Library of the University of Toronto

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from University of Toronto

http://archive.org/details/canhomejournal1912toro

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

JULY
1911

TRAVEL NUMBER

PRICE
10 CENTS

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

Made in Canada

MAGIC NO ALUM BAKING POWDER

Much has been said and many reasons given why a baking powder that contains Alum should not be used. Are there any good reasons that can be given by the manufacturers of Alum baking powder why Alum should be used in baking powder. Do you prefer to use the Alum kinds? In some countries the sale of Alum baking powder is prohibited by law. Magic Baking Powder does not contain Alum and costs no more than the ordinary kinds.

Magic Baking Powder

Conforms to the High Standard of Gillett's Goods.

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

WINNIPEG TORONTO, ONT. MONTREAL

Try this Thirsty Flour

A very thirsty flour. Absorbs a lot of water.
Because it contains so much gluten.
Manitoba wheat is wonderfully rich in sturdy gluten.
And, think of it, FIVE ROSES is milled exclusively from the very cream of the Manitoba wheat berries.
So FIVE ROSES must be awfully thirsty, don't you see.
In your mixing bowl it greedily absorbs more water.
So you get more loaves than usual without using more flour. You use less.
Your flour lasts longer, doesn't it?
Less trips to your dealer.
That's how FIVE ROSES saves money.
Actually saves YOU money.
Use this economical flour.

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY LIMITED KEEWATIN TRADE MARK REGISTERED Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY LIMITED, MONTREAL

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.

Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00 (8s.) post paid.

We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by

THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED

59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

EDITORIAL CHAT

OUR CONTRIBUTORS are usually mindful of the general rules of journalistic work; but we should like them to remember that a manuscript should always be accompanied by stamped and addressed envelope for return, in case that the offering should prove unavailable. Complaints occasionally reach us of manuscripts which have gone astray. The writer's name and address should always be written on the manuscript, as the accompanying letter may very easily be mislaid. The editor can assume no responsibility with regard to manuscripts, although care is taken of all articles sent to the office. It is well for authors to retain a copy of manuscript forwarded as a contribution. It is not advisable to send more than one manuscript at a time. Individual criticism cannot be given, as so many manuscripts reach us that it would be impossible to follow such a course. Nor can we hope to accept all the "good" articles and stories which are sent to us, and rejection by no means implies lack of literary merit. When you take into consideration that there are only twelve issues of this magazine during the year, the would-be contributor can readily understand that acceptance of only a limited number of the best manuscripts is possible. It is well to have your article typewritten, although legible hand-writing is still sure of a careful reading. Illustrated articles are especially desired, and we should be glad to have articles of special domestic interest from some of our young graduates from the Macdonald Institute.

OUR SERIAL FICTION this month gains in interest with the second instalments. "A Honeymoon in Hiding" is just the humorous and eventful bit of fiction that will keep you interested during a summer afternoon. It will be concluded before the autumn and another serial of a similar nature will succeed. "The House of Windows," by Isabel Ecclestone MacKay, is the most imposing work of fiction we have published, and will be continued throughout the year. Those who read the first chapters in our June number will be eager to follow the fortunes of that deserted infant and will find the situation increasingly dramatic as the small Christine grows into womanhood. This story is the first production of "novel" proportions which Mrs. MacKay has written, and its progress will be watched with interest by all who admire her fiction and poetry.

SHORT STORIES are always in demand, and we are pleased to find among new contributors those whose work is well worth considering. We are sure that you will agree with us that "Orchard Lodge—and Nan" and "Mrs. Jim's Holiday" in the present issue, both from new writers, are interesting and brightly written. As a rule, we avoid stories which are dismal in ending or pessimistic in idea, as we consider the sunny side of the road the more pleasant and profitable. Serious problem stories or those of depressing tendencies are not desired—only bright, clean stories, such as the family circle enjoy. In our August number, you will find a delightful summer story by Kate H. Miles, a New Brunswick writer, who has written for us more than once, and whose sense of humor gives a piquant flavor to her narratives.

OUR HOUSEHOLD DEPARTMENT is hardly as busy during the summer months as when the leaves are falling. Yet, housekeeping is going on in July and August, even if some of our housewives manage to leave for a month's rest, and change. This month, in "Household Decoration," Miss Rorke is giving you an excellent talk on flowers and their use in home decoration. A room with a bowl of roses or a vase of carnations on the table can hardly be commonplace, and the art of arranging these with most graceful effect is to be encouraged. We can hardly hope to rival the Japanese, whose children are taught from infancy to arrange cherry blossoms or plum blossoms, so as to create the illusion of an orchard. But we may study, more carefully than we do, the effectiveness of a few flowers in brightening the aspect of a severe library or prosaic sitting-room until it looks as if it had caught something of "God's Own Out-doors." The article in the present issue deals with the best means of accomplishing this floral adornment. Miss Rorke will be pleased to answer questions concerning household decoration from any of her readers who are in perplexity regarding the many vexed questions of carpeting, papering, and cushioning, to say nothing of the minor details which make the adorning of a home.

SUMMER CAMPING is one of the most invigorating experiences one may enjoy, and it is to be encouraged as a means of renewed health and energy. It is not, however, to be made a matter of experiment, or there will be much discomfort on the part of those who have gone unprepared. In an article, "Women as Campers," Miss Ridout gives you some useful information as to dress and equipment which will prove helpful to those who are camping for the first time.

THE ADVERTISING DEPARTMENT of any modern journal is to be considered most seriously as an indication of the esteem in which it is held in the business world. A comparison of our advertising contents with any other Canadian publication will show you that we are keeping well to the front, as to the character and extent of our advertising. Women are the buyers for the household; and a journal like ours, which is intended especially for the home circle, reaches directly those who are most interested in household supplies. Consequently, we exercise all reasonable care that the articles advertised in our columns should be of the best class. Every magazine with a high standard in advertising is obliged to reject the class known as "objectionable." Our readers may show their appreciation of our care in that respect by mentioning to firms which they patronize that the introduction to their wares took place in the columns of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

CONTENTS

July 1911

FICTION

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS (Serial) - - 10
ORCHARD LODGE—AND NAN - - 12
MRS. JIM'S HOLIDAY - - - - 13
A HONEYMOON IN HIDING (Serial) - 14
A CAT'S REMINISCENCES - - - 16
THE OLD CHIMNEY - - - - - 31

TRAVEL FEATURES

IN THE DINING-CAR - - - - 6
IN THE FAR NORTH - - - - - 8
WOMEN AS CAMPERS - - - - 9

FASHION DEPARTMENT

FROCKS OF LINEN AND BATISTE - 22
THE FITTING GLOVES - - - - 22
AFTERNOON GOWNS - - - - 23
MIDSUMMER GOWNS - - - - 23
FANCY PEASANT BLOUSE - - - 24
THE HOUSE JACKET - - - - 25
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - 28
DAINTY SUMMER EMBROIDERIES - 35

MATTERS OF MENU

A JULY LUNCHEON - - - - - 17
HOUSEHOLD EXCHANGE - - - - 29
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - 41

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 20
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - - - 40

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - - 16
AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 18
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - - 19
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - - - 30
THE DRESSING TABLE - - - - 37
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY - - 42

MISCELLANEOUS

EDITORIAL CHAT - - - - - 3
EDITORIALS - - - - - - 5
THE SERVANT QUESTION - - - 34
WHAT WON'T WOMEN WEAR? - - 34
FROM THE PUBLISHERS - - - - 35

Contents copyrighted 1911 at the Department of Agriculture, Ottawa, by the Canadian Woman's Magazine Pu... Toronto, Can...

TIRED OUT? AND THIRSTY?

Do you want a drink that will brace you up—quench your thirst—be so full of deliciousness and strength that you'll forget most of your troubles? Then try

E. D. SMITH'S GRAPE JUICE

It is pressed from the choicest Concord Grapes grown in the "garden of Canada." It is absolutely pure, containing nothing but Pure Grape Juice and Pure Sugar. Products bearing the "E. D. Smith" trade mark stand the hardest tests for purity. Recently Government analysis tested Smith's jams and pronounced every sample true to name and unquestionably pure—other older, better known products could not stand the same test

Smith's Grape Juice is sold by Druggists and Grocers at 25c. the bottle.

E. D. SMITH = WINONA, ONT.

Canadian Home Needlework

Is Given to You

For One Subscription To Canadian Home Journal Both For $1.00

(Club Price, 5 Combination Orders $4.00)

Canadian Home Needlework encourages and enthuses while it instructs. It is crammed full of new ideas in most attractive things to make, and new ways of making old things. It shows dainty children's clothes, exquisite lingerie, beautiful lace and silk waists, gift articles of all kinds, stenciling. Every Spring, Summer, Fall, and Winter it has the latest designs for the seasons, and all are entirely original.

Needlework is a mark of refinement, and a taste for it is easily acquired when an attractive magazine of this character is in the home.

EARNING PIN MONEY

This premium offer has made it wonderfully easy for our subscription workers to secure orders. In every town we need some one with spare time to tell all their neighbors of this offer. Also we need experienced solicitors to give all their time to the work. Do you know of any? All are unusually liberally repaid for their work.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, TORONTO

"Not the search for pleasure, wealth or even honor, but, like her, to live always aspiring, helping and loving, and to leave behind a world sweeter, better and purer where our feet have passed, is the best purpose to which our own brief life can be turned."

JUST ONE BLUE BONNE

A RECORD OF A BEAUTIFUL LIFE
SWEET, TOUCHING, UNSELFISH, TRUE

The Life Story of Ada Florence Kinto

ARTIST AND SALVATIONIST

Told mostly by herself with pen and pencil. Edited by her sister,

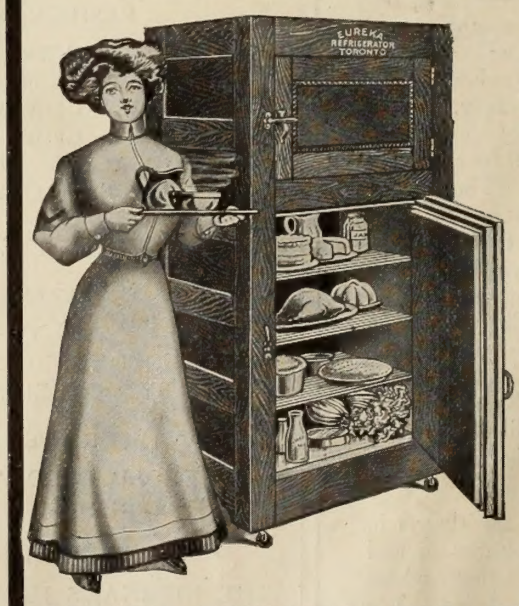
SARA A. RANDLESON

Cloth, with 23 illustrations, $1.00 net.
POSTPAID

This is one of the most beautiful and touching books which has ever been issued from our presses. It is a book to read and re again and then pass on to your friends.

WILLIAM BRIGGS 29-37 Richmond West, Toronto

"EUREKA" REFRIGERATO



installed 25 years ago are as ever and doing splendid That fact is an evidence superior workmanship ar terials used in their consti "Eurekas" are made to las time, and they have prove Besides, the air circulatio "Eureka" is perfect. Ab no foul or stagnant air can owing to our patented sy air circulation, which kee cubic inch of air in the r ator "on the move," carr impurities away in the water.

The air in a "Eureka" is th always pure, dry and col keeping all foodstuffs pe sweet and wholesome.

Handsomely finished in a lined with odorless spruce uine porcelain, and there i ing about the "Eureka" to corrode and poison the foo "EUREKA" HOUSEHOL FRIGERATORS ARE DIRECT TO THE USE FACTORY PRICES.

Write or phone Parkd for illustrated catalog call at the factory. Queen Street West car at Avenue—Noble Stree block north.

EUREKA REFRIGERATOR CO., Ltd., TORON

PICKERING COLLE

Newmarket A RESIDENT SCHOOL Ont

28 Miles North of Toronto

A residential school, with Preparatory, Commercial, and Collegiate Courses, Music and Art.

LARGE GROUNDS, new buildings, beautifully situated, with perfect sanitary e ment, electric light, steam heating, roomy, well-ventilated class and bed-rooms, e one of which receives direct sunlight.

COMPETENT instruction, firm discipline, and home-like Christian influences with these material advantages to make Pickering College worthy of your confid

Fall Term commences Sept. 11, 1911. For Announcement write

W. P. FIRTH, M.A., B.Sc., Principal. -:- NEWMARKET, ONT

10 Cents a Copy

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Volume VIII

TORONTO, JULY, 1911

In Coronation Month

WE are receiving lately solemn warnings as to our prosperity and what we are to do with it. Bankers and other prominent citizens in positions of trust are extremely anxious that Canadians should not spend their money foolishly, and these gentlemen exert themselves in public speech and paragraph to urge them to invest their spare funds in safe and sure undertakings.

We seem to have entered upon a period of good times when everyone is busy and happy. Canadians are spending a good deal of money in these days of Cobalt and Porcupine, and much of it is wisely spent in travel. There is no place like home, but it is just as well to see the other places, too. This year has seen an unprecedented number of Canadians cross the Atlantic to see the great pageant of the Coronation. The broadening influence of meeting fellow-citizens from all corners of the British Empire will be felt as a lifelong experience by those who are observant and sympathetic.

While King George V. is the centre of imperial interest, his wife receives public attention to an almost equal degree. The names of Victoria, Alexandra and Mary are associated with all the domestic virtues, as well as with the dignity of high position, and the esteem in which the present Queen Consort is held is significant of the regard which the British people have for the "old-fashioned" type of woman. Her dislike of fashionable vagaries and of the extreme dissipations of "smart" society is well known, and her example will doubtless do much towards giving a healthy tone to Court festivities. Her well-known concern in all the practical details of home life shows the genuine housewife, and her taste for good literature and the quieter diversions is assurance of the true gentlewoman's nature. May King George long reign over us and may Queen Mary continue to be a "shining example" in her royal home.

* * *

The Estate of Matrimony

THE last three months have seen and heard an extraordinary amount of discussion of our marriage laws. In spite of the many disquisitions by learned judges and clergymen, the June bride seemed to be as fair and sweet as ever, quite unterrified by the tumult in the land.

With regard to the consideration of the famous Hebert case, most of us will agree with the declaration of a Montreal editor: "If it is found that the present laws give any religious denomination greater powers than other religious denominations, the laws will have to be altered."

Canadians have had some reason to be gratified with the stability of their marriage laws and with the infrequency of application for divorce. In fact, the divorce evil can hardly be said to exist in Canada, so seldom is it resorted to by the citizens of the Dominion. A country which has lax divorce laws, and which regards marriage lightly, may be prosperous to outward seeming, but can have no stability as a state.

As in all undesirable conditions, the positive side of this matter is the better to consider. We need not waste any time in discussing or deploring unhappy marriages or in unsavory flaunting of domestic infelicity. So far as the rising generation is concerned, the great seriousness and sacredness of the marriage bond are to be impressed, if the future alliance is to be a contribution to ... citizenship. Plays and novels, which are continually holding marriage as a joke and exhibiting marital infelicity as a mere foible, are a most unhealthy influence in this respect, and should be avoided by all who see the serious side of life.

Where there are such differences ... to make the household a scene of dissension ... reflect upon the outcome. Marriage, which ... matter of impulse, in which there is no higher ... the gratification of a fleeting fancy, is hardly ... make a happy home.

The Summer Guest

JULY and August are ... months for ... of the year and are looked forward to during the other ten months by a host of small persons who are reserving all manner of delights for "the good old summertime."

Summer is, to some weary housewives, however, no season of enjoyment, for it is then that the selfish city cousin elects "to send the children out to the country to visit Cousin Mary." There have been many patient Cousin Marys in the land who have endured the yearly invasion of noisy young relatives with never a protest. But "it is time for a change," and Cousin Mary is beginning to insinuate that the small cousins from the city had better be sent to a Muskoka hotel or a cottage at the beach. Country air and food are delightful for the children, to be sure; but parents need not selfishly shift their own obligations on others and expect the country cousin to be delighted by a wholesale camping out in the farm house.

Summer is a busy time for the farmer's wife, who has to look after the fruit and the barnyard, to say nothing of supplying the material needs of threshers. There is no one more hospitable than the wife of the Canadian farmer; but the summer visitor is often so thoughtless as to tax her patience severely.

If you are going to visit in the country, consult in every way the convenience and the wishes of your hostess and make your stay of such judicious length that she will be quite sincere in the farewell remark: "I hope you will come again—soon."

* * *

The Comic Supplement

ONE of the Boston papers has opposed with all its might the vulgarity and tawdriness of the "comic" supplement. This atrocity is becoming all too familiar in Canadian homes. The teachers in several cities have protested against its extensive reading as demoralizing to juvenile manners. These colored supplements, which disfigure the Saturday issues of many of our journals, are bad art and worse literature. They make a special feature of ridicule of the weak or aged, and can hardly fail to encourage a spirit of coarseness and cruelty in the youth of the land.

A famous English writer of the nineteenth century attributes his knowledge of the best in art to the influence of his father, who would not allow him to see a bad picture in childhood. The culture, which is so slow in leavening ignorance and crudity, will not be hastened by a generation which finds food for mirth in the comic supplement. Mothers, fathers and teachers are represented in an absurd and unworthy light as shrews and tyrants. By all means let the children be amused and entertained by sketches in which there is real fun and a degree of artistic merit, but it is as much the duty of a householder to have clean reading matter for the children as to have pure food on the table.

IN THE DINING CAR

...tion of Equipment and Expenditure in Order that the Public may have Meals on Wheels

By CANADIENNE

...EON is now being served in the dining car!" Is there a more welcome announcement to the hungry traveler than this resounding call? It echoes through the corridors of the ... train until every passenger is aware that a square and sump... meal is his or hers for the ordering. There are all varieties ...uncheons to be enjoyed in this world—the "ladies' luncheon," ...e flower-decked tables and the most picturesque salads make ... believe that eating is indeed a fine art—the luncheon at the ..., where a woman enjoys the variety of seeing how men keep ...se—and the luncheon al fresco, when a picnic party disposes ... on the grass and proceeds to discover that the ham sand... wiches and raspberry tarts have become inextricably entangled.

To many of us, however, luncheon on a "diner" has a piquant quality which no mere "stationary" dining-room can afford. This ... age of movement, whether by transcontinental express, rac... ...or, or ascending aeroplane—and a moving dining-room has ...ided attraction for all except confirmed travelers, who survey ...e changing landscape without any sensation of surprise. To most ...f us the meal on the train is a novelty, and the first experience of such a repast is likely to create a desire for a series of such enjoy... able luncheons.

In the first place, there is the view to be considered, before we discuss the more material features. A bright dining-room is what the modern housewife insists upon—and the modern architect usually tries to fulfil her wishes. In the country the bright dining-...oom is obtained without contriving, but the housewife in the city ...sually has a struggle for sunshine in the room where meals are ...rved. In the train dining-room the view is unrivaled and has all the advantage of a moving picture. There are some imposing sights to be seen from the dining tables of Canadian hotels. The Chateau Frontenac, at old Quebec, has a long stretch of the lordly St. Lawrence; at Banff there are the crests of great mountains; at Victoria you may look from the Empress on Pacific waters; but from the window of the train diner you may see them all.

* * *

ONE would like to experience the sensations of a newcomer from the British Isles, who takes the tourist train in the East and travels across the continent, until he alights at a small station in the far West, where he is to take up land and some day have a homestead of his own. The C. P. R. takes him under its guidance, even before he crosses the broad, blue Atlantic, and looks after his welfare until he has fairly become a new settler.

INTERIOR OF A STANDARD DINING CAR.

The tourist train is, by no means, the comfortless affair which was used for emigrant traffic a generation ago. It is now equipped with what our grandparents would have considered luxury. In fact, the electrical devices are such as they would hardly have been credited, had the tourist train of 1911 been prophesied. The new settler is scarcely prepared to bear the expense of meals on the train, and is usually supplied with baskets of provisions for the long journey westward. Then the wife finds that she will be materially assisted in the furnishing of meals by the use of the "kitchenette," where tea or coffee may be prepared, and where other dishes may be heated. The kitchen on the tourist car is well worth a visit and assures the newcomer that "the comforts of home" are not forgotten in the younger land. Many a homesick woman, as she sips the "cup of kindness" and gazes from the car window on lake and hillside and prairie, forgets the old scenes for the moment and looks forward to the homestead that is yet to be built.

To see the magical effect of hope on the faces of new settlers, you have but to watch the passengers, as the wide lands of the West come in sight. They have heard of this granary of empires, and now they actually see the billowy fields, rolling in green or gold luxuriance to the horizon's verge. The weariness of the journey is forgotten for the time, as they gaze on the promise of the new land. To those who have seen the comfort of the new tourist trains, the old days, of which Robert Louis Stevenson wrote in his description of an emigrant train crossing the continent, seem hardship indeed

* * *

THERE is hardly anyone who is indifferent to the furnishing of the scene of eating. Nothing is less appetizing than a stuffy or shabby dining-room. Truly has it been said that hunger is the best sauce. The man who is almost starving probably pays little attention to the dining-room furniture; but, under normal conditions, it is worth consideration, and, with the progress of civilization, it has come to mean a great deal.

The improving equipment of our trains might ... ly as an index of Canada's advancement in ... ...ure. Compare the coloring and style of ... trains with the gaudy upholstery of the early days. In the modern dining-car everything is cool and restful, with a soft richness of coloring which puts one in the humor for broiled trout and Saratoga chips.

No one can be indifferent to the gleam of polished wood, the sheen of velvet cushions, or the daintiness of silken curtains. All these details make a perfect fitting for the meal which is to be eaten as one travels. Then, there is the all-important matter of table linen. Only the snowiest of tablecloths and napery will be allowed, "done up" in a style which is the last word in laundry perfection. The practical housewife immediately begins a mental estimate of what the laundry bills of a transcontinental line must mean. The C. P. R. system, for instance, has one hundred and fifteen dining cars on the move from coast to coast. There are about one thousand meals served daily, and the rule of the road is immaculate cleanliness. So, it is not difficult to see with the mind's eye a pile of tablecloths and serviettes, from each day's service, which would keep more than several laundries busy. The woman who has always regarded "looking after the family wash" as an important duty is rather bewildered as she contemplates the vastness of railroad housekeeping. Meals on wheels are not prepared, served, and cleared away without an immense amount of planning and expenditure, and the secret of it all is organization.

There has to be system of the sternest kind from the head to the most youthful servitor, in order that the day's work shall be carried out successfully. The rules for ordering, purchasing, and cooking are absolute, and discipline such as no Canadian housewife would dare to enforce with the ordinary Mary Ann is rigidly maintained.

There are no haphazard methods in running the dining-car. Such a thing as "pot luck" is unknown, and you may "ask a friend to dinner" with the perfect assurance that the dishes will be cooked to perfection. The system allows for no delinquencies, and every member of the elaborate service knows his duties and the penalty for neglecting them. It is a man-made system, and a woman becomes humble for a few moments as she realizes that masculine heads and hands plan and carry out this great wholesale housekeeping.

* * *

IN the eyes of a good housekeeper, the kitchen is of the unmost importance; and, some day, the architect will take a woman's advice and plan for a good-sized kitchen. On the train, the kitchen is a curious compartment, with the maximum of contrivances and the minimum of space. "How do they even manage to do such good cooking in such narrow quarters?" is a question which arises naturally to feminine lips. The chef must have almost supernatural dexterity in order to look after a multitude of orders in such a restricted territory. But the inspection of the kitchen arrangements shows that everything is in what our grandmothers called apple-pie order, that each dish and spoon are in their own place, and that it would be quite impossible for the former to run away with the latter, in the fashion of the ancient nursery rhyme.

Everyone knows that it is much more difficult to keep a small room in order than one of imposing size. Consequently, when the limited area of a dining-car kitchen is considered, the necessity for its being kept in the strictest order is obvious to all who have had to do with culinary affairs. "The kitchen of a dining-car," says a traveler who knows, "is a most exaggerated example of the economy of space. Every inch is used. Water tanks are suspended from the ceiling. One wall is lined with the big range and heating ovens, while on the others are storage-boxes, receptacles for pans, pots, and other utensils, and a row of cupboards up under the ceiling. At one end, between the kitchen and the dining-room proper, is a little pantry which serves as a sort of vestibule. That is where the waiters place their orders and receive dishes. Every separate article of food and equipment has its place. Every corner and nook in the car has a particular function. The silver is in one place, the milk and cheese in another, and so on through the list. Everything perishable is kept in a refrigerator."

The supplies for the dining-car must be regulated by one who has a genius for the commissariat. Consider, on the C. P. R., for instance, what a thousand meals daily must mean! A cup of tea or coffee is a simple matter—but it takes pounds and pounds for a day's travel—and the year will easily dispose of tons of these cheering and stimulating beverages. Then there are gallons and ...ons of milk to flow in a lacteal stream from the Atlantic to the ...ic in the co... ... the ... pil... ... Meat is, perhaps, the ...ifficult item ... ... to provide and cook; but the matter ... is preserved in the matter of supplies enables the calcula... ...o be made wi... almost mathematical probab...y.

THE variety of our own food supply can easily be grasped by one who notices the changes as the train proceeds across the continent. The sea products are naturally the popular orders near the coast, and how one appreciates the flavor of the "truly salt fish"! In our lake regions the freshly-caught trout and whitefish abound. Each of us has a favorite dish or delicacy which lingers in the memory—or whatever does duty for a gustatory remembrance. My own preference is for broiled whitefish and Saratoga chips, eaten to the accompaniment of a view of blue lake and dark pines, and followed by such apple pie and coffee as dreams are made of—or nightmares, if you are that miserable being, a nervous dyspeptic. It is always dangerous to advise about a book or a dish, as tastes are the most different endowments in this world of infinite variations. Yet, one feels that there must be something wrong with the traveler who cannot enjoy broiled fish and a lake prospect.

The ventilation of the dining-car in earlier days left much to be desired. In summer, an open window meant cinders and coal dust and general discomfort. In winter, an open window meant colds, while closed windows meant stuffiness; but, in the modern car, the use of the latest design in screens allows one to enjoy a gentle breeze, without the fear that one's hair is going to be blown into dishevelled confusion, and that one's collar is becoming hopelessly grimy.

The workers in the dining-car kitchen also have reason to be grateful for the breeze which a swiftly-moving car sends through their narrow quarters. If it were not for this constant ventilation the culinary authorities would hardly be able to superintend in any comfort the preparations for breakfast, luncheon, and dinner, and would be giving "warning" some warm July day.

Marvellous are the uses of electricity as employed in modern travel. If there is no regular dining-car on the train, the pressure of an ivory button brings a waiter with an "impromptu" table, which is deftly attached to the brass fixture in the side of the car, and, behold, you may have a small spread all to yourself, with a tempting array of the menu before you. A word of advice may here be offered to the feminine traveler. Many women imagine that a train journey is an experience which does not call for regular meals, and will undertake a trip of several hours' duration on the strength of an orange or a couple of bananas. Now, that is an entirely mistaken policy, which you would do well to avoid. It is no wonder that so many women arrive at their destination with "such a splitting headache that they can hardly see." There is no economy in going without the necessary food and giving yourself genuine physical discomfort as a result. Either provide yourself with a suitable and adequate luncheon, or obtain such on the train.

It was a Canadian woman writer, Sara Jeannette Duncan, now Mrs. Everard Cotes, who wrote years ago that interesting description of a trip across the continent in a C. P. R. train. That entertaining account, "A Social Departure," tells of the adventures of the author and her friend, Orthodocia, who proceeded to Japan, India, and Egypt, in the course of their travels. The writer declares emphatically: "My ideal luggage is a toothbrush and an umbrella." That is an eminently sensible ambition, and, bearing it in mind, I have always disliked the "lunch box" on the train. It is usually very much in the way, and the contents seldom prove all that one had hoped for. Women are learning to travel in comfort, and to follow the example of their men relatives in the matter of dispensing with all except necessary luggage. The lunch box will soon be left at home, except for the cheap excursion or the Sunday School picnic, and the woman traveler will fortify herself with a substantial meal in the course of a half-day's journey.

A BRIGHT AFTERNOON IN THE TOURIST "SLEEPER."

A MILE A MINUTE ON THE TRANSCONTINENTAL

MOUNTAINS AND PRAIRIE FROM THE OBSERVATION CAR.

* * *

THE variety in menu is the difficult matter for consideration. "What the man who eats on the train is most interested in," says a railroad authority, "is the menu. It is by the variety of dishes, as well as by the way they are served that the management is judged. If the passenger doesn't find what he wants he is dissatisfied. There are as many different tastes as there are men and women; and, if it be true that many people like the same thing it is equally true that few people like the same combination. Here is where the man at the top, the superintendent himself, comes in strong. Culinary secrets are no secrets to him, as he has studied the subject backward and forward. From his years of experience he has gained an accurate insight into the gastronomic preferences of the traveling public. Not a day passes but that he examines and puts into final shape the menu that is to appear later on the dining-cars."

In the "shopping" for the railroad table nothing is left to chance, and no allowance can be made for tradesmen who fail to deliver the goods. The butcher or the grocer who deals with a dining-car must be on time with the best of supplies—or—there are others who are willing to live up to the schedule. It is done according to absolute rules and specifications. Bone and useless material must be eliminated from the meat supplies; the fruit must be fresh and of a certain variety, and thus, throughout the list, from bouillon to coffee.

One of the important matters in a private household is knowing how much to order. The woman who attains the happy medium between extravagance and "skimpiness" has gone far towards good management. When she has invited "company," how anxious she is to know just how many to provide for, lest she be in the position of an improvident hostess. She wonders how the housekeeping authorities on the railroad can possibly know the extent of the necessary supplies. Here the law of average, as learned from experience, must come in to regulate the orders. Fruit is, probably, the most speculative item on the menu, and it is ordinarily difficult to provide for contingencies in connection with summer travel. Yet, if you desire an ideal summer dish, especially for the early meal, order a canteloupe, which comes fresh and chilled, and ripely delicious to the table.

There is, of course, more than one cook required on each dining-car. In the C. P. R. system, from three to five are in active employment, and from two to six waiters. On the transcontinental trains there is necessarily a more elaborate equipment than on those which make less extended trips.

Canadians of pioneer days knew nothing of the sleeping car, and even the arrangements on the boats of the St. Lawrence and Great Lakes service were such as would lead the modern traveler to write a letter to the papers or send a protest to the directors of the company.

The up-to-date sleeper is not the chamber of fortune, as to stuffiness, that one found in the first sleeping-cars. Miss Agnes Repplier has declared that the American sleeping-car is a barbarous institution. That criticism applies only to the heavily-hung, airless "creations" of unhappier days. The railroad authorities in Canada have learned that the public desires sleep, not suffocation, and the provision for light and comfort is such as the fastidious traveler might desire. But the most delightful scene of summer travel is the observation car, with its luminous opportunities for seeing the beauties of the country through which you pass. "You haven't seen Canada until you have seen the Rockies," is the enthusiastic exclamation of nearly every traveler who goes out to the Pacific Coast.

IN THE FAR NORTH

An Interesting Expedition into the Primeval Wilds

By LOUISE BELMONT

FOR those who are fond of the joys of outdoor life and travel, it is doubtful if a more enjoyable trip could be conceived or planned than that right in our own North-West from Edmonton to Grand Rapids and back to the Pas, over the chain of small lakes and down the broad expanse of the Saskatchewan to its mouth at Grand Rapids, where it empties into Lake Winnipeg. The writer had the good fortune to make this trip in the autumn, and the picturesque beauties and interesting experiences encountered made the journey an ever memorable one.

With one exception of touching at Prince Albert, the trip was made through the primeval wilds, far from railways, waterworks, electric lights, fashions and such landmarks of civilization—and oh, what a delight it was to be able to go about in short skirts and without a hat, drifting from morn to night daily with skilful Indian guides at the paddle, and nothing to do but read or eat sweets to the heart's content!

These Indian guides know the north country like a book. They are not only expert canoeists, but crack shots (always shooting on the wing), and able to prepare as appetizing a meal and as comfortab'e a camp on short notice, as one could meet in many a day's march. These guides—at least those in our party—were always good natured, and though naturally taciturn, were always willing to enlighten us in their very much broken English, regarding the many points of interest encountered. While seldom exhibiting any show of their feelings, they did appear to be surprised that a girl should undertake a trip of this kind—and more than that, enjoy it—but if they had lived all of their lives among the clang and rattle of a big city, they would understand why I was so delighted at everything I saw.

FOR rations on this trip, we took tea, sugar' bacon, salt, a little jam and bannock (the latter being the Indian substitute for bread)—and for fresh meat we trusted to the Indians' guns, which, by the way, never failed them. Although using only the old muzzle loaders, never do I remember seeing them fail to bring down the moose or the duck they went after—and the latter were encountered literally in great clouds on the little lakes. The writer had been accustomed to consider herself a pretty fair shot at a stationary target, but target shooting is very different from wing shooting, and it required quite a few days' practice before even tolerable proficiency was attained in the latter direction.

Our first object of special interest was encountered at Prince Albert, where we saw all that remains of one of the two steam boats that ran the blockade during the rebellion of 1885. This boat is in a much better state of preservation than the other one which we saw later on during our journey, and which lies almost buried in the sand at Cumberland House, the first inland post of the Hudson's Bay Company.

The most exciting experience of the trip—and one of the most thrilling which it has ever been my lot to enter upon—was the running of the rapids at Grand Rapids, where the Saskatchewan empties into Lake Winnipeg. The five miles was done in twenty minutes, which as the boys say, is "going some," and the guides seemed not a little surprised that a girl should wish to undertake this more or less dangerous trip. However, all's well that ends well, and we were amply repaid for any rough or hazardous experiences we may have had, by the most delightful camp that was made for us, with great roaring fires and soft beds of fragrant spruce boughs right out in the open with nothing overhead but the blue canopy and the glittering stars, while the music of the trees and the rapids lulled us to sleep. There is an Indian encampment at this point which we visited, drinking tea and exchanging presents with the silent but friendly people. Much of what we received from the Indian women were specimens of their skill with the needle in silk and bead work on leather. Almost invariably these designs are executed in very bright colors, but of pleasing and harmonious contrasts, and the designs themselves are generally artistic and such as would do credit to a skilled needlewoman in Toronto.

ANOTHER feature of unusual interest was seen at the Pas, viz., the old mission, and the furniture which was made for it, by the members of the Franklin Relief Expedition which wintered at this point fifty years ago. The church which they built has gone the way of all wooden edifices, but it has been replaced by a neat structure of more modern appearance, which, however, contains the furniture made by them, still in an excellent state of preservation. When it is remembered that this furniture was all made by hand and in one winter, one can but wonder at the skill and industry displayed by these men. The furniture consists of seats for the church, pulpit, reading desks, font and commandment frames, while for the parsonage adjoining, there are a dining table, chairs and chests of drawers. Also there may be seen here an old sun dial, made by the members of this party, and which still does active duty. As a matter of fact, this sun dial was examined a couple of years ago by two astronomers from the Carnegie Institute at Washington, and pronounced correct. The Indians on this reserve are very proud of all these things, and will not part with any of them on any consideration.

THE PAS FROM THE INDIAN RESERVE

LUNCH ON THE SASKATCHEWAN

A CAMP EN ROUTE

The new line to Hudson's Bay which is being constructed by the Canadian Northern Railway, has now reached the Pas, and the little station, as well as the great engines and cars which come thundering in from time to time, are a never-ending source of curiosity to the stolid Indians, who never moved and just grunted once when they saw the engine for the first time—probably in disapproval of the innovation, for most of them do not care much for the advent of the white man's methods into their country. Although the construction of this road would appear to the ordinary traveller to be a good deal of an experiment, still if it cuts off one thousand miles in the voyage to Liverpool as compared to the Montreal route, it would appear to be financially justified, and will probably prove a great boon to the farmers of the West. An engineering undertaking of considerable magnitude is involved in the construction of a great bridge which is necessary to cross the Saskatchewan at the Pas, and work upon which has been started. Every day, numbers of the Indians go down to watch the progress of this work, and will stand for hours watching the great pile driver at work, scarcely moving a muscle or making a sound.

When we reached the Pas, it was to face a good old northern blizzard and a drop to 50° below zero, but we were properly equipped for the snap and thoroughly enjoyed the wild ride with the "huskies" over the ice and snow. This is the only method of transportation in the north once the winter sets in, and is really very delightful—so much so, that I have decided to make another journey out there, and get away from the noisy motor horns, the P.A.Y.E. cars, and the multitude of other discordant sights and sounds of the highly civilized (?) East.

Camping Notes

IT is the part of wisdom to locate your camp near a spring of clear, cold water. Water is one of the greatest necessities of camp life.

It is best to wall the fireplace around with stones. This keeps your fuel together and concentrates the heat.

Drive forked sticks into the ground on opposite sides of the fireplace, and lay a stout stick across them. Then suspend your cooking pots from this bar. The crosspiece should be as green as possible, otherwise it will soon take fire and give way. It is unpleasant to have your beans drop into the fire just as you are ready to eat them.

Be sure that you take with you only the things you are going to need. Little extras count up, and you will find that there is little enough room in a tent for articles that are really necessary.

The writer has found, however, that there is one thing which, though not strictly necessary, nevertheless adds greatly to the pleasures of camp life—the kodak. Pictures of your camping activities and surroundings always prove fascinating souvenirs of the summer days.

If you are not a hard worker, but seek some unconventional form of recreation, by all means try camping.

PILE-DRIVERS AT WORK ON NEW BRIDGE ACROSS THE SASKATCHEWAN AT THE PAS

WOMEN AS CAMPERS

A Consideration of Clothing and Equipment

By DORA S. RIDOUT

ALTHOUGH few of the many splendid books on camping devote any space to women as campers, there are, nevertheless, many excellent "woodsmen" belonging to the weaker sex.

It is, unfortunately, only too true that even in the woods the question of clothes follows women. But once the main lines have been decided upon, there only remains the necessity of improving and curtailing.

The following suggestions apply to fairly easy camping trips in the months of July and August, and perhaps the early part of September.

Women should try above all things to "travel light." Nothing will be a greater recommendation in the eyes of masculine campers. Whether the trip is to be merely an aimless wandering through well-known lakes and rivers, or a vigorous fortnight's paddle through new regions, cut down your personal kit to the bare necessities, being careful, however, to leave nothing essential behind.

The important questions of tents, blankets, and cooking utensils I leave to more experienced campers, such as Kephart and Stewart Edward White, and turn my attention to the vexed problems of the woman's camping clothes. The above authorities give many pages to the discussion of men's apparel, but dismiss women's outfit in a sentence or two. This, of course, is only natural, experience being the best schoolmaster in such matters.

To begin with, the hat.—A soft felt slouch hat or an old Panama are both good. The straw is light and cool, but the felt has the advantage of being partially rainproof.

The blouse, always a difficult article to decide upon.—Cotton is not really advisable, being cold and uncomfortable when wet, and tearing easily. Anything white is worse than useless. I wore a white jumper on my first trip and looked and felt disreputable all the time. A light flannel shirt, blue, grey, or brown, such as men wear, is excellent. Have the armholes made large and the collar turned down to obtain the greatest ease while paddling. The great charm about such a garment is that it is not clinging and uncomfortable in wet weather. Then, if one's space permits and the weather is warm take a pongee silk blouse, light, cool, and serviceable. This has been tried with great success. A fellow camper maintains that delaine is good, and it, perhaps, combines the essentials of the two mentioned, but it has an unhappy knack of tearing.

The skirt should be made of dark wool cloth, very tough, and made short. Some say that khaki is serviceable, but experience has proved this material difficult to dry, besides not shedding the dirt. Black material is impractical, as it absorbs the heat to a remarkable extent; brown and slate grey are very satisfactory colors in the woods. An underskirt of moreen or sateen will be found useful, especially in the event of anything happening to one's outer skirt. Bloomers are neat, but rather warm for midsummer camping.

FOR a sailing trip shoes must, of course, have rubber soles, and on a canoe trip they are good for rocky places; but, where the portages are heavy, they wear out too quickly. On one such occasion we came home literally safety-pinned into our shoes. Leather-soled footwear becomes dangerously slippery after a few days' scrambling over rocks. Mocassins with insoles are comfortable, but shoepacks are best of all.

One's night clothes should be kept dry at all costs. A complete set of flannels and a pair of woollen stockings will not be found too much, especially in the chilly hours of dawn. Keep these things rolled up in the blankets whether in camp or on the march.

A wide leather belt is almost a necessity as a support and for carrying a knife and hatchet. Cases to hold these may be slipped on to the belt, pushed round to the back, and kept safely out of the way.

Perhaps the most useful article of apparel in camp is the aforesaid knife. This is not the usual "bowie," but a small butcher's knife, which should have the steel running through to the end of the wooden handle. Have the blade ground down to a size that will make it comfortable to cut one's food with as well as for the hundred and one other uses that will be found for it.

For a long time I considered the art of chopping purely a masculine accomplishment. The few attempts I had made ended in my feebly chasing the log of wood, yards from the original chopping block. But now, having mastered the first principles of the art, it is difficult to know when to stop. There is infinite pleasure in swinging the hatchet and watching the neat strips fly from the log, or in felling a maple sapling, for tent poles, with a few vigorous strokes.

A hatchet in a leather case slung on the belt will be found a great convenience. There will then be no need to delay the making of a fire until the men are ready to get firewood. After settling upon the position of one's tents, the next important item is to find a suitable chopping block. There is nothing that rouses the ire of an old camper as quickly as he or she who will chop on stone or earth.

One change of clothing is ample, for washing in the warm, soft water of our Northern lakes amounts to a pleasure, while the same sized laundry done over a washtub would be unbearable drudgery. Therefore, in the "soapbag," a very important article, take a generous piece of laundry soap, as well as castile or any other favorite toilet soap. A good half-day may be spent scouring one's clothes—they may not be of the whiteness attained by the Chinaman, but they will be fresh and clean and sweet, and, like everything else in camp life, will give you that glorious feeling of independence and liberty unattainable elsewhere.

COOKING comes by rights under the woman's department; but it frequently happens that one of the men seizes this opportunity to show how it should be done, and for the most part his dishes are very creditable. All books on woodcraft devote a great deal of space to camp cookery, and, indeed, like many other aspects of camp life, is well-nigh an inexhaustible subject.

Everyone has ideas about camp fires, although most campers do not depart seriously from the approved models already established. It is always well to let the cook have his or her way in this matter. It is naturally trying to the temper to have to cook over a fire you do not approve of. One man of our acquaintance insisted upon putting the kettle on the ground and then building the fire around it, thus making it impossible to approach it and unnecessarily slow in boiling.

A MATTER OF KINDLING

PREPARING A PRIMITIVE FIREPLACE

A LAZY DAY

A cooking fire should be small and made directly under the pot. For general cooking I delight in a fire made either on rock or on flat stones made to form a hearth. At either end of the fireplace drive in crutched posts, and on these put a green hardwood pole. From this may be hung a succession of pots suspended over the fire by wooden pot hooks. Keep the kettles at one end over a brisk fire, while at the other end make a fire of bark and wood that will soon burn down and form glowing coals for frying and broiling. In this way a great deal of cooking may be done simultaneously. For a light mid-day meal, when only the kettle has to be boiled, place a green sapling a few feet long under one good-sized stone and over another to support it, and hang the kettle on the end.

An excellent hold-all has been devised by an experienced camper for holding one's personal kit. It is merely a piece of brown canvas, folded so as to form two pockets, with tapes sewn at the four corners. In this may be kept one's night clothes, and at night it should be stuffed with day clothes to form a pillow.

To those women who are fortunate enough to be taken on masculine camping parties I would say that in the long run it will save trouble to everyone concerned if they will not overdo it. It is a good plan to decide upon what one can carry on the portages and make herself responsible for it, whether it be one of the grub bags, or the cooking kit, or both, so that the men who have to carry canoes and duffle may feel confident that these important items are not being left behind.

In camp there are a thousand things to do, even if the cooking has been consigned to some man who especially enjoys it. The days are all too short to do all that to one seems possible.

If the stop is to be one of a week or so there are tables to make out of drift wood, and shelves for the grub bags, and the endless tidying up round the tents, for which one's fellow campers will be truly grateful. In fact, there are many ways in which a woman may make herself anything but a hindrance in a camp. She, however, has to prove herself, for, after all, there are many excellent housekeepers who would make wretched campers.

Camping Notes

YOUR sleeping-tent should be about five feet by seven. Such a tent may be bought for five or six dollars, and will more than pay for itself in comfort. At least one extra fly, to stretch overhead, adds enormously to camp comfort, especially on rainy days.

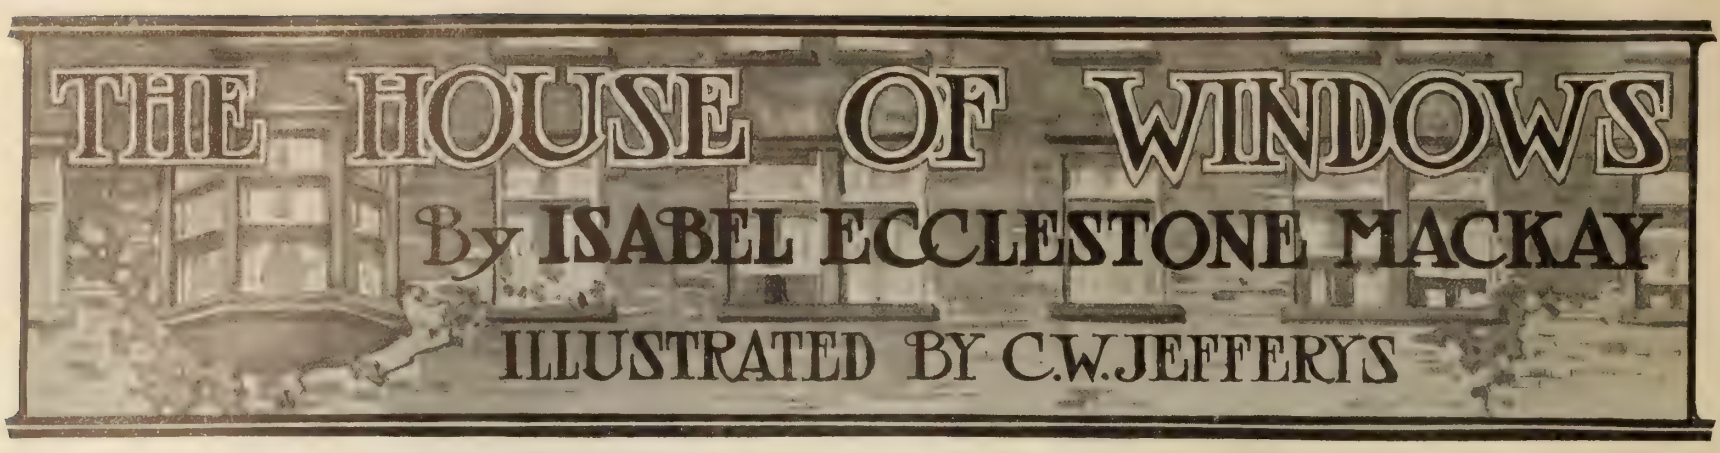
Strips of canvas of various lengths are always handy for covering things. Both flies and canvas pieces can be bought for from twenty-five to ninety cents a square yard, according to weight, the heavier grade being best if there is likely to be much rain.

For real comfort, and to meet all conditions of temperature, sleeping-bags are much better than blankets. These bags can be bought for from ten to fifteen dollars, according to the number of thicknesses of wool, and the patent appliances that finish the bag; but blankets sewed at the sides and ends, forming a bag, will do for any camp short of the Rocky Mountains.

A little care in the selection of your camping ground will save you a great deal of inconvenience. Find a level, grass-covered spot, between two trees just far enough apart to permit placing the ridge-pole of the tent between them. For this pole, a long, straight sapling is best. Set its ends in crotches of the two trees selected, and stretch your tent over the pole. That saves you the trouble of making tent-poles, and is a good deal stronger.

It is best to build a platform under your tent, as this insures a dry floor.

To build this platform, first lay a number of good-sized logs on the ground, parallel to each other. Block them up with stones, to make a solid foundation. Then nail your boards to the logs, taking care not to leave nails protruding. Campers have enough to do without bothering with torn clothing.



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant.

THE father, however, seemed scarcely to have heard him. His head was buried in his hands again and he made no reply. After a moment's indecision the detective, respecting his silence, went quietly from the room.

Outside, the solemn butler stepped up to him respectfully. "Any news, sir?" But before he could answer Mrs. Torrance's maid came down the stairs wiping her red eyes. "There's news enough," she said. "The dear little baby is dead. And the poor mistress!—hark, listen to her now!"

Through the quietness of the beautiful hall rang a woman's cry, "Elice, my baby Elice!"

. . . . . .

Down in the third floor back of 1620 Brook Street a tiny child slept peacefully in a cradle hastily fashioned out of a clothes basket. Over the cradle leant two young girls, and while one shaded the lamp with her hand the other leaned still closer and (in spite of certain principles in regard to the non-kissing of babies) left a light caress upon her placid forehead.

"Sleep well, little Christine," said Celia. "If one mother did not want you, you've found two mothers who do!"

CHAPTER V.

SIXTEEN years, which may very well work miracles with the suburbs of a city, may very well leave the older portions almost untouched. Here, for lack of space to build in, building has ceased; the streets, the pavements, the outward aspect of things remain the same, however much of changing life has passed them by. It is here, in the heart of the city, that the returning traveler recognizes his native place and feels at home again. One could, for instance, feel a comforting sense of the permanence of things by just walking into the stores of Angers & Son after a sixteen years' absense. Good old Angers! It gave one such a comfortable feeling to find it still there. Of course, in sixteen years Angers had grown, but it had grown mostly into the air, so that its face was like that of a child who has grown taller without losing his familiar aspect. Successive coats of paint had come and gone, but paint is only a change in the mode of dressing and makes no real difference. Inside, the changes were mostly in extent. There were openings upward and vistas where none had been before. There were more elevators, there were moving stairways, the aisles were wider, the departments larger, the whole concern bigger, busier, and more imposing. And yet one could not see much real change in Angers.

Take the ribbon counter, for instance. In the course of the sixteen years it had been moved almost all over the ground floor; but had now, in the process of shifting, come back to the exact place it had occupied when one visited it before. True, it was a glorified ribbon counter, with multiplied pyramids and superfine glass cases, and yet it was wonderfully like that other counter where a shabby go-cart had been left upon the occasion of a ribbon sale sixteen years ago. There were no go-carts there now, for none were allowed inside the doors; instead, one could find upon the top floor a playroom for waiting children—Angers believed in keeping up-to-date.

But if there was little real change in the identity of the stores themselves, the personnel of their various staffs of workers was almost completely altered. One searched eagerly for a familiar face. There used to be such a nice girl to whom one always went for gloves—one missed her; and the girl in the book department who could really recommend a good book was gone. Why! They were all different! Or was that a familiar face at the ribbon counter? One thought probably not, for it is harder to know a person after sixteen years than to recognize a store.

If one were really interested, however, one might recognize an old acquaintance in Mr. Harcourt Flynn, no longer floorwalker, but now manager of the furniture department, with much added dignity and a little office and telephone of his own. One might have recognized Mrs. Harcourt Flynn, also, had she happened to be doing some shopping, for this fortunate person was no less than Miss Twiss, that tall, dark girl with the large mouth, who used to be head of the ribbon counter, and who once came very near losing her place through carelessness in instructing her subordinates as to the rules regarding go-carts. Mr. and Mrs. Flynn made a fine looking couple, and Mr. Flynn was much respected in Angers. He was not an unkind man, but it had become quite a tradition of the stores that he was a man who would stand no nonsense and who insisted that things go smoothly in his department. (Incidentally, there was quite a little romance about this marriage, which we shall have to take for granted.) Many faces there were in the stores, most of them quite new, some half-remembered, some almost haunting in their blurred remembrances. Among the last one might place the face of the present head of the ribbon department. Did one know her or did one not? One puzzled over it, and then, if one had a very good memory for faces, one remembered; and with recognition came a pang of regret, for this tired-faced woman was surely that pretty young girl with the fresh blue eyes and enchanting smile who had been a "new" girl in Angers sixteen years ago. Yes, upon second glances, there was no doubt about it. It was Celia Brown who stood there—but Celia Brown a girl no longer!

One brand new thing the stores had and that was a new manager. Since Mr. Davies' day there had been two new managers. None knew what had happened to Mr. Davies, no one cared either—it was so long ago—but there had been talk at the time of some mysterious falling out with the board. This autocratic body had become dissatisfied with Mr. Davies, and Mr. Davies had disappeared forthwith. With him went the tradition of the board; for it leaked out, in a gossipy fashion, that the stores were really owned by Mr. Adam Torrance, who used to live in that swell house with colonial pillars, opposite the Gardens, you know. But this fact did not excite the interest that it might have excited, since Mr. Torrance had been abroad for years traveling the world over; at first in search of health for his wife (who had never been the same, poor thing, since their little baby had been made away with in so shocking a manner) and, after her death, in search of forgetfulness for himself.

Meanwhile, the stores underwent the usual vicissitudes of stores whose owner is an absentee, but through it all they made money, which, after all, is the chief end of stores. They were abreast of the times also; witness the playroom for children, the moving stairways, and the careful number of stools behind each counter for the comfort of the clerks. This last innovation might seem to the uninitiated an almost useless extravagance, for, as the watchword of the stores was quick service, and as the prosperity of the stores was great, none of the clerks had ever any time to sit down, and were only apt to stumble over the stools when in a hurry.

It was upon this obvious inconsistency that Mrs. Harcourt Flynn (down town to do a little shopping) remarked one day when, upon leaving her husband's private office, she paused at the ribbon counter for a few moments' chat with Miss Celia Brown.

"What do they have those stools for?" she asked. "It seems to me that they do the customers far more good than they do you girls. Makes them feel better to see them there, I suppose, so that after they have kept you on your feet for an hour or two matching ribbons that won't match, they can go home and talk comfortably about the conveniences provided for the comfort of shop-girls! Tell me now, Celia, frankly, have you sat down to-day?"

Celia (it was indeed no wonder that one had failed at first glance to recognize her) smiled ruefully. "Really, I—I don't remember," she said.

"That's a nb! You know quite well that you haven't. And, Celia, when do you get your holidays? Don't put me off because I have an address I want to give you, a nice quiet place where you can really get some rest. It worries me to see you looking so tired." Mrs. Flynn's sharp black eyes rested affectionately upon her friend's pale face.

"I go off in a week or so," answered Celia, "but I am not going away this year—excuse me, Fanny, there is a customer waiting—"

"Let her wait, it won't hurt her. Now, Celia, you are going away. I'm coming over to see you and I'll bring the address. I'll give those girls a piece of my mind. I'll tell Ada that you are killing yourself—"

"Oh, please—" began Celia, but the voice of the irate customer who, like a certain king, had almost been obliged to wait, cut short her appeal, and Mrs. Flynn, annihilating the customer with a look, swept loftily away.

"Are you the head of this department?" demanded the customer, then, as Celia bowed, "Well, I would like you to match this ribbon; your assistant tells me that you haven't any apricot of this exact shade, but I know better. I bought this ribbon here only yesterday."

Celia took the scrap handed to her and examined it.

"The apricot we have is a shade darker, madam," she said politely.

The customer put up her glasses, "But it's impossible! It's a strange thing if you clerks cannot recognize your own ribbons. This ribbon was bought here."

"I think not." Celia was still polite.

"Excuse me, I bought it—at least my sister bought it here yesterday. It can't be all sold out in one day. If you will let me see all the apricot shades—"

"Certainly." Celia tried hard to keep the weariness out of her voice as she lifted down the pile of ribbon bolts.

"Are these all there are?"

"These are all, madam."

"Well, it's most extraordinary! I know my sister said that she bought the ribbon here, and if it wasn't here it was at Clark's. If you are sure there are no others—"

"These are absolutely all, madam."

"Then it must have been at Clark's. How provoking! One would think that in a store of this size—" but Celia's attention was already claimed by another ribbon seeker and she turned away.

"Atrocious how rude these clerks are getting," sighed she of the apricot ribbon. "That girl positively turned her back upon me while I was still speaking. I'll mention it to the floorwalker; it will be a kindness to the firm."

As a result of this kindness the floorwalker looked a little more sharply than usual at Celia. He was used to complaints of fussy women, and, being a just man, as floorwalkers go, he gave them usually no more attention than they deserved. But upon hearing this complaint, it suddenly occurred to him that the head of the ribbon department had not been looking herself for some time; observed critically that there were serious defects in her appearance. She was extraordinarily pale, she stooped, she looked distressingly tired! Her usual prim uprightness had suffered some strange eclipse: even her hair seemed faded, and the grey showed plainly in the brown. It was evident to a less interested person than the floorwalker that Miss Brown was "going off" in looks, and no one knew better than he how fatal such a going off might be. Customers like to be served by bright looking girls. They resent the very appearance of illness.

"If she doesn't spruce up after her holidays," thought Mr. Page, "she'll have to be transferred to mantles or something." Then, with a shake of his head, "But I'm afraid she hasn't any figure for mantles, poor girl, and no aptitude either, most likely. She has been in the ribbons a long time!"

A very long time it seemed to Celia Brown—all her life almost! The years before she had entered Angers seemed as if they must have belonged to the life of another person. And yet how quickly the time had gone! Something in the weariness she felt just now made her remember with sudden acuteness her first week behind the ribbon counter, when the long strain of standing had racked her nerves and muscles with strange pain. The girls had been kind, they had told her she would get over it, and she had got over it; that phase had passed. She had learned to stand all day without fainting at night, and she had grown used to being tired. From a new girl she had become a smart clerk, and then a responsible saleslady, and then head of the ribbon department. This she had remained, because there was really no further promotion for her, and the work was comparatively light.

She often encouraged herself with thoughts of its comparative lightness, and to-night, as she trudged wearily home to save her street car fare she tried to think of it harder than ever.

"If I were in the mantles, now," she told herself, "it would be so much worse," but something bright and sharp in the back of her brain remarked sarcastically: "You in the mantles, you wouldn't stand it a day!" "I know it," she answered the voice, "and that is why I am so fortunate to be in the ribbons." "You won't stand the ribbons much longer," said the voice jeeringly. She tried to silence it, but it managed to enquire with brisk insistence, "And then what are you going to do, what are you going to do then?" It was no use refusing to listen to it, so she began to argue the matter, as she had so often done before, as, indeed, she seemed to be always doing of late.

"After my holiday I shall be quite strong again," she asserted bravely, and, before the voice had had time to object to this, she added, "When Christine is able to help I will not have to be so afraid of losing my place. I believe it is partly fear that is unnerving me." "It will be years before Christine can help," whispered the voice. "She is sixteen now, and even if you give up all idea of sending her to the university, she can't teach on her certificate until she is eighteen." "At the most that is only two years," said her braver self, but the voice was relentless, "It might just as well be two centuries. You can't hold out one year, let alone two." "I can," said determination. "You can't," said that inner knowledge; then, while she struggled for more confidence to face it down, it began to insinuate, "You might give up some of your fine ideas for Christine. She is willing. Now, if you were to allow her to enter the stores—"

"Never, never!" cried Celia. So intense was her denial that she spoke aloud, but no one noticed in the busy street. "Never, never," she repeated, and her hands in their worn cotton gloves pressed the fingers cruelly into the palms. The voice, silenced for the time, sank back again beneath the surface of her mind. She walked on, out of breath with the battle, but with a certain warm confidence in her heart.

CHAPTER VI.

AS Celia turned the corner at Brook Street and with home in sight quickened her lagging pace, it is safe to say that she noticed few of the changes which the sixteen years had wrought. Yet Brook Street was changed. A stranger would have noticed at once that the entire character of the street had altered since that night when Celia had trundled the shabby go-cart home. Even at that time the neighborhood had long ceased to be very desirable: now its aspect was distinctly forbidding. One by one the shabby houses had given place to tenement or "apartment" houses, whose ground floors were devoted largely to second or third-class shops and eating houses, together with the inevitable pool rooms and corner saloons. From a shabby, quiet street, with an atmosphere of its own, it had become a shabby noisy street, with no atmosphere at all; from being merely undesirable it had become vulgar.

The house where the Misses Brown lodged had always looked out of place in this street, now its presence there was so strange as to cause continual comment. At a little distance it was a rather imposing place, when the setting sun beamed upon its many windows it might, at a little distance, have seemed a palace. Beside it was the only vacant lot on the long street. It was surrounded by a wall, and, at a little distance, one might have imagined a garden there. Many a passer-by had woven romance about this strangely appearing house, and even on unromantic Brook Street it had earned for itself the name of the "House of Windows." So, in the most unlikely places do the most unlikely people feel the influence of the unusual, and with groping fingers touch the fringes of the skirts of fancy.

Celia never saw the sun upon the House of Windows without a stirring which was almost pain. It looked so like some fairy palace, she knew it so well for what it was. For as one came nearer all the glamor faded, the illusion was ruthlessly destroyed. Not one whit better than its neighbors was the House of Windows. Better? Rather worse, indeed, for it was older, dirtier, more unkept than they. That it survived at all was due to its being part of an estate which could not be disposed of until the coming of age of a young heir. It had been allowed to stand, therefore, growing a little dingier, a little more out of repair, a little more at odds with its surroundings, every year.

The growing change was so gradual that it was almost imperceptible. One was used to a thing before one noticed it, and when one's attention was drawn to it one felt that it had always been like that. To be sure, Celia had observed that the window curtains displayed behind the glass became steadily poorer in quality, and showed a growing tendency to smuttiness as tenant succeeded tenant. She noticed that these tenants when she met them on the stairs grew constantly more down-at-heel and untidy of head, but the real significance of such metamorphoses is not always apparent to those who live in daily contact with them.

Everybody knew that the Misses Brown were the oldest tenants of the House of Windows. One of them, the youngest, had been born there it was understood. At least no one in the house could remember the time when her yellow head had not flashed like a ray of sunshine through the rather dreary corridors. The sisters kept to their old rooms, careless of the fact that their white curtains and shining window glass became more and more of an incongruity. Moving, to Ada, the blind sister, would have meant a painful uprooting, while to Celia the growing drawbacks of the place were accepted from stern necessity. Nowhere else could she find rooms for which she could pay, within walking distance of her work. As for Christine, the youngest, she was of so gay and bright a nature that she could have made sunshine in a darker place than this. Like Celia, she often watched the old house when the sun made it blaze with reflected glories, and no amount of after disillusion ever quite robbed it of the borrowed splendor.

And then there was the garden. Strange how the name which has once described a place will linger when all claim to it has gone. Once, that enclosed place to the side of the House of Windows had been a garden. Only a small part of it was left now, but once there had been space for the rompings of many schoolgirls; there had been soft grass, green trees and flowers. Now, although it was rank with weeds, hideous with tin cans, and waste paper, and odorous only of Brook Street, it was called a garden still.

Out of the magic of the name the blind girl had fashioned a reality which was one of the joys of her shadowed life. To everyone else an eyesore, it was to her still a thing of beauty, a garden which stretched before her sightless eyes and blossomed in her mind with ever-changing loveliness. She never walked there; the gate was always locked, a merciful provision, but from her third-storey window she often leaned out over it imagining the beauty which lay below. No one undeceived her, for the girls kept much to themselves, and incoming tenants never failed to receive due warning from the good-hearted Irish janitress.

"Sure, she thinks its a foine garden, poor thing," she would say. "And it's a great comfort to her, who's needin' all the comfort she's gettin'. You'll just be kind enough not to be undeceivin' her at all."

Celia, for her part, lied shamelessly, and was cheerfully abetted by Christine. But the real gardener, the one who planted the garden and caused it to bloom in due season, was Mr. Thomas Alexander Burns, once clerk in the book department of Angers & Son, and now manager for Brindly, of the Bookshop. He lavished upon this dream garden the thought and skill which would have made the fortunes of a dozen ordinary gardeners, and it was wonderful how his plantings prospered. Only once in a long while did failure come, and then its introduction was most skilfully arranged and with an eye to necessary contrast. The fact was that Mr. Burns, while still considering himself an unsuccessful suitor for Celia's hand, had been for sixteen years the unresisting captive, the willing slave, of her blind sister. He never admitted to himself that he loved Ada, she was too high above him for mere love, but he served her faithfully without hope of return, and indeed without the consciousness of serving. It never occurred to him that Celia could see what he kept so well hidden from himself, or that her persistent refusal of him was due to anything save a natural inability to care for so uninteresting a person. But Celia had known of Tommy's devotion from the first, and the knowledge had saved her more than once, when, unusually weary, she had been tempted to accept the peace and security which might be hers as his wife.

She thought of this possible means of escape that night as she mounted the stairs in the House of Windows, and, as usual, when her thoughts turned in that direction, she sighed. She knew that round of thought so well. It was like a tread-mill; always she came back to the same starting point. It was useless to consider it, but somehow she always did consider it when the stairs seemed as long as they did to-night.

Perhaps her step was heavier, also, or perhaps someone was listening for it with keen ears, for she had not passed the second landing before a door upon the third floor flew open, letting more light upon the dusty stair, and from somewhere above her there floated a sibilant whisper, "Sister Ann, Sister Ann, do you see anyone coming?"

Tired though she was, Celia smiled. "Only the long road and the swaying grass and the dust blowing before the wind!" she answered dutifully, and the next moment she was being kissed violently upon the cheeks by a vision with yellow hair.

"I knew it was you!" said the vision. "But of course it might have been Tommy, and I did not want to bother coming down for him! Take hold of my arm, darling, and let me pull you up. You are late. The muffins will be spoiled. Oh, Celia, we had a visitor to-day!"

Celia's face in the dimness of the stairway grew a little whiter. "A visitor? Was it Mr. Banks, our trustee?"

"How mean of you to guess? Yes, and he left a note for you. Ada and I have been speculating. Perhaps someone has died and left us some money—lots of money."

"I'm afraid not, dear."

"Well, you don't know! Not that we want anyone to die, but if someone simply had to die it would be nice to be left the money. Did you see Tommy?"

"No."

"How tired your voice sounds! Well, Tommy is coming over for tea. We have two extra muffins. He could eat three, but we simply can't afford it—unless this man who died has left us some money."

"What nonsense you talk, Christine! I believe this wild idea has really excited you. Let me look at your face?"

It was indeed a face worth seeing. There in the dingy dimness of the hall it gleamed like some clear gem. Here was the greatest miracle of those sixteen years! For this young girl, with the first breath of womanhood upon her, strong and graceful in body, beautiful in face, was no other than the baby of the go-cart—a changeling indeed!

"Tommy has sent me a poem, too," she prattled on, as she helped Celia to unpin her hat, and with many little feminine touches straightened her collar and patted her hair. "You know I told him that he was guilty of making individual distinctions by sending them all to you. Besides, it must be tiresome always to write poems to the same person."

The blind girl looked up with a smile. "I suppose it would depend upon the person," she said.

Celia looked at her keenly. It seemed to her that Ada was strangely blind in more ways than one.

"Mine is just as nice as Celia's anyway," said Christine. "Listen and I'll read it before he comes. Ahem! This is the first stanza—I always want to say 'verse,' but Tommy says that stanza is proper.

> "Hazel eyes and Honey-hair (that's me!)
> Do you dream you are so fair;
> Do you guess your budding sweetness—
> Ambushed yet in incompleteness,
> Folded round with soft surprise—
> Honey-hair and Hazel-eyes?

"What do you think of that?"

"It is in Tommy's best Burnsonian manner," laughed Celia.

"I rather like 'honey-hair,'" mused Christine. "I wonder what made him think of that?"

Celia looked at the girl's shining head with quick pride, but she said carelessly, "Now that I think of it, your hair is honey-colored. The shade is rather uncommon."

"Is it? But what does Tommy mean by calling me 'incomplete'? Do you notice anything missing, Celia? Am I 'shy' of anything? Why," with a little gurgle of laughter, "it is just another way of saying that I am not all there! I've a good mind not to give the wretch his extra muffin."

A heart-rending groan followed this terrible sentence, for the culprit had come tip-toe up the stair and had met the common fate of all listeners.

"Serves you right!" declared Christine, but her glance softened at the sight of a suggestive parcel under Tommy's arm. "Is it a book, Tommy?" she asked eagerly.

"Yes," said Mr. Burns, sadly, "it is a book, and yet for all practical purposes it is not a book." He laid the parcel carefully upon a shelf and placed his hat above it. Christine giggled.

"I suppose you mean 'no muffin, no book,'" she said. "In that case you can have your old muffin. Who is it for?"

Tommy gravely removed his hat from the parcel. "Well, its a kind of family book, I guess," he remarked. "First you said you wanted a new book, and then Celia said she had finished the one she was reading to Ada, and then Ada mentioned that she would like something of de Morgan's, and of course de Morgan wrote a new book at once, and—"

"And you felt it your duty to buy it!" snapped Celia. Her tone was so sharp and the irritation it expressed so uncalled for that the others looked at her in surprise. Even Tommy's equanimity was disturbed. His rather round blue eyes grew rounder. It was so odd of Celia to turn on a fellow like that! He knew of old how set she was against accepting any gift from him; but a book—he ran a bewildered hand through his hair, making it look more like a stubble field than ever.

"Don't do that, for goodness sake!" exclaimed Celia. "It makes you look exactly like Tommy Traddles!" And with this she disappeared into the adjoining room and slammed the door.,

"Well, that was a hard one," said Tommy cheerfully, and then, since every word could be heard over the partition, he asked in pantomine whatever was the matter with Celia?

Christine, also in pantomine, declared that Celia was feeling very tired, and Ada, who through it all had stood in quiet wonder, seemed to understand as well as if she had seen. She nodded gently, and with a gesture indicated that they had better take no notice.

Nevertheless, there was constraint upon them as they sat down at the round table. They could not talk naturally, and nothing seemed to taste properly until the door opened and Celia came back—a chastened Celia.

"Sorry I was rude, Tommy," she said taking her tea. "The fact is that you are almost too much of a blessing some times, and I am getting irritable in my old age, and then," with an attempt at lightness, "there was Christine's poem. It was really much better than the last one you sent me. It's not fair!"

"Really," said Tommy, delightedly. "Do you think I am improving? I wanted to ask you, but I was afraid of your chafing, you know. I think its rather better myself, eh?" He asked the question of Celia, but he looked at Ada. His voice was hopeful.

"Much better," said Celia.

"Lovely!" said Christine, eating muffin.

Ada, who was still looking faintly troubled, said nothing. Tommy's face fell.

"If I only had another name," he reflected despondently. "But a man can't write up to a name like mine."

Christine nodded sympathetically. "We could lend you ours for poetical purposes," she said kindly. "Brown is such a nice flat name. Nothing to live up to, all on a dead level. 'Brown!' somehow it never seems quite as if it belonged to me!"

Celia dropped her spoon with a faint clatter. Ada's face lifted with its listening look, and Tommy's face grew violently red.

"I mean," went on the girl unconsciously, "that there are so many Browns that it seems to be a kind of common-property name."

"Yes, of course, just so!" stammered Tommy. But somehow a restraint had fallen upon the table talk, and presently Ada rose and went over to the open window. Standing there she seemed scarcely changed at all from the girl of sixteen years ago. The years had left her peculiar loveliness almost untouched; with that strange immunity of the blind she had escaped unscathed. Although but three years younger than Celia, there was no thread of grey

Continued on page 38

ORCHARD LODGE—AND NAN

A Story of Strife Between Love and Ambition

By ELIZABETH RICHARDSON

Orchard Lodge, May 4th.

Dear Connie:

Just a note to tell you that I am here. And, Connie—there's an orchard, sure enough; two of 'em, for that matter! One is all prim and straight and stiff but the other is an old, old one—a place in which to doze and read and dream. There are just a few trees, gnarled and weather-beaten, their great branches curving most obligingly to form comfortable (?) seats. My gymnastic training will stand me in good stead now, for of course the leafiest nooks are the highest up. "It's the way of the world," as dear old Mrs. Cooke used to say.

But, Conn, best of all there is a high hedge right around this bit of Paradise, which hides it entirely from the vulgar gaze of the world. Just think of it—I shall be able to dry my hair out in God's sunshine, unafraid of some horrid person (feminine gender, of course) seeing me and telling some other equally horrid person (also f. g.) that "Miss Conran—the writer, you know—must really be getting on in years, for when she was drying her hair out in her back yard this morning—such a silly thing to do!—though I was quite a piece away from her I could see the grey hairs plainly!" Ah, well, such is the price of fame—and single bliss! They would not be half so interested in my advancing years were I married.

Now I suppose I had better tell you who comprise the household of Orchard Lodge. Well, there are Mr. and Mrs. Woodrow—perfect dears; Nan Nesbit, who teaches the village school, and who has the college bee in her bonnet; Billy Woodrow, a young imp of eight or thereabouts; and old Davie, handy man and Jack-of-all-trades.

This is all for this time—continued in my next.

Devotedly,

LYN.

* * *

Orchard Lodge, May 15th.

Dear Conn:

I woke up last night to hear the rain falling steadily on the veranda roof. You know how it sounds, so regular and resolute. It always makes me long for home and mother. Fortunately I had my wits sufficiently about me to get up and lower the window, then crept shivering back to bed. Somewhere near there was a place from which the water dropped—dropped—dropped. Even through the wall the sound came clearly, distinctly, falling on the roof with a thud that seemed deafening. I caught myself counting, "one, two, thud; one, two, three, thud; one, two, thud, and so on. It was so persistently regular! Finally, I fell asleep, still counting.

To-day it is still raining; no, pouring. Everything is drenched, the water is dripping from the trees and lying in pools all about. Isn't it strange what a subdued, patient look all outside has on a day like this? The trees are so resigned and meek; they might be saying, "Better have it all at once you know, and be done with it." The birds are a little more cheerful, and keep up a continual chirping.

Short as has been my stay here I have found that the men always congregate in the barn, especially on a rainy day. I suppose they sit up in the hay-mow, chewing straws and talking politics. Billy, who has a cold and pleaded off from school, Mr. Woodrow and Davie are out doing the "chores" now; I've no doubt they will stay there till noon.

LYN.

* * *

Orchard Lodge, May 31st.

Connie, dear:

I have been lying all morning in the hammock and becoming so lazy that for the good of my soul I thought I had better exert myself sufficiently to write you. Already I'm feeling better—nerves and Orchard Lodge don't seem to fit somehow, so I'm forgetting my nerves, praises be to Allah!

At present I am up in my bedroom, which is a "thing of beauty and a joy forever," even if it is a bedroom. One of my windows overlooks the new orchard and the view is entrancing! As far as the eye can see tosses and rolls a sea of foaming white, while little flecks of froth, sometimes veritable showers, are thrown high in the air, to fall again, quickly, silently, into the dashing waves. But what amazes one is the silence of it all; no sound of waves, lashed into fury, beating against rock or shore; only of rushing wind and tossing branches.

There, that gives it all away! Even your finite mind will have comprehended that it is the apple-blossoms I'm raving over. Alas! if this wind keeps up for long there will be none left! However, Nan says the trees are just as pretty without their blossoms; she likens them to "a billowing sea of green." I like Nan, she is—"Enough of rhapsodies," I hear you say. Therefore, I sha'n't enlarge upon Nan. Lovingly,

LYN.

* * *

Orchard Lodge, June 15th.

My dear Connie:

I'm out in the hammock with my writing-pad held straight up on my chest. That explains the writing. The birds are singing gloriously, the bumblebees rumbling lazily from flower to flower, the breeze stirs the branches overhead, while chequered shadows dance lightly on the grass. Oh, "what more rare than a day in June?" and "what more could the soul of man (or woman) desire?" I desire nothing but a glass of lemonade—a beverage for which I have developed a surprising fondness—and Nan has just gone into the house to make some. She has had a hard day at school and as a consequence is rather cross. Mrs. Higgins, an old woman down in the village, has been treating her to her (Mrs. Higgins') views of "woman's chief mission in life," or something like that. You may imagine what they are; she is a narrow-minded old body, who regards woman as much the "weaker vessel," to be kept always under the thumb of her lord and master. It makes Nan so angry to have these meddlesome old gossips twit her about being "on the lookout for a husband," and so on.

"To hear Mrs. Higgins talk," she said, wrathfully, "one would think a girl's one duty in life was to 'catch' a husband. This done she must serve and obey him for all time. To change the catechism, 'Woman's chief end in life is to marry man and serve and glorify him forever.'" with which she flounced away.

Good thing young Chester Dale isn't around, or Nan would be pouring the vials of her wrath upon him.

Here comes the lemonade, so good-bye.

Devotedly,

LYN.

* * *

Orchard Lodge, June 25th.

Connie, my friend, I wish you were here. How you would revel in long, lonely walks on the—alas!—dusty country roads, or through the fragrant fields and meadows, with the sound of singing birds and humming bees in your ears, and the fresh, scent-laden breeze in your face. Or in dreaming in the high, dark woods, where the sunbeams glance fitfully through arched branches and a little brook babbles noisily over its pebbled, sunshiny bed, to glide quietly, darkly, through cool shadows, and out again into the flickering sunshine. A chattering squirrel runs rapidly up a fallen trunk, to turn and gaze at you, its beady eyes coldly suspicious. Bye and bye the restful sound of murmuring wind in the treetops and softly-running water lull you to sleep, and you wake to find the shadows deepening, lengthening, and darkness gathering in the deeper woods, while the supper-bell peals insistently from the farm-house. You regretfully gather up your cushion and book and go home through the still fields while the birds chirp sleepily from the woods behind; a cow-bell tinkles for a moment and is silent; somewhere near, yet invisible, a girl is calling "Co-bossy, co, co-o," her voice rising and falling in musical cadence.

From the foregoing you may guess where I have spent my afternoon—out in the woods, happy and solitary, feeling a thousand miles from human habitation, though as a matter of fact the "bush," as it is always called, is only across a couple of fields. I'm beginning to see the wisdom of the doctors' orders about living in the fresh air, for I have a positively appalling appetite, and am forced to observe that rule of the Puritan's—or was it the Quaker's?—about quitting before one is "filled up"—to quote Billy—for the perfectly simple reason that I don't believe I ever would get "filled up"; for decency's sake I have not tried. And I'm disgracefully fat,—not "plump" not "stout," but fat!

I must tell you of the amusing sequel to Nan's sarcastic words of a few weeks ago. I think I told you of the incident in my last letter. Last Sunday we had a divinity student to preach, the regular minister being away. This student, Mr. Harrington, stayed here. I went to Sunday School with Nan and noticed that Mr. Harrington, who taught Billy's class, seemed to be much tickled over something.

As we walked home he observed to Nan, "I am much interested in your theory of woman's chief end, Miss Nesbit. It is—er—unusual."

Nan looked mystified, but I remembered with a start that Billy had climbed up one of the trees near the hammock just before Nan came home from school that afternoon, and therefore must have heard her silly speech.

"The class I taught this afternoon had the first question of the catechism. Doubtless you know the answer, 'Man's chief end is to glorify God and enjoy him forever.' One lad, of an enquiring turn of mind, asked if woman's chief end was the same as man's. Before I could answer your cousin piped out, 'No, it isn't; Nan says it isn't.' I remarked that I thought it was.

"'Well,' he glowered at me, 'I guess Nan knows, 'cause she's a teacher.'

"Answering my look of inquiry he said, 'Nan says woman's chief end is to marry man and serve and glorify him forever.'"

Mr. Harrington paused abruptly, overcome with mirth, in which Nan had the grace to join, though blushing violently. He did not pay much heed to her hurried explanation, nor was he at all shocked, as Nan, staunch little Presbyterian, feared he would.

Love to Tom and the kiddies. Devotedly,

LYN.

* * *

Orchard Lodge, July 15th.

Dearest Connie:

The serpent has entered my Eden! In other words Chester Dale has proposed to Nan and she has refused him. I don't know whether I have mentioned Chester in my letters; he is a young man from the city who has been out here considerably this summer, especially since Nan's holidays commenced. It is plain that Nan loves him, and though she is trying bravely to appear cheerful and carefree, her white face and sad eyes tell the story of sleepless nights and tear-wet pillows. Poor child! She is so frank and sunny it is impossible for her to appear what she is not, but it is the little goose's own fault. Just fancy, Conn, she won't accept Chester because she is determined to go to college. She will not consent to even an engagement.

"He shall be free," she says. "It will probably be a year or two yet before I can go to college, and then four years on top of that—it's a long time!"

I agreed with her, but urged her to give up the college idea altogether.

"You know how much Chester needs you," I said; "he is peculiarly placed, alone in a large city, with no near relatives; the owner and manager of a large business. And believe me, college isn't worth the sacrifice of a good man's love. Mind, I am not saying Chester would not be faithful and wait for you, if need be, six years, but it is a hard test."

Jean Norton, Nan's chum, who is now in her sophomore year, got wind of the affair and wrote Nan. I saw the letter.

"Nan, my dear," she wrote, "I do hope you aren't making a mistake. I know Chester loves you and that you are not altogether indifferent to him. (Don't be offended, dear.) If you love him, don't, for pity's sake, Nan, give him up for the sake of going to college. Take this from one who knows, college is not worth it. That is not saying anything against college either, for it is great, and if it wasn't for Chester I'd say 'Come, and good luck to you.' But listen, Nan—this is honest to goodness, cross my heart, as we used to say—if some good man loved me as Chester Dale loves you, and needed me as he needs you, I would leave college for him this minute."

Billy and one of his friends jumped from the highest beam in the barn to-day, on to a little wee bit of straw on the floor. Even Mr. Woodrow turned pale when he heard of it.

"Oh, well," said Billy nonchalantly, when told they might have been killed, "we said our prayers before we jumped, so in case—" Thoughtful of them, was it not?

Lovingly,

LYN.

* * *

Orchard Lodge, July 29th.

My dear Connie:

Nan and I were out for a stroll in the orchard to-night, after thes tars came out, and I wished again that you were here.

Looking far up through the purple night to the dark sky, dotted with its myriads of glimmering, gleaming stars, I felt so little and mean and insignicant! You know the feeling of intense loneliness that comes over one, when even the birds are silent and every little sound is strangely distinct, and the piercing whistle of a distant engine fairly tears the silence, one seems to hear it quiver and sob as the

Continued on page 36

MRS. JIM'S HOLIDAY

An Episode of a Reunion in an Ontario Town

By B. McM. BELL

UNTIL Mrs. Jim read that item in the paper she did not know what ailed her. And even then she did not, just at first, for she refused to admit it even to herself. She put the idea away from her again and again, but each time it pressed back more insistently. She knew she was tired—tired of the eternal sameness of things, of the endless stretch of prairie that bounded her on every side, of its monotony, its noiselessness, its solitude, but—

She read it again, and yet again, until she found herself repeating it by heart:

"Every husband and wife should have, at the least, one month's holiday away from each other during the year. Change of air, change of environment, change of companionship, however congenial, are necessary to the health and happiness of both."

Could it be that she was tired of Jim? Jim, who never grumbled, who never complained, who bore all the reverses that had come to him with a brave heart, and a brave smile—tired of Jim!

Her eyes left the paper and traveled to the far corner of the room, where the baby was amusing himself with his toys. How Jim loved his boy, she thought—how wonderful seemed to him every movement of the baby hands and feet, every lisping word that fell from the baby lips! And how he had loved the others—the three little ones, whose graves were lonely, away out in the cemetery on the prairie!

The great love she had borne him for years surged up in her heart, until for the moment it crowded out every other emotion. Then, just as suddenly, there came a revulsion of feeling, and she knew that she could not bear him to come in tonight from the field and kiss her, as was his custom, and ask her about her day's work. She seemed to know that the very caress had become a mere habit, and that he gave it to her as unthinkingly as he put on his smock in the morning to go to his work in the field.

Jim's kisses had meant so much to her once. Now, they meant nothing to either of them—they had descended to the level of the commonplace.

It must be true, she decided at last. Jim had, in some mysterious way, become part of the environment, and she knew she was tired of that. Vaguely she wondered if Jim was tired of her. They had lived together so long without a break that it seemed as if romance and emotion were eliminated from their lives. Their pulses no longer beat faster at each other's approach. When their hands touched the contact sent no thrill through the body, no color to the cheeks. And Mrs. Jim knew now that what she, at any rate, had been longing for was the sweetness of that first year of their married life, when everything was new and fresh and lovely. She saw plainly, too, the truth of what she had been reading—that absence from her husband for a time was the only way to bring back that sweetness of romance, that joy in his companionship that she had known and enjoyed for many happy years.

But where was she to go, and how was she to get away? The only place she cared to visit was the little Eastern town in which she was born. For years she had yearned to go back, even for a month, but she had not been able; and now, she was no more able than before. It would cost so much, and Jim had done without that new binder till he could manage with the old one no longer. She couldn't go there—that was certain.

The clock struck the half-hour. Jim would soon be coming in for tea—she must have it ready for him.

She was just putting the finishing touches to the table, when a rap came on the door. A moment later the grizzled head of their old Scotch neighbor appeared.

"Why, Mr. Williams," said Mrs. Jim cordially, "come right in. You're just in time for tea. Jim will be here in a few minutes.

"Do come," she said in her most persuasive tone, for the old man had made a gesture of dissent. "I have just the things you like for supper."

"Ay, I've nae doot o' that," replied the old Scotchman. "Your suppers are aye worth tastin'. But I canna bide the nicht, lassie. I was tae the toon, an' I juist lookit in wi' yer mail."

Mrs. Jim opened the letter he had handed her, and became so absorbed in it at once that she did not notice that the old man, instead of going on to his house, waited at the gate for Jim, who was coming in from the field, and stood talking to him earnestly for a few moments.

Mrs. Jim's letter proved to be an invitation to the Paris Old Boys' Re-union, in August. She had heard vague rumors concerning it, but had not dreamed that an announcement would find its way to her little home on the prairie. But there ,in plain letters, was her name, followed by the invitation. And there, on another page, was a picture of the High school. Every line of its square brick front was familiar. Every room of it was crowded with memories, tender and sweet. "The old school," she said lovingly, "the old school!"

She turned the page and a picture of the town met her eye—a splendid cut. There was the house where she was born, the street where she had played, the bridge from which she and her brother had often dangled their legs while fishing, the doctor's house, the church with the manse hard by, the line of stores on either side of the clean, wide street, the library and reading-room, with their myriad associations; and, away in the distance, the winding road that led to the cemetery where her mother and father slept.

She longed; oh, how she longed to see it all again! She laid the booklet aside, for she heard her husband's step at the door.

"Halloa, Jim, boy! Want Daddy to give you a toss?" Jim caught the boy up and threw him to the ceiling, being rewarded by a rippling peal of baby laughter. He looked at his wife's smiling face with eyes that had just been opened, and he saw, behind the smile, the tears, the tired lines about the mouth, the pitiful, weary droop of the shoulders.

"Supper ready, little woman? I'm as hungry as a yoke of oxen."

And what a supper! Poached egg on toast, followed by creamy custard, flaky home-made bread, butter yellow and sweet, and fresh rhubarb pie with cream.

"Mr. Williams brought the mail, Jim," said Mrs. Jim, as she poured her husband a cup of tea.

"Yes, I saw him," Jim answered. "Scottie isn't looking well. I've seen him failing these two years."

"Since Mrs. Williams died," said Mrs. Jim softly. "I tried to persuade him to stay for supper, but he wouldn't."

"He wanted to get home," Jim said; but he did not tell her that the old Scotchman had waited purposely to speak to him, and that the subject of their conversation had been Mrs. Jim herself. He recalled the earnest look in the old man's eyes as he said, "She's no weel, the lassie. Ay, lad, I ken ye hae na' noticed it. It's no serious yet, but she was tellin' Auntie Gray that she's juist tired oot. It's a rest she needs, lad, a rest an' a change. Ye'll hae tae get her awa' fer a spell, I doot.

"A picture of the town met her eye."

"Lad," the old man put his hand on Jim's sleeve, "do it soon—do it as soon as ye can. I'd 'a' had my ain wumman wi' me yet, gin I hadna kep' my een closed sae lang." He turned abruptly and left him, but Jim knew that it was to hide the moisture that had crept into his eyes.

"Any letters for me, Nell?" Jim asked, when the meal was over. "Halloa, what's this? Paris Old Boys, eh? So they're going to have it after all. There's the town. I'd know it without the name from your description, Nell.

"What a pretty place it must be," he said a moment later. "So many rivers, and bridges, and trees."

"The prettiest place in all Ontario," said Mrs. Jim.

"To you," returned her husband, his eyes twinkling. "'There's no place like home,' eh, Nellie?

"Say, Nell, you'll have to go," he said, laying aside the booklet after he had looked through it.

"Jim!" cried his wife, half-reproachfully, "I can't."

"Of course you can. Auntie Gray will cook for me, and look after the milk and butter. You know she has offered to do it several times. Let's see, when does it come? In August—plenty of time to get ready—of course you can." Then he added, a little doubtfully, "The baby, though—"

"Oh, he'd be no trouble."

Jim noted the eagerness in her voice. "You know he makes friends with everybody."

"It's not that, Jim, it's the—the money."

"Money!" Jim laughed easily. "We'll fix that. Why, I've a roll of bills where I can put my hand on them this minute. You'll take them and get some things for yourself and the boy."

"Jim!" exclaimed his wife, almost fiercely, "I'll do nothing of the kind. There are things you need more than I need this trip, and you must not do without them."

"Well, well, little woman, never mind," said Jim quickly, for he saw in his wife's eyes the mist that heralds tears. "We'll see what turns up."

But next morning he was very decided.

"Nellie," he said quietly, but in his eyes was a look she could not combat, "you're going to Paris for that re-union. Now, take this money, and get yourself and the boy ready."

ONCE in her native town, Mrs. Jim gave herself up to the full enjoyment of what she had for many years been longing for. The re-union week was an unmixed delight. Each day was full of pleasurable excitement. She met again those who had been her schoolmates in the old days—many of them she had not seen since they left the dear old High school. They had gone their several ways, and she had gone hers. Now they recounted the schoolday pranks and punishments—those comedies and tragedies that spell so great a part of the school-life of boys and girls. Some of the teachers of the old days were still in their positions—others, she remembered with sincere regret, were lying in the cemetery on the outskirts of the town.

Often she would take the baby and go with some friend to visit an old, well-remembered haunt, whose associations, seen through the mist of the years, were beautiful and tender. There were so many dear friends to visit, too, and they were all so good to her. And the baby was splendid! He seemed to know that his mother's friends were his friends; enjoyed all the caressing and jollying they gave him to the utmost, and grew fat, and rosy, and strong.

And Mrs. Jim, herself, in the change of air and scene, and in the freedom from the work and worry of housekeeping, found the strength she had been seeking.

So the time passed, and Mrs. Jim, looking at her ticket one afternoon, discovered that it was good for only a few days more. Then she fell to musing. Had Jim missed her, she wondered. He had been so anxious for her to come. Perhaps he had wished to be alone again—alone and free, as he had been before she came into his life. She wondered, too, with a bit of an ache at her heart, if he liked being alone—if he would be sorry to see her come back. His letters told her nothing: he was getting along well, he said, and she and the boy must stay as long as they could, and have as good a time as possible.

The sweetness of that time when they were married swept over her like a flood, carrying everything before it. She saw again the lovelight in Jim's eyes, as he stood beside her in the little village church. She took the drive with him again from the place where she had been teaching, and where Jim had wooed and won her, away out across the prairie to the home he had built and made ready for her. It was a glorious day. The sky was blue, of a shade peculiar to the Western sky in June, and there were just enough cloud-flecks to temper the sunshine. Flowers of every color mingled with the green grass of the prairie. Wild pink roses were springing up in the trails. The sloughs reflected the blueness of the sky in their glistening depths. The strong, rushing wind of the prairie had, for the time, given place to a gentle breeze, that merely stirred the leaves of the poplars in the bluffs.

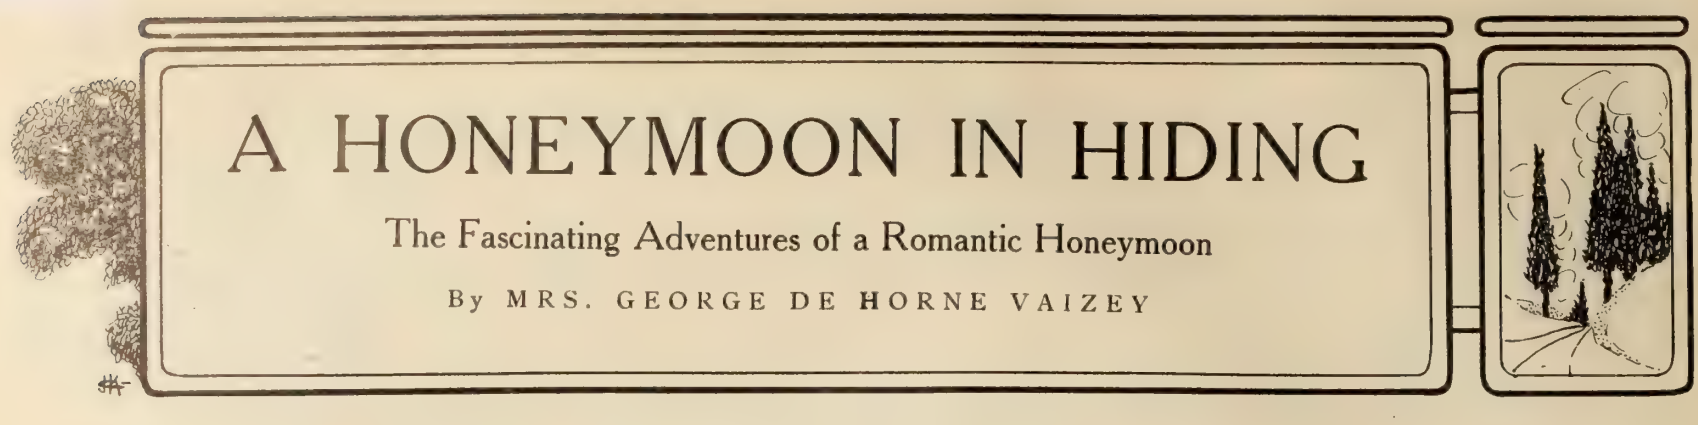
The sweetness of the June-tide filled their hearts to overflowing, and they clasped each other's hands and laughed like happy children. They knew nothing but joy then. Sorrow was to come to them later.

Mrs. Jim's mind ran swiftly over the years—years that were glad for the most part, but heavy with work and care. But the babies were worth it—she had told herself that, many a time—worth it many times over—if only she could have kept them! Again she lived through that awful week when the three little lives went out, and with them, for her, all the joy of motherhood. Ah, how tender Jim had been then! How he had sought to stifle his own grief, that he might soothe and quiet hers—how he had helped her take up the burden—the heavy burden of life in a world whose light had gone out with the light of three little faces!

A maid rapped at the door. "A telegram for you, Mrs. Gray," she said.

A great fear caught at Mrs. Jim's heart. It

Continued on page 31.



A HONEYMOON IN HIDING

The Fascinating Adventures of a Romantic Honeymoon

By MRS. GEORGE DE HORNE VAIZEY

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Gwen Nugent becomes the wife of Dr. Pat Hilbert, London, England, and as they start off on their wedding journey, the bridegroom discovers that he has been robbed of his pocket-book. He and Gwen return quietly to London and spend their honeymoon in their new house, avoiding their friends. They go to an East End restaurant one evening and the waiter advises them to seek amusement at a music hall where a "competition" is going on.

"FACTORY girls—five-pound note—a competition. What sort of competition? What do they do?" queried Gwen breathlessly, whereat the waiter's tired face lit up with a flash of amusement.

"Madame understands that there appears at this hall a prima donna, a star, a very fine madame indeed, who has even had a turn at the Empire itself. It is to personate her, to sing her songs, make her dance, her gestures, her smiles. In the first part of the programme, madame herself would appear; in the second, the young girls would compete. One after the other they would appear on the stage, dressed, madame would understand, in their toilet of every day, and would sing a song chosen from the star's repertoire. It was a sight the most unusual, the most unique, only to be equalled by that of the presentation of the five-pound note to the successful candidate of the evening. The best seats were a shilling each."

The honeymooners looked at each other and drew long breaths of delight. The Wild Girl must wait; Cissy must wait. In the bosom of the family, surrounded by love's devotion, they must bide their turn, for it was now or never with the factory girls and their impersonations of the beautiful star.

Half an hour later Pat and Gwen were seating themselves in one of the front rows of "stalls" at the National East End, and inwardly marvelling to find that on the whole it looked so much like the places of amusement with which they were familiar. Cheap gilding instead of dear; cotton-backed satin instead of silk; at a first glance there seemed little difference between the two, and the building had fine proportions, and was brilliant with lights. The occupants of the stalls differed widely from the crush-hatted, satin-cloaked audience of the West, but they had an air of quite unexpected respectability, and were every whit as detached and uninterested in manner.

The galleries were thronged with an eager crowd whom the honeymooners divined to be ultimately connected with the business of the hour, and when the star made her first appearance, her ditties were received with breathless attention.

The star was large and coy. She wore a chestnut wig, a white satin dress, and large clusters of imitation diamonds. Her voice could not, by any stretch of courtesy, be called sweet; it was in quality rather of the nature of an engine whistle. She enunciated her words with a piercing distinctness, putting her finger in her mouth when a youthful effect was desired; dancing a heavy breakdown between the verses, and on these occasions when they wished to be especially naive, burrowing her chin into her neck, when the double chin promptly became three, and spread right over the diamond stars.

Gwen looked on with rapt attention, putting herself mentally in the place of the factory girls, and unconsciously imitating each grimace in a fashion which reduced her husband to silent convulsions of laughter. The rest of the program was dull beyond relief; but to-night no one had any attention to spare for performing dogs or human acrobats; all the applause was kept in store to greet the manager when, at long last, he appeared on the boards to introduce the first of the fifteen heroines of the night.

The manager was stout, and wore a frock coat, well creased at the waist. He wore also an enormous solitaire diamond in his necktie, and another on the little finger of his left hand. His features were Hebraic in type, and beaming with good nature.

"Ladies and gents," he announced genially, "I have much pleasure in introducing to your notice Candidate No. 1, Miss Louiser Riggs, who will now proceed to inform you that 'She's no laidy, dressed in fine array.'"

Loud applause.

Striding round the corner of the wings came a big, thick-set girl with a mop of red hair, a picture hat, ornamented with white plumes, a collarless blouse, a blue skirt with a ragged hem, and a pair of ancient boots, through the toes of which could be discerned fleeting glimpses of white stocking. "Good old Louiser!" shouted the gallery, and Louisa bowed her acknowledgments with much self-possession. Then she patted her tattered skirt, glanced over her shoulder at an imaginary train, pressed her hands against her waist with a smoothing, patting movement, and rolled her eyes languidly from side to side. It was an admirable piece of mimicry, and the house yelled approval, but, alas, Louisa's voice was thin and husky, and her manner of enforcing her genial qualities was far from convincing. Friends of the rival candidates "booed" in derisive fashion, and Louisa artfully hurried through her verses and lengthened the interludes between, when her dancing steps, her smiles and flutters would surely score to her credit. Nevertheless, the verdict of the house was not appreciative, and it was with a discomfited air that she returned to the back of the stage, to seat herself in the first of the fifteen chairs which had been ranged in readiness against the wall.

"Ladies and gents," announced the manager, smiling more broadly than ever, "Miss 'Arriet Tevans will now oblige with her valuable advice:

> "'Put yer umbrella back,
> With yer troubles in the rack,
> And the sun will Sh—ine again!'"

'Arriet Tevans had evidently a large following, for she was greeted with cries of "Buck up, 'Arriet!" which advice was badly needed, for she looked as frightened as a rabbit, and just about as white and pink-eyed, and shivery about the nose, as she stood in the fierce glare of the footlights, panting visibly beneath her poor little bodice, and holding on tightly to the ends of her red shoulder shawl. There was nothing even faintly reminiscent of the star in her meek and frightened mien, but when at last she found courage to open her mouth, a surprising volume of sound startled the audience into attention. The very rafters seemed to ring as 'Arriet Tevans adjured her hearers to optimistic signs, and two occupants of the stalls, at least, resisted with difficulty the temptation to thrust their fingers into their ears. Again the verdict of the audience was distinctly non-committal, and Candidate Number Two retired with an air even more discouraged than her predecessor.

Gwen began to feel that the competition was not quite so amusing as she had imagined. There was too much grim earnest behind the surface comicality. How heartrending must be the conviction that one had tried, and failed. Gwen did not feel inclined to laugh at the eccentricities of the next few candidates who demonstrated in striking fashion the rareness of allied gifts. If a girl possessed any powers of mimicry, she had no voice; if she had a voice, she could not mimic; but Elizabeth Huggins, Number Nine on the program, seemed at last to be able to combine both roles. She was a pretty girl, or would have been pretty if it had not been for her pitiful air of delicacy. She wore no hat, and her dress of rusty black cashmere had plainly been made for someone several sizes bigger than herself. She was shaking with nervousness, but there was a desperate air of determination in the manner in which she walked forward to the centre of the stage, and made her bow to the audience. "She can't face it! She'll bolt in another minute," whispered Pat in Gwen's ear; but Elizabeth Huggins did not bolt. She dropped her eyelids as if to shut out the sight of the white blur of faces, and with a spasmodic jerk of the body, set herself to her task. First, with a downward, crouching movement, she appeared to sink into herself, shortening her neck, and inflating her chest into an appearance of fulness; this done, the white shoulder shawl was next twitched downward to mark the line of a decollete bodice, above which was now revealed to sight a mass of glittering glass beads, scarcely less effective than the star's own, in the kindly glare of the footlights. The sight of those diamonds awoke a preliminary cheer from the gallery, and, encouraged thereby, Elizabeth dived into a capacious pocket, from whence a sheet of music was produced and held out in extended arms, while a sweeping smile stretched the corners of the mouth. This was good; this was true. The picture of the star at the same moment in her performance rose instinctively in the mind of the beholder, and the audience broke into renewed cheers. Then Elizabeth began to sing and there was an instant hush. It was a small voice, a weak voice, but exquisitely true and sweet, and the banal words took to themselves quite a touching beauty as the young voice trilled them out:

> "I don't care where I reside,
> I'll be quite satisfied,
> Any old place will do for me,
> So long as you are trew!"

When the verse was ended the applause broke out once more, and a faint flush showed itself on Elizabeth's cheeks. Still with downcast eyes, as if not trusting herself to face the audience, she made a sweeping bow of acknowledgment, and, lifting her skirts in two outstretched hands, began a series of posturing strides which represented the star's dance. It was cleverly done, and Pat laughed heartily at the sight, all the more heartily, perhaps, because the uplifted skirt revealed a patched and tattered woollen petticoat, instead of the star's cascade of lace, and boots and stockings in the last stage of decrepitude; but when he turned towards Gwen, lo! her lips were set and two big tears shone in her eyes. No, she was telling herself, it was not funny at all—it was pitiful, heartrending to behold. The desperate resolution of this white, frightened girl conjured up dread pictures. Who waited at home for the coming of that five-pound note? What was that home?—a cellar; an attic, damp and bare, with perhaps a few tumbled coverings in one corner to serve as bed to some dear one starving, suffering. "Ah, she must get it. She must have the prize!" sighed Gwen earnestly to herself.

And then suddenly came a hitch. Elizabeth's thin cheeks flushed with a painful red, her eyes showed a frightened gleam, the clear notes choked, struggled on, choked again, and were finally overcome by a paroxysm of coughing. It was not ordinary coughing which might pass with the passing of a moment; there was a tragic significance in its sound, and the girl seemed at once to realize her defeat. Her thin arms dropped to her sides, her head dropped on her chest, she turned her back to the audience and walked hurriedly off the stage.

"Ladies and gents," announced the manager hastily, "Miss Florence Murphy will now oblige."

Gwen drew close to her bridegroom's side and clutched a piece of his coat. "Pat, oh, Pat! She wanted it so badly—she was so brave. I can't bear it if she doesn't win the prize."

Pat squeezed her fingers, and whispered reassuringly, "She was far the best, dear, far the best. She's bound to win," But in his heart he was not so sure.

Ten minutes later, Elizabeth Huggins slipped into her vacant seat, to listen to the efforts of her remaining rivals, and as Fate would have it, arrived just in time to witness the triumph of the evening. Alice Maud Smith was the name of the Diva, and from the moment that she appeared on the stage her mastery seemed assured. She had no beauty, no voice, and not too much ear, but she had unlimited self-possession, a merry eye, and that happy knack of noting and reproducing leading characteristics which makes the fortune at once of the portrait painter and the entertainer. No subtle effects for her; no half shades, nor delicate suggestions. Alice Maud knew her audience, and, so to speak, piled on her color with a shovel. She shouted her words in a loud rollicking treble; at the end of each verse she dropped her head forward with a sharp little jerk, blowing out the lower part of her cheeks, in ludicrous exaggeration of the star's chin. At the end of each "dance" she brought down the heel of the right shoe with a deafening thud on the ground, and rolled her eyes so far upward that the iris completely disappeared from view. By means of such crude and exaggerated effects she excited her audience to a frenzy of admiration, and settled the question of the prize beyond a shadow of a doubt. The ten girls sitting ranged on their chairs at the back of the stage, smiled sickly smiles, and clapped with the rest, and Elizabeth Huggins' face shone out white and tense against the red screen.

> "I've a sort of Yorkshire relish
> For my little Yorkshire girl!"

Alice Maud smirked her thanks to a roaring, stamping audience, and five minutes later was formally presented with the coveted five-pound note. The prize was presented with due honors, and during the presentation Gwen was busy fumbling in her pocket; fumbling with a purse and an envelope of an old letter. Something small and yellow was transferred from one to the other, and a few words scribbled in pencil on the cover.

"Find someone at once, and send this round to Elizabeth Huggins," were Mrs. Hilbert's commands, and her husband sped willingly on his mission.

The honeymoon couple walked homeward arm in arm. From time to time they chanted snatches of songs beneath their breath, emphasizing the points with tender glances beneath the light of the lamps:

> "She's my wife, and she suits me grand."
>
> "I don't care where I reside,
> So long as You're there I am satisfied."

And the grim eastern street was an enchanted land.

CHAPTER IV.

THE fifth day was wet; hopelessly, drenchingly wet. Until this point the weather had behaved itself in exemplary fashion, so that, as Gwen philosophically observed, there was no justification for grumbling. "Still, let's do it all the same," she added, "and then it will be all the more exemplary to stay indoors and be happy. What's your idea of amusing yourself on a long, wet day?"

Pat didn't know. There was but one thought which obtruded itself at the moment, and that he put promptly into speech.

"What about meals?"

"It will clear in the afternoon. It always does. We'll dine out and go to see Cissy. Lunch will be a make-up festival at home, and I'll be cook. What do you say to ham and eggs, and a cup of coffee to follow?"

Pat thought the menu somewhat sketchy, but was too newly married to say so. "Sounds savory," he said instead, and as Gwen construed the words into a compliment, all was peace and joy.

She was certainly the most resourceful and amusing of companions, and the long, wet morning seemed to pass in a continuous ripple of laughter. Her suggestions for occupation were always quaint, and unlike anybody else's suggestions.

"Pat," she cried suddenly. "Let's play at making faces like they do in books."

Pat's stare of amazement was absolutely unfeigned.

"What do you mean?"

"Oh, you know. The sort of thing they are always saying in feuilletons. 'Fifteen contending emotions struggled for mastery on her lovely face.' Where's that novel I was reading yesterday? Let's open it at random and see what we find. Here you are! 'Cecilia looked at him, half-reproachful, half-defiant, with a great love shining out of her tired eyes.' Exercise one. Let's stand before the glass and try to look all that, at the same time. It will be good practice for our 'English stolidity of expression.' Come along."

She thrust her hand through Pat's arm, and drew him laughing and protesting before the dressing-table with its long swing mirror, and a happy mirror it should have been at that moment to have the privilege of reflecting two beings so young, so comely, so radiantly alive..

"'Tention! Eyes! The first exercise, the most difficult of all," quoth the happy bride, "is to look tired. Make your eyes look tired, Pat. Pretend you are weary, utterly wearied and satiated with life, and roll them at me, and see how they look. Just as a start."

But Pat stubbornly refused to obey.

"Shan't! Impossible. Jolly well ashamed of myself if I could, with my honeymoon not half over. I'll look a world of love, if you like. I'll go up to the top of the class for that!"

"Stupid! What's the credit in that! That's easy," cried the bride complacent. "Well, I'll try. There!" She opened her eyes extraordinarily wide, rolled them upward so as to show quite an alarming amount of white, and still more slowly rolled them back into their ordinary position. "How's that?"

Pat shuddered.

"Excuse me. It is not becoming. You look extremely ill. I don't think he would return her love very long with many such glances."

Gwen's reply to this criticism was a glance of disdain, eloquently unmixed with other sentiments; after which she again turned to the mirror and braced herself for a second attempt. This time an appearance of intense languor was attained by the simple process of slowly flicking the dark eyelashes up and down, but the difficult point was reached when she endeavored to introduce the due mixture of love, reproach, and defiance. The effect was, to put it mildly, alarming to behold, and Pat covered his face with his hands, affecting to cower in dismay.

"My good girl, you couldn't look worse if you intended to poison me the next moment! Where does the great love come in? Looks to me a lot more like hatred, but anyway, I'm no good at reading compound glances. I've lived among simple, straightforward people, and my education's been neglected."

"Oh, but this is really quite simple. If you read any feuilleton you will find a dozen more complicated on every page. Let's try another. Here you are: 'Surprise, doubt, and agitation struggled for mastery on her countenance as she listened to this thrilling tale." That ought to be easy enough. Try!"

Instantly both pairs of eyebrows arched upward, while the lower lip dropped apart; "Surprise" was an unequivocal success, but when it came to "doubt" opinions were sharply divided. Gwen wrinkled her brows, and sucked in her lips; Pat buried his chin in his necktie, and screwed up his eyes until they were almost hidden from sight; after which each violently denounced the other's methods.

"Not a bit like. Toothache, if you like, but not doubt!"

"You look like as if you were in church, and pretending that you weren't asleep. Mine was far better than that. Now then, 'agitation.' I shall gulp for that, people always gulp when they are agitated. And pant. That's good. That's very good. The trouble will be to do them all in succession. Complete exercise: Surprise—doubt—agitation—typified in succession, as I count, and wave my hand. 'Tention. One, two, three!"

The frenzied grimaces which ensued ended in paroxysms of laughter, as the performers sank back on convenient chairs, and rocked helplessly to and fro.

"Oh! Oh! Your face."

"Oh! Oh! Your eyes." Gwen fanned herself feebly, with her crumpled little handkerchief, as though quite exhausted by her dramatic efforts. "Dear me, what a mercy it is that one's expressions are automatic; it seems horribly difficult to manufacture them to order. Let's try another way. We'll each choose a description and illustrate it, and the other shall guess what it is. There's your book; here's mine. Choose what you like."

"What a babe you are!" Pat took out a cigarette paper and felt in his pouch for a fresh twist of tobacco. He thought he deserved a smoke by this time, and was more interested in watching the pretty picture made by his wife as she smiled and dimpled over her search, than in preparing problems for his own solution. Thus it happened that it was his ears, though as a rule much the less acute of the two, which caught the first sound of the alarm, the faint click from below as of a key turning in a lock. He threw up his arm in the prearranged warning, and in an instant his wife was on her feet, bending forward in an attitude of keenest attention.

Yes! It was all too true. The front door shut with a hollow, reverberating thud. There was a sound of footsteps, a sound of voices, of high, feminine voices in shrill debate. The danger which they had dreaded had become a fact. The cousins were upon them. "Fire!" hissed Gwen. "Fire!" hissed Pat in reply; with one stride of his long legs he seemed to reach from one end of the room to the other; the stove disappeared from view in the recesses of the central cupboard, newspapers and pipes were clutched in one outstretched hand, a pair of slippers in another; Gwen's deft fingers gathered together the four corners of the tablecloth, carrying its contents as in a bag. So well had the tasks been apportioned, that they seemed completed at one and the same moment, and there was a smack of harlequinade in the manner in which husband and wife simultaneously disappeared behind the long swing doors.

"The waiter's tired face lit up with a flash of amusement."

Swift as had been the transformation, however, it is doubtful if it would have been swift or silent enough if the intruders had come straight upstairs; but, as Gwen had anticipated, they chose rather to give a preliminary survey to the ground-floor rooms, and it was more than five minutes later before they mounted to the door of the den.

"This is the room they are going to use as a snuggery," announced Flora's voice. Flora was the eldest and least amiable of the cousins, and Gwen, applying her eye to an air-hole, espied beside her the figure of that nasty, horrid, affected Mabel Gifford, who had made such a desperate set at poor, dear Pat two winters ago. How dare Flora bring Mabel Gifford to spy over Pat's house, her house, before even the most intimate of friends had passed its threshold? If a glance could have killed, a glance focused to one deadly point through a hole pierced by a gimlet, then surely Mabel Gifford's mortal career would have come to an abrupt conclusion at this moment. As it was, however, she swept forward into the room in serene unconsciousness, seated herself on Pat's favorite armchair, and stared around with appraising eye.

"What an appalling wall paper. How on earth could they choose such a thing for a room in which they intend to live!"

"Oh, but, my dear, what could you expect? Gwen has no taste. I never knew anyone with less eye for color. You can see that in her clothes."

Gwen straightened herself suddenly; the cupboard creaked as she moved, and a corresponding creak sounded from the companion panel at the other end. Her tingling anger received force from the conviction that it was Pat's silent convulsions of laughter which had caused the creak; Pat doubled up with amusement at such aspirations against one who prided herself upon being the most artistic of her sex.

Mabel Gifford smiled, a forbearing, sweetly magnanimous smile.

"Oh, well," she said generously, "she looks quite nice sometimes. Quite nice, I've seen her look. In a blue serge in the morning, for instance. One can't go far wrong in blue serge. Some people think her almost pretty."

Again the cupboard creaked in twofold, eloquent fashion, but Flora and Mabel babbled on complacently, unconscious of the gaze levelled upon them to right and to left.

"Has it ever struck you that she—I wouldn't say so for the world, of course; I detest uncharitable remarks—but sometimes her colour is so very pink?"

It was apoplectic at that moment, and such flashes of blue light seemed to dart through those gimlet holes that one would have expected the speakers to have been consumed as by fire. Gwen felt that she could never again believe in telepathy as she beheld the unruffled calm of her uninvited guests.

Flora patted her hair, and assumed an expression of virtuous resolve.

"I would rather not say what I think. One must be loyal, you know, and she is my cousin. I must say the engagement was a surprise. Pat had been so continually at our house, I could not have believed that he was the sort of man to be taken by that dolly style."

"No, indeed. I thought at one time, dear. I felt quite sure—you seemed to have so much in common—I quite expected—"

"Oh, well, perhaps at one time. He was certainly very marked, but I saw that there was no real depth in his character. When Gwen came up from the country to pay us that visit, it was quite painful to see how frivolous he became. I felt then that it would never do, and showed him gently, but firmly—"

"I see. Quite natural, but seems almost a pity. If you could have been patient and given him another chance, you might have saved him so much. He is immature, of course, very immature, but he seemed to me to have possibilities, and you would have brought them all to light. It wasn't altogether his fault. Her manners are so very—"

"Oh, she absolutely threw herself at his head. Everybody saw that. I shall always feel a terrible responsibility at having asked her up, but now that it is a fait accompli, I must do my best for them both. I told Gwen I would look after the house while they were away. This room feels close. I don't think the house is healthy myself, and it's ridiculously beyond their means, but they took no advice and settled it all themselves. I offered to go with them to buy their things. Pat would have liked it, I could see, but she wouldn't let anyone have a say but herself. Come and look at the bedrooms—plain papers, if you please; each one a different color. Ridiculous to have plain papers in bedrooms."

"Just a look round. I mustn't be long. I promised mother—"

The footsteps mounted higher up the stairs; the high treble voices becoming less and less distinct. From the far side of the cupboard a subdued voice broke the silence.

"Ahem!" it said, with an encyclopædia of insinuation. "A-hem!" but Gwen was too angry to respond. Still, and straight, and crimson-cheeked, she stood in her corner until ten minutes had passed by and the sound of the front door proved that the house was once more free from intruders. Then, the two doors swung open, and with simultaneous haste the husband and wife sprang forward into the room, wheeled round, and faced each other defiantly. Pat's hair was ruffled, his lips twitched, his expression was a comical mixture of amusement, nervousness, and bravado; Gwen was one quivering embodiment of wrath; black-browed, crimson-cheeked, flashing eyes, little clenched hands.

"Beast! Cat! Cats! Hateful, interfering cats!"

"Singularly indiscreet young women!"

"Cats, I tell you! Cats! And it's hateful and horrid of you to be so calm. Coming here—poking here in my house, and making remarks. Wall paper, indeed! My taste, indeed! Blue serge. I can look quite nice in blue serge. Did you hear her; did you hear her say it?"

"Yes, dear. It was quite true. I've seen you do it!"

"Don't! Gwen screamed at him, and stamped her foot oblivious of possible listeners next door. "Don't be maddening! Don't—don't try to propitiate me. I—I won't stand it! I am 'Dolly'; my cheeks are pink, sus-pi-ciously pink—"

"Deliciously, dear. She meant deliciously."

"I—I threw myself at your head."

"Never mind if you did. I was waiting to catch you."

Gwen screamed again, and sawed the air with her arms.

"I hate you. I do! You—you—you 'immature' pig!"

Suddenly the tears streamed and Pat caught her in his arms, all tenderness and compunction.

"Precious, little, silly girl. Don't cry. I won't let you cry. Brides never cry on their honeymoons. I have 'possibilities,' you know. Buck up, and bring them to light. I'm so 'frivolous.' It depends upon you."

(To be continued)

Just WHY

Old Dutch Cleanser

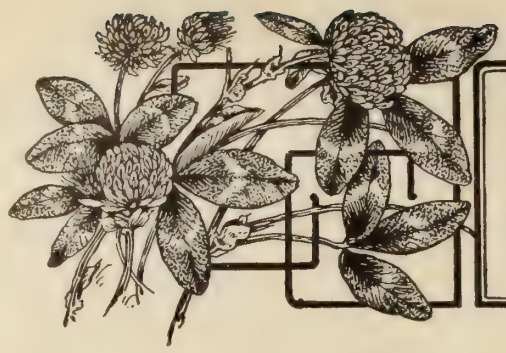
Cleans Your

Refrigerator HYGIENICALLY

Because this pure, mechanical Cleanser contains no Caustic or Acid to get near the food. It penetrates into every corner and cuts every particle of grease from the shelves and walls. Soap-cleaning cannot do this satisfactorily.

Sprinkle some Cleanser on a wet cloth or brush and go over every part of the refrigerator carefully, after removing and cleaning the shelves. Do this once a week (the ice compartment once in two weeks) and it will always be clean, sweet-smelling and sanitary.

Many Other Uses and Full Directions on Large Sifter-Can, 10c



With the Journals Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Editor's Note

WE regret that Miss Pickthall, who has made so many friends among our young readers, will not be conducting this department in future; but we hope to hear from many of our "Juniors" during the coming holidays.

We are sure you will be interested in our new competition. We are offering two prizes, the first of three dollars, the second of two dollars, for the best letters on the subject: "Our Summer Holiday." Each letter must be accompanied by a signed certificate from parent or guardian, stating age of writer, and assuring the Editor that the letter is original work. No one over fourteen years of age is allowed to compete.

A special prize of two dollars is also offered for the best photograph of a holiday scene sent in by one of our Juniors.

The date for the close of this competition is September fifth. Announcements of prize winners will be made in our October number.

We are anxious to have a good response to this competition. So write of your nicest holiday!

A Cat's Reminiscences

By R. C. J.

PERHAPS some of the events in my life may be interesting to some, and be warnings to others. I am not just a common, ordinary, every-day cat. In my veins flow the blood of Persian descent through my grandmother. She was of the true blue, and lived a life of ease and elegance amidst refined surroundings in an aristocratic Scotch home.

My first memories are of a manse away in the country, with a lovely garden. How we kittens did revel in it! My birthday was in early spring, so by the time my mother had taken me out of the barn to explore things in general, summer had come. Every morning we went to the byre and frolicked round while the cow was being milked. Visions of porridge and warm milk danced before us, and no sooner was the pail full and the little stool put aside, than we all rushed out into the yard, where we had breakfast. Mother and a large black cat had theirs in a basin, but we youngsters claimed a big brown plate as our own. The cocks and hens looked on longingly, but we never paid them much attention. They were much too insignificant for that. Our mistress and her maid were very good to us. These big, human people seemed so strange to us, but we realized that they were necessary to our life and happiness. The long summer days we spent rushing about the garden, chasing flies and each other, and were gradually initiated in the mysteries of rabbit hunting. Our mother brought up the little baby rabbits from the fields, and very timidly at first we played with them. Mice, too, we got to know pretty well, as well as butterflies. Once visitors came to the manse, and I was taken very often into the house, and sometimes allowed to sleep in the spare-room bed on the quilt. My brothers and sisters were never invited to these sacred places, and even a kitten gets proud and vain in these circumstances. Tit-bits were given to me in the dining-room, and I began to despise warm milk and porridge and life in the barn with the other cats.

"IN THE GOOD OLD SUMMER TIME."

One day, after summer had gone, a great change came to me. I could not think what was going to happen, for I was given such a large breakfast, and, without being allowed to say good-bye to my mother, brothers and sisters, I was put into a basket and firmly secured under its lid. I felt myself being carried along a road and mewed as hard as I could. I did not want to leave my happy country home, and, although you would not believe it, a little kitten has often strange forebodings. We are not so devoid of brains as the big human "grown-ups" imagine. After being carried along this road for almost four miles we came to a railway station. My heart almost stood still, and I mewed more than ever when I was put into a horrid moving mass of iron and wood, with a fire and smoke, that I knew to be a train.

So ended the first act in my life. Country life for me was over, and I was taken away to a great city as fast as the train would go. Some one, a lady with a good face and kind eyes (for we cats can read faces) met me and carried me away from the guard at the station. My new home was out in the suburbs of a beautiful city, and I was very kindly received. My lady took me out of the basket, put me on the parlor table, and gave me a saucer of milk—such thin, watery stuff, after ours at the manse. The whole household came to inspect me, and then I was introduced to my special friend and companion, an old grey cat called "Ted." I soon felt quite at home in my new abode. Ted introduced me to all his garden acquaintances, and I had a cosy little basket by the kitchen fire all to myself. He and I hunted for birds and mice, and chased each other up and down stairs, and had no end of fun, except when a friend of my lady came. He tied a tin can to my tail, and I had to fly round the dining-room to try and get it off. Such an un-Christian way to treat a poor cat!

About a year and a half after I came to town I was very ill with bronchitis. My lady was very careful of me. The doctor came to see me. I was wrapped up in my basket very snugly, and had horrid medicine prescribed, which I did my best not to take. It was no good fighting, however, I was rolled up in a shawl, so that my claws would not scratch, and do what I would I could not get them out. Ted was very bad, too, but, unlike me, he refused to stay in the house to be treated. One cold morning my lady found him almost dead, lying on the stones outside. Brandy and every other known restorative was applied, but in vain. Poor old Ted was dead! I wore mourning for some weeks, and missed him very much, although I got more attention than ever.

Such a funny thing happened one day. The house seemed to be all upset, and the rooms got gradually emptier and emptier. I was so frightened I did not know what to do. Strange men were everywhere, and they are so unkind to us poor cats. My lady seized me and shut me up in one of the rooms when she found me wandering about like an evil spirit. A few hours after I was hustled into a big basket, and, along with my master, who was an invalid, and his nurse, we were taken out to a cab, and drove away from my dear old Ted's last home; so closed Act. No. II.

Act No. III. is still going on in our new house, which we reached after a very short drive. There things seemed in a worse condition than ever; but I liked our new abode, and I felt that I would be very happy there. There were plenty of trees and gardens all about, and birds galore. However, I was not allowed out that afternoon. I was shut into an upstairs room and took refuge in the chimney. There was so much noise and racket all round that it seemed the safest place. It was such fun, a few hours later, when my lady came to look for me, to be able to see her from my little black hole. She thought I had really gone away, and seemed so vexed that I jumped down and purred round her.

Life went very smoothly after that. We got a new nurse for my master, and she gives me gruel night and morning, for breakfast and supper. I go into the bedroom and sit at the fire while she makes it, and then I follow her to the bathroom, where the pan is washed, and my little portion is laid out in a basin. Sometimes it is very hot, and am so impatient to begin that I burn my tongue. I spend a good deal of time on the bed in my master's room; but it is very trying to one's patience to have to wait till the bed is made. I know the difference between the blanket and the bed-cover, and know that I dare not jump up till the latter is on.

At the Diamond Jubilee, some years ago, I wore a neck ribbon of red, white and blue, and enjoyed myself immensely, except at night, when the crackers and squibs went off. I thought my head was going to be blown off, too. A dog arrived at our house some time ago. On the whole, he and I are very good friends, but we both like the best place on the rug in front of the drawing-room fire.

After all, town life is not bad and I am very happy; but then I am a well-behaved cat, and deserve to be so. I don't stay out at night very often and don't frequent the cats' nightly council in the gardens. The "grown-ups" are very good to me, and will be to other cats too, if they are as good as I am; so let all other kitties take warning, follow my example and live a pattern life.

It has often been told us that a cat has nine lives. So far, mine have been all that any Persian kitten could ask for or desire.

CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB

Have You Fifty Acquaintances?

WE all know so well our own plans that we often fail to realize that we have not made them perfectly clear to others. A letter from one of our members has given me a new point of view, and now I am wondering how many readers of the Journal hesitate to write me because they think I want only members who will make a business of subscription work. She writes:

"Dear Secretary—

"Do you know I was a little afraid to write to you at first. I was afraid I might be committing myself to something I wouldn't like—have to go to places I wouldn't care about—to be a regular solicitor. It seems absurd now when I know how perfectly free I am to get subscriptions where and when I please, to stop and begin again any time, and that you never get provoked at anything.

"Very sincerely,

"E. D."

Indeed, it is just as she says, I demand nothing from our members. I feel sure that every one who writes to me is very much interested in the Journal and desires to make money for some purpose, I can merely tell her our best offers and trust to her enthusiasm.

AMONG ACQUAINTANCES

Some have time, energy, enthusiasm, ability and inclination that will carry them far beyond their circle of relatives and friends, and the money returns are much greater than most girl workers can earn.

They are usually cheerful, self-confident, most attractive to meet, and perhaps in these letters I have emphasized too much this "big money" side, and neglected to tell about the girls who get just a few orders. If so, it has been entirely unintentional, for the club was started for just this class of workers. They are the backbone of the organization, and send in many orders. If every girl reader of these pages who knows fifty ladies would tell them about the Journal, it would mean thousands of new subscriptions.

And each of the girls would be tremendously surprised at the large amount of money earned by a few subscriptions. For instance, in your case—what do you especially want that you just cannot afford? A silk parasol. About eleven subscriptions. An Irish lace collar? About eight. A Madam Sherry bag? About seventeen. Set of monogram blouse pins? About six.

You and I, and our thousands of readers believe just that the Journal is splendid value; and second, that every Canadian should give a home magazine an opportunity to prove its worth. There are hundreds of thousands of women in Canada who do not know there is such a magazine. Will you tell all your acquaintances?

INDIVIDUAL INTERESTS

For each one of your friends you will know a special reason for taking the Journal. This one enjoys stories, and nowhere else can she get so much good fiction for $1.00 as in the Journal. The next is a newly married housekeeper, to whom all of the housekeeping suggestions, the menus and recipes, and housefurnishing plans, will be most welcome. Next comes a mother with a house full of children, and the Journal will make a strong appeal there, it is so entirely free from all unclean reading matter or advertisements. The younger ones will enjoy the children's page, and the older ones the fiction, and every department will increase their interest in the home. The next has a sister, or daughter or friend away from home. The Journal will be a splendid remembrance or birthday gift, and easily sent.

Probably the next takes only American or British magazines. In the Journal she will find the topics that interest women the world over, and besides, many things that are especially interesting to Canadians. Certainly she will be willing to give at least a short subscription so that when her present subscription expires she may know our Canadian magazine, which will not only be more satisfactory, but will save her money.

COINING ENTHUSIASM

Now, when you are in no way connected with the Journal, you can talk enthusiastically about it, the many interesting contents, the features that appeal to you, why cannot you do the same when it will pay you money at no extra cost to your friends? We would rather pay you for getting orders than the printers for circulars, and the government for stamps, or the newspapers for advertising, and we must make every woman in Canada acquainted with the Journal.

OUR SPECIAL OFFER

We have a special summer premium offer that is securing a great many new subscribers for us. Will you let us tell you. There is no restriction to membership in the Club; no age limit: no time limit; no class limit; just say you would like to join.

Very sincerely, Secretary.

WHERE THE LAKE BREEZES BLOW.

New Hose Free

—if these wear out in Six Months

For Men, Women and Children

Here is freedom for all time from hose that need darning. Order six pairs of Holeproof Hose in the manner indicated below and we'll give you a signed-in-ink guarantee that they will wear without holes for six full months. If one or all pairs show in that time the slightest hole or tear or rip, return them to us and get new hose free.

That is the guarantee under which Holeproof Hose have been sold in the States for the past twelve years. These hose are a wonderful success. The business is fifty times greater to-day than when the hose were first sold this way, proving a marvelous product. Last year 5,400,000 pairs outlasted the guarantee, wore longer than six months.

Think what it means to have hose wear six months—without any darning—without any discomfort—hose that are soft and pliable, made in the lightest gauze weights for summer, as light as any hose can be made, yet guaranteed to wear six months.

We can do it because we use the best cotton yarn—costing an average of 70 cents a pound, the top market price. Common yarn sells for 30 cents. We carry like quality all through the goods. They are thus made to stand the guarantee. Don't wear common hose when you can get hose like these. "Holeproof" costs the same as the common kinds sold with no guarantee whatever.

MEN'S SOCKS. Sizes 9½ to 12. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, navy blue, gun metal, mulberry. In light weight, 6 pairs $1.50 (same in medium weight in above colors and in black with white feet, 6 pairs $1.50). Light and extra light weight (mercerized), 6 pairs $2.00. Light and extra light weight Lustre Sox, 6 pairs $3.00. Pure thread-silk sox, three pairs (guaranteed three months), $2.00. Medium worsted merino in black, tan, pearl, navy and natural, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in finer grade, 6 pairs $3.00.

WOMEN'S. sizes 8½ to 11. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, and black with white feet. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00. Same colors (except black with white feet) in light weight Lustre Hose, 6 pairs $3.00. Light weights in black, tan and gun metal, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in extra light weight Lustre Hose, 6 pairs $3.00. Same in pure thread-silk, $3.00 for three pairs (guaranteed three months). Outsizes in black, medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00, and in extra light weight Lustre Hose, 6 pairs $3.00.

CHILDREN'S. Sizes 5½ to 10½ for boys, 5 to 9½ for girls. Colors: black and tan. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00.

INFANTS' SOX. Colors: tan, baby blue, white and pink. Sizes 4 to 7, 4 pairs (guaranteed 6 months) $1.00. Ribbed leg stockings in same colors, and black, sizes 4 to 6½, 4 pairs (guaranteed 6 months), $1.00.

FAMOUS
Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

HOW TO ORDER If you can't get of your dealer the genuine "Holeproof" with the signature Carl Freschl, Pres on the toe, send to us, stating size, colors (whether all one color or six assorted), weight and kind you want, and send the price and we'll send the hose and the signed guarantee ticket insuring you the wear as stated above. Unless stated otherwise 6 pairs are guaranteed 6 months. Six pairs of one size and weight and kind in a box. Colors only may be assorted.

Send in your order to-day. You'll always wear Holeproof Hose once you try them.

Write for free book, "How to Make Your Feet Happy."

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY CO. of CANADA LIMITED
10 Bond St., London, Canada

Tampico News Co., S.A., City of Mexico, Agents for Mexican Republic.

TO DEALERS Write us for our agency proposition. Excellent opportunity. Thousands of United States dealers making big hosiery sales with "Holeproof"

Are Your Hose Insured?

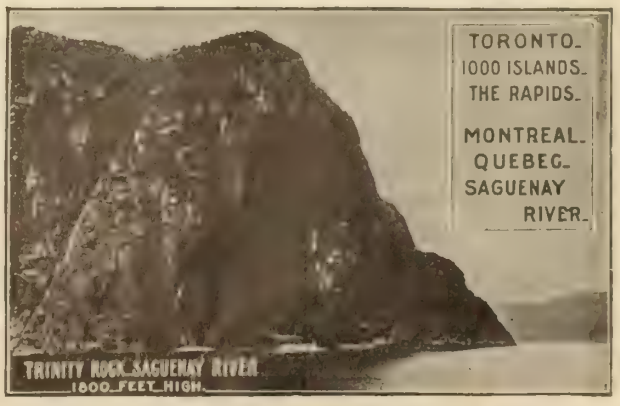
A fence of this kind only 16 to 23c. per running foot. Shipped in rolls. Anyone can put it on the posts without special tools. We were the originators of this fence. Have sold hundreds of miles for enclosing parks, lawns, gardens, cemeteries, churches, station grounds, etc., etc. Supplied in any lengths desired, and painted either white or green. Also, Farm Fences and Gates, Netting, Baskets, Mats, Fence Tools, etc., etc. Ask for our 1911 catalog, the most complete fence catalog ever published.

THE PAGE WIRE FENCE CO., LTD., Walkerville, Ont.

Branches—Toronto, Cor. King and Atlantic Ave. Montreal, 505-517 Notre Dame St. W. St. John, 37 Dock St.

The largest fence and gate manufacturers in Canada. 506

"NIAGARA TO THE SEA"



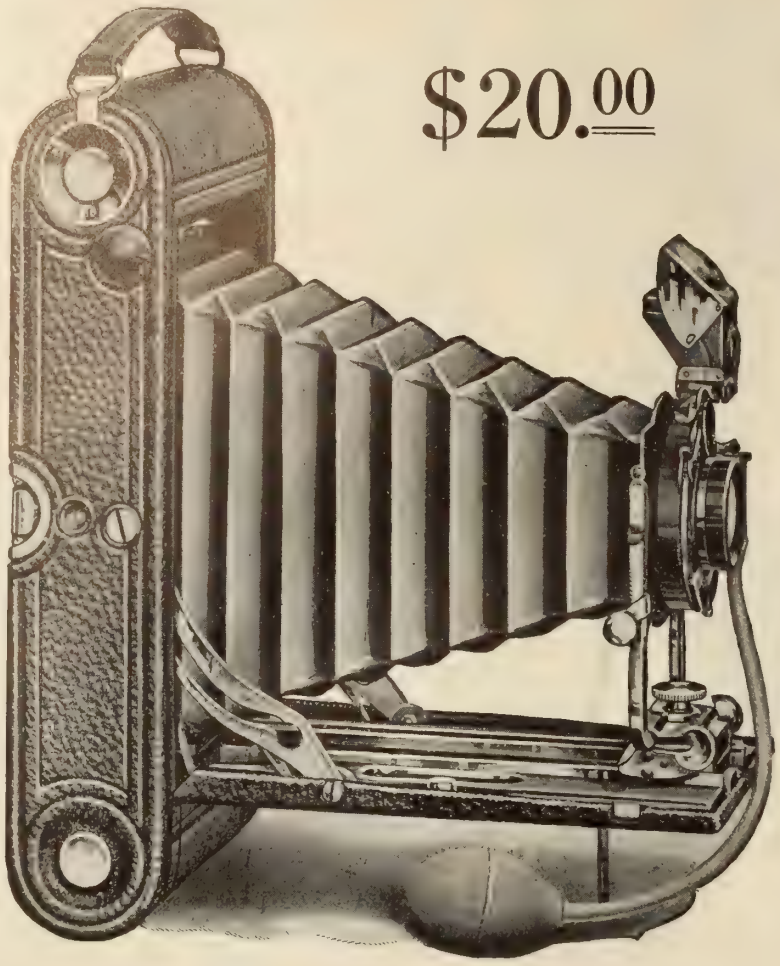
An Ideal Vacation Outing via the

Richelieu & Ontario Navigation Co.

For Rates, Folder, etc., address

THOS. HENRY, Traffic Manager, MONTREAL

H. FOSTER CHAFFEE, A.G.P.A., TORONTO



$20.00

3A Pocket Kodak

So simple as to be readily understood and operated by the beginner; so efficient that he does not outgrow it.

Pictures Post Card size (3¼ x 5½), Price, $20.00

CANADIAN KODAK CO. LIMITED

Catalogue free at the dealers or by mail.

TORONTO, ONT.

BENGER'S FOOD

is for Infants and Invalids and for those whose digestive powers have become weakened by illness or advancing age.

If the digestive functions, however weak, can do any work at all they should be given work to do to the extent of their powers. In the easy process of its preparation the digestibility of Benger's can be regulated to give this work with extreme nicety.

The "British Medical Journal" says—"Benger's Food has, by its excellence established a reputation of its own."

BENGER'S NEW BOOKLET deals with the most common doubts and difficulties which mothers have to encounter. It is sent post free on application to Benger's Food, Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, England.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere

B23

White Vaseline

Invaluable Internally for Coughs, Sore Throat, Croup, Etc.

12 Vaseline Remedies in Tubes Capsicum, Borated, Oxide of Zinc, Camphorated, Carbolated, Camphorated, Mentholated, Etc. Each for special purposes. Write For Free Vaseline Book.

Chesebrough Mfg. Co 1880 Chabot Ave., Montreal.

Do you know of any person who would like to make five dollars a week in their spare time? If you do, send their name to Canadian Home Journal.

COMFORT SHOE FORM

Shapes Your Shoe to Fit Your Foot.

A practical Shoe Stretcher for home use. Eases corns, bunions and tight vamp seams. Breaks in new shoes in one night. Simple to operate and will last a lifetime. Makes new or old shoes comfortable, obviating the use of injurious foot powders, Corn or Bunion cures.

Thousands now being sold in Toronto. Made in two sizes: one for men and one for women; state size wanted when ordering.

By mail, prepaid, $1.00. Money cheerfully refunded if not satisfactory.

Liberal Discount to Agents and Dealers.

D. I. HARPER & CO.

79 Spadina Ave., TORONTO

By JESSIE E. RORKE

RUSKIN has said: "Flowers seem intended for the solace of ordinary humanity; * * * quiet, contented, ordinary people love them as they grow; luxurious and disorderly people rejoice in them gathered." But if this be true many of us come willingly under condemnation and truly "rejoice in them gathered," finding as real, if not as lasting, a pleasure in a few well arranged flowers as in a choice piece of marble or a beautiful picture.

But it is a mistake to think that flowers are beautiful enough in themselves to be independent of arrangement and surroundings. Nature has such perfection of harmony and grace in all her compositions, such a quiet and unobtrusive subordination of the lesser parts of the plant to the flower itself, that we are apt to feel the beauty without stopping to realize how it is attained, and carry away the flower, the chief centre of interest, without a thought that the greater part of its charm is left behind us or any attempt to reproduce similar conditions in its new environment. Yet, if flowers are to have their full decorative value, these small details, the causes which lead to such beautiful effects, must be carefully studied and understood.

ARRANGEMENT OF SHORT-STEMMED VIOLETS.

It is wise to select the flowers with the place which they are to fill in view. Will a low or high arrangement serve the purpose best? What colors will harmonize with the room and add most to its charm? Will a single rosebud give the needed touch of grace or should it be a mass of glowing bloom? Tall straight flowers should not be placed in a position above the eye, or on a table so small that they appear to be insecure—weighting the vase at the bottom may make them perfectly safe, but their effect will still be unpleasant. Flowers that droop and show their face from beneath are best to use if one must look up at them, as on a high shelf or mantel. The heavy headed double tulips, peonies and the pretty white clusters of the mountain ash are flowers that seem to require such a position. It is rarely wise to use flowers of more than one color in a room at one time, though occasionally flowers of the same kind, but different colors, as white and purple lilacs, or of different kinds that are found massed together in the fields, as goldenrod and asters, or buttercups and daisies, will give a pleasing effect in a large room. In a dark room the brighter flowers, yellow, orange and orange reds may be used in profusion and will add much to its cheerfulness, while the lower tones of the purples and blues look cool and refreshing on a warm day when one would gladly exclude the sunshine. Keep the flowers quite free from surrounding bric-a-brac and give them as plain a background as possible —they refuse to be subordinate and are better omitted where something else claims the larger share of interest.

In arranging the flowers themselves it is best to conform as nearly as possible to their manner of growth. Surely anyone who had spent even ten minutes in really enjoying the beauty of a lilac bush could never again cramp its graceful clusters into a symmetrical mound of purple bloom devoid of leaves and almost of stems. A moment's glance at the wild iris suggests at once that it must have a tall slender vase and be surrounded with only a few of its own leaves, while nasturtiums claim for themselves a low bowl or open dish where the exquisite colorings of the flowers can be massed together among their flat green leaves.

IT has been said that the Japanese love the entire plant while we love only the blossom, and the majority of our flower arrangements go far to prove the latter part of the statement true. In spite of what the florists may tell us, all flowers require absolutely their own leaves, and these in the proportions in which they grow. Such flowers as sweet peas or golden glow that blossom well above the leaves will not require so much green, but nasturtiums are found with quite half as many leaves as flowers, and lilies of the valley have even more. The natural length of the stem should be remembered too in cutting, as the flowers must look cramped and out of proportion if cut too short.

Different kinds of flowers should never be put together in one bouquet and different colors of the same flower very rarely—only in such flowers as nasturtiums, sweet peas and pansies where the varying tones blend and harmonize with one another. It is so easy to imagine how incongruous a bush would look if crowded with different varieties and colors of flowers, and surely the same arrangements in the smaller compass of one bouquet is even worse. Pyramid bouquets of many kinds and colors are so frequently to be found in our smaller churches, often made up of very beautiful flowers that could not have failed to add to the quiet dignity and beauty of the building, nor to add their mite to the spirit of reverence and worship, had any of them been arranged separately and more simply. I call to mind one morning service when my thoughts wandered from the sermon to the big bouquet that decorated the pulpit, counting out the flowers—white lilacs, crimson tulips, yellow tulips, pink geraniums and the green leaves of the big perennial poppy—and then on to the beautiful garden where they grew in such abundance that the vase might easily have been filled with any one of them alone. How beautiful they would have been, just a few of those big pink and white petalled geraniums among their own green leaves, or a cluster of the long-stemmed tulips.

The receptacle in which the flowers are placed should be harmonious in color and line and always entirely subordinate to the flowers themselves. The shape should be of the simplest and only the quietest colors should be used, and sometimes even the cheapest materials prove to be the most beautiful. For many flowers there is nothing more pleasing than the inexpensive vases and bowls of clear glass, and I have seen few things more beautiful than an old grey stone mustard jar filled with branches of lilacs with their drooping purple clusters. Cut glass is never satisfactory for flowers as neither its outlines nor character seem to harmonize, and elaborately decorated china, or highly colored pottery, however beautiful in themselves, will only detract from the effect of the flowers which they hold. The dull greens, blues and browns of some of the pottery vases and the old brass and copper receptacles suggest most attractive color schemes. Soleil d'or roses in a copper bowl will make a bit of color that one will delight to linger and enjoy.

RED ROSES IN DARK BLUE JUG.

The necessary balance between the flowers and their receptacle must not be forgotten. It is equally trying to have the flowers appear in the large vase which holds them or to look crowded and top heavy because it is too small. There is sometimes a difficulty in keeping the flowers in an erect position without crowding them into a small-necked bowl, but this may be remedied by the use of the small metal holders which are heavy enough to stay at the bottom and hold the flowers in a graceful, natural position. But if these are not at hand, small sticks laid crosswise will sometimes answer the purpose, or superfluous leaves and stems may be tucked in where they will be useful without attracting too much attention.

In selecting flowers for decoration it is often better to go to the woods and fields than to the garden. The dainty little foam flower, wild lilies, "Queen Anne's lace," ox-eyed daisies, "black-eyed Susans," the brilliant autumn foliage—any of these will not fail to give the most artistic effects.

The Japanese have surpassed all other nations in the love of flowers and skill In their arrangement. They have considered it a subject worth long and careful study and the results are such as might be expected from a people whose whole inclination through many generations has been toward the purely decorative side of art. The children are given lessons in the arrangement of flowers, ferns and grasses, spending as much time on its mastery as Canadian children do on the subjects of the languages and sciences that we are wont to consider more important. For an hour or even two, the Japanese will stand before his single branch of cherry blossoms, trying first this, then that effect of line, color and light, gently persuading with careful fingers, twisting it a little here, bending there, until the whole appears to have the same free unstudied charm and grace that it had upon the tree, and the result is as truly a work of art as though he placed it upon canvas.

SPRAY OF APPLE BLOSSOMS

THE choosing and arranging of pictures must necessarily be almost entirely a matter of individual taste, as we wish our pictures to be those from which we obtain personal pleasure, and the way they are hung must depend on the shape and lighting of the room; yet there are a few suggestions that will apply in all cases and sometimes slip the mind when they should be of service.

Our principal reason for hanging pictures in our homes is to break the bare monotonous spaces of the walls and the desire to make continuous the moments of pleasure that some picture has brought to us, or to place where we may live in companionship with it, the expression of some great conception or unusual beauty.

In rare cases a picture may be of such great value that the room and its furnishings are arranged for its reception, but usually the house has been built and furnished before the selection of the pictures, and it is necessary to remember that they must conform to the size of the room, the purpose for which it is used and the other furnishings employed. But the beauty of the picture is the first consideration. It in itself should appeal to us sufficiently to give real and lasting pleasure, and be regretfully left behind if it fails to fulfil the requirements of fitness.

For the drawing-room, pictures should be, as far as possible, real works of art, and should not be crowded on the walls. A few good pictures are much to be preferred to any number of poorer ones. Very large pictures or those that require distance for a good effect are, of course, out of place in a small room, though the opposite extreme is not wise as small pictures have a tendency to make the room seem smaller. Some pictures, though small in size are great in conception, and fill a much larger space than others of the same dimensions. The irritation of a wall that is unbalanced or lacking in harmony is, or should be, as wearing as a tiresome noise. It is possible to become so accustomed to discords that they fail to jar, but one would not willingly lose the appreciation of the beautiful, or become blind to the harmonies of line and color. Reproductions of good pictures are often well worth a place in our homes, and are always to be preferred to a poor though more expensive picture. Modern reproductive processes have furnished us with a great deal of material that has real merit and artistic value, and at a cost that makes it available for the poorest home. Indeed, we are left without excuse for hanging pictures that have not the fullest claim to be considered beautiful.

If the pictures are to be hung in a room the walls should be treated in such a way as to give a quiet, unobtrusive back-ground, but if the walls themselves are decorative —hung with tapestry, figured fabrics, or a paper that itself holds the attention, there should be no pictures.

In an ordinary dwelling house it is often difficult to get a good light. A northern exposure is always best, but mostly one can only compromise and by trying the picture in various positions give it the best light that the room affords. Where possible the high lights in the picture and the light from the windows should correspond in direction—a strong light on the shadow side shows the picture at a disadvantage. Where possible a picture should be hung at the level of the eye and flat against the wall, but if, because of some interference such as a picee of furniture it is necessary to hang it higher, a slight tilting forward of the upper part of the frame will bring the surface of the glass at right angles to a line from the eye of the observer. In a landscape this line should strike near the horizon, in a portrait near the eyes of the figure.

Without exception the frame should be subordinate to the picture it encloses; its use is to isolate the picture from its surroundings, consequently, it should have little ornament, certainly none that will attract attention from the picture itself. Gilt frames will sometimes have this effect, especially if the coloring in the picture is dark. Prints look out of place in highly gilded frames; they should usually have mats of heavy toned paper with frames of some pretty wood. A light frame with a dark picture and a dark wall attracts attention to itself, or a very dark frame against a light wall. If the colors of the print or canvas are subdued, a frame showing one of the predominating shades should be chosen. If browns prevail in the picture a brown frame cannot fail to harmonize.

A small picture should usually have a narrow frame except where it is desirable

TRILLIUMS IN CLEAR GLASS VASE

to gain an effect of perspective, but pictures showing large objects, vivid colors, or vigorous action require deeper frames—too narrow a moulding would look inadequate with such a picture as "The Horse Fair," even if the print were small. Their use should be limited almost exclusively to heavy canvases and light water colors.

The matter of frames should be carefully considered, as a good picture has frequently been spoiled by a tawdry frame. Anything which looks ostentatious or glaring should be avoided, as the frame is merely a secondary consideration and should never distract attention from the picture itself.

To Europe in Less Than Four Days LAND to LAND

The St. Lawrence Route to Europe by the ROYAL Line, shortens the ocean voyage to less than four days, and affords the traveller two days of delightful sheltered sailing down the great St. Lawrence with its never ending panorama of beautiful scenery and historically famous points. The splendid triple turbine steamers Royal George and Royal Edward hold all speed records and afford the most luxurious accommodation in the Canadian - European service. The English port, Bristol, is only two hours' run to London by the special boat trains which meet the Royal Line Steamers on arrival. For further information see nearest steamship agent, or the Canadian Northern Steamships, Limited.

H. C. Bourlier
General Agent
Toronto, Ont.

A. H. Davis
General Agent
Winnipeg, Man.

Guy Tombs
General Agent
Montreal, Que.

P. Mooney
General Agent
Halfax, N. S.

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada. Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Frocks of Linen and Batiste

LINEN and batiste are two of the favorite materials of midsummer wear, but both these dresses can be made from a variety of fabrics.

In the illustration, the older girl's dress combines white linen with rose color and is trimmed with lace banding, but thinner materials, such as lawn or batiste, could be combined with all-over embroidery or with heavy lace, or the dress could be made of one material throughout with the yoke and sleeve bands embroidered by hand. The main portions of the blouse and the short sleeves are cut in one and are attached to the center front, and the yoke finishes the whole. The skirt is straight and plaited.

For the eight-year size will be required 3⅝ yards of material 27 inches wide, 2½ yards 36 or 2⅜ yards 44, with ½ yard 27 inches wide for yoke and sleeve trimming, and 11 yards of banding.

The pattern, 7053, is cut in sizes for girls of 6, 8 and 10 years of age.

The little tot's dress is made all in one piece, but it is tucked over the shoulders as well as at front and back, and falls in most graceful and becoming lines. There is an opening made at the back and the upper edge is joined to a square yoke. All childish materials that are thin enough to be tucked are appropriate. The yoke can be made of banding, as in this instance, or of all-over material, or it could be made to match the dress and finished with scalloped edges.

For the four-year size will be required 3 yards of material 27 inches wide, 2⅝ yards 36 or 44, with 2¾ yards of banding.

The pattern, 7054, is cut in sizes for children of 2, 4 and 6 years of age.

A Dainty Morning Gown

PRETTY, graceful morning gowns are liked at all seasons, but are especially needful during the warmer months. This one is dainty in the extreme, yet simple and easily made. The blouse and skirt are joined on a slightly high waist line, and the gown is left open for its entire length at the front. The blouse is made with sleeves that are sewed to the armholes and the trimming is arranged on indicated lines. In the illustration, flowered batiste is trimmed with lace banding, but this gown is adapted to thin silks, to challis, and to materials of the kind quite as well as to the washable ones. Challis with bands of satin ribbon and frills of lace would be pretty for cooler days.

For a woman of medium size will be required 7¾ yards of material 27 inches wide, 5¾ yards 36, or 4 yards 44, with 10 yards of banding, 7 yards of edging, 1 yard of beading; the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¾ yards.

The pattern, 7043, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust.

Striped Linen with Plain

GOWNS that are made in semi-princess style and with a high waist line are exceedingly fashionable this season, and this one will be found available for many materials. In the illustration striped linen is combined with plain, and the edges are scalloped, but plain linen could be trimmed with contrasting color, and pongee is excellent for such a gown, while it also can be utilized for foulard and the thinner washable materials. For street wear white or colored serge of light weight, with collar and cuffs of black satin, would be exceedingly smart. The shield is separate, and can be made from any pretty lingerie material, but in this instance it is cut low and made from flouncing. The blouse is cut in one piece with the sleeves, but with a seam at the center back. The sailor collar can be cut on round or square outline. The skirt is cut in four gores. The two are joined, and the closing is made at the front.

For the medium size will be required 7¾ yards of material 27 inches wide, 5¼ yards 36 or 4½ yards 44, with ¼ yard 27 inches wide for the collar and cuffs. The width of the skirt at lower edge is 2½ yards.

The pattern of the gown, 7052, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust.

The Fitting Gloves

GLOVES, as the specialty shop man reminds us, are, comparatively speaking, the most expensive and noticeable part of a woman's attire, yet they are generally drawn on at the last minute, and then hurriedly. We all know that to take the time to have a good pair of gloves correctly fitted when buying is a distinct saving, but we sometimes forget and spend the same amount of time trying to find a cheaper pair that prove in the wearing anything but economy. Styles of gloves do not change very much; the serious question each season is rather in the length of glove to be worn. Oddities do appear, but it is safer to keep to the conventional, unless it is something that seems to have been made for some special dress that you may have. As for length one must look to the dress sleeve. For morning or afternoon, for street wear and with tailored clothes the two-clasp glove is correct, in lambskin, cape, mocha and chamois, pique-stitched. Whether the gloves show a contrasting stitch or facing is a matter of individual taste, and personal taste and use govern the selection of color. There is a heavy glove in white glace finish, that may be washed with soap and water on the hands. The ordinary chamois gloves in this respect are a real economy for the business girl who must count her pennies, as she may have daintily fresh gloves without the added expense of the professional cleaner. These ought to be bought of a good quality, and care be taken to fit them on the hands. The chamois gloves may be purchased in both light and heavy weight—the heavy weight being warm and comfortable for cold weather.

Gloves for social occasions are glace or suede, and again the question of length is variably governed by the sleeve. A plain, long sleeve when not of transparent material calls for a short glove, but you will find a coquettish woman, knowing well that long gloves give a youthful and graceful effect to the arm, will often wrinkle an eight or sixteen-button length glove artistically over the sleeve. If the upper part of the sleeve is of heavy material and the lower part of lace you will like a long glove for much the same reason, and also because a short glace-finish glove looks heavy when continued by a transparent sleeve. When a dress is of sheer and delicate material the suede gloves in their delicate tints are tempting, although you know they have not

Dress Pattern No. 7052
Embroidery Design No. 583

Dress Pattern No. 7053

Dress Pattern No. 7054

Morning Gown Pattern No. 7043

the wearing or the cleaning qualities of the glace. For evening wear the gloves always meet the dress sleeve, whatever the length, so the only question is as to color and finish, to which the same rules apply as for the afternoon gloves.

With New Blouse in Norfolk Style

THE so-called outing blouse, or the one made with sailor collar and in Norfolk style, is a pronounced favorite of the season and also can be relied upon to make an excellent model for the coming autumn. This one is combined with the plain five-gored skirt, and the gown is made of buff linen trimmed with black, but various color combinations will suggest themselves at once. White linen with rose color or blue is pretty; black is liked on white and on all colors and the skirt can be made plain and finished only with a hem if the flounce is not liked. In this case the blouse is made with elbow sleeves and worn without a shield, but the shield can be added and the sleeves can be made long, if liked. In addition to serving for the entire gown, the blouse makes an excellent model for linen and materials of the kind to be worn over odd skirts.

For the medium size the blouse will require 4⅜ yards of material 27 inches wide, 3¼ yards 36, or 2¾ yards 44, with ⅝ yard 27 inches wide for collar and cuffs; for the skirt will be needed 4½ yards 27, 3⅝ yards 36, or 2¾ yards 44, with 2 yards 27 inches wide for the flounce.

The pattern of the blouse, 7037, is cut in sizes 34 to 42 inches bust; the skirt, 7018, sizes 22 to 34 inches waist.

Blouse Pattern No. 7037
Skirt Pattern No. 7018

Gowns for Summer Afternoon

SELDOM has any season seen so much variety as is offered just now, but, nevertheless, border and border effects are many. In the illustration are shown two gowns, one made of bordered marquisette, and the other of linen trimmed to give a border effect.

The marquisette gown is combined with messaline, and is exceedingly charming. The skirt is a simple straight one, but the lower part is made of the silk, while the upper is made of the marquisette. The blouse is especially well adapted to bordered fabrics and to combinations of material. It can be made just as illustrated or high at the neck. The same model would be a pretty one for foulard or for any other thin material.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2¼ yards of bordered material 20 inches wide, with ¾ yard of satin 20; for the skirt will be needed 2½ yards of bordered material 36, with 2¾ yards of satin 20 inches wide.

The pattern of the waist, 7016, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 inches bust; the skirt, 6999, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist.

Waist Pattern No. 7016
Skirt Pattern No. 6999

The linen gown is made with one of the new tunics, and this tunic is arranged over a five-gored skirt, finished with a circular flounce. In this case, the flounce is made of eyelet embroidery. The blouse is made with a pretty shaped yoke and with sleeves that are sewed to the armholes. It can be finished with or without a collar. Linen is a favorite material for midsummer wear and the combination illustration is in every way charming, but this same model would be excellent for pongee or for any similar silk, and for many of the fashionable wool materials, with the trimming portions made from any contrasting material that is effective therewith.

For the blouse will be required 2¼ yards of material 27 inches wide, 1¾ yards 36 or 44, with ⅝ yard 36 inches wide for the yoke and cuffs, 2½ yards of banding and ⅞ yard of lace for the under sleeves. For the tunic and foundation skirt will be needed 7¾ yards 27, 6¼ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 2¼ yards of banding and 2¼ yards of fringe, and 1¾ yards 36 inches wide for the flounce.

The pattern of the waist, 7061, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 inches bust; the skirt, 7034, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist.

Waist Pattern No. 7061
Skirt Pattern No. 7034

Gowns for Midsummer Wear

THE high waist line makes a notable feature of the latest styles. Here are two gowns that are exploited, giving quite different effects.

The gown to the left is made of striped marquisette, and it is trimmed with Irish lace and velvet ribbon. It is in the height of style. The trimming gives the continuous lines, the deep hem and wide tucks on the skirt are charming as well as fashionable, and the blouse is made both with the peasant sleeves and a yoke. The model will be found an available one for almost all figures and for all seasonable materials adapted to indoor use. The skirt can be cut off at the natural waist line and adjusted over the blouse at that point if more becoming, and the blouse can be made with high neck in place of the round one shown.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2⅛ yards of material 27 inches wide, or 1¼ yards 36 or 44, with ⅝ yard of all-over lace, 1½ yards of lace banding and 6 yards of velvet ribbon; for the skirt will be needed 6 yards 27 or 4 yards 36 or 44, with ¾ yard of lace banding and 1½ yards of velvet ribbon.

The pattern of the blouse, 7049, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust; the skirt, 7046, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist.

Waist Pattern No. 7049
Skirt Pattern No. 7046

The second gown is made with one of the new yoke skirts and surplice blouse. This blouse can be finished as illustrated or with a sailor collar and revers, and it can be made with or without the guimpe lining. The skirt is five-gored and the yoke also is cut in five gores. In this case both are of one material, and the yoke is trimmed with banding, but the yoke can be made of the trimming material and the skirt left plain or finished with a band, as liked. This gown is made of white linen and is trimmed with banding, but such a model as this one is just as desirable for foulard and pongee as it is for linen, and it can, indeed, be made available for many fabrics, and treated in many ways. Made with the collar and revers the blouse takes on a quite different aspect and becomes adapted to street use.

For the medium size the blouse, as illustrated, will require 1½ yards of material 36 inches wide, or 1⅛ yards 44, with 1½ yards 36 inches wide, and 1 yard of all-over lace for the guimpe; for the trimming will be needed 2¼ yards of banding; for the skirt will be required 4¼ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 5 yards of banding. To make the blouse as shown in the small view will require 2⅜ yards of material 36 or 1¾ yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern of the blouse, 7040, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust; the skirt, 7038, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist.

Waist Pattern No. 7040
Skirt Pattern No. 7038

Tailored Skirts—Their Variations

ONE finds the greatest variety of styles in skirts of suits and those of the separate class. The new "trouser" or "pantaloon" skirt is creating quite some comment and amusement at the moment, but it is anticipated that this style will never be generally adopt-

HANDKERCHIEFS

HEMSTITCHED LINEN CAMBRIC.

Quality Numbers	18	22	28	36
	Price per dozen.
Ladies', 13ins. square, ¼in. hems	$ .73	$ .95	$1.20	$2.00
Ladies', 15½ins. sq., ½ and ⅞in. hems	1.00	1.35	1.75	2.95
Ladies', 16½ins. sq., 1in. hems	1.12	1.55	2.00	3.35
Ladies', 17½ins. sq., ½in. hems	1.12	1.55	2 00	3.35
Gentlemen's, 19ins. sq., ½in. hems			2.37	3.90
Gentlemen's, 20½ins. sq., 1in. hems	1.55	2.05	2.75	4.63
Gentlemen's, 23½ins. sq. 1in. hems	2.00	2.60	3.55	5.25

GOLDEN FLAX HEMSTITCHED CAMBRIC.

	No. G 41	No. G 43	No. G 44	No. G 45
	Hand-sewn.	Hand-sewn.	Hand-sewn.	Hand-sewn.
Ladies', 13ins. sq., ¼in. hems	$1.63	$2.00	$3.38	$4.00
Ladies', 15½ins. sq., ½ and ⅞in. hems	2.25	3.85	4.50	5.25
Ladies', 16½ins. sq., 1in. hems	2.50	4.25	4.87	5.75
Ladies', 17½ins. sq., ½in. hems	2.50	4.25	4.87	5.75

HEMSTITCHED SILVER SHEEN TRANSPARENT IRISH LINEN.

Nos.	SS 3	SS 4	SS 5	SS 7
Ladies', 11in. sq., ⅛in. hems	$ .95	$1.37	$1.60	$2.50
Ladies', 13ins. sq., ¼in. hems	1.30	1.87	2.45	4.13
Ladies', 15½ins. sq., ⅞in. hems	1.87	2.38	3.15	5.45
Gentlemen's, 20½ins. sq., 1in. hems		4.00	4.88	8.50

BORDERED LINEN CAMBRIC HEMMED.

Nos.	BH 1	BH 2	BH 3	BH 7
Ladies' Size	$ .69	$ .80	$1.00	$1.88
Gentlemen's Size	1.00	1.13	1.38	2.70
Gentlemen's Full Size	1.12	1.25	1.50	3.10

HAND-EMBROIDERED INITIAL (per dozen)

	No. 730	No. 46	No. 71	No. S 63	No. 88
13 inches square, ¼in. hem	$1.50	$1.75	$2.38	$3.15	$4.38

	No. W 41	No. W 49.	No. W 42.	No. 53.	No. W 35
14 inches square, ⅜in. hem	$1.50
15 inches square, ½in. hem		$1.88	$3.15	$2.65
20 inches square, 1in. hem					$2.50

FANCY

CALAIS LACE AND CLEAR LINEN LAWN.
In great variety. Prices: 16c., 20c., 25c., 50c. each.
EMBROIDERED MUSLIN HEMSTITCHED.
Specially Soft Finish. Prices: 10c., 12c., 25c., 38c. each.
EMBROIDERED HEMSTITCHED (Union of Linen and Cotton).
Beautifully Soft and Fine. Prices: 25c., 30c., 38c., 75c. each.
EMBROIDERED CLEAR LINEN LAWN HEMSTITCHED.
Best for wear, and (in use) become ideally soft. Prices: 13c., 21c., 25c., 50c. each.
EMBROIDERED LINEN CAMBRIC HEMSTITCHED.
Thick heavy make. A variety always in stock. Prices: 20c., 25c., 38c., 50c. each.
EMBROIDERED SCALLOPED BORDERED.
Prices: 25c., 38c., 50c., 62c. each.
EMBROIDERED HAND-SPUN, HAND-WOVEN, SILVERY TRANSPARENT.
Of exquisite and surpassing beauty. Prices: $1.88 to $15.75 each.
PRINTED COTTON HANDKERCHIEFS (suitable for Children).
Prices: 25c per dozen, Hemstitched.

WALPOLES'
IRISH LINENS

44Z Bedford Street, BELFAST, Ireland.

Illustrated Catalogue on receipt of Postcard to WALPOLES', 173 Huron St., Toronto

Jaeger Underwear is Best for Summer

Wear Jaeger Pure Wool light weight Underwear for comfort and safety in hot weather.

It absorbs and dissipates moisture more quickly than any other underwear and is therefore the most hygienic as well as the most comfortable.

Sold in all sizes for Men and Women. Every garment guaranteed against shrinkage.

TRADE MARK

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co., Limited.

231 YONGE STREET, - - - - - TORONTO.
316 St. Catherine St., West, - - - - Montreal.
Steele Block, Portage Ave., - - - - Winnipeg.

Dye Those Summer Things

Scores of summer things, such a fancy parasols, bathing suits, colored stockings, ribbons, feathers and artificial flowers, hammocks and cushion covers get faded and dingy long before they are worn out.

WITH MAYPOLE SOAP

The clean, easy home dye, you can give them a new lease of life, usefulness and beauty, and save many a dollar. No stained hands or kettles, no muss, no work to speak of. 24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10c—black 15c—at your dealer's or postpaid with free Booklet, "How to Dye," from ed. The skirt is circular cut, with a panel front and back which can be unbuttoned and left loose so as to reveal the trouser effect of the skirt when the wearer walks. Practical skirts are wider than last season, the average model measuring from two to two and one-half yards wide around the bottom. Extra width is gained in some of the models of narrow effect by the introduction of side or box pleats. These are pressed flat without any sign of flare about the feet, but at the same time gaining necessary latitude for locomotion. Tunic effects are especially good. Simulated tunics are shown in a great number of styles usually effected by piping of contrasting fabric.

FRANK L. BENEDICT & CO. = MONTREAL

Blouse Pattern No. 7025

Blouse with Front Closing

THE blouse that is closed at the front, yet is not a plain one, is much in demand, for it fills many needs. This one is finished with a revers that is smart and becoming and it will be found desirable for the waist and for the entire gown. The wide tuck over each shoulder provides just becoming fulness and the use of contrasting material for revers and cuffs gives a touch of color that is exceedingly smart. Henrietta cloth makes this one and it is trimmed with velvet, but for an odd waist plaid silk could be trimmed with plain and various other combinations made.

Blouse Pattern No. 6869

The waist consists of fronts and back. The revers is joined to the right edge and the closing is made invisibly. The sleeves are cut in one piece each and joined to the shaped cuffs. The collar can be finished with the over portion, as illustrated, or without as preferred.

The quantity of material required for the medium size is 3½ yards 24 or 27 inches wide, 2¾ yards 36 or 2 yards 44, with ⅝ yard of satin to trim as illustrated; 1 yard of lace for jabot.

The pattern, No. 6869, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inch bust measure.

Tucked One-Piece Blouse

SUCH a pretty little blouse as this one is sure to meet with a welcome from every girl. It is adapted to small women too, and it is altogether charming. In the illustration it is made from bordered material and it is especially well adapted to such use; but it can be made available for any seasonable fabric, for the straight edges can be trimmed with banding or with embroidery, or in any way to suit the fancy. The neck is cut out to form a small square.

The blouse is made in two pieces that are joined at the front and the trimming conceals the seam. There are tucks at the center-front that extend to yoke depth and at the back that extend for full length. The closing is made invisibly at the back.

For the 16-year size the blouse will require 2 yards of bordered material 20 inches wide, with 1½ yards of banding and 1½ yards of ruffling to make as illustrated; or 2 yards of plain material 27, 1 yard 36 or 44 inches wide.

Blouse Pattern No. 6995

The pattern, 7025, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years.

Fancy Peasant Blouse

THE blouse made in peasant style and which gives a bolero effect is one of the very newest, and this model is exceptionally pretty. In the illustration it is made of messaline combined with Persian silk and with yoke and under sleeves of embroidered net, but almost any two seasonable materials that are harmonious can be combined for the blouse. It would be charming made from eyelet embroidery with linen, and it would be exceedingly beautiful made from figured and plain foulard, and it can be utilized for embroidered net, all-over lace, and materials of the kind, in combination with silk, marquisette, crepe de chine, or any similar material. In the illustration the blouse is made over the lining, but the lining can be omitted and the blouse finished as shown in the back view, or with a yoke and collar, making it high at the neck, as preferred.

The lining can be fitted by means of darts at the front or made in guimpe style. It includes two-piece sleeves. The blouse itself can be made in one-piece or with seams over the shoulders, as best suits the material. If the lining is omitted and the high neck effect is wanted, the yoke can be attached to the blouse. If the under sleeve effect is wanted without lining, lace or other trimming can be attached under the trimming bands.

The quantity of material required for the medium size is 1 yard 27 or 36 inches wide, for plain portions, 1¾ yards 27, ⅞ yard 36 or 44 for bolero portions, 1 yard 18 for yoke and under sleeves.

The pattern, No. 6995, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42-inch bust measure.

House Jacket Pattern No. 6885

House Jacket

THE simple breakfast jacket is the one that is apt to be most needed. This one has one tuck over each shoulder that provides just becoming fulness. In the illustration the right front is cut in two big scallops, but it can be finished plain, as shown in the small view, if preferred, and the neck can be made a little higher with a turned-over collar. Sleeves that extend just below the elbows are found to be practical as they are fashionable, but this jacket can be made in that way or with long sleeves, as preferred.

The jacket consists of fronts and back. The back is laid in a box plait at the center. The sleeves are made in one piece each, gathered into bands, and the belt confines the fulness of the jacket at the waist line.

For the medium size will be required 4¼ yards of material 24 or 27 inches wide, 3 yards, 36 or 2½ yards 44 inches wide, with ½ yard of silk for bands.

The pattern, No. 6885, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inches bust measure.

House Jacket Pattern No. 7029

Tucked Negligee

THE negligee that is made with a peplum is a favorite one. It means smooth fit over the hips and pretty fulness where fulness is needed. This one is especially adapted to warm weather needs and includes the big collar that makes such a feature of the season. In the illustration it is made of flowered batiste trimmed with lace banding and edging.

The negligee consists of fronts and back with peplum. The fronts are tucked to yoke depth but the back is plain. The peplum is joined to the lower edge and the beading conceals the joining. The fancy collar is seamed to the neck edge. The sleeves are cut in one piece each and they can be left loose or gathered into bands.

For a woman of medium size will be required 3½ yards of material 27 inches wide, 2½ yards 36, or 2⅛ yards 44, with 2½ yards of banding and 3½ yards of edging.

The pattern, No. 7029, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inch bust measure.

Child's Bishop Dress

BISHOP dresses, or those that are gathered at the neck edge, are exceedingly becoming to tiny folk. This one can be made plain, as shown on the figure, or it can be gathered and stayed with a belt, as shown in one of the small views. Treated in this latter way, it becomes quite different in effect, yet it is just as simple and easily made. The neck can be finished high or round and the sleeves made long or short, whether the belt is used or not.

Dress Pattern No. 6951

The dress is made with front and back. The sleeves are in one piece each, gathered into bands. When the high neck is used, the collar is joined to the neck edge. When low neck is used, the fulness is held by a band. To make as shown in the small view, the dress is gathered on indicated lines and stayed with a belt.

For the 2-year size will be required 2½ yards of material 27 inches wide, 2 yards 36, or 1¾ yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 6951, is cut in sizes for children of 6 months, 1, 2 and 4 years of age.

Boy's Blouse

THE blouse finished with a soft collar is a thoroughly comfortable and satisfactory garment, and one that every boy greatly likes to wear. This one combines plain fronts with a back that is full below a smooth yoke. It is smart and becoming and consequently it fulfills every requirement. All materials that are used for boys' blouses are appropriate, percale and madras, linen and galatea, also flannel for outing and for cooler weather.

The blouse is made with the plain

BON-TON

Every Woman, Girl or Child, no matter where they live, can be Stylishly and Economically Dressed this Summer,

BY SHOPPING AT THE "BON-TON" BY MAIL.

While our Bon-Ton Catalogue shows the splendid values we offer in Tailor Made Suits, light coats and capes or other seasonable articles, we are specially proud of offering in lingerie and washable fabrics which enable ladies to look so dainty and stylish during the Summer months. And Madam you do not realise how cheap our goods are until you see them.

Bon-Ton goods for women are the best value offered in Canada, and the most stylish.

That they are made in the latest style and of the best materials can be easily verified without any risk to you.

Order anything you like from our Spring and Summer Catalogue for 1911, and if it does not, in every particular, come up to your expectations, return it and we will not only refund your money at once, but pay express or postage charges both ways.

Could we do anything more than this to prove to you the absolute faith we have in our goods?

Among other advantages in shopping with us are that the catalogne price is all you pay for any article—we pay all transportation charges; that you can shop, any time, at your leisure, in ease and comfort, at your own home.

Every woman is interested in the newest styles, so every woman should have the Bon-Ton 1911 Spring and Summer Catalogue —simply send a post card today with your name and address.

THE BON-TON COMPANY,
439 ST. JOSEPH STREET, QUEBEC.

No. 4481—The charming Lingerie Dress, illustrated above is a sample of the handsome styles for both indoor and outdoor ladies' wear, illustrated in our catalogue. A dainty Val. yoke, handsome open work embroidery between rows of lace inserts, lingerie tucks, skirts joined to waist by lace belt, taken altogether make this dress one of the most attractive we offer. Price only $5.95 delivered to you.

SPECIAL REPRESENTATIVES WANTED in many localities. You can easily earn $5.00 a week in your spare time. Write for our salary or commission offer.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

BOOKLET "H" and sample of cream mailed on request.

Do You Want a Clear Complexion?

Princess Purifier will clear any kind of a tanned, freckled, blotched and discolored complexion. It doesn't cover up skin troubles, recollect, it positively removes them. It is carefully prepared in our own laboratory from pure ingredients known to be beneficial and not only preserves and enhances a good complexion, but transforms a poor complexion into one of charm and attractive beauty. Princess will also cure spots, pimples, blackheads, rashes eczema and other skin troubles. Contains no oils or fats. Price $1.50 express paid.

COMPLEXION PURIFIER

Superfluous Hair, Moles, Warts, Etc., permanently eradicted by our reliable method of antiseptic electrolysis, which is safe, sure and practically painless. This treatment can only be given with success by thoroughly trained operators of experience. We have five such. Largest institute in Canada, and one of the largest in America. Established twenty years.

Hiscott Institute
61 College Street - TORONTO

Our Princess Face Powder

Extremely soft, fine and adhesive. Imparts that clear transparency and velvety texture necessary to real beauty. White, pink and brunette. Price, 50 cents, postpaid.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

A clean stomach and a clear head are the guarantees of

Abbey's Salt

25c and 60c bottle.
Sold everywhere.
81

Dominion Express Money Orders and Foreign Cheques

are payable all over the World.

Absolutely the best way to remit money by mail.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED

Money sent by Telegraph and Cable

Foreign Money bought and sold.

Rates for Money Orders

$5 and under . .	3 cents
Over 5 to $10 . .	6 "
" 10 to 30 . .	10 "
" 30 to 50 . .	15 "

On Sale in all Can. Pac. Ry. Stations.

$552 Buys Everything Needed To Build This Fine 6 Room Home

NOT the portable kind, but well-constructed, warm, substantial frame buildings. You save architect's 5%, builder's 10% and lumber dealer's big profits by buying ALL materials direct from our mills. 14

Other Houses, Bungalows, Cottages, Barns, Schools, 2 to 12 Rooms—$175 Up

Everything at wholesale cost—lumber trimmed, fitted and marked; roofing, doors, windows, glass, plaster board, interior trim and finish, hardware, even the nails and paint. Also plans, blue prints and detailed building instructions—all so clear you'll need no skilled labor.

Book of 60 House Plans FREE

Photos, plans, descriptions show exactly what completed houses look like and tells exactly their entire cost. Send 2-cent stamp and ask for Plan Book No. 39

Sovereign Construction Co. 839 Lumsden Bldg. TORONTO, ONT.

ALMA Ladies' COLLEGE St. Thomas, Ont.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE ON REQUEST

"EAGLE" STEEL LAWN SWING For Only $13.50

This swing has never before been sold for less than $15.00, but as long as the present stock lasts you may buy one for $13.50.

The frame work is all of solid steel and is so constructed that it cannot rust or break. It is an ideal article to keep the children happy and in the open air.

It may be used as a couch or seat, and can be taken down in five minutes and stored in the house all winter.

Write for our booklet fully describing these swings.

The Ontario Wind Engine & Pump Co., Toronto

fronts, which are finished with a box plait and with a back that is cut in one piece, gathered and joined to the yoke. The collar is attached to the neck edge. The sleeves are in regulation style, finished with overlaps and cuffs. There is a patch pocket over the left front.

The quantity of material required for the medium size (10 years) is 2¾ yards 24, 2⅛ yards 32, or 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, 6735, is cut in sizes for boys of 6, 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

Boy's Box-Plaited Dress

THE one-piece box-plaited dress is a favorite one for tiny boys. It is simple and childish, yet masculine in effect. This one is worn over knickerbockers and can be held by a belt or left loose as preferred. Fine French serge is the material illustrated, but dresses of this kind are made from all childish materials, linen, galatea, poplin and the like are used at all seasons; serge and lightweight wools are much liked, and for very dressy occasions, the same model can be used for velvet and velveteen.

The dress is made with front and back portions that are laid in box-plaits, and it is closed invisibly beneath the box-plait at the center front. The sleeves are cut in one piece each and can be either tucked or gathered at their lower edges. The knickerbockers are of the regulation sort, drawn up by means of the elastic inserted in the hems.

The quantity of material required for a child 2 years old is 4¼ yards 24 or 27 inches wide, 2¾ yards 36, or 2¼ yards 44 inches wide.

Suit Pattern No. 6106

The pattern, No. 6874, is cut in sizes for boys of 1, 2 and 4 years of age.

High Waistline in Skirts

MANY skirts are in the raised waistline effect hung from an inside belt of webbing. Girdles and narrow belts of the material are invariably attached to the skirts. Also models with Empire girdles with sash ends attached are shown. The loose panel back is another clever idea of this season's skirts, the same being left loose from the knee depth or hip. This free hanging box pleat or panel is a style feature introduced not only in tailored models of the ready-to-wear class, but even brought out in the most elaborate afternoon and evening gowns.

Boy's Russian Suit

THE suit made with the real Russian coat that buttons up to the left shoulder is always a favorite one for the small boy, and this model is simple as well as smart. In the illustration it is made of serge and worn with a leather belt, but there are various other lightweight wool materials that are appropriate, while a great many mothers use the heavier washable fabrics throughout the entire autumn, and this model suits all equally well. Galatea, khaki, heavy linen, soft finished pique and viyella are admirable for hard usage throughout the cooler months. Among the wool fabrics serge and mohair are especially well liked, and for very dressy occasions white is a favorite.

The suit consists of the coat and the knickerbockers. The coat is made simply with fronts and back and closes with buttons and buttonholes while the sleeves are laid in tucks at the wrists. The knickerbockers are of the regulation sort drawn up by means of elastic at the knees.

Blouse Pattern No. 6735

The quantity of material required for the medium size (4 years) is 4⅛ yards 24, 3¼ yards 27, 2½ yards 36, or 2 yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, 6106, is cut in sizes for boys of 2, 4 and 6 years of age.

For Misses and Children

THE feature of the majority of the new dress models for misses and children feature the peasant styles which are very becoming. Every line shows this type of dress either in variations of cut and color combination or effected by trimmings. Much ingenuity has been exercised by designers this season in trimming effects, applied motifs and original designs for simulated yokes and flounces. Simplicity of outline is the keynote for these models, which denote smartness in every instance. Rep dresses for children are trimmed with braids applied to simulate yokes or bands of trimming. Many are made up with yokes and flounces of contrasting fabrics. Russian effects are good.

The style relation between misses' and women's garments is very strongly marked this season. The tailored suits are in great demand. The coats are short, the skirts gored or semi-pleated. The materials employed run mostly to serges, melanges and mannish mixtures and worsteds. Many of the suits continue to use sailor collars, square in outline, and terminating in long revers. The one-side fastening continues to be in favor, though many of the models show the closing directly down the front with three or more buttons.

Suit Pattern No. 6874

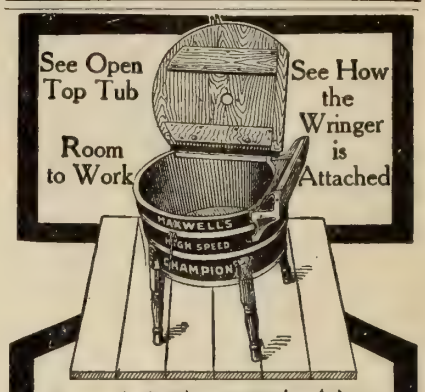
Woman's Beauty

is impossible without good health. To bring back the brightness of eye, the rosiness of cheek, the springy step of buoyant health, no tonic is better than

BOVRIL

It is the concentrated goodness of Beef.



MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

The Wringer Board extends from the side, out of the way of the cover. This allows practically the whole top of the tub to open up—makes it easy to put in and take out clothes.

No other washer has as large an opening. No other washer can be worked with crank handle at side as well as top lever.

Do you use Maxwell's "Favorite"—the churn that makes quality butter?

Write us for catalogues if your dealer does not handle them. 89

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS, ST. MARY'S, Ont.

Home Dressmaking

is simplified by using the celebrated

Hall-Borchert Adjustable Forms

Adjustable to every size from 32 to 44 bust measure and can be raised to suit length of skirt.

Write to-day for our New Catalog. It shows a full line of Dressmakers' Forms.

CLATWORTHY & SON, Ltd.

Display Fixture Manufacturers

161 King St. West, TORONTO

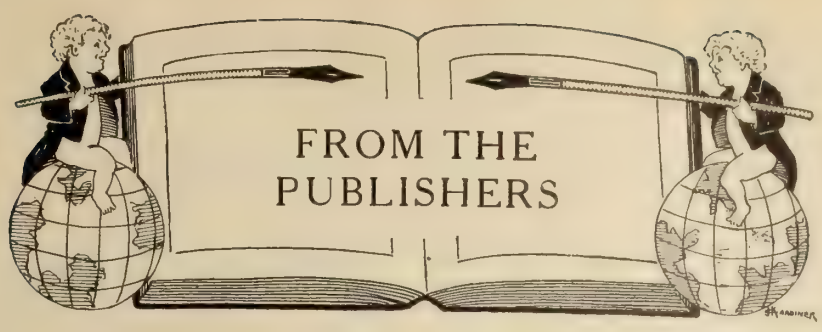
REAL SCOTCH WINCEY

—LAWRIE & SMITH— have for many years manufactured this fabric, which has been much appreciated, and goes on increasingly so. The excellent quality of the material, which is practically unshrinkable, makes it most adaptable to those who make up garments for day and night wear in their own homes.

PRICES—

1/- to 3/6 per yard.

Write for Free Samples to Lawrie & Smith, Ayr, Scotland.



FROM Mr. Robert Service one has a right to expect a better work of fiction than his first attempt, "The Trail of Ninety-Eight." Mr. Service has published two books of verse, "The Songs of a Sourdough" and "The Ballads of a Cheechako," decidedly unconventional and even startling in their bold realism, but possessed of a sense of color and a refreshing originality, which won their deserved popularity.

In the first novel by this Yukon writer, we have a production which is crude and absurd, as a piece of literature. The style is school-boyish in its evident desire to out-do the dime novel, and the material is of the most repulsive elements. Mr. Service, in this narrative, seems determined to see nothing but the worst elements in the scenes and the characters he describes. The Yukon can hardly be the sulphurous section he represents, and there must be some decent citizens in Dawson. The book is so hopelessly inartistic that it becomes a source of amusement. The chapter which describes the descent of the rapids by the hero and heroine is the funniest instance of mixed metaphors which modern fiction can display.

ST. MARTIN'S HOUSE, OFFICES OF THE MACMILLAN COMPANY OF CANADA, TORONTO.

Try again, Mr. Service! Do not write in a fit of hysterics, and please do not inflict upon us another heroine such as this impossible young person. Laura Jean Libbey's "He Loved But Was Lured Away" makes an excellent companion volume to "The Trail of Ninety-eight." Toronto: William Briggs.

* * *

IT is generally admitted that Toronto is the publishing centre of Canada. Richmond Street was once regarded as "Publishers' Row," but it is being deserted by those who prefer more quiet and picturesque surroundings. About two years ago, the "Presbyterian Publications" moved into a commodious and homelike structure on Bond Street, opposite St. Michael's Cathedral. Last year, a few doors north of this building, there was erected "Saint Martin's House," which must be regarded as the most artistic publishing home in Canada—where the offices of the MacMillan Company of Canada are to be found. The home offices in London, England, are in the parish of St. Martin's-in-the-Field—hence, the name of the Canadian branch. With the name of MacMillan have been associated many of the most famous literary characters of the last century, and its reputation for honor and good workmanship has placed it among those "reliable British houses" whose imprint is sufficient guarantee.

The New York branch was organized as a separate company and now has its own branches in Boston, Chicago, San Francisco, Dallas and Atlanta. The new home of the Canadian company is quite in keeping with the traditions of the house as to its situation and architecture. The surroundings are ideal, as to air, light and comfort. From the roof, on a summer day, one looks upon a waving mass of verdure with the spire of St. Michael's, the tower of the Metropolitan Church and the spire of historic St. James piercing the leafy expanse. The property includes a lawn, twenty-five feet in width, running all along the north side of the building, screened from the street by a large group of old shrubs, and affording an abundance of light and air to the offices. The building itself consists of five storeys and a high basement, which, with the first storey, is of Ohio bluestone, the upper storeys being of stone and brick.

The entrance is through a vestibule with a marble wainscot. The inner hall, lighted by a mullioned window with leaded cathedral glass, contains the staircase and passenger elevator, and opens into the waiting room and educational office. This is furnished in dark wood and lined with bookcases, and leads into the office of the president and directors. The rest of the first floor is occupied by the general offices, travellers' sample room, and packing and shipping departments. The shipping is done from the freight elevator into a paved court on the company's premises.

Having unobstructed light on all four sides, the various floors, each containing about six thousand square feet, are extremely light and airy, and, owing to the quiet of the street, a more suitable situation could hardly have been found for the business.

By courtesy of the president, Mr. Frank Wise, we are publishing in this department a cut which shows the admirable style of this structure.

* * *

RICHARD WASHBURN CHILD has written a most readable story in "Jim Hands," a narrative of factory life in New England, introduc-

Continued on page 42

A pure, rich, high grade, flavory coffee. The kind that makes you linger over your cup—such is

Seal Brand Coffee

128

Packed in 1 and 2 pound cans only.

CHASE AND SANBORN, MONTREAL.

Delicious Knox Grape Sherbet

An exquisitely frozen summer dessert that is quickly and easily made with pure grape juice, ice and

Knox Pure, Plain Sparkling Gelatine

Here is the Recipe:

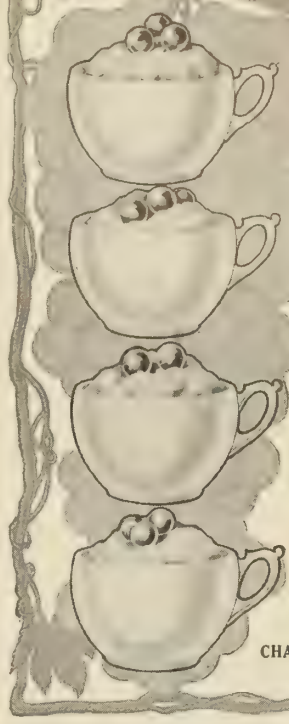
¼ box Knox Sparkling Gelatine — 1 cup sugar — 2 lemons
1 pint grape juice — 1 pint water — 1 orange

Soak gelatine in one-half cup cold water five minutes. Boil sugar and water to a syrup and add dissolved gelatine. When partly cooled add juice of the lemons, orange and grape juice. Freeze. Excellent to serve with the meat course.

Revised edition of "Dainty Desserts for Dainty People," our illustrated book of new recipes, free on request for your grocer's name.

Pint sample for 2c stamp and your grocer's name

CHARLES B. KNOX CO., 110 Knox Ave., Johnstown, N.Y.
Branch Factory: Montreal, Canada



ML FLOORGLAZE

THE FINISH THAT ENDURES

Try it for Sailboats, Canoes, Motor Boats, Carriages, Wagons, Wicker Furniture, Kitchen Tables, Bath-rooms, Flower Boxes, Window Screens, Window Seats, Radiators, Lawn and Porch Furniture, Metal Beds, Pantry and Cellar Shelves, and a hundred other things about the house, indoors and out.

ML FLOORGLAZE

is not affected by dampness; will not gather mold nor mildew; will not fade, crawl, check, flake nor flour; lasts amazingly, though subjected to severe exposure and wear. Best for floors; better than paint for all woodwork and most iron work. Costs little and lasts long.

ML Floorglaze is the only Perfect Floor Finish

For Sale by most Paint and Hardware Dealers in Canada. DON'T ACCEPT A SUBSTITUTE

MADE IN CANADA BY THE

Imperial Varnish & Color Co., Limited

WINNIPEG TORONTO VANCOUVER

THE summer shops! Can anything be more alluring in feminine eyes than these vistas of lace and muslin, these dainty organdies and immaculate linens? Every woman is born with a love of shopping, and never does this instinct have more gratification than in the days of June and early July. But let us give a word of advice to the summer shopper. Do your purchasing early in the morning or about four o'clock. If possible, avoid the middle of the day as a shopping period, or you will find yourself with nerves and strength exhausted.

Cushions for couch and veranda are among the summer attractions, and Eaton's are showing a most varied and seasonable line of curtains, cushions, and veranda furnishings, which will appeal to all who love dainty and fresh upholstering. The rose and other floral designs are the general favorites and will brighten living-room or library, so that the house will seem "as good as new."

Never were summer gowns more airy and attractive, and the summer girl can, at comparatively trifling cost, supply herself with a variety of dainty dresses. The gowns for travel are all on display in these days of vacations in Muskoka or at the seaside. Linen, pongee and Shantung furnish such a variety of going-away gowns that one has difficulty in making a choice, where each is so pleasing. The soft or rolling collar is seen on many of those costumes, as it forms the unusual combination of comfort and becoming style. The linen suit is probably the most popular, and the reason for its extensive use can easily be found in its durable qualities.

IF there is anything the average woman revels in it is negligees, says a New York shopper, and one does not wonder, for they grow more beautiful every season and are so becoming. A few mornings ago I enjoyed the privilege of viewing the season's collection at one of the smart Avenue shops, and found many of them ideally suited to trousseaux. One of the most bewitching was of a very soft rosy pink chiffon, a warm peachlike tone trimmed with maline lace. The coat which accompanied it was of shirred turquoise blue mousseline, held in at the knees, and ended with a ruffle of the lace and a garniture of varicolored rococo ribbon roses. Its fragile beauty was most youthful, and as the model walked the coat floated about her, creating an aura of mystic delicacy. Another, simply made of soft flesh color satin, had a baby waist extending just below the bust and finished simply with a cord. The chiffon coat of a violet blue tone was also simple, long and loose, and had as a trimming a row of large flat blue fresh water pearls. It was quite reasonable for such a handsome one, and came in other color combinations equally effective.

But the most adorable thing I have seen this year in this line was a robe intended as a room robe to be thrown over one's nightgown. It was simply made, long and fairly loose, with short kimono sleeves. These sleeves and the edge of the gown were finished with a tiny white chiffon puff. At each side of the front, midway between the knee and ankle, the satin was held back and shirred into a puff which was finished by a spray of delicate pink ribbon roses; covered elastic holding the gown back. It was the most truly feminine and bridelike thing I have seen.

The original model, of which this is a copy, came in a soft rose pink taffeta, and was almost equally beautiful and of such a becoming shade. I must not forget one of the most useful things for the bride or anyone else who travels, the Pullman robe intended to be worn on one's trips to the washroom on the train or on shipboard. Of soft silk, in soilproof grey and other colors, with its hood attached and its accompanying bag into which it folds so compactly, it is only $9.75. For steamer use and for lengthy traveling its uses are manifold. At this same shop they carry an extensive line of boudoir caps that are all very well made, most effective, and range from $1.95 up. At that price they are of point d'esprit trimmed with delicate ribbon flowers.

IT is hard to keep away from the topic of neckwear this season, says a Toronto scribe, and yet it is hard to write about them, for they almost defy description! One may classify them as stocks, jabots, fichus, or turndown collars, but what a variety under each head! Among the fichus each seems more charming than the last. To be successful, the fichu must, above all, be fine in material. It may be simple and absolutely untrimmed, but if made of sheer dainty material or showing careful handwork the effect is delightful. Nothing devised for adornment ever lost its charm more hopelessly than does the fichu through coarse and cheap treatment. But this, of course, has not prevented the market from being already flooded with countless abuses in coarse net and lace of a really charming mode.

Wide, flat fichu collars of fine embroidered linen are being shown. They are rounded in the back, low over the shoulders, and taper to a point in front, the pointed ends sometimes not being draped at all but slipped under the high girdle at each side of the front. There are also combination fichu and collar arrangements, made of fine sheer lawn or organdie, which cover almost the entire bodice. Some of them are exceedingly quaint and pretty. One that was quite untrimmed, but of exquisitely fine lawn, was fitted to be perfectly flat and low on the shoulders, sloping down almost to the waistline in front. The two loose ends crossed and were caught by two white crochet buttons. The whole effect had a rather nun-like suggestion.

In spite of the vogue of the low-necked dress, the stock collar of lingerie and lace, with a little jabot or frill to match, is still immensely popular. One sees very little of the stiff high linen collar. The sailor collar, with its youthful air, is very serviceable, and smart-looking ones made of crossbar batiste simply handstitched are very effective on plain tailored coats of dark serge. Crash, either hemstitched or scaloped, makes a nice-looking coat collar and cuff sets. The very thin materials seem more appropriate as collars for frocks, or for very dressy coats.

THE introduction of color in blouses for everyday wear is attractive. The use of anything but white has its disadvantage in that it compels the wearer to cling to one color scheme; and every woman knows how annoying it is to find that she only has a blue blouse clean when she is wearing a brown suit.

The way to overcome this is to choose one's blouses rather carefully after one has made up a plan for the summer wardrobe. If you make your blouses now in haphazard fashion, you may be compelled to get suits and hats to go with them.

Some women keep to one color scheme as nearly as possible throughout the season; they know that blue and green and black, possibly, are their chief colors, and they hold on to these regardless of what the dyers and the manufacturers produce. This is the secret of really good dressing, and you will find, upon observation, that it is the method of nearly all the women who are conspicuous for taste, says a writer in the New York Times.

If you know your own wishes quite thoroughly in regard to the colors you will choose for your spring and summer suits, then it is quite wise to go ahead with your blouses.

The big bands are in good style this year, and they are among the chief colors introduced on white materials. Golden brown, soft shades of green, and many tones of blue are used, as well as cerise and pomegranate red.

Pink is to be in high fashion this summer in all shades but the pastel ones; Killarney pink, coral, flame and watermelon are among the tones we shall see most used on sheer white blouses of muslin and marquisette.

THE HOUSEHOLD EXCHANGE

By "MISS OPHELIA"

HERE are two hints of importance. The first concerns itself with amusing the baby. Save all your spools and put in a box on your closet shelf where they can be found easily, and on a rainy, bad day when your little one is driving you distracted, get them down and give him some cord and a bodkin. He will amuse himself stringing them for an hour or more, as it is something entirely new and fascinating. A bag of large variegated buttons may be occasionally substituted for the spools.

The second concerns itself with a matter of direct interest to all who make cakes. "I was brought up," says a good housewife, "to be very careful about buttering or oiling my cake tins, and the paper with which they were lined was invariably prepared just before it was used, for oiled papers bought at the store never "went" at our house. Not long ago I saw an expert cook oil his tins, then put in a spoonful of flour and shake it until a little of it adhered to every oiled spot. For all but the most delicate cakes this answers the purpose of the most carefully prepared oiled paper, and it is certainly much easier."

ALREADY enquiries are being made regarding the summer hanging basket, concerning which this brief advice may be of use.

There is nothing that adds so attractively to the large porch as large hanging baskets suspended between the pillars. In making them one should purchase large, flare wire baskets—the larger the better—in order to provide sufficient earth to the growing plants.

Line the baskets with wood moss or purchase it of a florist. A basket outlined with yellow myrtle, the centre being filled with short ferns, is very pretty.

A CORRESPONDENT asks about the dangers from the common house fly, saying that her neighbors are comparatively indifferent to its ravages, and that typhoid is common in the district. The following remarks in Life and Health, by Benjamin W. Douglass, State Entomologist of Indiana, may give some enlightenment:

"A short time ago I sat down to a hurried lunch in which a recently opened can of sardines played an important part. The small fish were of excellent quality, and I had eaten two with considerable relish when an examination of the third revealed, closely pressed against the side, an oil-soaked fly.

"I felt about as Jerome must have felt when his pet rat was drowned in a jar of jam, and no one knew what had become of the poor thing until the second helping.

"The sardines in question were alleged to have come from Portugal. Whether this was so, or whether they came from the fisheries of the Maine coast, I am unable to tell; but I was at least sure of the identity of the fly. He was in such condition from the preservative effect of the oil that a mere glance sufficed for his identification as the house fly—Musca domestica—and whether he came from the Spanish peninsula or from Canada, or from my neighbor's barn, I was as sure of his life history as I was sure of his name.

"I knew that the egg from which he came was laid in filth; that all his youthful, larval, growing days were spent in filth; that he lived and grew in the vilest offal that his mother fly could find. And when he finally emerged as an adult insect, he walked about on this same filth, and on other filth which he, perchance, might find. After a whole career of filthy life, with claws badly loaded with bacteria of every sort, the fly found my sardine, and came to me. Do you wonder that I banished the remainder of the can? And yet I have known, and still know, many persons who would simply say, that make?" It really makes all the difference in the world—the difference between cleanliness and dirt, decency and pollution, even the difference between life and death.

"Until almost the very present the house fly has been accepted as a disagreeable but unavoidable nuisance. It was but yesterday, so to speak, that the fly was proved guilty of carrying the germs of disease upon his feet. Through all the years of the dim past, in all lands where men have lived, the fly has been a constant companion of humanity. We have accepted his annoyance as such because of our ignorance of the insect's real iniquity.

"The house fly, or, as Dr. Howard calls it, the typhoid fly, is so important a factor in the public health that I am convinced that the most vital problem in economic entomology in America today is to provide some measure for controlling this pest. With the control of the common fly, however, we face the most gigantic problem of insect control that has ever confronted mankind. The fly is entrenched behind a bulwark of public ignorance, and not until we educate the common people to a realization of their danger shall we be able to make much progress in fighting this enemy.

I WISH to tell the house mothers of a simple, effective method of relief for those chronic attacks of intractable eachache which cause so much suffering, especially to children with enlarged tonsils. It is one which I have evolved from my own experience with two children.

To relieve the pain quickly, take a common stove lid, moderately hot, wrap it smoothly in paper; wring a piece of old flannel out of cold water, which may or may not have three or four drops of carbolic acid in it, and wrap this over the paper, then dry flannel over all. It should be comfortably soft on top, so, when pressed down snugly into the pillow, the afflicted ear can rest upon it and enjoy the wonderful soothing ease which the warm moisture, pouring into the sore and inflamed parts, soon brings to pass. In fact, relief is immediate, and by the time two hot lids have successively been applied, you and your patient are ready for a final dressing for the night, which consists of a piece of absorbent cotton about the size of your palm, saturated in the centre with spirits of camphor, and securely bound over the ear. This protects the ear from cold air, which would be disastrous after the moist warmth, and also warms and stimulates.

MISS MATTIE BOWES, of Strathnairn, Ontario, sends us several valuable suggestions:

The problem of entertaining for the busy woman on the farm can be made much easier. Should she devote one afternoon a month to receive her visitors, the same preparation would suffice for five or six. When she sends her invitations she might suggest a topic for discussion in which all are asked to come prepared to take a part. The afternoon will pass quickly and all will feel benefited. It will also serve to strengthen and uplift the social problem and do away with much needless gossip.

The writer also suggests the following easy way of washing. To every three pails of water use one cup soap chips, previously dissolved. (To dissolve them use a granite dish, pour a little cold water and set on the stove. Let simmer until all dissolved).

Take your white clothes (including white waists, underwear, fine table linen, pillow cases and sheets, white aprons. etc. Put in your boiler with cold water and dissolved soap, let boil an hour. Lift out in your tub, pour enough cold water to cool for washing, give them a slight rub such as neckbands, cuffs, etc., when they are ready for the rinse. The remaining suds use for your towels, dish towels, coarser table linen, etc. First wet them in cold water before putting them in the hot suds, add another cup of dissolved soap, cover with water, let boil an hour, then they are ready for the wash. I have found this method of washing easy, and the clothes are much whiter, no danger of rotting clothes. I put my clothes on the stove, and while they get ready for the wash I can do all my morning's work. I find the colored clothes easier to clean, and don't fade so easily. Any left-over suds I use for flannels.

For ginger cakes, take one cup molasses, one cup brown sugar, one small cup of butter, one tablespoon ginger, one teaspoon soda, two tablespoons of buttermilk. Add enough flour to stiffen. Take a piece and roll in your hands.

For lemon sponge, take two cups of boiling water, one-half cup corn starch, one-half cup sugar, juice of one lemon, pinch of salt. Wet corn starch with cold water, put all on stove. When cooked, add beaten whites of three eggs. Beat all to a froth. Serve cold.

For sauce, take yolks of three eggs. one cup of milk, two tablespoons of sugar. Flavor to taste. Cook in double boiler. Any other essence may be used in place of lemon.

AN alert complexion expert declares: When preparing for bed the face should be thoroughly washed with warm water and a good soap or finely ground oatmeal. After this a light massage with cold cream will be soothing and beneficial, followed by a douch with cold water to close the pores. If the cold cream has been rubbed thoroughly into the skin—which is necessary for a dry skin or one dried by the wind and cold—it is better not to leave any superfluous cream on the skin for the night. Even if the cold water is not used at the end the cream should be wiped off. The face may be washed in the same way in the morning with a litle less soap and cold cream, but with more cold water at the end to prepare it for the cold air outside. One cannot be too careful about washing the hands carefully before using creams.

Soclean

THE DUSTLESS SWEEPING COMPOUND

THE good old house-cleaning time disgruntles husbands and kills more than a few women every season. Because cleaning in the old way merely shifts dust and dirt—it does not move it. Twentieth century science has invented one remedy—the "Soclean" way. "SOCLEAN" (The Dustless Sweeping Compound) lays and absorbs dust at one and the same time. When the broom is applied it will not rise—it merely absorbs all the dust and germs that threaten to arise. "Soclean" is a faultless disinfectant and makes old carpets look like new. Ask your Grocer about it. See that it's the brown powder sold in handy pails at 25c., 50c. and $1.00. 202

SOCLEAN LIMITED - King Street and Spadina Ave., Toronto

PEACH'S TABLE DAMASK

From Looms Direct. Money Saving. Wonderful Offerings. GIVEN AWAY. Lace Cover with Catalogue & Buyer's Guide of Curtains, Window Draperies and Furniture compact for shipping. Household Linens, Ladies' and Gents' Tailoring, Underwear, Shoes, &c. 54 Years known Reputation. Send a trial order to actual makers in the old country.

$6.25 Damask Parcel Postage & Duty Paid.

2 White Damask Table Cloths, 2½ yds. by 2 yds. and 2 White Damask Table Cloths, 60 by 58 ins., all rich Scroll and Floral Designs, hemmed. 2 Half Bleached Table Cloths, hard wearing. 2 Irish Cambric Tea Cloths. 2 Handsome Tray Covers, all Irish Hand Embroidered and drawn thread.
Postage & Duty Paid $6.25
Marvellous Value. Try One. Write to-day.

SAML. PEACH & SONS, The Looms,
Box 887 NOTTINGHAM, England.

The Original and Best Scotch Wincey. In range of beautiful colourings, stripes or in white. Ideal for LADIES' BLOUSES, CHILDRENS'DRESSES BABIES' FROCKS, and all underwear—Gents.' Shirts, Pyjamas. etc. Washes perfectly, and is UNSHRINKABLE. From 8½d. per yard to 4/6. Patterns Post Free.

FOR BABY.

Copy of UNSOLICITED testimonial.
"St. Jude's Vicarage, South Shields, 31 Oct., 1910. Mrs. De la Hey will be obliged if Messrs. Spence will send 12 yards of enclosed Wincey, for which cheque is enclosed. Mrs. de la Hey has NEVER used ANY OTHER Wincey which gave the PERFECT satisfaction of Messrs. JAS. SPENCE & CO.'s MAKE."

JAS. SPENCE & CO., GLASGOW, N.B

Three Yearly Subscriptions for $2.00 during July and August. Send us two new Subscriptions at one dollar and we will send your own for one year free.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

An Old Homestead

FROM a Chippawa correspondent comes an interesting story of an historic farm home, which, with the accompanying photograph, we publish for our readers' benefit. We should be glad to have from time to time such sketches of farm houses with an early record, as there must be many "homes with a story" throughout our country. Photographs of these historic farms or of scenes associated with them will also be welcome.

Let us for a moment turn our minds back to the days of our great grandparents, and picture the early settlers of our prospering country. The accompanying picture is a view of the writer's great grandparents' home. The main part of this house was built of logs, over a century ago, in the year 1810, these figures being cut in a log above a window. This dwelling, which stood through the war of 1812-13-14, Mackenzie Rebellion of 1838, and the Fenian Raid of 1866, at one time provided shelter for the soldiers. It withstood all these rebellious conflicts, but has to fall at the command of the N. F. Q. V. Park Commissioners, who claim they have taken the land the house now stands on.

This farm was bought from the Crown during the reign of George III., 1798, and Jacob Miller, Sr., the great grandfather, settled here in the year 1804, and in 1810 built the log house which stands to-day as an old landmark. If we imagine ourselves along the river just seventy-five years ago, we would find quite a change. Let us picture this farm covered with woods, excepting a cleared space aroung the first log cabin. Many places of our North-west to-day would compare with the loneliness of this forest home, where the howl of the wolf and the voracious bear would often frighten the settler. At night these denizens of the forest would break the stillness of the calm, and make the woods vibrate with their sharp howlings, filling the young hearts with terror. The grandfather once met a wolf face to face with nothing save a knife for self-defence. Just as the animal was about to attack him he shrieked, and the animal disappeared in the woods, leaving him to span hurriedly the few yards' distance to his home. In contrast picture the deer peacefully swimming the currents of Niagara, from Grande Island to the Willoughby shore, and on reaching land, with a bound soon being hidden in the thickly-grown forest.

Stories of this farm have been handed down to the fourth generation, and we can scarcely realize these facts. At this time there was what was known as a tow path along the bank of the river, this being the only driveway, and the mail was carried on horseback from Fort Erie to Chippawa via this narrow path. Logging and lumbering were extensively carried on in those days, and the logs, which were boomed together, were drawn up the stream by oxen. This was before the steamboat whistle had visited our river. The Indian's canoe—a hewn-out log—and the sail-boat, were the first boats to mar the stillness of the water. How quiet and peaceful!

Tales of cutting the grain with a sickle, and later the cradle, binding it in sheaves by hand, can to-day be told by the grandson, who occupies this dwelling. The grandmother often turned the buzzing spinning wheel, while the grandfather was engaged breaking the flax. The light these dear old people used a century ago was the cruise or grease lamp, and later the tallow candle, also a wooden lantern. A prominent feature of this house, when first built, was two old-fashioned fireplaces, where the bake kettle was used for baking bread, before the brick oven was built out of doors.

As our missionaries of to-day, the great grandfather traveled on horseback to the County of Waterloo, carrying his books in a leather bag strapped across the horse's back—to preach the gospel to listeners who were eager to hear of salvation.

Before the schoolhouse was built, one family, or perhaps two or more, hired their own teacher, and after the building of the first schoolhouse, the teacher had the privilege of boarding around among the families represented in the school. Nevertheless, the men and women of those days were the medium whereby the advanced education of to-day has been reached.

Just six years ago the Park Commissioners purchased an eighty-foot strip of land across this farm from the grandson—plans changed, and now the old landmark has to be removed for a one hundred foot boulevard. During the summer, as the grandson and great grandchildren sit on the verandah of this historic dwelling, instead of the ring of the woodman's axe, of long years ago, there comes floating on the breeze in strong contrast the puffing of the gasoline yacht, and the whizzing of the automobile.

"One farm house, old with gables grey,
Round which the woodbines droop and cling,
Where swallows twitter all the day
And russet coated robins sing.
I cross your threshold worn and old
And listen to the ticking clock,
That seems to think my footsteps bold,
And ne'er the tales will be forgot.

How sad, how still! The churchyard's gloom
Is not more sorrowful than this;
Dead faces haunt the empty room,
The forms and faces that are missed.
They whisper to the lonely heart,
The unbidden tears will fill the eye;
The years have drifted us apart,
Ah! dear old house, good-bye, good-bye."

A Woman's Time

MISS ETHEL RUPERT, of the Maple Branch of the Women's Institutes, contributes a paper on: "Is a Woman's Time Worth Anything?" In these days, when "How to Live on Twenty-Four Hours a Day" is one of our best-selling publications, we may well reflect on the value of a woman's time. Miss Rupert says on this subject:

A decision made in the General Sessions Court in New York City has raised the question, "Are Wives Supported by Their Husbands?" The whole matter of their situation is neatly set forth by an American political economist thus.

The general rule is that a man has a wife and family. The former is lending him aid by cooking his food and mending his clothes, but there is no need of considering her as a separate agent of production. Let us see whether or not that which the wife produces in the home comes within the scope of economic production. At a glance we discern that she is producing articles of commerce, food, clothing, and comfort. Moreover, as a buyer for the family and administrator of the family funds, she is performing services as distinctly related to the production of wealth as any similar work done by men in business houses.

It is the law in most countries that the amount of time a woman shall work for wages is sixty hours a week. In the home the wife, because she works for nothing, or, shall we say for love, may be forced to toil, day after day, all day long, far into the night, and all night, if the convenience of the family shall be so served. The burden of her task may be greater in the home than if she labored for wages, and her contribution to wealth is worth money; but, because of the sanctity of the home the situation of the wife's labor is ignored on principle. No record is made of the profit and losses of her production, and if the health, happiness, and even the life of the wife go to balance the account, the assumption is, that this is quite right and proper.

It is a fine instance of the beautiful spirit of devotion to duty which makes women toiling in the home so eminently fit to die and go to heaven. Women cannot reasonably consider any duty to the family, which does not properly provide for the fulfilment of her duties to herself. Heaven may wait to welcome her into glory when, as a wife and mother in the home, she has worked herself to death. But the education she has received and the ideals she has been taught to revere, compel her, while working in the hope of Heaven, to have some hope of life, liberty, happiness, and fair wages, to recompense her here below. The work done by women in the home is the last determining factor of the problem of the cost of living, and is also the first determining factor of the cost of all production. The question demanding investigation is not, are wives supported by their husbands? but, how far are husbands—men in general—supported by the work of wives?

How to keep the girls in the home is an important problem now demanding attention. That it is desirable that a daughter should remain at home during the period that comes between the end of school life and the beginning of matrimony is generally agreed. She is better protected there and her parents feel they have a right to her companionship, since they were deprived of it for years while she was at school. Every adult, able-bodied and capable, ought to earn his or her own living, and in such a way as to realize it.

No matter how useful a daughter is in the home, she usually thinks, and often not without reason, that her work is not appreciated at its full value. To ask a father for money is as disagreeable as to ask a husband. If she earns it, she ought not to have to receive it as a gift. At this period of her life, when she is energetic and most needs work, the young woman is not given anything of importance to do, or receives no specific compensation for her services.

The daughter should be given a regular salary. The salary should be at least equal to what would have to be paid for the same work if a stranger were called in to do it. The duties should be defined and efficiently performed.

In one instance a daughter became a capable housekeeper and manager, buying all supplies, for which she received wages at the end of every month. Another, whose mother is an invalid, gets the same amount weekly that would have been paid a nurse. Both these salaried daughters were happy, contented, and efficient. Each had a feeling of independence and self-reliance never to be attained under the usual haphazard appeal to father for money to gratify needs.

The plan does not in any way abrogate filial affection or its implied duties. When a girl stays at home from a sense of duty, the approval of a good conscience and the verbal recognition of her value are not always sufficient to alleviate the feeling of unrest, caused by her desire to realize her economic value.

AN OLD HOMESTEAD AT CHIPPAWA

On Educational Topics

WE have received several papers in connection with child training and education. While all of these are excellent, they are too long to publish entirely. Therefore, we must content ourselves with giving certain paragraphs of special force or significance. Mrs. L. B. Danard, of the Kenible Branch, says concerning the school training:

A good teacher supplements the work of a good home, and helps to rescue from danger children who have suffered from bad parental control. The teacher not only should have a good scholarship, but a good moral character and a strong personality, as children are great imitators, and habits formed in youth often cling to them through life.

The school sets itself the task of forming character, and a true educator will help his scholars to foster pure habits and self-control, knowing that as the twig is bent the tree is inclined. Children should be taken into the confidence of their teachers; then there will not be the tendency to fall into improper habits, and they will love to keep up the good reputation of the school.

On the playground boys and girls learn many habits of self-control. They learn to act for mutual benefit. Occasionally some pupil may influence some other member of the school to act indiscreetly, but as a rule the majority will uphold what is right and refuse to give heed to anything that tends to impurity. The youth of our schools should imbibe such principles as will enable them to live well in the home, well in the township, well in the province, and well in the Dominion. They should be taught to condemn corruption in public and private life. It is the duty of our schools to mold and form those who are to control the destiny of our nation.

Children are more easily led to be good by examples of loving kindness and by tales of well doing in others, than by being threatened into obedience by records of sin, crime and punishment. They may be taught delicately and honestly the grave facts of life, and should learn, for the first time, such matters from parent or educated authority.

Mothers, give your children plain food. Too much meat and highly-seasoned food tend to excite and overstimulate. It is a shame for a mother to bring her children up to the habit of drinking tea; if milk is scarce there is nothing better than pure water.

From Miss King, a member of the Onandaga Institute, comes a paper: "What a Child Should be Taught Before Entering School."

The writer emphasizes the importance of forming habits of industry and cleanliness in the child's early days, declaring:

Every time a thought follows the same line it creates a deeper impression and makes it easier to go over the same territory again. In this way habits are formed. So the mother needs to look well after the child's acts in these early years, as actions if repeated become confirmed impressions and ultimately habits. The poison from anger may be formed in five minutes, but it takes some time to eliminate it; so, for the sake of health, the child's passion should be restrained. Truthfulness should be taught now. Win the confidence of the child, expect truthfulness, let it see nothing is gained by untruthfulness, and above all do not promise what you do not intend to give or do. Punctuality and promptness may be taught by accustoming the child to a regular life, regularity in regard to meals, walks, and stated times for baths. He should be put to sleep at the same time every day, and this habit will grow with him.

Courtesy, to become second nature, must also have a foundation laid in early years. Boys and girls cannot learn too early to defer to every woman, from the mother to the humblest servant and the little playmate. He should be taught to wait upon the aged, not to domineer over the weak, and to do acts involving self-denial. A child will not learn these things without being taught, and, in short, these are the foundation years of character building. Into the child in these years should be instilled the principles underlying Thackeray's definition of a gentleman, when he says, to be a gentleman is to be honest, to be gentle, to be generous, to be brave, to be wise; and, possessing all these qualities, to exercise them in the most graceful outward manner.

The two strongest factors in child nature are imitation and imagination. In fact, children learn chiefly by imitation. That is the reason example counts for so much. The mother says something that she thinks the child will not notice, but is surprised to hear it repeated, perhaps in an exaggerated form. Even the parent's tone of voice does not pass unnoticed; indeed, it is because of this law of imitation that environment counts for so much in our lives. We are something like those insects who, naturalists tell us, take color from the plants they lodge on. Imitation enters into the very fastnesses of character, and we ourselves are forever imitating what we see and hear, the forms, the sounds that haunt our memories. We imitate unconsciously the line and color of the walls around us, the trees by the wayside, and Walt. Whitman puts it very nicely when he says:

"There was a child went forth every day,
And the first object he looked upon that object he became.
And that object became part of him for the day, or a certain part of the day;
Or for years or stretching cycles of years
The early lilacs became part of the child."

His literary education is well under way before the child reaches the kindergarten. At four or five the child has made considerable progress in its mother tongue. If literary education begins with infancy, then its first agencies are the cradle-song and the Mother Goose melody. The dark mammy who croons her delightfully quaint "Hush-a-by-baby," or the Indian mother or white mother, who chants her "Hush-a-by-baby on the tree-top," is laying the first foundations of literary appreciation and is developing a sense for the simple rhythmic movements, and the word music of these baby lyrics will remain as undertones for a life time. As poetry preceded prose in the literary history of the race, so too has the mother instinctively tended to woo her child to activity, to sport, and to play by means of verse and music in "The little piggy went to market." "This is the church and this the steeple." As he grows, to these may be added stories in prose and singing games, and perhaps some fairy stories to stimulate the imagination, and Bible stories to give a solid background to character. In these ways, by imitation, he will become proficient in the dear mother-tongue, and on entering school he is a promising literary pupil. He can learn something of number by means of objects about him.

An Old Chimney

WE have received from an Institute member whose name is not given the following "Tale of an Old Chimney." The writer says:

"This life of ours is as a wild Aeolian harp of many a joyous strain, but under them all there runs a loud perpetual wail, as of souls in pain."

—Golden Legend.

There is a picturesque section of country situated within a couple of hours' ride of Toronto, which, owing to the hilly nature of the land, was avoided by the early settlers, who, finding the battle with the forest difficult enough on the level, left the conquest of the hills and dales to the later comers. So that until the beginning of the latter half of the last century, there were parts of certain counties which simply served as hunting grounds to those who occupied the towns and villages of the lower lying districts.

This is one of the few localities where one may still see the quaint log cabin of the settler nestling among the trees on the hillside, but more frequently still, one chances upon the tall bare chimney standing bleakly alone in a remote spot, where there are few passers-by, and where the few who do pass give but scant attention to this ghostly monument to an age that has passed.

Being upon one occasion visiting a friend whose home is in this interesting locality, I wandered out along the country lanes, feeling strangely disposed for solitude, and with intent only to find a quiet nook wherein to spend an hour or so in silent communion with nature, at whose shrine I have always been a constant worshipper.

The stillness and the peacefulness of the surroundings soothed even while they saddened me. Why I should be sad I could not tell. My mind seemed steeped in forgetfulness of the world with all its carking cares and worries, its illusive promises, and its wearying disappointments. It seemed almost as in another sphere. While in this peculiarly receptive and expectant mood, a turn in the path revealed to me this weird reminder of the days of Auld Lang Syne.

I quickened my steps in order to examine more closely this relic of an almost extinct generation. I had come from a crowded city, and previous to my life there had lived in a thickly populated district, where there were no landmarks such as these to cause one's mind to revert to conditions in the history of our forefathers, now passing into oblivion, and regarded by this younger generation much in the light of a fairy tale.

Here stood the gaunt, awkward pile of rude stones and mortar, firmly and compactly put together, as though intended to face a century of storms and tempests. Here it stood ever in perpetual silence, pointing with persistent patience to the skies, whither had gone those who once had made the ingle ring with their merry songs and laughter. Standing here surrounded by the debris of the rude cabin, of which it had once been the cheerful centre, its weird loneliness awakened a train of thought and fancy, that took my memory far down the vista of the past till I fancied I could again hear the dear voice of an aged grandfather, long since gone to rest, as he recounted to my willing ears the fascinating tales of his early days as a pioneer in this country. Seating myself on one of the worm-eaten logs that had once formed a part of this ancient domicile, I gave myself up to the memories that thronged my brain, peopling the solitude, and voicing the tales of those who had waged war with the wilderness before my eyes saw the light.

While seated thus in meditation, I caught sight of the bent form of an aged woman, who was slowly and tediously making her way to the quiet corner where the chimney stood. I watch-

THE SINGED CAT

Those who have paid dearly for the use of cheap cream separators, through many unhappy experiences, know now—what they doubted then.

Their unanimous testimony—

THE DE LAVAL FOR MINE

Tells the story.

Better get a Catalog.

Agents everywhere.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

With Every Bag of Flour There Goes A Guarantee

That guarantee means that I believe Cream of the West to be the best bread flour on the market. If your bread doesn't beat any you ever baked before, if it fails to rise or doesn't give extra satisfaction in every way, your grocer will pay you back your money on return of the unused portion of the bag.

Cream of the West Flour

the hard wheat flour guaranteed for bread

If people will fairly and honestly try Cream of the West they will have success with it. That's why we guarantee it. We are sure of it.

The Campbell Milling Company, Limited, Toronto
ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, President 105

2 IN 1 SHOE POLISH

Is the Perfection in Shoe Polish.

Some preparations give a gloss but destroy the leather. "2 in 1" not only is not injurious but increases the life of the leather keeping it always soft. It gives a brilliant, smooth and lasting gloss that gives perfect satisfaction.

It is good for your shoes.

THE F. F. DALLEY CO., Limited, 14
HAMILTON, Ont., BUFFALO, N. Y. and LONDON, Eng.

OWNERS ARE PROUD OF I H C WAGONS

There is a certain pride in owning a wagon that you know is built of the highest quality materials obtainable—a wagon that is not only attractively finished with the best paint and varnish, but which also gives perfect service, day after day, and year after year. That's why I H C owners are so proud of their wagons.

If you want to be proud of your next wagon—choose one of these two in the I H C line—

Chatham or Petrolia

The loads they carry, the roads they traverse, and their wonderful durability make others wish they had bought a Chatham or Petrolia.

Chatham Wagons have a long record for satisfactory service in Canada. Made with hard maple axles, oak bolsters, sand boards, rims, and spokes, and oak or birch hubs—they represent the highest standard of wagon construction. When you buy a Chatham wagon it is with the assurance of getting the utmost service and satisfaction out of it.

Petrolia Wagons are constructed of first quality woodstock which is thoroughly seasoned by being air-dried. The ironing is of the very best. The inspection of each part is most rigid.

Be sure to call on the I H C local agent, get a pamphlet, and let him show you one of these wagons. If you prefer, write the International Harvester Company of America at nearest branch house for any information you want.

IHC Service Bureau

This Bureau is a clearing house of agricultural data. It aims to learn the best ways of doing things on the farm, and then distribute the information. Your individual experience may help others. Send your problems to the I H C Service Bureau.

EASTERN CANADIAN BRANCHES:—International Harvester Company of America at Hamilton, Ont.; London, Ont.; Montreal, Que.; Ottawa, Ont.; St. John, N. B.

International Harvester Company of America
(Incorporated)
Chicago U S A

LOOK FOR THE SHEEP

THIS SHEEP TRADE MARK IS ON EVERY GARMENT OF "CEETEE" UNDERWEAR

YOU CAN GET RID OF RATS AND MICE.

Get a 25c can of Common Sense Rat Exterminator from your dealer, follow directions carefully and you will be agreeably surprised at the results.

Common Sense Exterminator

Is the quickest, surest, most effective method of getting rid of rats and mice. It kills them, dries up the carcass. No odor. Twenty years on the market, and always sold under the "money back if not satisfied". Common Sense Roach and Bed-Bug Exterminator sold with the same guarantee.

From all dealers and 18

COMMON SENSE MFG. CO. 381 Queen St. W. Toronto, Ont.

PEASE FURNACE

Note vertical shaker; no more back-bending.

Saves fuel because it extracts all the heat units possible.

No ash sifting because everything is consumed to a very fine ash.

No dust because there are fewer joints and these few are cup joints and dust proof.

Distributes fresh warm air from all registers at once.

"Ask the man who has one."

Write for our Books: "The Question of Heating." or "Boiler Information," sent free on request.

PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY. LIMITED

TORONTO 37 WINNIPEG

ed her approach with interest, feeling strangely conscious that her appearance seemed to harmonize with the surroundings, as she made her way quietly over the meadow, her black dress wavering like a shadow in and out of the sunlight between the trees.

At first she didn't appear to notice my presence, and I sat quietly without speaking, fearing to startle her, as she seemed absorbed in thought, and now and again would murmur broken sentences to herself, shaking her head sadly, as though some memories were well-nigh more than she could bear.

Presently her eyes rested upon me, but she did not appear surprised, but seemed, indeed, to weave me into the train of reminiscences that thronged her brain. As I looked searchingly into her face I could see that the light of reason was partially dimmed, and in a measure was prepared for the weird scene which was to follow.

The woman was evidently of great age. Eighty winters or more must have gone over her head. She was dressed in some soft black material, with snowy ruffles at neck and wrists. A quaint close black silk hood was tied over her head with soft ruffles of black and white gathered in about the wrinkled old face. Although the features were drawn and seamed deeply, there was a sweetness and calm about them that would impress one with the fact that the furnace of affliction had long ago burned away the earthly dross, there remaining only the refinement of grief mingled with submission.

"Ah! Child," at last she quavered. "How came you here? What part have you in this desolate scene? You who are young, and gay and care-free—what have you in common with the things of long ago?

Seeing that she did not expect an answer, and wondering what the current of her thoughts might be, I contented myself with a sympathetic smile, and a glance of reverent interest toward the old chimney, where she sadly turned her gaze, and which, I could see, was awakening a long chain of assocaitions in her mind.

Seating herself quietly on another of the logs that shrewed the ground for many yards around, she sat in silence for some minutes, with hands clasped and gaze fixed intently upon the fireplace of the old chimney, as though fascinated by some kaleidoscopic view of what had once taken place before its merry blaze.

Suddenly she exclaimed: "Hush, child, hush. Do not move, or he will go away again as he has always done before when I have come here. Do you see him, the tall, broad-shouldered lad who came to my father's house with manly step and asked that I might be his bride, and come with him to make a home in the silent forests of the North?

"Do you see him now, with oxen and sledge, and axe in hand, cutting and hewing and dragging together the sturdy logs and heavy stones to build our tiny home? With laugh and song he goes cheerily on, proud in his strength and vigor, and joyous over the prospect of the heartease that was to follow, when we could sit together before the dancing blaze in the cheery fireplace that was to be built?

"See! Some kindly neighbors have come to give a hand. How ready they always were in those days to give of their time and sympathy to each other; but now—ah, now—I fear pride and indifference rules in the hearts of most. Neighbors were neighbors in those days. One log house was as good as another. 'Twas hearts that counted. Now, the spirit of criticism and envy prevails, and neighbors sometimes are hard to find."

A mystic light settled over the old countenance and she seemed to be seeing with the inner vision of the soul strange scenes enacted long, long ago.

"Ah," she continued, "the chimney now is being built, broad and high, with deep fireplace and spreading hearth.

"Now, the logs are being shifted into place and carefully pinioned at the corners, now the rustic roof is on, places cut for the heavy door, and tiny windows.

"Ah! soon he has finished the tiny house that is to shelter the little girl who loves him so well, for not in lordly mansion, but in lowly cot, is true love most often to be found.

"Our wedding day has come, dear; we are going away now from the dear father and mother, who bid us a fond farewell, and tell us to keep up brave hearts, as they had to do in their battle with the wilderness. We reach here at last, with oxen and cart and our few modest belongings. It does not require much outward show, when love rules the heart. At last we have crossed the threshold. Ah! do not look now dear, my brave lad has taken me in his arms, with a glad 'Welcome home, my darling, God grant us many long happy years here side by side.'

"And now comes the 'hanging of the crane,' and the neighbors again gather from far and near to give us welcome to our own fireside, and to wish us joy for the years to come. The logs are piled high in the fireplace for the first time, the flames dance and gleam, all hearts keep in harmony with their sparkle and glow.

"Our friends have gone now, and we have our first chat alone in the firelight, and we build in happy fancy the structure of our future years."

Her voice quavered away into silence and she sat absorbed in thought. Presently she began again, with voice more saddened and tremulous, and the faded old eyes, with a hopeless pathos all their own.

"Yes, we were so happy. Our life was hard, but our courage was high. Our little clearing grew and grew. Some years we met with great success; other years were not so well. Our little ones came to gladden the fireside, and the cheerful glow is reflected from their bright faces. We have our glad times, and our sad times—our merry-making and our mourning.

"Do you see the merry groups of lads and lasses, and older ones too, who come to help us make merry from time to time? There are our logging bees, our ploughing bees, our quilting bees, our paring bees. See the great strings of apples and pumpkins carefully suspended from great hooks in the logs overhead, looking like fairy garlands in the misty light. When through with their work, whichever it may be, they sit them down to the table loaded with all the good things that only can be found in wholesome plenty in the old farm homes. Now they are through, and there is a busy scattering of cups and plates, tables and chairs shoved back, and the floor cleared for the dance. How joyously they glide, in and out, up and down, while the firelight glows on the hearth! Shine on dear fire, this cannot last for long."

THE OLD CHIMNEY

There is silence again for a time. The feeble head bows low.

"Our little first-born has left us today. This weary world was too hard for him. The angels wanted him. Our little Hugh. He was only ten. . . . The fire burns low to-night, dear.

"See! Look how the old back-log sparkles and gleams! What dancing shadows are flickering on the grey old walls! Daughter Elsie is to be married to-day. Pile high the blazing embers. Let the warm glow gladden her young heart, and keep it warm with the memories of father—mother—home.

"Years come and years go. Sunshine and shadow, joy and sadness, but the love in our hearts is firm and strong, and the fire on the hearth gleams on steadily, cheerily.

"Alas! now, the end draws nigh. The old log house, with its many memories is not large enough or handsome enough for those who were reared within its walls. It must give way to the spirit of the times.

"Look yonder! The great brick house on the hill is now the place called 'home.' It is a grand place. It has rooms and rooms to spare. It has cupboards and closets. It has carpets and curtains, broad halls and wide verandahs. A tiny little grate with its gorgeous mantle and mirror is set up in one great lonely room reserved for 'company.'

"They talk to their neighbors now by telephone, and have their papers and letters brought to the door, and there is nothing now as it used to be. . . . Ah, well! I suppose it is better so, but . . . neither hearts nor homes are gladdened with a light like that which shone from the fireplace in the old chimney. . . . My poor laddie could not bear to change. His spirits drooped from the time the other house was reared. Our last day in the old home came all too soon. We sat together side by side before the old fireplace.

"'Mary,' he said, as he took my hand in his, 'my race is nearly run. We have journeyed along life's path together for many a year. We have had our "grey days" and our "gold days." You have been a good wife to me, Mary, you have never murmured nor complained, though we've had hardships a-plenty. You were fitted for better things, but you came here with me, little wife, when the country was all new, and our fortune all to make. Now we are old and grey, Mary. We have nearly lived our lives. Our children are healthy and prosperous, and must live as their generation lives. We have been very happy, but the end must come. We cannot be so content away from the old fireside, but we will be patient. It will not be for long. I may go on a little before, but you will surely follow. Then we shall be together always, Mary, for "we know in whom we have believed,' and He has said "In My Father's house are many mansions."

"'I think, Mary, sometimes, that our mansions in heaven will be like the places we most loved here on earth, and, if so, mayhap we may once more sit by our own bright fireside.'

"'Let us heap the logs high in the old fireplace for the last time to-night, dear wife. Let us warm ourselves in its ruddy glow. To-morrow—the new house—the new ways of living. Our ways set aside for those of modern days. To-night shall be ours. Let the firelight shine.'"

Her voice sank almost to a whisper, and the words came only in broken sobs, as she continued:

"When the morning sunlight crept into our bedroom window, it shone on his calm, quiet face. His life had peacefully gone out with the dying light from the old fireplace."

She sat in silence for some time, with her dear, patient, old face buried in the wrinkled hands. Slowly at last she raised her head, and, turning to me with a patient smile, she went on—

"And now, child, I am all alone; but I shall soon go to him, where all is peace and light. I come here to live the happy past over again. . . . . But there is no fire on the hearth to-night."

There was a sound of childish voices, a rapid rush of footsteps, and two happy, healthy children came rushing down the path.

"Oh, grandma! Are you here again? We have been looking for you everywhere. Are you not coming home to supper?"

They drew back shyly as they saw me sitting there, but seemed reassured as I gave them a pleasant smile and word of greeting. The dear old grandma rose slowly, and with a kindly smile for each, prepared to follow them down the path.

Turning to me again, ere she left, she sadly shook her head. "Go home, dear child," she said, "stay not in this place of head and gone memories."

Slowly and feebly she made her way back over the hill, the children gaily laughing and chattering by her side.

I have tried to record as faithfully as I could the quaint utterances, as she quavered out her plaintive tale that summer afternoon. I have made no attempt to imitate the odd and broken dialect, but have simply translated the weird sad thoughts, as the broken syllables fell from her lips.

As she disappeared from view, I sat on as one in a dream, living over all that had transpired. The spirit of the past seemed to envelop me as with a shroud. So still I sat, in fact, that even the living creatures round about seemed to think me as much a part of the surroundings as the stones and logs themselves.

A robin perched itself on the top of the old chimney and chirruped at me saucily and fearlessly. A squirrel scurried across from the neighboring trees, frolicked up its base, and chattered from one of the corners. A tiny field mouse crept noiselessly out and peered at me shyly with its tiny bead-like eyes. The crickets droned their monotonous requiem from the very hearthstone itself. All things seemed to declare each in its own peculiar way—"There is no fire on the hearth to-night."

Reports of Meetings

THE seventh meeting of the Mount Hamilton Women's Institute was held on Wednesday, April 19, at the home of Mrs. A. Campbell, Mount Park Avenue. Mrs. Campbell's parlors were filled to overflowing with friends from the city, as well as the mountain. Four more ladies joined. Rev. G. Pugsley, of St. Stephen's Church, gave a very interesting and inspiring address on children. He drew comparisons between children of the Old Land and those of our fair Canada in many ways. Those beyond the sea appeared in a more favorable light than those of this country. Rev. Mr. Pugsley also gave a solo, which was much enjoyed. Mrs. R. Farr gave an instrumental solo. Miss Mattie Hood was accompanist. Mrs. L. Nicol demonstrated tomato soup, and current topics were handled by Mrs. R. Dongworth. They were up-to-date as well as instructive. So many questions were asked in the question drawer that Mrs. Farr had not time to discuss them all. This department of the Institute work is proving a well of knowledge, for the questions are so interesting that many are called forth to speak who would otherwise be silent. Dainty refreshments were served by the following: Mrs. R. Dongworth, Mrs. Nicol, and Mrs. R. Farr, the hostess supplying tea and coffee.

SIMPLE BUT EFFECTIVE WALL DECORATION

Editor's Note

Secretaries who send in notices of meetings will please do so promptly, as it is not interesting to the general public to read accounts which are months old.

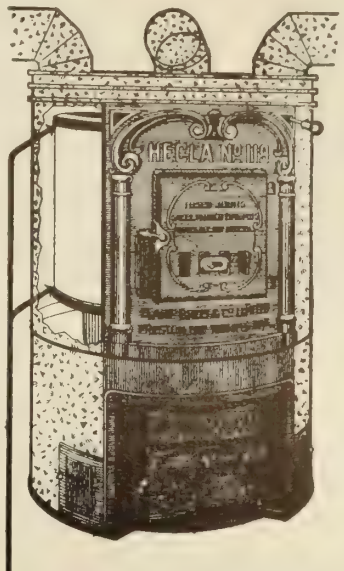
This furnace is built to keep gas, dust and smoke out of the house.

¶ No matter how cosy your home, an odor of gas, however slight, is unpleasant and sometimes dangerous.

The health of your whole house demands a furnace that will give pure warm air without gas or dust.

Gas cannot escape from a "Hecla" Furnace. Every place where experience has shown that gas might otherwise find an opening has been made absolutely tight by our Patent Fused Joint.

The constant expansion and contraction of the steel and iron parts cannot break this joint.



"Hecla" Furnace

¶ The "Hecla" has other safeguards against gas. The cast iron Combustion Chamber will not burn through and allow fumes from the fire to pass into the house.

The air jets in the door assure proper burning of any surplus gas.

The Automatic Gas Damper prevents danger from gas puffs.

There is a special dust flue to carry the ash dust up the chimney.

THE FUSED JOINT

In the "Hecla" the steel sides of the radiator are fused by our patented process to the cast iron plates at the top and bottom. This process welds the steel and iron into one piece, making an inseparable joint—one that cannot spread with the heat, and one that has proven perfectly gas and dust proof, even after years of service.

The "Hecla" Saves One Ton of Coal in Seven

How steel ribs added to the "Hecla" Fire Pot make this saving is told in our booklet "Comfort & Health."

GET THIS BOOKLET

It tells how to get heat for a minimum cost.

148

CLARE BROS. & CO., LIMITED, - PRESTON, Ont.

PLANS Send a rough diagram of your house and we will send complete plans and estimates for heating it. FREE

Queen's University

Kingston, Ontario.

ARTS, EDUCATION
THEOLOGY, MEDICINE
SCIENCE, including ENGINEERING.

The Arts course may be taken by correspondence, but students desiring to graduate must attend one session.

ARTS SUMMER SESSION

July 3rd to August 11th.

For Calendars write the Registrar,
17 G. Y. CHOWN, Kingston, Ontario

The Kindel Kind

FEATHER PILLOWS

PURE—CLEAN—NEW FEATHERS

GUARANTEED

Your health demands that you have the best and most sanitary. Insist that your dealer show you

The Kindel Kind

The Best Wall Finish

Only one coat required
Easy to apply

Most beautiful, economical and sanitary wall coating made, can be applied by anyone to any kind of surface. Will not rub off or peel. Shows no spots or brush marks. Produces that subdued, velvety effect, so agreeable to the eye.

Muresco

Muresco is made in a large line of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be re-coated any number of times, and entirely removed by washing, thus rendering it a simple matter to keep walls in perfect condition.

Beware of wall finishes that cannot be removed by washing; they are neither practical or sanitary. Will eventually peel off, leaving your walls in ruined condition.

Muresco costs no more than othe finishes an goes farther. Call for sample card and see handsome combination effects.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited

Sole Manufacturers, Toronto, Canada.
New York, Chicago, Carteret, Cleveland.

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENTS

The Servant Problem

By DOMESTICUS

THE problem of domestic help has ever been a hard one to solve. In a great measure this is because girls who engage as domestic helps are often looked upon as socially inferior. We may ask: "Why is this so? Why should any woman who is mistress of a home, and who (if she is capable of filling the position) understands and knows how to perform all the different household duties, why, I say, should she despise a girl who is willing to relieve her of some of those duties for a money consideration?"

Her husband in his business may employ girls as typewriters, stenographers, book-keepers, etc. They simply relieve him of some of the duties of his position for a money consideration. Why should they be considered higher in the social scale than their sisters who assist in the home and are not exposed to the dangers of office life, where they cannot receive the same courtesy and consideration from their associates that they would receive in their home?

If all women recognized the supreme claim of the home and home duties upon them, those who would willingly make housework their profession would not be considered as inferior and without ambition. Hundreds of girls become mistresses of homes who do not understand either their position or duties and this results in much unhappiness both to themselves and their home circle.

It seems, passing strange that mothers, who should glory in their home life and duties, will instil into their daughters' minds the idea that the work which they, as mistress of the home, either perform or oversee, is degrading, and will insist that they follow some other line of work if they wish to earn money. Mistresses, holding those opinions, who cannot get helpers, do not deserve pity. By degrading their own profession they hinder many sensitive young ladies from entering it who would do so, if they could without losing caste.

What Won't Women Wear

By A MERE MAN

THE last time I made a muss of it for a publication it was a story of love and business, that, I have no doubt, would give me entree with favor among the sisters here and you. This time I am going to be practical, tell the truth, and incur the wrathfulness of many followers of fashion regardless—but I hope the approbation of sensible souls whose loveliness lies not in Fiji fussiness, and who refuse the dictation of monstrosity without fear.

Now a railway car is not always an emporium of fashion, especially of hats; but an Eastern shopping party of beauty spots from a lovely college not too far from Montreal, and I, as things fell out, landed in the same car. 'Twasn't far enough to make it worth while to remove the headgear, so twenty-six seats were required to accommodate sixteen of these ladies and a professoress who had seen to it that none other had anything on her when it came to hats. A much travelled looking and companionable man who sat across from me said in a confidential whisper that for size, variety of vegetables, fish, fowl, and fur, that crop of hats had everything skinned that up to the moment he had observed. Being of a sporty disposition, he wanted to make a small bet that the dark lady on the off-side, six seats ahead, had a dried fish on her lid. My private opinion was that it was a porous plaster cut on the bias. Just then the lady with the bushel of turnips on her bonnet, sneezed, and to the amazement of one and all, the six insidious eye-punching hat stickers held the weight to its own. The travelled looking fellow looked bored a minute and then said he thought it was marvellous how hat builders could sting the public with so much unnecessary material.

"Take any street down town," he said, "and study the women's hats coming and going. I say 'hats' because you don't see anything else. Regular family top pieces. Moving picture show carrying its own tent. Or, on the other hand, watch 'em getting by with the torpedo-helmet shaped craft. It positively makes me nervous to have a school of these helmeted goddesses bearing down my direction. I've seen some African natives togged out on top—but believe me, those dusky dames would throw flips from jealousy if they could see these curiosity shops their white sisters take around with them. And what is it all? Simply the subservience of sense to foolish vanity.

Some guy over in Gay Paree wandering along the country side, saw a bushel basket upside down with a mess of radishes the good wife had just pulled for dinner lying on top of it. Back he hustles to the city and imposes the style suggested by the basket and vegetables. Only the creation costs fifty dollars, while the clean cut white straw sailor in which most any woman looks sweet, costs three bucks. Ever notice a thin-faced female pikin' along with a five-foot diameter lid? There you get your lines and angles. Lovely thing. Every step she takes it looks as though she expected retribution to catch up with her. Or, again, the basket hats. Somewhere up in the measure there are eyes that see the ground and a face that might perhaps better be hid under a bushel. It's a cinch to say that no homely woman hesitates to wear these products of a disordered mind, because any woman is good looking compared with these hats, if she wears one.

"Remember the seven story feathers they affected last year. Squint up through the car and count the birds and animals that have died to serve the lust for fuss. We used to grin at the squaws out West when the poor things bartered for bright rags and beads, or tried to bingle some inattentive brave with other added attraction. How would you like to see your mother rigged out like the lady with the dried fish on her hat? My friend, I believe if the decree of fashion was that women should wear snakes alive on their top pieces, it would go."

Gathering up his grips, my talkative companion paused long enough to say: "And think of it—all that tommy rot—unnecessary trash—is accepted without a wiggle by the majority of women who never think of the chuckles of the hat artists who pull the string and the puppets jump."

Here the train pulled into the station and the travelled man and sixteen be-topped damsels waddled down the aisles and out of the cars. I saw them going down the avenue towards the thought factory, whose red roofs showed above the maples. Wouldn't it be grand, says I to myself, if the dear things only had as much inside as they have on top of their heads!

The Bride's Outfit

IN a discussion of a bride's outfit for one hundred dollars, an adviser remarks.

Now for the fundamental things of the bride's wardrobe. She should have two pairs of corsets. I have a personal theory that that woman is best corsetted who finds a satisfactory shape, and thereafter wears only that make and shape. The demand for them has brought into the market many good corsets at two dollars. Of night-dresses, at an average cost, based on present offerings, of one and a half dollars, four might be purchased. As gauze underwear is so generally worn, I shall not include more than two lawn chemises, at one dollar apiece, and four combinations in gauze at fifty cents each. Of stockings she may include four pairs of lisle at twenty-five cents a pair. Tan shoes at two and one-half dollars, and a ready-to-wear hat for general use at two dollars and a half. All these are necessaries. Add to them two lingerie petticoats at one and a half dollars each, and four pairs drawers at fifty cents. This lingerie division of the purchases will now have totalled up to twenty-seven dollars and fifty cents. The first, which includes the wedding dress, amounted to forty-eight dollars and seventy-five cents. The entire amount so far spent, then, is seventy-six dollars and twenty-five cents. The remainder will purchase accessories.

I would advise the spending of five dollars for one smart shirtwaist and one of lingerie. Good houses offer them in June at this price. Another five dollars should be devoted to veils, ties, jabots; and a third like sum to a pair of house slippers and extra gloves. Seven dollars remain for what I would call the insurance of the better things in the wardrobe—namely, in things to work in and things to rest in.

The overall of gingham or alpaca is one of the most practical of these and will be a boon to the young housekeeper who would like to continue in the home the neat appearance she formerly preserved in the office. The apron, as artists have adapted it and modern housekeepers have adopted it, is really a thing of beauty. Again, a challis negligee or relaxation gown will be a comfort. These articles may be bought for the seven dollars.

MOODY'S KLENZINE in the Kitchen

"What's the cause of all this brightness, this morning, Mabel? Everything so spic and span and your work done so early."

KLENZINE MAID:—"Klenzine is the cause of it. Postie told me how it would cut my work in half, so yesterday I ordered a 10c. package. Why! it simply cleans like magic. Just look at those pans—they shine like mirrors, and it is the same with everything else. Besides, it keeps my hands so nice and soft. I wouldn't be without it even if I had to pay for it myself."

KLENZINE makes all housework easy. For washing dishes, cleaning woodwork, windows, silverware and tinware, bathroom, pipes, etc., it is far superior to soap. A valuable disinfectant—keeps the sink clean and sweet.

Insist on MOODY'S KLENZINE at your grocers. Large size package 10c.

THE ALPHA CHEMICAL CO., LIMITED
BERLIN - - CANADA
For sale by all Wholesale Dealers

7-3-11

The first pound you use will win your lasting favor

"More bread and better bread"

PURITY FLOUR

IN WRITING ADVERTISERS MENTION CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Dainty Summer Embroideries

THE tempting display of summer gowns, blouses, and dainty dress accessories so attractive to the average woman, were surely never so alluring before, as their sheer daintiness and simple lines are more graceful and practical for the home dressmaker's skill than they have been for many seasons past. All the most expensive varieties show hand embroidery as almost their only decoration, and consequently when one can do this at home, and the making-up of these is so simple one is tempted to say, "Why pay such high prices for these dainty gowns? I shall embroider one myself." And we are prepared to fill such wants, as a glance at the pretty gown pictured here will show.

Design No. 05.
Stamped on Voile, $3.75.
Stamped Marquisette, $6.00.

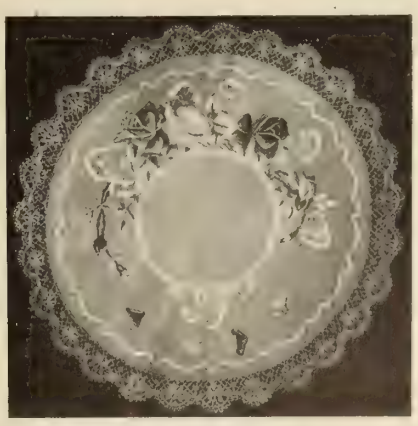
The favored materials this season are the marquisettes and voiles, which are seen on all the handsomest of all the imported models, as well as the more inexpensive gowns, and the reason for this is not hard to find, as this material is so soft and durable and does not crush. Silk embroidery threads are altogether used for these, as the cotton threads have not the required lustre and softness. The gown we illustrate is embroidered in white, black and coral pink. We describe fully in our June columns the correct manner of working the fashionable bead stitch embroidery, and refer our readers back to this. The gown, No. 95, is stamped on eight yards of material, and the tunic band is stamped on the selvage. Two yards are allowed for this, but if preferred an extra band for the foot of the skirt may be also arranged for.

No. 5208.—Stamped Coat Set, 35 cents.

A dainty lingerie waist, which is very simple, is shown on Figure No. 5510. The charm of this waist consists of the exquisite French embroidery, which is beautifully brought out on the butterfly design. Fine sheer lawn, and lustered cotton are the materials needed for this simple waist.

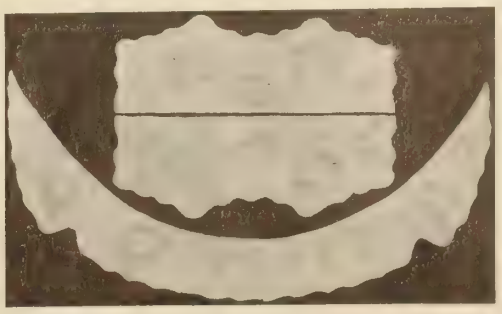
Embroidered coat sets are a necessary adjunct of the summer tailored suit, whether it be of lightweight wool or linen, and as these launder so easy and look cool and dainty, three very handsome designs, quite different in shape are illustrated here. No. 5620 is embroidered in pure white, using a combination eyelet and solid stitch. This also embroiders handsomely on colored linen in the fashionable Oriental shades, which are so popular at present. The whole design afterwards is outlined with black. No. 5208 is a handsome example of the solid padded French embroidery, and may be brought out in either all white or a touch of color introduced into the outlining will bring this to match any costume. No. 4107 shows an effective combination of braiding and solid embroidery. This set, which is all white, is worked with the rat-tail or tubular braid, and looks very handsome. These sets are all effective without being too elaborate, and are stamped on medium weight linen, but if preferred sheer handkerchief linens can be supplied.

No. 5510—Lingerie Waist.
Stamped on Lawn, 75 cents.



No. 2163.—Tinted design, 36-inch, $1.00.

We illustrate a very handsome tinted centre piece which has a beautiful design of roses and sprays of wild carrot, which combination is unusual and effective. The roses are heavily tipped with royal floss in shades of pink and red, and the carrot, which is embroidered with French knots, for which white rope silk No. 1201, pale green No. 1239x and 1240 are used. The leaves and stems are embroidered in dull greens touched with a little brown, and a handsome linen cluny lace in a deep shade of ecru matches the tinted background and finishes this centre most effectively. Further information regarding the embroidering of this, and the materials, will be furnished upon application.



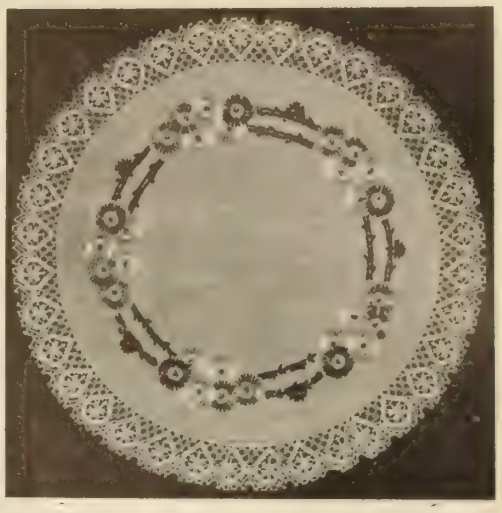
No. 4107.—Stamped Coat Set, 35 cents.

No. 5620.—Stamped Coat Set, 35 cents.

If the articles illustrated on this page cannot be supplied from your dealer address The Belding, Paul Corticelli, Limited, Dept. L, Montreal, for further information.

SEND AT ONCE

— 35 CENTS —



For eight skeins of ART EMBROIDERY SILK which is sufficient to embroider a 15 inch CREAM LINEN CENTRE PIECE, stamped for the fashionable Mille Fleur or Thousand Flower Embroidery which we will give you FREE and sufficient Cream Lace to edge this beautiful Centre Piece; ALSO A DIAGRAM LESSON which will enable any woman to do this embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send to-day, as this generous offer is good for a short time only.

This offer is made to convince every woman that BELDING'S ART EMBROIDERY SILKS are the best made.

Send 10c for a copy of Belding's Needle & Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for art embroidery.

Address

Belding, Paul
& Company, Limited

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

OXO CUBES

mean a meal in a moment — for a cube makes a cupful of rich delicious beef-tea.

4 Cubes, 10c. 49

HEADACHE?

Stop it in 30 minutes, without any harm to any part of your system, by taking

"NA-DRU-CO" Headache Wafers

25c. a box, at all druggists'.

NATIONAL DRUG and CHEMICAL CO. of Canada, Limited, Montreal. 27A

SEND ONLY 10 CENTS for this beautiful 18-inch tray cloth on Fine Art Linen, your choice of Wallachian, Eyelet, Mt. Mellick, Violet or Holly design, and we will include Free of Charge, one year's subscription to "Art Needlework" Magazine. The tray cloth regularly sells for 25 cents and one year's subscription to our Embroidery Magazine would ordinarily cost you 25 cents, thus making a total cash value of 50 cents. The above Bargain offer will be sent to any address upon receipt of 10 cents and the names and addresses of five lady friends. Send us your order to-day.

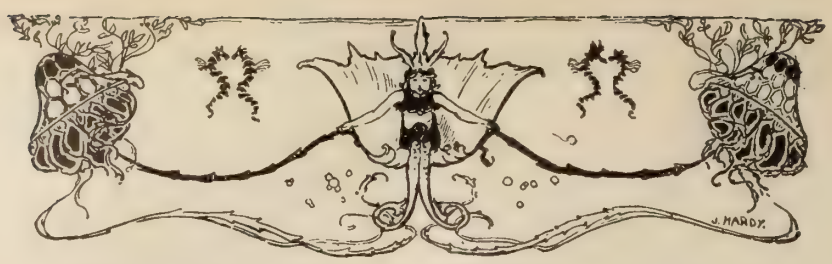
Avallone & Co. Inc., Dept. L. 515
Traders Bank Bldg., Toronto

There's nothing more Appetizing than

UPTON'S PURE ORANGE MARMALADE

and with toast or rolls and coffee it makes a most tempting light breakfast or luncheon. The name UPTON signifies purity and deliciousness. Made from nutritious oranges imported direct from Spain and the best quality granulated sugar only.

Your Grocer has Upton's



Mrs. Jim's Holiday

Continued from page 13

must be from Jim! Had anything happened—was anything wrong! With trembling fingers she tore it open, and read:

"Will meet you in Winnipeg on Thursday.—Jim."

Mrs. Jim stood still, holding the bit of paper in her hand, and soon she was looking at it through a mist of tears. The question she had been asking herself was answered—Jim had missed her. Jim wanted her. And in a trice she knew that she wanted him—wanted him with an intensity of longing that left no doubt in her mind that the old romantic love, with all its sweetness, was alive again.

The holiday had done its work. Going to the drawer where she kept the letters Jim had written her, she took them all out, and, in the light of that scrap of yellow paper, she read them again, read between the lines this time, till her heart was satisfied, of Jim's love, and longing, and loneliness. Then, in an ecstacy of emotion, she crushed them close to her and whispered:

"Oh, Jim, Jim, you're just the best husband in all that big North-west!"

Orchard Lodge—and Nan

Continued from page 12

echo dies away. Well, that is what it was like last night. But as we stood gazing at the tree-clad hills rising majestically in the misty distance, a sense of perfect peace and safety stole around us, and Nan voiced my thoughts, too, when she sang softly,

"Unto the hills around do I lift up
My longing eyes;
Oh, whence for me does my salvation come,
My help arise?"

Your subdued, but loving,
LYN.

Orchard Lodge, August 8th.

Dear Conn:

Well, thank goodness, it's all settled! Now I can enjoy my remaining two months in perfect peace.

I'll tell you how it happened. Early Thursday morning we got a telegram saying Chester Dale had been seriously injured in an automobile accident, and that in a moment of consciousness had asked for Nan. Mrs. Woodrow and she went, coming back Friday evening. There was an operation, the result of which was doubtful.

Nan told me all about everything the next day in the orchard.

"While Aunt Jean and I waited—it seemed an eternity—in that dreadful hospital for the doctors to come and tell us the result of the operation," she said, "I say it all clearly. Nothing mattered, not even college, nothing but Chester. I saw how my selfishness had made the poor boy suffer, and my great fear was that I should not have the chance to make it up to him. Oh, Miss Conran, I could never have forgiven myself had it turned out that way! But God in His goodness willed otherwise, and I had the happiness of seeing the joy in Chester's dear eyes when I told him that I had at last come to my senses." And in Nan's eyes too shone the "light that never was on land or sea."

Chester wants to be married next June at the latest, and no doubt Nan will give in to him. She has resigned her position as school-teacher, and is already planning her trousseau.

By the way, Conn, you may congratulate Ned and me; we have "made up," as the children say. "There are no fools like old fools," you know. Nevertheless, these particular fools are ridiculously happy.

With love,
LYN.

Prayer of a Modern

BY H. W. JAKEWAY

O Lord of Strength, I do not ask for power
To beat down others in the market place.
I pray for poise that I may hour by hour
Meet well my duty with a cheerful face.

O Lord of Grace, let not my aim be rest,
With life so short for what I have to do.
But grant me restfulness—thus to invest
With joys my hours of ease and labor too.

O Lord of Light, whatever I may learn
Of what men in their little knowledge teach,
Or wheresoever my poor mind may turn,
Keep reverence in my heart, I do beseech.

—Canadian Magazine.

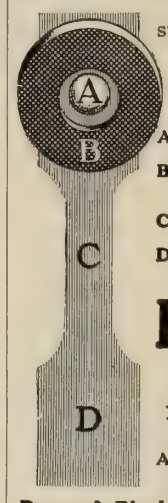
Corns Gone

in 48 Hours—the Pain Gone Instantly

A Blue-jay plaster is the only right way to treat corns. For every person who uses anything else there are fifty using Blue-jay.

For a Blue-jay plaster ends the pain instantly, and removes the corn in 48 hours.

It is applied in five seconds, then one forgets it entirely. No soreness, no pain. In a couple of days you simply lift the corn out. That is all.



Yet thousands of people still suffer from corns just because they don't know Blue-jay.

Note the Picture

A is the harmless red B&B wax that removes the corn.
B is soft felt to protect the corn and keep the wax from spreading.
C is the toe band, narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive. It fastens the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

15c and 25c per Package
Sample mailed free.
Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters.
Sold by all Druggists.

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York
Makers of Surgical Dressings, Etc. (77)

Baby's Own Soap

unequalled for toilet and nursery use.
"Best for baby—best for you."
Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited
Mfrs., Montreal.
E511

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

THERE ARE OTHER "ROGERS"

and various makes of Silverware, which are claimed to be "just as good" as

1847 ROGERS BROS. XS TRIPLE

but, like all imitations, they lack the beauty and wearing qualities identified with the original and genuine 1847 ROGERS BROS. exclusive designs, equal to the very best Sterling Silver in pattern, finish and general excellence. They are the heaviest triple-plated Table Silverware obtainable.

Examine the trade mark and be sure your purchases are stamped

1847 ROGERS BROS. XS TRIPLE

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.,
HAMILTON, ONT.

PERFECT Willow Plumes

IN any color, from your old ostrich feathers. Money saved and more lasting than new "factory" plumes.

SPECIAL processes for cleaning and dyeing evening gowns and street dresses. The lustre and softness of new goods retained. Feathers, silks and laces given special attention.

EXPRESS paid both ways on orders amounting to $5.00. Ask for our advice and prices. Quarter century reputation.

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS
656 College St. Toronto, Ont.

The Summer Girl

WHO does not look forward to the warm days and balmy breezes of the golden summer time? We Canadians are given to indignation if any foreigners assert that our winters are actually cold, and that there is real ice in our rivers; yet we are well aware that March is a trial to our patience, that April is too likely to possess many chilly days, and that we are tired of the name of winter by the time the May flowers come. Then we are in danger of rushing out in the warm sunlight, regardless at times of hat or veil, in the confident belief that a sun bath is the most beneficial treatment our much-tried features may receive.

Now, this is the reverse of wise and prudent procedure, and we are likely to realize its folly in a painful fashion before the end of the season. A complexion is not to be exposed ruthlessly to the blaze of the sunshine of summer, and the woman who values a clear and soft skin knows better than to allow old Sol to do his worst in the matter of tan and sunburn. It is all very well to say that it will "come off." It may, by the use of creams and other healing agents be very much modified; but when the face has been severely burnt once or twice, the traces are likely to remain.

We are not saying that it is necessary to go about constantly muffled in a veil, or to wear a sunbonnet in the months of sunshine and roses. But it is necessary to have some kind of protection for the face and hands, or the result of constant exposure to the strong rays of the sun will be regrettable. A Toronto girl who visited Muskoka for the first time a few years ago thought it would afford her the "grandest time" to paddle all day in the July sunshine. So she set out with two companions, who, wiser than she, wore wide, flapping hats, and kept their long sleeves well over the wrist. The eager novice would take none of their advice, declared that she loved the sunlight and could not have too much of it. So she rolled her sleeves well above the elbow, put a small tam-o'-shanter on the back of her head, and set forth for a whole day on Lake Rosseau. For the following day and several after she mourned exceedingly over blistered arms and face, lavishly applying cold cream, which did its best to heal the injured cuticle. There is a scar on the girl's right arm which reminds her of that day's indiscretion—and she laughs no longer at the wise maiden who dabs a "summer lotion" on her face before going out in the strong sunlight. It is all very well to be reminded that one must live and learn—but to learn by the very unpleasant process of scorching is hardly necessary.

BEFORE going out, then, it is well to apply to the face a good vanishing cream, rubbing it in well, and afterwards dusting the face with a good powder. By "rubbing in well," it is not suggested that you should treat the face as if it were made of rubber or stone. Hard rubbing for the face is entirely the wrong treatment and should never be employed. There is nothing more beautiful when in blooming and healthy condition, but it is delicate as a flower and will resent anything resembling a vigorous "scrubbing." The carelessness with which so many of us regard the complexion is the chief reason why so few fulfil the poet's lines:

"You passed me as April passes,
With a face made out of a rose."

Most of us can hardly boast of flower-tints after the bloom of youth is passed; yet it is largely due to our own indifference that the radiance of childhood is so soon dissipated. The fresh complexions of Irish, Scotch and English girls are proverbial—and we must give the salt air the credit for old-world roses. Yet, even in the brighter glare and harsher atmosphere of this continent, much may be done to keep a fresh tint in the face. The hard water of our cities is blamed for much of the dryness and parched look of the skin. However, borax is extremely cheap and a little of it goes a long way towards making the hardest water suitable for cleansing purposes.

In the matter of toilet water, there is an immense range among the modern preparations. A heavy perfume is unpleasant to most persons, but the merest suggestion of fragrance may be most refreshing.

ESTELLE asks whether perfume in the form of an essence is considered good taste. Yes—so long as the perfume remains a mere suggestion rather than a pronounced scent or fragrance. I once knew a rosy-cheeked servant named "Maggie" whose idea of a Saturday night's dissipation was to purchase a twenty-five cent bottle of "white rose" and sprinkle about half of the precious extract on hair, collar and handkerchief until her approach was an attack on the olfactory nerves. Heavy perfumes are offensive to most of us.

The French, who are usually considered the most elegant people in Europe, have many delightful perfumes—but those of Oriental name and aroma are somewhat too heavy for our liking. Several British firms have made a name for themselves during the last score of years with perfumes that are of a peculiarly refreshing nature, such as carnation and crabapple blossom. Never buy cheap perfume. A little of the very best should be the rule in this matter. Our grandmothers used to sprinkle lavender sprigs in the linen chest or wardrobe, and it was a clean and wholesome practice. A sachet bag, filled with a fragrant mixture gives a pleasant suggestion of old gardens to your gowns and lingerie.

"MAPLE LEAF" asks a question which occurs to many these hot days. What is the best method of avoiding an odor of perspiration? Some of us are troubled very slightly in this way; others have much difficulty in overcoming it. As a rule, the stout woman suffers from it more than she of slender proportions. It is advisable to bathe frequently and to use a good talcum powder very liberally. Toilet water should always be used by anyone who perspires excessively. There are several good preparations on the market which may be relied on. Special attention should be paid to diet, and the food should be as light as possible—such as will not entail any complications in digestion. Meat and pastry should be almost banished from the hot weather diet, and every precaution taken to avoid an over-strain. An avoidance of heavy, greasy food, and care in the matter of exertion will do much to relieve the sufferer from excessive perspiration.

A CORRESPONDENT asks if strawberries are injurious to the skin, declaring that whenever she eats this delightful fruit, the enjoyment is followed by a slight rash appearing on the face.

Strawberries are usually considered rather indigestible, and, if you suffer in the manner described, it would certainly be better to avoid eating the "best berry of all," as an old writer describes it. There are many who find it a trying fruit, tempting though it may be. This is a matter, however, for a physician to decide. It may be that you have some slight disorder of the digestive organs, which would make it advisable for you to avoid certain fruits and vegetables. "Hyperacidity," as it is called, leads to many an unpleasant moment, and may be checked by careful diet.

Royal Vinolia

THE CHAIN OF NEW PLEASURES

BEST SCIENCE, BEST TASTE AND BEST RESOURCES PRODUCE FINEST SOAPS, PERFUMES AND TOILET LUXURIES IN THE WORLD

Will you accept our offer? Will you do it to-day? We ask the privilege of putting any of the exquisite new Royal Vinolia luxuries on your toilet table at our expense.

This is a special sign granted only to the druggist who always has the full range of Royal Vinolia Toilet Luxuries. Ask your own druggist first. If he has not the Royal Vinolia article you want, go to one who shows this sign on his window. If you have any difficulty in finding a Royal Vinolia Depot, inform us, mentioning your druggist's name and address. We will send you addresses of depots within easy reach.

ROYAL VINOLIA
LEVER BROS. LIMITED
TORONTO

The Sign of the New Royal Vinolia Depots.

We don't even ask you to send us stamps for postage.

We only ask that, in fairness to us you will make a complete trial of any one of the Royal Vinolia Toilet Luxuries which you may choose—use it—and compare it with the best other toilet articles you have ever used in your life. It cannot fail to give complete satisfaction and comfort and prove an added daily luxury for all the days to come.

Will you miss this? Will you let yourself forget it? Get the special postcard referred to below from your druggist. Send it to-day.

Tear this slip out, save it as a Reminder:— Ask your druggist to-day. With your purchase of any ROYAL VINOLIA article and nearly all Vinolia articles over 20c., you now receive a special postcard which entitles you to a complete and free trial of any one ROYAL VINOLIA Toilet Luxury that you choose.

LIST OF ROYAL VINOLIA LUXURIES WITH PRICES:

Royal Vinolia Soap	box of 3 35c.	Royal Vinolia Cream	35c. and 50c.
Royal Vinolia Shaving Stick	25c.	Royal Vinolia Shaving Powder	25c.
Royal Vinolia Talcum Powder	25c.	Royal Vinolia Complexion Powder	50c
Royal Vinolia Vegetable Hair Wash	35c.	Royal Vinolia Solidified Brilliantine	35c
Royal Vinolia Tooth Paste	25c.	Royal Vinolia Tooth Powder	25c.
Royal Vinolia Fluid Dentifrice	25c.	Royal Vinolia Sachet	35c.
Royal Vinolia Vanishing Cream	15c. and 25c.	Royal Vinolia Perfume	$1.00 and $1.50

When the time comes to send the children away to school be prepared to meet the extra expense. Put away a little money for that purpose every year. Every dollar saved now means less privation for you and a better education for the children. We pay 3 per cent on savings accounts.

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$47,000,000

The Traders Bank
of Canada
INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION

TORONTO

AUG. 26th 1911 SEPT. 11th

Splendid array of Women's and Children's Work and Household Arts in New Women's Building

Splendid Classification - - Increased Prizes

ALL ENTRIES CLOSE AUGUST 15th

For Prize Lists and Information, write

J. O. ORR, City Hall, Toronto

HOUSE OF WINDOWS

Continued from page 11

in her dark hair, and her forehead was as unlined as a child's. Save for a deeper note in her voice and a soft seriousness of manner she seemed scarcely older than the girl Christine. Tommy's eyes followed her with worshipful reverence.

"It begins to feel like autumn," she said. "Come and see the garden, Tommy. What a pity that asters have no perfume!"

"Ah, but you forget the colors," said Tommy instantly. "Massed against that green hedge they satisfy without perfume. They are such big, straight, sturdy fellows; flaunting, yet brave, like soldiers."

"Yes?" eagerly. "Go on, Tommy. You make me see it all. Tell me about the golden-rod in the east corner." She leaned out over the dream garden and Tommy went on. He told of golden-rod and of the late dahlias, and of how the wind had blown some yellow leaves, first warning of dead summer, upon the garden walk; but he looked only at her face. For both of them the garden was real, the weeds and the tin cans did not exist; he was a gardener and she was a princess in an enchanted land.

The other two watched them with wondering eyes. "Doesn't he do it well?" whispered Christine. "When he talks to Ada like that, Tommy is a real poet. Say, Celia, did you ever notice—"

"Yes," said Celia, dryly, "I have noticed." She drew a breath of relief. "If it is so plain that the child notices it," she thought, "I need never worry over that particular question again. However bad things may be I can never take that way out."

"Christine," she said abruptly. "Get me the note Mr. Banks left for me."

Wondering a little at her tone, the girl handed her the envelope. Celia opened it slowly. She had already guessed what the note contained, and had braced herself to bear the confirmation of her fears. Mr. Banks wrote briefly that he was sorry that he must confirm the news of which he had spoken to her before; the Moulton Oil Company had gone into liquidation, and the shares upon which Miss Brown had been receiving dividends were now

"Well!" exclaimed Christine, who was almost dancing with impatience. "Is—is anybody dead?"

"Dead?" said Celia stupidly. "Oh, no. At least there is no fortune left to us. It is merely a—business letter."

"Oh!" There was disappointment in Christine's tone. She would have liked to have seen the letter, but Celia did not offer to show it. Instead, she changed the subject.

"Isn't that someone on the stair, Christine? Open the door. The landing is so dark. Fanny said she intended coming over."

"Oh, dear!" Christine's sigh was heartfelt. She did not care for the bustling ways of Mrs. Harcourt Flynn.

"She is a dear, good friend," said Celia, warmly. "But, listen, she wants me to go away for my holidays. And mind, you are not to encourage her in it. I don't want to go."

"Aren't you all going, as usual?" asked Tommy in surprise.

"Why, I thought—" began Christine But Mrs. Flynn's brisk voice interrupted

"Those stairs get worse and worse," she declared, without preliminaries "Why you girls stay here I can't see! You'll break your necks some day. It's a scandal. Can't you make your landlord-man do anything?" How d'ye do, Tommy? Why can't you see the man for Celia?"

"Celia won't let me." Tommy's tone was injured.

"No, I won't. The last time Tommy complained Ada was just worried to death by men coming to 'see about it.' As many as nine different people came, and then nobody did anything. There isn't any landlord, really; we pay our rent to an estate."

"Then I would move. There is a nice apartment house going up now just around the corner from us. Very reasonable rent. I'll get Sam to speak for you."

"Well, I never!" murmured Christine. But Celia, alarmed, interposed hastily. "No, Fanny, don't do that! We hate the idea of moving!" She made a slight gesture in Ada's direction. Mrs. Flynn's eyebrows went up. She liked Ada, but Celia was her special favorite, and she thought her continual sacrifice for her blind sister somewhat overdone.

"Well, you know best. If you trip on that loose board and kill yourself, don't blame me. I've warned you. And here is the address I promised you. You won't know yourself after a fortnight of Lakeview farm."

Celia took the piece of paper and thanked her. "Only, I'm afraid we aren't going away this year, Fanny," she added, as if by an afterthought.

"Ada," said Mrs. Flynn. "Are you going to let your sister kill herself?"

Ada turned a startled face from the garden. Tommy Burns turned with her, his face flushing a slow, deep red. He never could become accustomed to hearing Ada addressed as Mrs. Flynn addressed her. But that lady went right on.

"I may say that I think Celia is looking badly, very badly, indeed! She needs a complete rest and change. You have influence with her, Ada, use it before it is too late! That is all I have to say. I came especially to say it. I told Celia I intended to let you know the truth. Celia is being killed by overwork. No thanks, I do not wish any tea. I have dined. Tommy, if you will see me down these stairs I shall be obliged. I do not wish to die just yet. Good-bye, Celia. I will see if I can get you an extra week of holiday."

Her departure was as sudden as her coming had been.

"Oh, dear, I hope she doesn't!" said Celia, in a frightened whisper.

"Such a dear, good friend!" murmured Christine, sotto voce, and then as the sound of Tommy's returning steps were audible, she called sharply and in Mrs. Flynn's best manner, "Tommy, if you trip on that loose board and kill yourself, don't blame me. I warned you!"

Laughing, she sprang down a few of the steps to meet him, and then, in the darkness of the hall, Mr. Burns was surprised by a vigorous pinch upon his arm. "Don't tease Celia any more tonight about going away," cautioned Christine. "She's tired out, and there's something wrong—I'm sure of it."

So it happened that Celia, inwardly bracing herself against their united persuasions, was surprised, and perhaps

"Dey am dun quick"
Aunt Salina
In thousands of homes wash day is looked upon as one of ordinary pleasant occupation since the advent of the New Century Washer.
¶ Start your washing at 8 o'clock in the morning and you are through before 10, with the clothes on the line, the kitchen cleaned up and the assurance that every particle of dirt or stain has been removed from the clothes without the slightest injury to the fabric, if you use a
8 A.M.
10 A.M.
New Century Washer
¶ Just ask the woman who has one. This machine is not classed with ordinary Washers. They are Better Machines, Better Made on a Better Principle, and do Better Work in Better Time.
¶ The NEW CENTURY is well made and the smallest details in its construction are given the closest attention. The wood in the tubs is the best Louisiana swamp cypress, ribbed like a washboard, tongued, grooved and reinforced inside by a rust-proof steel ring to prevent warping and leaking. All metal parts in contact with water are galvanized by a secret process—will not rust or stain the clothes. All parts are made by automatic machinery, are absolutely interchangeable, and can thus be readily replaced in case of accident.
¶ The NEW CENTURY is sold by all the best dealers. If your's don't handle them write us direct.
"Aunt Salina's Wash Day Philosophy" is our new FREE Book, and gives many valuable hints on the washing of all kinds of textiles. Send us a postal and get it to-day.
9 A.M.
SUMMER-DOWSWELL Limited
HAMILTON, ONT.

Recipes for Summer

The author of this won a $100 prize in a recipe competition.

PERFECTION SALAD

½ box Knox Sparkling Gelatine.
½ cup cold water.
½ cup mild vinegar.
1 pint boiling water.
1 teaspoonful salt.
1 cup finely shredded cabbage.
Juice of one lemon.
½ cup sugar.
2 cups celery cut in small pieces.
¼ can sweet red peppers, finely cut

Soak the gelatine in cold water five minutes; add vinegar, lemon juice. boiling water, sugar and salt. Strain, and when beginning to set add remaining ingredients. Turn into a mold and chill. Serve on lettuce leaves with mayonnaise dressing, or cut in dice and serve in cases made of red or green peppers, or the mixture may be shaped in molds lined with pimentos. A delicious accompaniment to cold sliced chicken or veal.

ANGEL PARFAIT WITH FRENCH FRUIT

1 teaspoonful Knox Sparkling Gelatine.
The whites of two eggs, beaten dry.
1½ cups double cream, beaten light.
3 tablespoonfuls wine or thick syrup.
2 tablespoonfuls cold water.
½ cup of French fruit cut fine.
½ cup granulated sugar.
½ cup water.

Soak the gelatine in the cold water five minutes or longer. Boil the sugar and half cup of water to the soft ball degree (as in making boiled frosting), pour in a fine stream onto the whites of eggs, beating constantly meanwhile; add the gelatine, stir over cold or ice water until the mixture is cold and begins to set, then fold in the cream and the fruit and flavoring. The fruit will be softer if soaked in the wine or syrup some hours or over night. Turn into a quart mold, lined with paper, cover securely and let stand in equal measures of ice and salt about three hours.

FRUIT SALAD

For the celery and grape fruit salad, cut the inner and crispest stalks of celery into half-inch lengths. Skin one banana and cut it into neat cubes. Do the same with a tender tart apple. Have ready two halves of grape fruit, from which you have removed all the pulp so carefully that you have not torn the skin of either half. Cut the pulp taken from one of the halves into small pieces, in size corresponding to the apple and banana dice. Put all these into a chilled bowl and set on the ice or in a very cold place for half an hour. Chill the mayonnaise and serve a tablespoonful on each portion of salad. It is a pretty idea to use the empty half skins of the grape fruit as a receptacle, which should lie on ice until serving time. The addition of whipped cream and a little sugar to the mayonnaise is an improvement on the ordinary.

SUMMER SALAD

Peel, slice and chill half a dozen fresh, ripe tomatoes. Peel and slice three or four fresh cucumbers, young enough to have small, tender seeds. Lay these in ice water for an hour. At serving time drain thoroughly. Rub the inside of a salad bowl or platter with a cut clove of garlic, make a foundation of lettuce, pile the cucumbers in the middle and put the tomatoes around the edge. Sprinkle thickly with finely chopped mint, and pour over a well-mixed French dressing. This is a particularly refreshing salad, suited to either dinner or luncheon.

BANANA CAKE

Banana cake is made by beating a quarter of a cup of butter to a cream and adding a half cup of sugar and one egg. When very light stir in enough sifted flour to make a stiff dough. Roll into a thin sheet and line a square shallow baking pan with the sheet. Peel five ripe bananas and chop fine. Place them over the crust in the pan, sprinkle over them a half cup of sugar, the pulp of five tamarinds, soaked in a quarter cup of warm water, and squeeze over all the juice of two oranges. Put on top a tablespoonful of butter cut into bits, a dash of mace and two tablespoonfuls of thick cream. Grate over the top two small crackers, bake in a moderate oven a half hour. Serve in narrow strips, like French pastry.

HOW TO IMPROVE YOUR COMPLEXION

BEETHAM'S

La-rola

Entirely Removes and Prevents all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, HEAT, IRRITATION Etc., and renders THE SKIN DELICATELY SOFT and VELVETY

It is the most perfect Emollient Milk for the Skin ever produced, and for the Toilet and Nursey is Invaluable. It is delightfully Refreshing and Soothing if applied after Motoring, Cycling, Tennis, Golfing, Boating, etc. It is neither sticky nor greasy, and can be used at any time during the day.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

It is True Economy

to use the highest grade of sugar like

St. Lawrence Sugar

It is brilliantly white and sparkling—looks dainty and tempting on the table—and goes further because it is absolutely pure sugar of the finest quality. Make the test yourself. Compare "ST. LAWRENCE GRANULATED" with any other.

The St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Co. Limited

MONTREAL. 33

Settling Mother-in-Law.

THERE'S a wee woman, not yet turned six, out in the West, whose grandmother is a keen disappointment to her. Being a decidedly precocious infant, the child is much petted by all the grown folk save her grandmother. Naturally, she resents this lack of demonstration, and quite recently thought out a plan by which judgment might be brought upon the old lady, whom she always designates as a "mother-in-law."

An artist friend frequently amuses her by making sketches. One day, while thus engaged, she requested him to draw a "mother-in-law." "Make her fat and make her cross." The young man carried out her instructions.

"Now, draw Daddy." He did so. "Now draw Mamma." Again he obeyed. "Now draw me." When the four sketches were made, she enclosed them in an envelope and put it away. On Sunday she went to Sunday school, and when the collection plate was passed, out came the envelope and was put on the plate.

"I've fixed her, Mamma," she said triumphantly when she came home.

"Fixed whom, dear?"

"Your mother-in-law," came the startling reply.

"Why, whatever have you done, dear?"

"I sent all our pictures to the Lord and asked Him to pick out the ones He loved and give the cross one to the Devil." Then she added conclusively: "I think I've done a good work."

* * *

No Gentleman.

AN interesting bashful young man was driving one evening with a young lady whom he had been calling on for some time previous. The stillness of the evening and the beauty of the scene around him inspired his courage, and, sitting stiffly erect with his face forward, he asked suddenly: "May I kiss you?"

"Surely," she coyly replied.

"Aw," he said, his face scarlet, and larruping his horses to a run—"aw, I was only foolin'."

* * *

An Enterprising Man.

HEARING a noise at midnight in one of his rooms, a gentleman tiptoed to the spot, thinking to take the burglar unawares. Sikes, however, was not to be caught napping, and before the owner of the house fully realized what was happening he was looking down the muzzle of a revolver.

"You realize that you are at my mercy?"

"Ye—s," replied the house owner.

"And also realize that I could shoot you dead if I wished?"

Another trembling affirmative.

"You did not hear me enter the house?"

"No."

"Well, if you had your windows fitted with one of Ketchum's new patent burglar alarms, this wouldn't have happened. I am an agent for the—"

But the house owner had swooned.

* * *

Easy.

LADY: "What is the price of this ribbon?"

Clerk: "Twenty cents a yard."

Lady: "At Brown's they sell the same thing for ten cents a yard, but they are out of it now."

Clerk: "So do we when we're out of it."

* * *

The Reason.

AS an example of graciousness and tact, Matthew White tells in Munsey's Magazine, of a London clergyman who was called on to address an audience of actors. Alluding to the better social status of the players, the clergyman said that in former days it was sometimes customary to brand them as vagabonds, and bore a hole in their ears with an awl, that citizens might thus be forewarned. "And who knows," the clergyman added, "but that it is a survival of an endeavor to hide this mark of indignity that causes some of the actors even to-day to wear their hair long?"

* * *

Just Dissolved.

"SO you broke your engagement with Miss Spensive?"

"No, I didn't break it."

"Oh, she broke it?"

"No, she didn't break it."

"But it is broken?"

"Yes, she told me what her clothing cost and I told her what my income was; then our engagement sagged in the middle and gently dissolved."

* * *

As He Saw It.

DR. HARVEY W. WILEY, chief of the bureau of chemistry in the Department of Agriculture, has interpreted many laws affecting pure foods and drugs, and has had some of his opinions reversed by the Department of Justice and the President.

He was discussing this one day when he said:

"The matter of interpreting laws is much like the story of the little boy who was told by his teacher to read something from a primer.

"The boy read as follows:

"'This is a warm doughnut. Step on it.'

"'Why, Johnny,' said the teacher, 'that can't be right. Let me see your book.'

"This is what she found.

"'This is a worm. Do not step on it.'"

* * *

A Helpful Bell-Boy.

FOR four consecutive nights the hotel man had watched his fair, timid guest fill her pitcher at the water cooler.

"Madam," he said on the fifth night, "if you would ring this would be done for you."

"But where is my bell?" asked the lady.

"The bell is beside your bed," replied the proprietor.

"Why," she exclaimed, "the boy told me that was the fire alarm and that I was not to touch it on any account."

* * *

Fishy.

MOTHER—"Johnny, you said you'd been to Sunday School."

Johnny (with far-away look)—"Yes, mamma."

Mother—"How does it happen that your hands smell of fish?"

Johnny—"I carried home the Sunday School paper, an' the outside page is all about Jonah and the whale."—Roseleaf.

* * *

A Hungry Husband.

BUT there is another type of woman almost as undesirable as the extravagant one. A man feelingly remarked one day: "That gown my wife is wearing makes me hungry whenever I see it. She bought it with what she saved out of the housekeeping money."

For a time after they were married all the tradesman's bills had gone to the office and been promptly paid by cheque. But the slips were on a nail behind the kitchen door at home, and there was no way of checking the bills down town. So the man decided it would be a much wiser plan to make his wife a regular allowance on which to run the house. It was a generous one, more than sufficient to provide good, wholesome food, but the woman was a schemer, and she proceeded to make the most of great possibilities. She bought cheap cuts instead of juicy steaks and tender chops, and dairy butter in place of creamery. Cold storage eggs came on the breakfast table enveloped in omelette instead of the more expensive "new laid." The cook was initiated into the making of delicious-looking croquettes, which, when dissected, were found to be composed of the meat from the soup pot. They looked tempting, but there was no nourishment in them. Instead of good, fresh fruit and vegetables from the market, the cart of the grubby-looking banana man was beckoned to the back door, and rare bargains were driven with the Italian "market gardener" from Elizabeth Street, whose broken-down wagon bore his name and calling in zig-zag letters on its side. Wherever there was a bargain going on in fowls of uncertain age, or tinned vegetables from old stock, there was the hungry man's wife, a ready buyer. A little chicory judiciously mixed with the coffee was an economical discovery, and a cheap grade of tea replaced the good old English blend. Often the man rose hungry from the table—but the woman got her gown.

The difficulty is sometimes to strike the happy mean.

* * *

The Wall Paper Man.

Oh, I'd sing you a song of the wall paper man,
Who's with us once again,
Who comes with the flies and who everywhere hies
With his ladders and buckets ten;
I'd sing of the ease with which bric-a-brac breaks
At the soft gentle touch of his hand,
I'd sing of joy which it seems that he takes
In upsetting a jardiniere stand;
I'd sing how he figures the cost of a job
To a dot (except extras worth ten),
Of his tracks in the hall and paste buckets that fall,
And the way the new rug appears then:
Oh, I'd sing of the wonderful litter he leaves
And the household he puts in a fuss—
Yes, I'd sing of him now if I didn't, somehow,
Have to pass up all singing to cuss.

—Kansas City Times.

* * *

Women and Suffragettes.

ON his visit to America, Father Vaughan of London (called by Chesterton "the Mayfair priest who makes the comfortable classes feel uncomfortable") was asked: "Would you give votes to women?"

"I would make no difficulty about giving votes to women," he answered. "But, you understand," he added with twinkling eye, "once you gave votes to women, the suffragettes would be wanting them also."

* * *

He Paid for It.

"THERE goes a man that really has accomplished something in this world."

"Is that so? What has he done?"

"Bought a house on the instalment plan."

"That's nothing. Thousands of men are doing that."

"I know, but that man actually has his house paid for?"

—Detroit Free Press.

* * *

Secret of Genius.

IT is not altogether easy to imagine a Lady Macbeth eating chops. Yet her greatest impersonator got her inspiration from them, if one may rely on an altogether delightful authority.

On a certain occasion, writes Mr. E. V. Lucas, in his recent book, "The Second Post," the painter Haydon paid his butcher, who reciprocated by expressing great admiration for the artist's painting of "Alexander."

"Quite alive, sir!" said the butcher.

"I am glad that you think so," said the artist.

"Yes, sir; but, as I have often said to my sister, you could not have painted that picture, sir, if you had not eat my meat, sir."

"Very true, Mr. Sowerby."

"Ah, sir, I have a fancy for genius, sir."

"Have you, Mr. Sowerby?"

"Yes, sir. Mrs. Siddons, sir, has eat my meat, sir. Never was such a woman for chops, sir! Ah, sir, she was a wonderful crayture!"

"She was, Mr. Sowerby."

"Ah, sir, when she used to act that there character—but, Lord, such a head, as I say to my sister—that there woman, sir, that murders a king between 'em."

"Oh, Lady Macbeth."

"Ah, sir, that's it—Lady Macbeth. I used to get up with the butler behind her carriage when she acted, and I used to see her looking quite wild and all the people quite frightened. 'Aha, my lady,' says I, 'if it wasn't for my meat, though, you wouldn't be able to do that!'"—Pittsburg Chronicle Telegraph.

From the Publishers

Continued from page 27

ing a pretty romance, wherein the heroine is a daughter of one of the chief workmen and her lover is a son of the owner of the "works." The humorous touches are delightful, and one will remember the strenuous mother-in-law even longer than the very-much-in-love young persons. "Katherine" is a charming girl, however, less stormy and bewildering than the average "American" heroine.

"Jim Hands" is a pleasing story—just the thing for an afternoon on the boat or in the orchard. Toronto: The MacMillan Company of Canada.

* * *

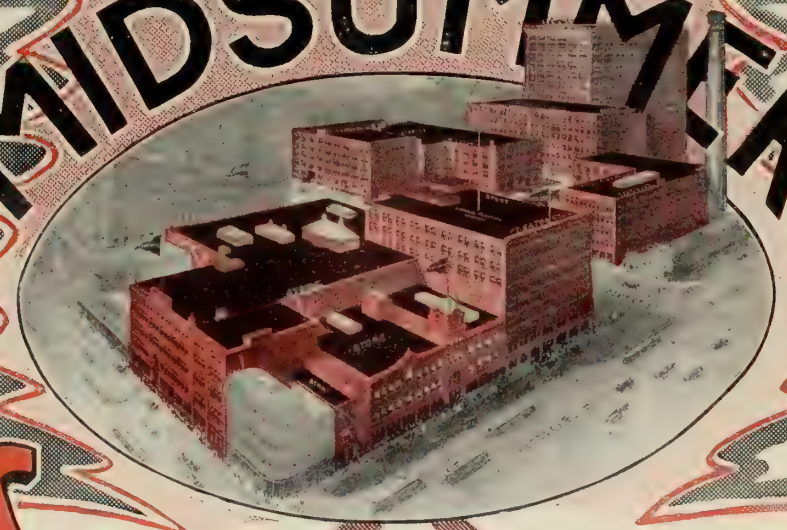
IT is refreshing to turn from Mr. Service's impossible and sordid chronicle in "The Trail of Ninety-Eight" to another work of fiction which represents a very different heroine, although her adventures, also, lie in unbeaten paths. Mr. Hulbert Footner, the author, is a Hamilton writer who has lately spent his winters in New York. In the latter city, he has been quite successful with his short stories, and his first novel, "Two on the Trail," leads us to expect fiction of an unusually entertaining order from this native of the Ambitious City.

The very first chapter, where the hero and heroine meet in a restaurant of the West, and proceed to indulge in the old-fashioned pastime of falling in love at first sight, is a stimulant to the reader's curiosity and imagination. From that moment, Garth Pevensey and Natalie Bland set out on a series of hairbreadth escapes in search of a long-lost exile which leave one no idle nor dull moments. The matter-of-fact and prosaic reader may protest that there are too many such incidents, that no mere young man could ever have come alive through such appalling disasters as befell the noble Garth. But a truce to such contention! The scene is the Great Unexplored region of the West—and who knows what may happen in those wilds? It has been said, too, that Garth is an amazing athlete for a newspaper man—that such physical prowess would hardly be expected from a chaser of a copy in old New York. Here we admit a doubt, for the aspiring journalist certainly topples the burly men of the Northern woods and streams over, like so many ninepins. There is the most villainous villain we have met for many a day, in the person of Nick Grylls, who, like the character of King John in the old green-backed history, bears no redeeming feature. We, who live in the city, where there are electric lights and police, have a genuine thrill of terror when the fair Natalie is pursued in the lonely North by such a superlative scoundrel as Old Nick. But it all ends in sunshine and orange blossoms, and the only discordant note is that Mabyn, villain number two, is permitted to live.

The most pleasing and promising characteristic of the story is its cleanly and wholesome tone. In that respect, it affords a welcome contrast to the hysterical lack if moral balance in the Service production. Honor and purity form the basis of the romance of "Two on the Trail" and, while evil characters are depicted, there is no attempt to make them out other than the sordid creatures they are. Mr. Footner's second novel will be anticipated with interest by all who like a story of dashing adventure. Toronto: The Musson Book Company.

EATON'S CATALOGUE №99 SALE 1911

MIDSUMMER



397 SELECTED

BARGAINS

FOR SALE DURING THE MONTHS OF

JULY & AUGUST

If you have not received a copy of this Catalogue, WRITE FOR ONE To-day.

SATISFACTION GUARANTEED OR YOUR MONEY BACK

BARGAINS THAT ARE BARGAINS

Buy at EATON'S NOW—during this Sale. It's a wonder for big value-giving—brimful with timely opportunities that no one can afford to pass unheeded. Every department has bought at keenly-cut prices great volumes of worthy goods, and you're the one who benefits most. Two months of hustling, bustling business. It can't be otherwise. Every item spells BARGAIN! BARGAIN! BARGAIN! Just twenty-four pages of them, but every one a genuine money-saver. Can you resist them? Some folks will buy for the time to come, let alone present needs. That's money saved. Don't you want to save? Of course you do. Just use this book, trust it for what we say about it, send your order now, and don't forget that our Guarantee goes with every purchase, large or small. Satisfaction guaranteed to every customer or all your money back.

LOW PRICES GIVEN ONLY FOR JULY AND AUGUST SALE

SWEEPING PRICE-REDUCTION ON WOMEN'S ONE-PIECE DRESSES

3.98

A VALUE EXTRAORDINARY

Style J-89588. Those who appreciate fine material and simplicity of design will admire this really charming One-piece Dress of fine white embroidered flouncing. The yoke and elbow - length sleeves of all-over embroidered lawn in a dainty open pattern are cut in one-piece in the prevailing style. The skirt just below the waist line is finely tucked all round, and the lower part — in flounce effect — is softly gathered to give becoming fulness. Val. lace and insertion complete the round neck, sleeves and waist line, and the dress fastens with pearl buttons in the back. Excellent service may be looked for in this dress, as the materials used are of fine, close weave, and for social occasions both in summer and winter it is an ideal style. Sizes are 32, 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 bust, with choice of skirt lengths 38 or 40 inches. SALE PRICE 3.98

THE T. EATON CO LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA

IN WRITING ADVERTISERS MENTION CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

–has no equal for cleaning Bath-tubs
Many other uses & full directions on Large Sifter-Can 10¢
Old Dutch Cleanser
Chases Dirt

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

AUGUST
1911

FICTION NUMBER

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

PRICE
10 CENTS

Made in Canada

The only well known medium priced baking powder made in Canada that does not contain Alum.

The interest of the public in the question of pure food is increasing every day, and housekeepers are recognizing the fact that the well known and well advertised branded articles are more to be relied upon than the unknown private brands that do not bear the name of the manufacturer. Food scientists condemn the use of alum in baking powder. The pure food advocate can ask for no greater attention to detail in making, nor more absolute purity than is offered in Magic Baking Powder.

MAGIC BAKING POWDER

Contains no Alum and costs no more than the ordinary kinds

E.W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

TER ROUTE TO WINNIPEG"

A delightful sail amidst roomy and luxurious surroundings will make your journey to Port Arthur, Fort William or West a pleasure and a rest. The rate is the cheapest including meals and berth on boat.

Canadian Pacific Railway

Sailings daily except Friday and Sunday from Owen Sound at 5.00 p.m.
Connecting train from Toronto at 1.00 p.m.

Handsomely illustrated Literature, Tickets, Reservations, etc., from any Canadian Pacific Agent or

R. L. THOMPSON, District Passenger Agent
TORONTO

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.
Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00. (8s.) post paid.
We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

EDITORIAL CHAT

THE AUGUST MAGAZINES are not as a rule filled with useful and informing articles, to the exclusion of lighter material. The last month of the summer is the playtime of the year for most of us, and consequently, the editor takes temperature into consideration and endeavors to give the readers only the most entertaining fare. We honestly hope that our paper friends are enjoying themselves so much in a brief respite from the day's work that they will appreciate our desire to give them a number of summer enjoyment. The serial story, "The House of Windows," by Mrs. MacKay, is becoming more enthralling with each installment, as you learn more of the mysterious heroine and appreciate her trials. In this issue we are giving you more than the usual number of chapters, in the hope that this extra supply of serial fiction will divert you for an August afternoon. The adventures of the happy young persons in "A Honeymoon in Hiding" continue to be most amusing and entertaining. This story will be concluded in our September number and we are sure it has been appreciated by all our readers. "Mrs. Jim's Holiday" in our July number has appealed to a wide class, if we may judge from the comments which have reached us. "Every husband in Ontario should read that story," was the emphatic comment of one reader, who considered that the "lesson" of the story was most impressive. This month's contribution from Miss Miles, "Dame Nature, Human Nature, and the Beaver Dam" is a bright and seasonable narrative of a camping-out. "At the Gate of Silence" is a rather creepy and uncanny tale which will give you a chilly sensation, not unwelcome in the month of August.

THE DOMESTIC DEPARTMENT, however, has not been overlooked, and you will find in the August pages the usual articles on this work. Miss Jessie E. Rorke deals with the matter of household decoration from the standpoint of one who considers the beautiful rather than the expensive. There is a false idea, cherished by some, that, in order to have an attractive home, it is necessary to spend lavishly. Miss Rorke discusses this theory extensively and upholds the artistic idea, which has nothing essentially to do with expenditure. These articles are well worth your consideration, and letters addressed to Miss Rorke will be cheerfully answered.

AROUND THE HEARTH has a rather overwhelming suggestion for the summer months, when we are all as far away from a fireplace as we can be. "Around the Bon-fire" might be more in keeping with the heart-to-heart talks of a summer evening. Still, whatever season it may be, you will find Jennie Allen Moore's page a comfortable spot for a good quarter-of-an-hour. This time, she talks about the annual meeting of the National Council of Women, which was held at Port Arthur during the month of June. Jennie Allen Moore's comments thereon are both shrewd and discriminating, and we are sure that the women who are interested in philanthropic and social questions will be concerned in her experience of the large and representative gathering of Canadian women. This department has steadily grown in our readers' confidence and liking, and we are sure that, whatever you may decide to "skip," it will not be Jennie Allen Moore's page

OUR RURAL READERS may be inclined to consider the article on the "slum disease" rather out of their sphere, and leave it for the perusal of city readers. The country, fortunately, does not have to face the housing problem, and is reasonably sure of a pure milk supply. If you will consider this matter beneath the surface, however, you will find that the slum question affects the community at large. There cannot be such a plague spot in a city, without its exerting an evil influence throughout the whole country. The recent report of the Medical Health Office of Toronto shows the urgent need for prompt action in Ontario's capital if the slum districts are going to be abolished. Winnipeg, with its wonderful growth and cosmopolitan crowds, has difficult slum questions to face. Montreal, with its large foreign influx and its high rate of infant mortality, may well take the matter of slum abolition into serious consideration. In an article on this question in the present issue, Mr. James Acton, who is practically acquainted with "ward" problems of pure milk supply and decent housing, surveys the situation, in so far as Canada is concerned, thoroughly and sympathetically, indicating a sane and safe method for dealing with that part of the city which threatens to become submerged.

THE GIRLS' CLUB is in a flourishing condition, and we are always glad to hear from our young friends. Photographs in connection with the work of the Girl Guides will be especially welcome.

OUR WOMEN'S INSTITUTES are loyal in their support of that department. A member writing recently says:—"It seems to me that it would be well to find out from Mr. Putnam what particular line of work the Woman's Institute have undertaken and carried out successfully in any part of the province, and which, according to his estimation, is coming the nearest to fulfilling the object, which is 'to raise the general standard of health and morals of our people.' Then give that particular work all the praise on the Institute page, that could possibly be due to it. Personally, I think that to be good Institute workers we must become very unselfish. To live for others should be part of our motto, and I would advise that work that has shown that spirit should come first. I do think that the work of cleaning neglected cemeteries is one that should receive especial praise. I also am a believer in the W. I. providing rest rooms for tired mothers and children, and where convenient to use same for entertaining young girls and boys in the evening instead of having so many young people on our town streets to such a late hour so many days, 'or rather nights.'"

CONTENTS

August 1911

FICTION

AT THE GATE OF SILENCE - - - - 6
DAME NATURE, HUMAN NATURE AND THE BEAVER DAM - - - - - 7
A HONEYMOON IN HIDING (Serial) - 11
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS (Serial) - 13
CHARLIE CHIPMONK'S CAREER - - 16
MAY APPLES - - - - - - - - 16

SPECIAL FEATURES

A WOMAN RANCHER IN ALBERTA - 9
THE SLUM DISEASE AND ITS CURE - 10
SONGS OF SUMMER - - - - - - 36

FASHION DEPARTMENT

GOWNS FOR SUMMER FUNCTIONS - 22
FROCKS FOR LITTLE GIRLS - - - 22
THE FASHIONABLE FICHU - - - 23
A MIDSUMMER GOWN - - - - 23
THE BREAKFAST JACKET - - - - 26
THE HOUSE APRON - - - - - 26
EMBROIDERED HOUSE LINEN - - - 27
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - - 28

MATTERS OF MENU

AN AUGUST LUNCHEON - - - - 17
CONCERNING GOOSEBERRIES - - - 17
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - - 41

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 20
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - - - 40

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - - 16
AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 18
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - - 19
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - - - 30
THE DRESSING TABLE - - - - 37
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY - - 42

MISCELLANEOUS

EDITORIAL CHAT - - - - - - 3
EDITORIALS - - - - - - - - 5
CANADIAN WOMEN'S PRESS CLUB - 29
FROM THE PUBLISHERS - - - - 37

PRESERVED RIGHT ON THE FARMS

Not hauled or trans-shipped for miles before being put up, but hand-picked when just right for preserving, carried in baskets to kitchens right in the midst of the orchards. Then carefully washed, and preserved with choicest granulated sugar and pure spring—not ordinary—water.

E. D. Smith's Pure Fruit Jams, Jellies and Preserves

Proved by the Government to be 100 per cent. Pure and to contain none of the chemical dyes, preservatives, etc., commonly used in the manufacture of Jams.

E D S

No wonder women say that E. D. Smith's Jams, Jellies and Preserves are different. Can you find another manufacturer, or even a housewife, who can get fresh, ripe fruit from the "Garden of Canada" as soon after being picked as we get it—get pure, clean, sparkling water from a spring in mountain rock nearby—and who also has a kitchen containing the best equipment known that tends to cleanliness and production of good food? Your grocer has them.

E. D. SMITH -:- WINONA -:- ONTARIO

How You Can Help Us

Do you realize how much more readily and gladly your friends and neighbors will give a subscription for the JOURNAL to you than to any outsider? In the first place they have perfect confidence in you. They know what you will like they will like. Will you lend us this influence of yours in making CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL known in your neighborhood. Will you ask all the women around you to subscribe and send the JOURNAL as gifts to their friends. They will like it, because it is such great value for $1.00, because it is Canadian and because you recommend it.

EDUCATIONAL OFFER

The Road to Success

Many of the highest paid business men have started as stenographers. To a keen young man, the position of private secretary is a sure step toward an executive position.

In an office, a young woman secures the means for further study and culture—music, art, literature, domestic science. Association with bright, energetic minds is excellent experience.

——You Can Earn a—— Three Months' Course in Shorthand and Stenography

by securing 60 yearly subscriptions to Canadian Home Journal before January 1st at $1.00 each.

Board During the Course and Carfare to Toronto from any place in Ontario by securing 150 subscriptions. Extra for more distant points.

With such a universally attractive home magazine, with the appeal to Canadian loyalty, and your excellent purpose, you should get an order from nearly every house. To help you get orders quickly, we give

An Attractive Free Premium

If for any reason you fail to earn the course, or prefer not to take it, for all subscriptions that you have obtained, we will pay you our

Splendid Cash Commissions

Premiums for Subscriptions To CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

(Only Yearly Subscriptions at $1.00 each are counted)

For 20 Subscriptions.

Ladies' or Men's Gold Watch (14k. guaranteed gold-filled case, guaranteed Waltham movement).
Sterling Silver Sugar and Cream.
Sterling Silver Manicure Set (wildflower design, silk-lined leatherette case).
Dozen Sterling Silver Spoons.
Pearl Pendant or Brooch.

For 16 Subscriptions.

Eight-Day Oak Mantel Clock.
Cut-Glass Fruit Bowl.
Solid Gold Signet Ring.
Dresden Tea Set (16 pieces).
Fine Ebony Bureau Set (mirror, brush, comb, file, buttonhook).

For 12 Subscriptions.

Silk Umbrella (ebony handle, sterling silver mounted).
Ring, set with 3 Pearls.
Set (3) Blouse Pins, Pearls.
Sterling Silver Watch.
Polished Nickle Chafing Dish.
12 Silver-Plated Tea Spoons.

For 8 Subscriptions.

Gold Bar Pin, 3 Pearls.
Solid Gold Birthday Pin (set with stone of the month).
Cut-Glass Bon Bon Dish.
Six Dresden Cups and Saucers.
Gold-Filled Watch Chain.
Opal Stick Pin.

For 5 Subscriptions.

Gold Heart Locket.
Gold-Filled Necklet (long).
Boudoir Table Clock.
Gold Blouse Pin, Pearl Set.
Ladies' Gold Signet Ring.
Six Dresden Tea Plates.
6 Silver-Plated Spoons.

For 3 Subscriptions.

Fine Leather Pocket-Book.
Bar Pin and 2 Collar Pins (turquoise blue enamel with pearls).
Opal Scarf Pin.
Crepestone Brooch, with Pearl.
Silver Berry Spoon.
Flexible Leather Bible or Dictionary.

For 2 Subscriptions.

Gold-Filled Blouse Pin.
Fountain Pen.
Opal Scarf Pin.
Sterling Silver Cuff Links.
Sterling Silver Belt Buckle.
Topaz Hat Pin.
Atlas of the World (180 maps, city populations, flags).

For 1 Subscription.

Gold Scarf Pin, Wish Bone.
Sterling Silver Hat Pin.
"Everything About Needlework" (4 volumes of instruction and suggestions).
Embroidery Stamping Outfit (25 designs, shirt waist, doilies, 2 complete alphabets).
Any 4 Patterns.

These premiums are furnished by one of the best jewelry houses in Toronto, and are guaranteed to give satisfaction. A premium-winner writes: "The silverware came to-day. It is most attractive in design, and far superior to what I expected. It will prove a pleasure to all of us for many years. It has taken very little effort to secure orders, the Journal almost sells itself."

IF PREFERRED WE GIVE LARGE CASH COMMISSIONS TO ANY ONE SENDING THREE OR MORE ORDERS

Circulation Department CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL 59 John Street, Toronto

MAIN STREET OF ALIX.

HAUNTED LAKE AT ALIX.

A WOMAN RANCHER IN ALBERTA

A Visit to Quarter-Circle-One Ranch

By GERTRUDE E. SETON THOMPSON

ONE of the most marked tendencies of the age is a desire for a more simple mode of life—a longing to return to the soil and depend on herds of cattle and stores of golden grain for sustenance. During the past few years there have been written many books dealing with the work of farm and ranch, as well as the side issues of sheep-raising, bee culture, mushroom growing, and small fruit cultivation. Not only have textbooks appeared in response to the newly-arisen demand, but such well-known works as Maeterlinck's "Life of the Bee," "Elizabeth and Her German Garden," "The Fat of the Land," "The Garden of a Commuter's Wife," "Comrades Two," and "In English Gardens," have done much to keep alight the flame of country hunger. It is a wholesome development, and will mean much to the future race.

Western Canada has drawn followers of the simple life from every class in Great Britain, and surely no more interesting ingress ever took place than has been witnessed in Canada the last decade or two. Some day an historian will do justice to the picturesque march of Old World people to the vast granary of Western Canada, and light will be thrown on some of the colonies that, banded together, have taken up large holdings of land. The romance of the West would then be revealed, and many a dramatic incident recorded.

While the desire to own land comes with special temptation to the pale city clerk toiling on a mere pittance in a position of hopeless limitations, the idea of becoming a landowner on a large scale appeals very forcibly to those of a different environment—the upper classes of Great Britain, particularly younger sons, who, brought up on the family estate, yet inherit nothing, and are obliged to depend upon their own efforts. Many of this class have come to make a new home in Canada, leaving behind with little regret the old-world life.

Sometimes a large party of Old Country people arrive, and, together start the work of making homes. But more often a settlement is an affair of slower growth. One family goes to a certain locality, takes up land and prospers. Gradually one and then another family follow from the Old Land, attracted by the certainty of congenial associations, of the success their friends have met with, and above all the opportunity for a free, untrammelled life.

An interesting colony of this kind is centered around Alix, a village east of Lacombe, on the Lacombe-Stettler branch of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is about four years since this fertile and populous section was served with a railroad. Before then a thirty-mile drive was necessary whenever supplies were needed from Lacombe.

It is sixteen years since Mrs. Westhead, an English lady, in honor of whom Alix was named, arrived from the Old Land with the idea of becoming a rancher. The purchase of some land, and the homesteading of a quarter-section, led to her acquiring over two thousand acres. A picturesque site for a house was chosen, its mistress being the architect, and when completed the home was seen to fit into the surroundings uncommonly well. It is of two storeys and was first built of logs. These have now been covered with natural colored shingles, the upper part being elaborated with red and black shingles, making a picturesque effect. Being set on a hill, the house commands a superb view of a broad valley, dotted with trees, innumerable little lakes, and in the background a chain of hills.

The drawing-room to the right as one enters from the vine-shaded porch, is a source of surprise. One does not expect, for instance, to see a pianola on a ranch, nor exquisite old china against a background of mahogany. Heavy rafters of dark wood beam the ceiling, and the low casement windows opening on fine views have seats built in. Books are everywhere, and many are in foreign languages, for the lady of the ranch is an accomplished linguist. The dark polished floor is strewn with handsome skins, some brought from the jungles of India, and others gathered in a trip which Mrs. Westhead took with a party of friends to the Far North of Canada, almost to the Arctic Circle.

The mistress of Quarter-Circle-One-Ranch has acquired expert knowledge on all matters relating to farming, and takes a keen interest in the agricultural interests of the country. Among them the development of a government cold storage, whereby the perishable products of the farm, such as butter, eggs and meat, can be kept in good condition until they are exported to Old World markets or shipped East. This study of agricultural pursuits began in Ireland, when, on her husband's estate, she started a creamery, which is still being operated with great success.

Each horse on the ranch has its name. Mrs. Westhead's own driving team, Thekla and Mewassin, are well-matched dun ponies, which their mistress handles with easy familiarity and an amusing knowledge of their little peculiariteis.

There is a pretty fifty-acre sheet of water on the property called Tanglefoot Lake. A canoe and sailboat invite a voyage of exploration to the tiny island or wooded slopes, where the wild deer have their haunts. Indeed, this part of the country is bountifully blessed with lakes. Near by is Haunted Lake, a large sheet of water, on which border several fine ranches, among them that of Colonel Marryatt.

Life on such a ranch as Quarter-Circle-One never gets monotonous. To give an idea of a day spent there let us begin at rising time. The two large bedroom windows are wide open, fine wire netting preventing the ingress of the unpopular mosquito, but not interfering with the flow of lovely pure air. In the broad lap of the valley one counts seven little silvery lakes glimmering in the early sunshine, and the Alberta atmosphere being famed for its clearness, one has a view many miles distant before the eye scans the far-off horizon.

TRAIL FROM ALIX.

Breakfast is an informal meal that comes off any time between eight and nine, and sometimes is partaken of in a corner of the huge kitchen, where everything shines with cleanliness, and where bright copper utensils are arranged with attractive effect against a background of Dutch blue walls.

Breakfast over, we leave Jane, good, staunch Scotch Jane, to "redd up," and are off to the garden, where strawberries, lettuces, peas, beans—what not, await the gathering. Butter-making is down on the programme every alternate day, and Mrs. Westhead enjoys working a foot churn of barrel shape that swings at first slowly and leisurely, and then gradually goes faster and faster until it is in furious motion. Afterwards the butter is worked with wooden pats into a creamy mass, packed into deep earthenware crocks, and consigned to the depths of the cool cellar.

Butter-making, gathering fruit and flowers, the concoction of a dainty salad, perhaps, may easily occupy the time until luncheon is ready. Then what an appetite one brings to the nutty home-made bread, sweet golden butter, and home-grown vegetables. After luncheon, perhaps, a chat follows; then a siesta with book or magazine while Mrs. Westhead gives orders to her men and otherwise superintends the running of the ranch. Presently we are off for a long drive over the exquisite country to a neighboring ranch, to which we have received a telephone invitation to tea, all the ranchers being supplied with telephones.

As we return to Quarter-Circle-One ranch, we drive into the stable-yard below the house to see the horses. Sixty beautiful, glossy animals in all stages of development, from the frisky colt to the dignified sire, are in the corral, making a sight worth seeing. We watch one of the men cut out from the rest of the bunch a horse that has hurt his foot on a wire fence. It is quite exciting to watch the nervous stampede of the sixty odd animals round and round the corral, we standing in the centre—rather a trying ordeal to an outsider like myself. At last the gate is opened, and all except the captive are allowed to go free to their favorite range.

Alix boasts a flourishing polo club, where every Saturday afternoon during the season a good game is to be witnessed, the ladies gathering in great numbers from the neighboring ranches and taking turns in serving tea under the shade of the trees.

There is an annual autumn fair at Alix, of which a ploughing competition is an interesting feature, Mrs. Westhead yearly offering a prize to the runner of the straightest furrow in the shortest time.

Each Christmas Eve a flock of children from neighboring farms come to enjoy a tree decked by Mrs. Westhead and laden with gifts from her—the great event of the year to the little ones.

And so seasons come and go, each with its own particular delights. In the winter sleighing is greatly enjoyed by the ranchers, there being no great depth of snow, but just enough to cover the trails. Then this season also brings about many little dances and other entertainments.

As spring approaches, all becomes activity and bustle. Ploughs are made ready, grain sorted, plans laid and seedmen's catalogues consulted. Then comes the great business of seeding. It is in the early summer, however, that a visitor finds conditions most ideal. Then are the long, light nights. During June and part of July it is possible to read a newspaper without artificial light as late as half-past ten o'clock at night. The charm of the peaceful landscape full of grazing cattle, with many a lake, hill and intersecting trail, the lovely wild flowers, the fresh green of the trees, and above all the exquisite blue of the Alberta sky with its wonderfully pure and stimulating air, make the pleasures of city life fade into insignificance and oblivion.

Among the various settlements of Old Country people, that of the Alix district must be considered as one of the happiest and most delightful, with its beautiful and picturesquely situated homes, cultivated people and surroundings that have been beautified by the application of both taste and money—a most happy combination.

Mrs. Westhead's success as a rancher should prove encouraging to other women who, having some capital to invest and loving the outdoor life, feel a desire to launch into the wide sphere of farming or ranching.

THE SLUM DISEASE AND ITS CURE

What Can Be Done to Remove the Root of this Social Civic Menace

By JAMES ACTON

IN spite of the immense possibilities of the land the drift of population, even in a comparatively new country such as Canada, is steadily and ever towards the cities. Statistics show a regular diminution of rural and growth of urban population, with the result that, in the older parts of this country at least, within a few years the cities and towns will overbalance the country districts. The reason for this tendency is two-fold—the rising generation are inclined to leave what they consider the humdrum life of the farm, encouraged by perhaps faulty education and ideals, and the large immigration, notwithstanding the inducements offered for settlement upon the land, finds its way largely to the great centres of activity as most in accord with previous environment. Of the large number of foreigners coming to Canada a majority settle down in the cities to follow vocations or trades to which they have been accustomed and which yield the readiest means of subsistence and remuneration usually considerably beyond that to which they were accustomed to bring in the countries whence the immigrants came. This seems inevitable and can only be remedied in a degree by a vigorous effort on the part of the government to secure such immigration as will find its way to agricultural pursuits.

This large influx into the cities, especially of foreigners, whose habits of life are the product of the congestion of old world centres, creates a demand for cheap living which soon makes itself felt upon the community. Taking Toronto as an example, the foreign element was confined, until a little over ten years ago, to colonies so small and scattered that its influence was practically negligible, while to-day there are whole districts practically given over to Italians, Russians, Roumanians, Greeks, and other nationalities that maintain an existence almost as separate from the regular inhabitant as though the newcomers were in their various countries. The results are already being felt in many ways by the city, and the poorer classes of the English-speaking population are feeling the stress not only of competition in labor, but in housing and feeding.

Taking one district in Toronto as an illustration, the situation will be easily seen. What was known as St. John's Ward, now number three of the civic divisions, twenty years ago had a small colony of Italians, who were regarded more as curiosities than as a factor in the city's well-being. At that time the "Ward" was populated by mechanics and laborers, who, for the most part, occupied either their own dwellings or rented premises, and, while always regarded as one of the poorer districts of the city, one might traverse it from end to end without meeting anything that might be regarded as "slums." There was some poverty, but the means for reaching and alleviating distress were quite adequate, and the House of Industry board had a comparatively easy task. A little over fifteen years ago there came the advance guard of the "Hebrew Invasion." Quietly but steadily the arrivals acquired property in the "Ward," or began to rent houses at such rates that the land agents were startled, and rents went up enormously. Cottages that originally brought eight or ten dollars a month, within a short time more than doubled in price, being let and sublet in rooms to families, who were content with one room instead of four or five. The effects will be understood when it is stated that a widow with five children depending upon her had to move into two rooms, for which she had to pay two dollars more than she previously paid for the entire premises. Cases of this kind might be multiplied indefinitely, and while the conditions developed in this some time ago out of employment. Someone younger and stronger had been found to take his place at less wages. He, with his wife and three children, had lived comfortably in a cottage, for which they paid fifteen dollars a month. At first the wage earner thought it would only be a matter of a few days when he would secure another position, but the days and weeks sped by and there was "no work." They got behind in their rent, had to sell some of their effects and move into the "slum" district and occupy two rooms. This was not so bad, although five of them, father, mother, two girls and a boy had to sleep in one room, under obviously difficult and undesirable conditions. The two girls were able to earn a little at a downtown factory and the boy sold newspapers after school. The mother had to help, earning a day's pay now and then by washing and scrubbing, and they kept their heads above water until she at last went down with some physical trouble, which necessitated an operation, and there were medical as well as other expenses to be met. They managed, however, until the eldest girl met with a "misfortune" that took her from the home, and the family was fairly "up against it." The worst of all, however, was that the conditions under which they were compelled to live made of the man a shiftless, hopeless wanderer. He lost heart, ambition, and self-respect, so that in time he seemed not only willing but anxious for help that he would have scorned in his normal condition. Men who have been respectable and self-respecting are inevitably unmanned by this "slum" process, and, after living without the comfort, cleanliness and hopefulness of a real home, degenerate into mere animals. This man was spending his time loafing about places he would have shunned in his better days. Here lies the crux of the whole situation. It is the circumstances and conditions of slum life that do the deadly work, and thus the breeding of disease and death is by far the least dreadful result. Here was a man who learned to avoid this semblance of a home for the bar-room and had the love of his family replaced by a desire to pick up what he could for himself and live on his wife and family for what he needed.

Various remedies have been suggested and tried to meet the "slum," but most of them fail to touch the root of the matter. There is the "church slumming," which contents itself with street corner preaching and tract distribution, that is like offering a bunch of hay to a drowning man. "Convert them and they will soon improve their conditions" is the watchword of well meaning but unpractical religious enthusiasts. One out of a thousand may be pulled as "brands from the burning," but the other nine hundred and ninety-nine care less with regard to their immortal souls than where next week's rent is to come from. Then there is the "slum" faddist, usually a kind-hearted young woman, who visits the poor, and, while thinking she is doing a great deal of good is often doing much more harm to those she is trying to help. Some of the "slummers" who let themselves loose upon this problem do more to pauperize and destroy self-respect amongst those who but laugh at their kindness and take advantage of their generosity than poverty if left to do its own work. There are charitable organizations which practically perpetuate conditions which they seek to remove by indiscriminate and thoughtless help.

Then there is the community or settlement idea, which just now finds considerable favor. People take houses and dwell amongst the "submerged tenth," to show them how to live, opening kitchen gardens, girls' and boys' clubs; meanwhile the members going in and out of the homes of the district. No doubt some good is accomplished by these efforts as well as those which involve open-air excursions, manual training, rescue work and such agencies, which touch individual life, but workers engaged in such enterprises admit the tremendous discouragements and the apparently hopeless futility of ever reaching anywhere with the best of them combined. It is but touching the fringe of this great ocean of seething corruption.

"Back to the land" is the cry of those who see in this overcrowding of the cities a departure from Nature's plan, and they seek to deport those who are ready for almost anything to surroundings which are as unnatural and unwelcome as a vinegar bottle to a fly. All the efforts so far put forth to take people from the slums and transplant them to the land have been failures, because most of the plants so moved have been as foreign to their environment as a fish on land. If some of those inured to country life could be induced to go back whence they came, or if those contemplating leaving the country for the city could be induced to remain where they are much good might be accomplished, but one might as well put a farmer in the stock exchange as one of these city-bred dwellers in the tenements on a piece of land. That is why so much money and effort have been absolutely lost in seeking to reach a solution along this line. The process seems reasonable to the ordinary mind, but it fails to take into account human nature. A prominent philanthropist who recently tried the experiment and gave employment on his farm to a dozen heads of families, providing them with comfortable little cottages to house them, gave up in disgust. He could hardly get a decent day's work out of the men, and only a couple out of the dozen did anything with the plots of ground he gave them to cultivate for their own use.

* * *

THE solution of the slum problem lies in the proper sanitary and scientific housing of the city's people. We have laws, it is true, governing the amount of air space occupants of tenements should have, and the authorities refer to these with complacency when the question is raised. But these laws are not only flagrantly disregarded but are stupidly inadequate. It is useless to have laws the letter of which may be observed but the spirit persistently violated. In the city of Toronto, in the district just named, there are four and five families in houses that once gave shelter to but one. How can people live decently under such conditions? How can children be properly reared when they are denied not only the comforts but common privacy that ordinary decency demands? How can a man possibly be what he should be to the community and the state who is compelled to live like a beast, and whose very environment conspires to make him an enemy to society?

With wholesome, sanitary surroundings, which ought to be possible even at the price these people pay for squalor and infamous surroundings, it ought to be possible to secure comfort and decency. The solution is being reached in older cities, such as New York, Philadelphia, Boston, Chicago, and other places which find it not only desirable but profitable to fight the slum disease in a practical and scientific way. In New York there are to-day a number of modern tenement blocks that give people with small means a chance to live as comfortable, comparatively, as their more wealthy neighbors, and these enterprises which are of a business as well as philanthropic character pay dividends.

At the corner of Sixty-fourth Street and First Avenue is a building which covers a whole city block. It holds a population of about 4,000, enough to make a fairly large town. It contains 184 four-room apartments, renting from $4.65 to 5.5 a week, and 392 three-room apartments at from $3.65 to $4.15 a week, and 285 two-room apartments at $2.85 to $3.85. There are 861 apartments, and the prices include steam heat and hot water, with laundries and clothes drying rooms in basements; baths, clothes lines on the roofs, children's play-room in basement, elevator service for garbage, and other conveniences. There is not a dark room in the building, and the apartments, of course, are sanitary and durable throughout. Imagine two nice clean healthy rooms in a city like New York, with all conveniences and no water or fuel to pay for, at about ten dollars a month; and the company pays a dividend, it is claimed, of five per cent. on the investment. That block alone ought to be worth hundreds of thousands of dollars to the city in the saving of disease and crime. It is claimed that the death rate was only 4.5 per thousand last year against probably four times that amount in the ordinary tenement district.

In a city like Toronto or Montreal, with the correspondingly low value of land and cost of building it ought to be possible to erect tenements such as to almost cut the New York rentals in two. What a boon it would mean to many of these people to obtain two rooms for $7.50 a month or four for $12.50, with heating, water, and other comforts to make home what it should be. Our Canadian cities are expending almost limitless sums upon filtration and sewerage schemes to cut down the typhoid rate a few per thousand; why not give some consideration to the possibilities of diminishing the general death rate, and especially that of the slum districts, by sanitary housing? It should pay any city to offer a reduction in rates to any private individual or corporation erecting tenements similar to those of New York city, where the rentals are on a basis of not more than a four per cent. dividend.

All other methods of reaching the slum problem are frivolous and ineffectual. Within the next ten or twenty years the energies of economists will be steadily directed along such practical lines as have been indicated to reach the root of an evil that is sapping the very foundations of civic and national life. In the meantime are there not men of means amongst us who will turn aside from their money making and from some of their haphazard methods of philanthropy and take up this question of supplying the very poor with decent housing, and thus help build up a sturdy citizenship? In Toronto building permits have been issued this spring to the extent of $25,000,000, and Montreal and other cities are "going ahead." In all these developments there is scarcely an effort to meet the requirements of the underworld for habitations providing comforts and conveniences at a price within its reach. While magnificent office buildings, factories and private dwellings go up in abundance, the slum dweller may well say, "No man cares for my soul."

A HONEYMOON IN HIDING

The Fascinating Adventures of a Romantic Honeymoon

By MRS. GEORGE DE HORNE VAIZEY

GWEN sniffed, and wiped her eyes with an infinitesimal handkerchief. To a certain extent she allowed herself to be propitiated by her husband's blandishments, but it was evident that a grievance still lingered. Dr. Hilbert was perfectly conscious of the nature of that grievance, and, smiling, awaited the moment when it would be put into words.

"Did you ever—were you really—is it true that you were ever—"

"Marked? By all the gods of heathen mythology, Gwendoline, my wife, I was not. Whatever may be the attitude the most diametrically opposed to 'marked,' that attitude was mine. And she showed me 'gently but firmly,' oh, lor! That Scotch fellow was all out of it when he wanted to see himself as ithers see him. If I had the chance to-morrow of hearing how my best pals talked of me behind my back, I'd run like a hare!"

"All people are not like some people. I'd scorn to say a word against a human creature, however—however hatefully they treated me."

Pat swallowed several times in silence, his screwed-up face eloquently expressive above his wife's reclining head. Then he said tactfully:

"But you, of course, my darling, are unlike everyone else. I say! This has been a bit of a nerve-shaking experience. I need calming down. Let's have some tea."

CHAPTER V.

SUNDAY! A Sunday in town is apt to be a somewhat dreary occasion to those who have no regular interests or pursuits, or who for any reason are temporarily debarred from the same.

Dr. Patrick Hilbert, standing with his hands in his pockets, staring through the shrouded windows of the Den, on the first Sunday morning after his marriage, was conscious of an acute pang of regret at the remembrance of the lost fifty pounds. Ah! that this bright spring day had found himself and his bride in some peaceful country retreat, instead of being mewed up in a dull town house, unable to draw back the very curtains for fear of detection. He stifled a sigh, and turned towards his wife.

"Gwen! Have you any plans for to-day?"

"We are going to church."

"Are we? H'm!"

"Pat! How can you? Of course we are. It's the first Sunday we have had together. We should be ungrateful if we didn't go, and—"

"Right you are, little dear. So we will. Question is, where?"

"We shall have to think. There are lots of places I have wished to go to 'some day,' and they would all be interesting."

"Such as?"

"Oh-h, the Oratory, the City Temple, and the Guards' Chapel—and the Christian Science place in Baker Street—and Southwark Cathedral, and the headquarters of the Salvation Army, and—"

"Great Cæsar's ghost!" Pat fairly gasped with amazement. "Talk of 'fancy religions!' No one can accuse you of being a narrow-minded young woman. Do you propose to take them all at a dose, or to extend the programme over a couple of Sundays? I'm the meekest and most amenable of men, but I tell you plainly, I'm off. I've an idea of my own for once, and I'll back it to be the better of the two. The question is, given congenial society, as many rests as you like, and meals at due intervals—how many miles could you walk in a day?"

"H'm," Gwen meditated. "How many miles does one walk in an hour?"

"Say three. Three would be about your figure, I should think."

"Then I could manage twelve. Two hours in the morning, and two in the afternoon, with rests at lunch and tea. Could we have lunch and tea?"

"Certainly. I'll promise you that, and we'll keep well within the dozen miles. That's fine. I've a ripping little book upstairs, which gave me some fine country walks last year, a guide-book of rambles round London by field path and hedgerow—so that one can practically walk the whole day without striking a high road. We'll get off early, train to the starting point, laze along through the fields, get lunch at one nice little 'pub,' tea at another, and bring up about six o'clock at a country church, enjoy the service, and train home to supper. How does that strike you for a programme?"

Gwen acclaimed the suggestion with her wonted enthusiasm, whereupon the guide-book was taken from Pat's bureau, and its contents searched for the most attractive expedition. On almost every page the most alluring descriptions attracted the eye, as for instance: "The present ramble introduces the visitor to a variety of scenes. At one time, he saunters along a riverside, at another, he wanders over a breezy common, or through quaint half-forgotten villages," or again, "The church dates from the fourteenth century; note a stile on the left, cross it and enter the Park. Through four fields the right-hand hedge is followed, then cross a second stile, and continue by the side of the ornamental water. Now turn up the hill to the left, from the summit of which an extensive view," etc., etc., etc.

With such careful directions as these to guide one's footsteps—with, moreover, instructions as to the various hostels en route, and thoughtful information as to Sunday trains, no one need go astray, and it was a very bright and happy couple of ramblers who alighted at the quiet station of K— on that sunny spring morning.

"Gwen acclaimed the suggestion."

During the course of the next few hours the flowery language of the guide-book was abundantly verified; the trees appeared in their "leafy green," the grass was "studded with gem-like flowers," "feathered choristers warbled overhead," and the swans "floated proudly over the surface of the still lake," as duly therein advertised. There also appeared the "snug hostel" at the identical moment when the question of lunch had assumed paramount importance, and the honeymoon couple were shown into a dim, low room of the type well known to wanderers through rural England. Oil-clothed floor, horsehair furniture, portraits of Queen Victoria over the sideboard, and Edward VII. above the mantelpiece, windows shrouded with Nottingham lace curtains, and banked high with fuchsias and geraniums. Atmosphere chill, and—"What does it smell like?" queried the bride, wrinkling her little nose in eloquent disapproval.

"Musty!"

"Silly! Of course it's musty. There are lots of musties. What's it like—this particular must?"

"Sure I can't say!"

Gwen sniffed again, inflating her nostrils in critical fashion.

"It's like old bound volumes of the Sunday at Home. We had rows of them at home in the schoolroom, and I know the smell by heart. It wafts me back to my youth, but we did have the windows open. Ring the bell, Pat, do. I'm ravenous."

A smiling landlady appeared at the summons of that bell, and the same discussion took place concerning the forthcoming meal which has taken place in English village inns since the Flood, and will in all probability continue until the last trump.

Visitors: "What can we have?"

Landlady: "Anything, sir; anything you fancy."

"Any soup?"

"No soup to-day, sir; no call for soup on Sundays."

"Any fish?"

"No fish to-day, sir. Awkward place to buy fish. Only three times a week, but anything you wish in joints. What would the lady—"

Lady (promptly): "Roast chicken."

Landlady (pauses, hesitates, then with brilliant amiability): "We have chickens, of course, five chickens; plenty of chickens. I could kill one and cook it at once, if you wouldn't mind waiting, say an hour and an narf!"

The ramblers, explaining that they would seriously mind waiting any period over five minutes, resigned themselves stolidly to the meal of ages. Hot joint and vegetables (boiled potatoes and watery cabbage). Cold joint and salad (plain, undressed lettuce). Apple pie, with a pale and solid crust, and a jug of admirable, yellow cream. Strong-smelling, strong-tasting cheese, and delicious bread and butter. Good home-brewed ale; coffee, well-mixed with grounds.

Not a tempting menu, perhaps, but, given youth and good appetite, worse meals than this can be eaten with relish. Pat and Gwen made a hearty meal, and continued on their way powerfully refreshed.

The afternoon ramble through peaceful and pretty country presented no unusual features; another hotel supplied tea (embellished with radishes and spring onions), and shortly after five o'clock the lovers arrived at the village where they proposed to attend evening service, before repairing to a station two miles off to catch the nine o'clock train to town.

The spurt given by the refreshing cup of tea had sped them so rapidly on their way that they found themselves arrived at their destination a good hour sooner than they had intended, and the question arose how to occupy the superfluous time. According to regrettable English fashion the church was closed; it was a fine old pile of rough, grey stone, and promised an interesting interior, so that the fact was the more to be regretted, and the rectory was a stately mansion, approached by tall, iron gates and surrounded by beautiful and extensive grounds. The grounds were in apple-pie order, the house itself presented an air of sleek prosperity. Evidently this was one of the "fat" livings, where in return for spiritual services rendered to a handful of villagers, an incumbent received a stipend running well into four figures.

Dr. Patrick Hilbert had several scathing remarks to make on the good fortune of clerics as he peered through the gate at the velvety lawn, the massed borders of bulbs, the glimpse of glasshouses in the distance. Then, at Gwen's suggestion, they turned down a narrow lane which bent a circular course round the village.

"There might be a little place to let, which would just suit us for a week-end cottage!" she suggested hopefully.

Somewhat to Pat's relief, no cottage, large or small, appeared to be vacant. It was a prosperous looking little village, and the gardening display was unusually attractive. Right at the end of the lane stood a small, white house, a degree superior to a cottage, and surrounded by a thick, well kept, laurel hedge. On the principle that that which is hidden is always more alluring than that which lies unconcealed, our honeymoon couple made strenuous efforts to peer through this encircling screen. Pat stood a-tip-toe, Gwen stooped low to find an open space about the roots; they paced the whole length of the fence, and made scathing remarks on the wooden gate, and having denounced the selfishness of the owner in good round terms were about to turn away, when a head rose suddenly above the level of the hedge, and a voice politely bid them enter.

It was a grey head, belonging to an old man clad in a long linen coat, and carrying a weeding spud in his hand. A basket piled high with weeds lay on the grass by his side, and he pointed to it with an air of pride.

"Not bad for an hour's work. It's hard to keep pace with the weeds on this soil. No, no. Charmed, I assure you; charmed. It's not often that I have the pleasure of showing visitors round my garden. I do all my own work, so it's only fair that I should have a little praise sometimes. Quite a little patch, but a fair amount of bloom. Do you know anything about bulbs?"

"Not very much. We are both city bred. My wife and I trained down to K— and have walked over by way of field paths. We want to go to the evening service here, and are just putting in the time before the church opens. Awfully kind of you to show us round. Daffodils, aren't they. Awfully keen on daffodils. So fresh and yellow," protested Pat amiably, whereupon his host's face lit up with a smile.

"Narcissi," he corrected quietly. "Yes; they are an interesting class. I have several new varieties." He looked from one to the other of his visitors with an inquiring gaze, then sighed with an amiable regret. These were not gardeners; they were ignorant ordinary people who were "fond of flowers"; solitary specimens would not thrill them; rare cuttings struggling into life among the saxifrages in the rockery would leave them cold and untouched; the obvious facts, color and fragrance, were all that they desired. It was a disappointment, but with a quick mental change he shifted his interest from his own flowers to his visitors themselves; the tall, clever-looking man, the pretty, bright-faced girl. His tired old eyes dwelt on their faces with a kindly curiosity, and brightened in understanding. As the three made the leisurely round of the garden he picked a few specimen blossoms from every bed, and when the short circuit was concluded and they sat down to rest beneath an arbor of green, he laid the little bunch gently in Gwen's lap.

"With my good wishes for a long life together, my dear. I think—am I not right?—that you are quite new partners."

The lovers blushed. Gwen's lids drooped over the flowers.

"Thank you so much. Yes. It is our first Sunday."

"Ah-h!" The old man's voice was eloquent. "That's good, that's very good. I'll tell you something that is better still."

Gwen's eyes were lifted at that, in quick, incredulous surprise.

"What!"

"To be old partners, trusted and tried, after a lifetime spent together. I've been married forty years and my wife is my sweetheart still. That's what you have to aim at, my dear—to be your husband's sweetheart to the end. Don't ask me how it's done. I can't tell you. That's my wife's secret. Perhaps even she couldn't explain. It's a quality more than an effort, a 'way' some women have with them. I should say, however, I should diagnose," the tired eyes twinkled again, "that you possessed your full share of that quality!"

He looked at the young husband, and Pat looked back at him, a deep, eloquent glance, but he spoke no word. Gwen's heart chanted a little song to itself. "Oh, how happy I am! How happy I am!"

There was a moment's pause, then, being English and terribly afraid of being betrayed into sentiment in public, the bridegroom made haste to change the subject.

"We tried to get into the church, but it was shut. It's a fine old building. I should like to see the interior. An old living, I suppose. A fat one too, by the look of the vicarage. Quite an imposing looking house, and fine grounds. Parsons are lucky fellows to have such jolly places to live in. In almost every village their houses are the biggest and most attractive. Quite mansions, in some cases."

"That is so. Many of the parsons, however, sublet them to others because they can't afford to live in them themselves, now that their income has shrunk to a fraction of what it used to be. A fine house is little use without the money to keep it up."

"H'm!" Pat's voice was politely incredulous. "What sort of a fellow have you here?"

"Well-meaning. Industrious. Not at all brilliant."

"Ah, there are too many of that kind. It's the well-meaning bores who are responsible for half the empty churches. There's no spirit in them—no life—no inspiration. How can they expect to inspire their congregations?"

"Well, well, we mustn't be too hard. They don't expect enough, perhaps, and that's why they fail. And the congregations don't expect enough, either, and that's why they're bored. Wouldn't you find it hard to preach to a congregation of yawning, restless folk who take out their watches before the text is half spoken? Better preaching, yes, it's badly needed, but better listening, too, better listeners."

"Well, your vicar will have two good listeners to-night, at least. I shall listen as I have never listened to a sermon before. I shall remember it all my life. I wish he knew. Perhaps it would help him."

"I'm sure it would. I'm sure it would." The old man looked at the young girl with a gentle smile. He was old and lined, his beard and hair looked shaggy and untrimmed, the linen coat was fraked at the seams, and his boots showed a conspicuous patch, but Gwen thought his face one of the sweetest she had ever seen.

"Well," he said, rising heavily from his seat, "there go the bells. If you will wait one moment while I wash my hands and get into my coat, I'll take you into the church, and you will have time to have a peep at the brasses. It's an interesting old church, as you say, and I'm proud to show it. You see," he glanced whimsically towards Pat, "I'm the opulent parson."

CHAPTER VI.

DURING the following week the honeymooners increased their knowledge of London by visits to many places not only unfashionable, but vagrant in character. Probably ninety-nine out of every hundred occupants of the great metropolis have at some period of their history uttered the aspiration, "I must really go to Covent Garden some morning!" but not even the remaining one out of the hundred has really accomplished the expedition. That miracle of beauty, of fragrance, fresh as the dawn itself, is on exhibition every working-day of the year, yet the surrounding millions doze on in stuffy rooms and die content, never having beheld it. Not one person in a hundred, or even a thousand, has even uttered the aspiration to visit the Sunday morning market in Petticoat Lane, yet if they did, of a surety it would provide an excursion, which for novelty, amusement and picturesue effects would be hard to equal in the luxurious west.

Our lovers made both these excursions, stepping out of their narrow doorway in the early morning light, the bride alert, the bridegroom yawning, and walking unafraid, along the shrouded streets, secure as in a city of the dead.

One Friday morning, also, they visited the Holloway cattle market, and lest the fastidious reader be horrified by the grossness of their taste, let it be hurriedly explained that the great square is on those occasions a mart not for beasts, but for a medley of dry goods, laid out in tempting array on the ground itself. The word "tempting" is used advisedly, for be it known that in time not so far distant this same cattle market was the happy hunting-ground of every curio-dealer in London, and many a treasure which was afterwards displayed in aristocratic shop windows had lain a week before in all humility on the ground floor stall of a Hebrew vendor in the north. At the present moment, this same vendor is regretably educated to the value of antiques, but the astute buyer may still pass a happy hour wandering about the picturesque scene, and pick up a dozen thrilling bargains of household value. Wall papers of patterns of a previous year are here offered for a penny a piece; handsome papers, too, some of them, so handsome that our lovers, beholding them, figuratively gnashed their teeth at the remembrance of the prices which they themselves had paid for those other papers, not one whit better, which were at that moment embellishing their own walls. There also, in abundance, are to be found dear old brass candlesticks, such as adorned the mantelpieces of our sires; dainty bits of pewter, and china, and shaky old furniture, which a clever craftsman can soon revive into fresh life. The cattle market on Friday mornings is still a Mecca to that large body of the faithful who possess aspirations in advance of their purses.

But when spring is in the blood, the odor of spring in the air, there are times when even to a honeymoon couple the city palls, and that is the moment for discovering the wealth of beauty lying perdu in the suburbs, generously open to all and sundry. One does not speak of the many woods and gardens for which a key is necessary, purchasable for an infinitesimal guinea a year. There are many such, thank God—real woods; sweet, dim groves of scenery, with dainty wild flowers rearing their heads among the luxurious undergrowth; peaceful retreats where tired workers may lie at ease in rare holiday hours, and town-bred children taste the joys of the soil while a few hundred yards away the motor-buses whirl through the dull suburban street, and naught but the sky remains of the wondrous natural world. And when one sees on the margin of such oases, the encroaching boards, "Freehold land to be sold for the erection of houses," it's oh, for the wealth of a Carnegie to conserve for ever to our people a boon so priceless for health, and happiness, and education.

But the freelands of London, how rich they are, how beautiful, how varied. Wimbledon Common, with its wide and breezy stretches; Epping Forest, with its grand old trees, its badgers, its heronry; its herd of deer, famous as being the only remaining herd of the famous old English black-backed type. What though the wide central road be black with trippers—a short excursion to right or left will ensure silence and seclusion from the madding crowd. Greenwich Park, also, well deserves a visit, with its observatory, and its charming view over the horseshoe sweep of the Thames; for those who would not go so far afield, there is Hampstead Heath; for three days a year the joyful rendezvous of the people; for the other three hundred and sixty-two, peaceful and lovely, with wooded slopes, and sheltered dells, with winding paths, among the golden gorse, and flowering bushes bowing low to the surface of the pools. The West End Londoner never visits Hampstead Heath, yet its beauties would evoke high praise if he met them a hundred miles away. After an hour spent on the Heath, a surprisingly good two-and-sixpenny dinner can be enjoyed at "Jack Straw's Castle," and if there be another hour to spare, why not turn downhill in the direction of that other hostel famed in popular verse as "The Old Bull and Bush," and almost opposite its threshold find the entrance to "Golder's Hill," the beautiful estate bequeathed to the nation by its late owner, Sir Spencer Wells.

Our lovers spent the happiest of days in this charming retreat; a retreat verily, for, with the exception of Saturdays and Sundays, there is no crowd of visitors. They were enchanted with the beauty of the old walled garden, with its wide, herbaceous borders; its blaze of spring bulbs; promised themselves to come again when the great rose arbors should be covered with bloom, and decided that their own castle in Spain should also possess a Shakespeare bed, containing every plant or scrub mentioned in the great poet's works. When they were finished with the gardens, a pleasant meal served in the old mansion, now converted into a restaurant, supplied the necessary rest and refreshment, before they set forth again to wander over the green sloping park.

How good to think that all this beauty and greenery is London's own. That, at the cost of a few pence for conveyance, the occupants of grim, crowded lanes can be transported here to see the face of God in His creation. And blessed be the memory of all good men who have so enriched their kind.

In their wanderings about the suburbs there was one occupation which never failed to thrill our bride, and at the same time to reduce her husband to a condition of abject boredom and amaze, and this was the survey of unoccupied houses. To pass by a house to let, of any attractiveness whatever, which bore upon the placard the tempting words "Caretaker within," was a feat practically beyond Mrs. Pat Hilbert's endurance. Over that house she raced from attic to cellar, exclaiming with joy at each fresh excellence, and groaning over the drawbacks, as if here and nowhere else she were fated to live and die.

"If only a window could be knocked out in the side wall to let a little more light into the dining-room, it would really be perfect!" she would say meditatively. "Pat—how much should you think it would cost to put in a good-sized bay?"

"My dear, good girl, I haven't the least idea," her husband would patiently reply. "What does it matter? We've got our own house. It's nothing to us if the dining-room is dark!"

"No," Gwen would assent meekly. "But still—" and half-an-hour later, with an air of sudden triumph, she would exclaim, "I have it! I have it! Widen the door into the dining-room, and put in glass panels in criss-cross suares. It would be far cheaper, and let in all the afternoon sun. Now, if only we could plan a dressing-room for you!"

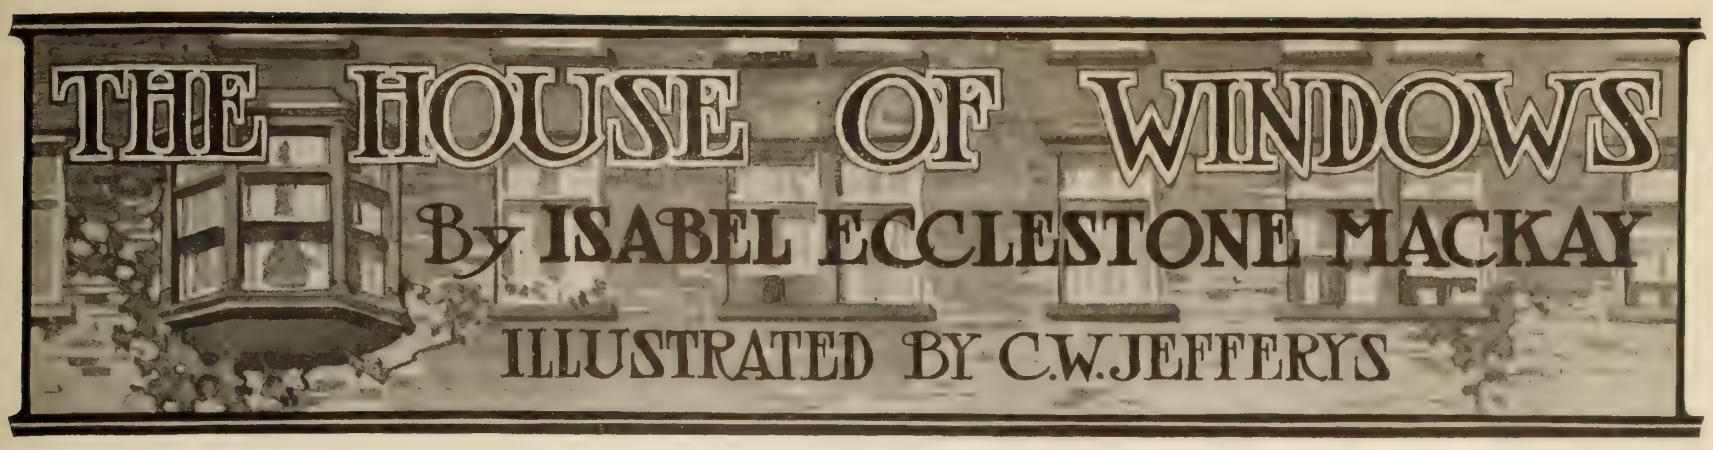
The mysterious flights of the feminine mind are a puzzle to all young husbands, and Pat Hilbert marvelled with the best. He was a straight, hard-working fellow, with a determination to play the game, and a cheery content with his lot in life, which he took "as it came" in practical, common-sense fashion. Flights of imagination were not in his line; but Gwen, it would seem, was continually soaring aloft on the wings of her Pegasus. It was one of her favorite amusements to imagine herself suddenly possessed of a fortune of several millions sterling, and she would make pencilled sums on the margins of newspapers to ascertain the yearly income to be derived therefrom; apportion its expenditure, and give detailed descriptions of the furnishings of the various mansions, and of her own costume when presented at Court. On other occasions she would be more modest, and acknowledging the improbability of so large a legacy, content herself with weaving touching little histories in which she herself figured as heroine, and by her sweet qualities attracted the attention of a millionaire in disguise. A particularly happy effect pictured him as a shabby old man in an omnibus afflicted with a sudden hæmorrhage of the nose, aggravated by the absence of a handkerchief to stem the flood. Then while other callous passengers sniggered and stared, she would hastily hand over her mouchoir, and offer him an arm to assist him to alight.

"Madam," he would declare, "you, at least, have a true woman's heart!" and a few months later a lawyer's letter would bring the intelligence that he had died a peaceful and happy death, bequeathing a neat twenty thousand to his "humane benefactress."

"Then!" said Gwen triumphantly, "we'd panel the dining-room, and buy a motor car!"

These and other diverting day-dreams served to pass away many an hour, but if ever there were periods when the "deadly ennui" seemed within imaginable distance to our Lovers in Hiding, they were those long, chill hours when the rain poured and they were compelled to warm themselves by the warmth of a Beatrice stove, and to find amusement in a house furnished only with solid essentials. Gwen Hilbert was too clever and resourceful a creature to allow her husband to yawn away a whole afternoon, re-reading a newspaper, and standing with his hands in his pockets, staring through the window curtains. Willy-nilly, she dragged him out, knowing full well that after a few hours' absence he would return with zest, and rejoice in the comfort of the cosy little room. West End matinees and exhibitions were necessarily de-

Continued on page 34



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada.

THEN, using her fingers for memory posts, she began with admirable patience to sort the knowledge she had gained in so reprehensible a manner. It ran something like this: There was very little money. Money had been lost somehow, with the result that her schooling expenses would prove a serious drain, if not an impossibility. There had been something said about her going into a shop and both her sisters wept at the prospect. (Query, why? Celia worked in a shop.) She had gathered that in any case she was not to be consulted or allowed to aid. (This indignity alone absolved her conscience in the matter of listening.) Something had been said about Tommy Burns helping, but from Celia's voice, Christine gathered that this was out of the question. (Her quick intuition immediately showed her a possible reason for Celia's objection.) So far, all was plain enough, but the rest was mystery. Celia had said something about bringing her, Christine, home. (Query, where had she been? It did not sound like a home coming from an ordinary visit), and a letter had been mentioned, an "awful letter." What could that mean? There was certainly mystery there. Never, since she had been old enough to take any interest in the affairs of the little household, had there been any awful letter. Perhaps it was that Celia had received to-night from Mr. Banks? She sighed impatiently. It was really too bad of the girls to exclude her from a possible family secret. Secrets are such interesting things! She had not been able to hear what Celia had confided to Ada between sobs and the part of Ada's answer which had penetrated to her ears was consoling but not enlightening. All she could gather was a general idea that her sisters were much concerned that she should have her "chance." (Query, why should they worry so about it? Because she was the youngest? That seemed to be the only possible explanation.) With her pretty brows drawn into a frown, Christine sat there in the moonlight which flooded the davenport bed and thought it all out. She was a girl of quick decisions, and, as she thought, her pretty lips grew firm and her eyes more determined. She looked anything but sleepy. Indeed, both Ada and Celia were peacefully dreaming before Christine slipped under the covers with a mind made up. "It's about time they found out," she murmured, "that this family performs best as a trio and not as a duet!"

CHAPTER VIII.

NEXT morning the sisters breakfasted cheerfully. The unburdening of her heart had done Celia so much good that she was more like herself than she had been for some weeks. Ada, whose inner peace no trouble seemed able to disturb for long, was as serene as usual, and Christine was so gay that it would have been a gloomy nature indeed which would have refused to respond to her bright spirits. Nevertheless, when the dishes were put away and Celia had gone to the Stores, Christine informed Ada that she felt the need of a long walk. "And I am not going to ask you to come with me, dearest," she added, laughingly, "because I am going to walk fast and furious."

Ada smiled. She was used to these sudden whims.

"In fact," went on Christine, pinning her best grey hat over her bright hair, "I am going to take a holiday and I may not even be home for lunch. It would be fun, wouldn't it, to surprise Celia, and have lunch with her?"

Ada colored faintly. "Celia took her lunch with her this morning," she said. "One gets so tired of having it down town."

"Does one?" asked Christine, innocently. "I hate a cold lunch myself. Well, if I don't come home you are not to worry. I haven't many more days now before going back to school." This last was said with a touch of girlish malice, in revenge for being treated as a baby and excluded from family counsels. But the quick sadness in Ada's face brought swift remorse and Christine had hard work to keep herself from blurting out her secret then and there. That would have spoiled everything. She must not speak too soon. Half of the flavor of the enterprise she had decided upon during the night was in the grand surprise which its success was to be to these two unappreciative sisters. For her idea was at once to show them how short-sighted their conduct had been, and, by a grand coupe, to place the family fortunes once more upon an easy basis.

The grand coupe, as planned, was something in the fairy-god-mother line, with coals of fire added. Christine would go out for an inconsequent stroll and would return the proud possessor of a "position," with adequate salary attached—in other words, she would have become a bread-winner.

Exactly how this was to come to pass she did not know, but there is none so hopeful as those for whose ignorance difficulties do not exist. Christine was very young, quite inexperienced and ready to believe that the whole world was her oyster. The opening of the oyster ought not to prove a difficult task. Already she had thought of one promising means and that was the advertising sheet of the daily paper. At breakfast, under cover of reading the City news, she had picked out of a long list three desirable positions, any one of which seemed especially intended for her.

Standing on the door-step she carefully slipped the first clipping from her glove and read it with renewed appreciation.

WANTED—A young person of good address and pleasing voice to read aloud to invalid lady, three hours daily. Generous remuneration to right person.

Could anything be more apropos? Christine felt no doubt as to being the right person. She was not quite sure what good address might mean, but she glanced down over her trim blue skirt, white blouse, and neat shoes, with an innocent air of full approval. Her voice she knew was pleasing. Tommy had often told her so and more than one of her collegiate friends had remarked upon it. It was soft and low, that most excellent thing in woman, and ought to be exactly what the invalid lady was looking for. Three hours reading would, she felt sure, be just so much pleasure! Better than all there was to be "generous remuneration." Christine rather let her imagination run riot in this direction. 'Generous' means many different things, but to Christine's hopeful mind it meant everything.

"Sure, 'tis a foine day again, Miss Christine," said the cheerful janitress in passing. Then with warm admiration, "And it's foine you're lookin' yourself!"

Christine slipped the clipping into her glove with an embarrassed air.

"Really, Mrs. Halloren? Do I look nice? Is my skirt straight? I want to look particularly nice today."

Mrs. Halloren put down her pail for a better look.

"It's perfect ye are," she declared. "If ye were me own daughter I couldn't wish ye to look foiner."

Christine smiled with pleasure. She saw nothing incongruous in the remark, and the tone of the compliment was unmistakably sincere. Christine was innocently pleased with her own good looks, but as yet quite unconscious of anything singular in her beauty. The loveliness of youth is a fairy thing, as illusive as sunlight on water, as potent as wine, and Christine had in full measure the charm and glory of it. Her hazel eyes, dark grey in certain lights, were set rather widely apart under delicate brows. Her nose was straight and fine, her lips curving and faintly red—the only trace of color in the warm paleness of her face; add to this a sweetly rounded chin and a glory of hair, honey-colored and sweeping back on either side of her brow in heavy shining rolls, and you have a description of Christine's beauty; but not its essence. One had to see her, to know her, but having seen, one was not likely to forget. Already Tommy Burns had noticed with somewhat proud annoyance that Christine was apt to be stared at upon the street. He had a special scowl for anyone who dared it, a terrific scowl, and lately he had worn it so often that Christine had declared that she would not go walking with Tommy if he looked so cross.

This morning, Tommy being absent, anyone might stare to their heart's content. Christine herself would never notice it, or if she did she would not have thought to ascribe the admiring glances to a personal cause. She floated down the streets of the city, happily dreaming, a vision of spring in autumn. And so far from self-consciousness was she that when a young man stepped quickly from a motor car and allowed an involuntary "By Jove!" to escape him, Christine thought that he had dropped something, and turned with a child's interested eagerness to see if he picked it up. In doing so she had a momentary impression of dark eyes in a strong face, oddly flushed; then, passing on, she forget all about him.

The young man, however, seemed not to have dropped anything. For a moment or so he stood on the pavement looking after her, a curiously arrested espression upon his face. Then, with an air of quick decision, he re-entered the car, ordering the chauffeur to go ahead, slowly. The man did not attempt to hide his surprise at the order and even ventured a protest. "This here is the address you gave me, sir," he said. "The Van Slykes live in here."

"I know—go ahead—and slowly."

The big car went on. It passed Christine again just as she turned in at the address of the invalid lady, a few blocks farther down the avenue. Christine did not notice it. Her mind was quite occupied with admiring the home where in future she hoped to spend three hours a day reading for a generous remuneration. It was a handsome place of grey stone, of no particular beauty, yet imposing and withal comfortable.

"By Jove," murmured the young man again. "It's Aunt Miriam's! she's going in—what luck." But having the wisdom of the serpent he did not at once follow her.

Christine rang the bell. She was not exactly frightened, her inexperience pictured nothing but courtesy behind that handsome door. To the maid who opened it she said that she would like to see Miss ——she remembered that she did not know the name.

"Miss Torrance sees no one in the morning."

"Oh, is she worse? I thought the advertisement said to call in the morning."

The maid's face changed perceptibly. The deference faded out of it. "Side entrance," she said, abruptly, and closed the door.

Christine colored faintly. She thought the maid rude. However, she went at once to the side entrance and rang again. Another maid opened the door and looked at her with undisguised surprise. Christine again asked if she might see Miss Torrance, and added that she was answering the advertisement in the paper.

"Miss Torrance will see you, I think," said the girl. "You're the sixth this morning, but she isn't suited yet. You'll have to wait." She led the way up a flight of stairs and into a small room at the end of a corridor. "I'll tell you when she's ready." She added and went out.

Christine's spirits began to sink. The room in which she sat was plain and gloomy—not what one might expect from the appearance of the house at all. It struck her that it must be a special room for tradesmen or servants. It had never before occurred to her that in applying for this place she had forfeited some of the rights of caste. Social distinctions had troubled Christine as little as they trouble most sensible Canadian girls. She had thought as little about her position as a duchess might; now for the first time she felt troubled and uneasy. Some of the first fine flavor of her adventure was evaporating. She sat on pins and needles, flushing and paling, while three maids came down the corridor upon various pretexts, each one managing to indulge in a long stare at the new applicant. She could hear them giggling together afterwards, and her whole body grew hot. It was a great relief when word came that Miss Torrance was ready for her.

"The mistress will see you now," said the English maid, who had let her in. Christine arose with alacrity, but even as she did so a bell rang sharply and the maid gave an indignant exclamation. "There she is again!" she said. "You'd better wait till I see what it is. She never knows her own mind from one moment to another There's the door bell, too!"

Christine resumed her chair with a sigh. There was more ringing. The saucy maids were sent flying in different directions and then the door opened downstairs and Christine heard a man's pleasant voice in the hall. The English girl poked her head in at the door and whispered, "A visitor—you'll have to wait."

The visitor was evidently at home in the house for he came up the stairs two steps at a time. Christine saw him pass the end of the corridor and, after knocking lightly, enter the room where the maid had disappeared.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Christine, "He is sure to stay for ages!" And she felt an impulse of dislike toward the young man with the pleasant voice.

Meanwhile, in the other room, Miss Torrance surveyed the intruder with unaffected surprise.

"You—Mark!" she exclaimed, offering a frigid hand. "Is anyone dead? Of course someone is dead. Martha hand me my salts! Don't try to break it to me, please!"

The young man shook her cold hand heartily, and not content with that, kissed her soundly in continental fashion.

"Bless the boy! Don't you know that I'm an invalid. Who is dead?"

"Lots of people, Auntie. But no one we know. Can't a prodigal nephew call upon his onlyest Aunt without being mistaken for an undertaker?"

The onlyest Aunt surveyed the prodigal nephew searchingly through her glasses.

"Hum! Well. So you came to see me, did you.

I have my doubts. You have been in the city for a whole week."

"Yes, by Jove, I have ! How the days fly. Well, isn't it time I came to see you ?"

"If you had wanted to come."

"I should have come sooner. Naturally, and I would have come sooner, only I couldn't, you see. The governor has just kept me on the dead tear. It's been awful ! Fact."

"Was part of the dead tear dancing attendance on Alice Van Slyke ?" politely.

"Why, yes. You know—don't you ?"

This enigmatic phrase seemed so full of hidden meaning that the old lady could not, for pride's sake, repudiate the knowledge. She nodded sagely. "Ah, that ! Well, Alice Van Slyke is a fine girl."

"Yes. Bully !" absently. Mark's dark eyes had already searched every corner of the room in vain. "Yes, she is a very fine girl. She says she comes over to see you often. Old people get so lonely !"

"Do they ?" with asperity. "I did not know it."

"Oh, you're not old, Auntie. I told Alice so. And of course you won't be lonely now that you have that nice young girl staying with you, Miss—er—what's-her-name ?" (Mark considered this remarkably clever).

"Oh !" The old lady's tone was dry. "And was it Miss Van Slyke who told you that I had Miss-er-what's-her-name staying with me ?"

"No—oh no ! I just happened to see her come in at the gate."

The old lady put down her glasses. "I see," she said. "Martha give me my salts. Mark, your visit to me this morning, your solicitude, is quite touching ! But you know I am an invalid. I cannot bear much excitement. You must excuse me. Incidentally, you have made a mistake. Miss-er-what's-her-name is not staying here. Martha, ring for Jane to show Mr. Wareham out."

For a moment Mark Wareham's handsome face flushed angrily, and then suddenly he laughed. His Aunt smiled grimly. "You see I know you, Mark," she said.

"Looks like it. But Auntie, aren't you going to let me see her ?"

"I have no one staying with me, nephew."

"Aunt, it's not like you to tell fibs. I saw her."

"Then you have the advantage of me. I have not seen her."

"She is the most perfectly lovely child. Really, Aunt, I only want to look at her. You know how an artist delights in beauty."

"I know. But you have made a mistake this time, Mark. Must I call in the servants to protest that I have no visitor of any kind at present ?"

"Oh, forgive me, Aunt ! I must have mistaken the house. Really, if you had seen her you would not blame me for wanting another look !"

"It is alright," magnanimously. "And I may say that if I had a lovely child staying with me I would not be afraid to let you see her. Thank Heaven for that, Mark !"

He went over to her and kissed her wrinkled forehead. For an instant his face was serious. "Yes, thank heaven for that !" he said. At the door he paused. "Say Auntie, you've seen a lot of life in your day. Tell me—is there anything in—in that kind of thing ?"

"I am not a mind reader, nephew !"

"Well, I mean in seeing someone, you know, and knowing all at once that you never saw anyone just like them—her, I mean, and feeling—"

"I understand. Why, yes. There is probably something in it. It has happened to you once or twice already, hasn't it ?"

"By Jove, no! nothing like it. Girls," with a comprehensive gesture, "there are so many girls. They're all alike! Except, Auntie, I really thought I saw her come in here."

"You must have been mistaken, Mark."

When he had gone the old lady looked after him with a softened face. "Not a bit like his father !" she thought. "Not a bit, but a good lad—he will settle down some day .I wonder whom he thought he saw."

"Send in the reading-woman now, Martha," she said aloud.

CHAPTER IX.

THE "reading-woman" followed the maid down the corridor with courageous mien. It would never do to give way to nervousness now that the goal was in sight. Only let her be brave for another few moments and success would be hers.

"What did you say your name was ?" asked the maid.

"Christine Brown."

The maid opened the door. "Miss Brown to see you, Mam," she announced, and to Christine, in a whisper, "Go right in. Never mind the dark. Her eyes aren't strong. Don't talk loud, it hurts her head."

"Don't stand there, come right in !" The voice from the invalid's room was so robust that Christine jumped. "Don't bang the door ! Gracious ! I thought I asked you not to bang the door. Martha, my salts ! Please come nearer, Miss Brown. Sit where I can see you !"

It was the invalid herself who spoke, and so amazing was the effect of so large a voice from so small a person that Christine obeyed in bewildered silence. She had intended to be very acute and observing, but she found herself unable to observe anything save the odd figure in the invalid's chair. Indeed Miss Torrance was enough to engage anyone's whole attention. She was so little, so wizened, that her appearance was positively startling. And her voice ! when she spoke Miss Torrance appeared to be all voice.

"Don't stare !" boomed the voice, irritably. Christine dropped her eyes.

"If there is anything I dislike it is a person who stares," continued Miss Torrance, staring very hard herself. "Why, you are a perfect child ! How old are you ?"

"Going on seventeen."

"Far too young ! I didn't advertise for a baby. What is your mother thinking of ?"

"I have no mother, Miss Torrance."

"I thought not. Dead, I suppose, or you would not be here. Well, I never judge from appearances. You may read a little from that book on the table, the green one. I am quite sure that you will not do. But I am always fair. I never form conclusions without good reasons. Begin where you find the book-marker." The invalid closed her eyes with a resigned expression.

Christine picked up the book. She knew that she was a good reader and the knowledge brought back some of her confidence. Her clear low voice was very pleasant to hear.

"Not bad, not bad at all," admitted the invalid. "But I don't suppose you could keep it up. I am not pessimistic, but I always distrust good beginnings."

"Oh, I think I could keep it up!" said Christine quickly. "Really I do." As she leaned forward her face came fully into the light, looking so lovely in its young eagerness that the invalid started involuntarily and put up her glasses.

"My dear !" she said in a different tone, "did you meet a young man as you came in here ?"

"No," said Christine, truthfully.

"Did you see a young man ?"

"No—yes. One got out of an automobile a little farther down the street. I think he had lost something."

"Was he tall, dark, and quite too good-looking for any useful purpose ?"

"I'm afraid I did not notice," faltered Christine. She could see no reason for the questions, but the little old lady was evidently excited.

"Did he speak to you, my dear ?"

"I think he said "By Jove,'" said the girl demurely.

"Um, very likely. Well, this is a nice state of affairs. Lost something, had he, the scamp ! And no wonder he thought I was lying—" She checked herself. Her sharp old eyes rested more kindly on the girl's wondering face, but her determination was immediately taken.

"All this is beside the point," she said briskly. "My dear, you read very well, but I am afraid that you would not suit me. I am a very cranky old woman and you are too young to be patient. Don't protest. I believe in being fair and in giving people a chance, but I know that the young are never patient with the old. And I would always feel guilty if I kept you in this close room when you ought to be out in the sunshine. I inherit the Torrance conscience, and it is a great trouble to me !"

There was a kindness in her voice which largely took the sting from the rejection. Christine felt an impulse of liking, and raising her eyes said frankly, "I think I could be patient, Miss Torrance, but if it would worry you to have me, of course—"

The old lady nodded. She had noticed at once Christine's neat dress and good shoes, and decided that this was not a case of urgent need, so that "the troublesome Torrance conscience" could not accuse her of harshness.

"Then we will consider it settled," she said. "And if you will not mind a word of advice from an old woman, I would tell you to go home and try to be useful there. You are much too young and too pretty to work for yourself, unless it is absolutely necessary."

Christine flushed. "It is absolutely necessary," she said, rising. Then, proudly fearful that she might seem to appeal for pity, she added a quick, rather stiff "Good morning," and left the room.

The old lady watched the closing door ruefully. "Most unfortunate," she murmured. "But it would never have done. Martha," to the maid, "you could see it would never have done to have her here. Pretty ? The child is lovely ! Mark would have been wild over her in a week. What did you say her name was ? Brown ? Might just as well have been Smith. Do you know whom she looked like ? She looked for all the world like my youngest sister, Mona. She was a belle when I was already passe. How I used to envy her. Adam simply adored her—he used to call her honey-bee on account of her hair. This child's hair is just like it. Poor Mona, she died very young. Likenesses are strange things !"

The maid smiled grimly. "Likenesses or no, she'll have some trouble getting anything respectable with that face," she remarked. "In her walk of life I always say that beauty is a drawback as often as not." She glanced complacently at her own prim features in the mirror. Her mistress, observing the glance, smiled.

"And what would you say Miss Brown's walk in life might be, Martha ?"

The maid shook her head, slowly. "Oh, she's got airs and graces enough! But you never can tell. Shop girls are getting very dressy these days, what with their false hair and all ! And ladies don't go about looking for work."

"The child said it was absolutely necessary."

The maid's prim lips came together sharply. It was evident that she had her own opinion about what "the child" might have said.

Miss Torrance sighed. "Well, I could not have taken her ! Though if Mark hadn't come in I might have. I liked the child. She had a voice like music. It was most selfish of Mark, most inconsiderate ! I wonder if he was going to call on Alice van Slyke, when he saw her ? It looks as if Adam were making rather a point of Alice. Well, it can't be helped—Martha, I'll see no more applicants to-day."

"There are three waiting, Ma'am"

"Send them away. That girl has spoiled me for anything more ordinary. It would not be fair to hear them now, and I always try to be absolutely fair."

It was of this "fairness" of Miss Torrance that Chrisrine was thinking as she walked cityward with a heavy heart. Why had she, who believed in being so fair, refused to give a trial to one so eminently fitted as Christine ? On account of her youth ? Christine had read in books that invalid ladies liked youth. In the proper order of things Miss Torrance ought to have engaged her at once. Soon she would have made herself indispensable; the old lady would have loved her like a daughter, and finally have decorously faded away leaving Christine her blessing and, incidentally, her beautiful home and plenty of money ! Here Christine's sense of humor saved the situation. She laughed heartily, and laughter is a good clearing house for gloom. After all, what was one check ? One must not expect to succeed the very first time ! Pausing for a moment, she drew out the second newspaper clipping.

WANTED—Cheerful companion for lady living alone. No housework. Good wages.

This sounded promising. "I should think she would want someone young," mused Christine. "Young people are more cheerful. Probably all her people are dead. Poor thing, it must be awful to be lonely like that."

The address, this time, was in another part of the city, distant, but easily reached by car. Christine was much too innocent to know that the street mentioned was in somewhat questionable quarters. She only knew that she had never been in that direction before, so that the sauce of novelty was added to the adventure. As the car whirled on she gave herself up once more to dreams. This lady to whom she was going was surely in great need. She pictured her in black with a sad face. It was too bad that she lived so far from Brook Street ! Christine peered out of the window of the car to find out just where she was, but the street was a strange one. As she did so she noticed a young man in a motor whose face seemed vaguely familiar. The motor was going very slowly—for a motor. It seemed indeed to keep just abreast of the car ! but here the girl's interest was distracted by the crowing of a pretty baby on the opposite seat and her eyes ceased to follow the slowly moving motor.

At the corner of Hadly Street, she alighted, and, after consulting her slip of paper for the proper number, she set off gaily in the direction indicated. It did not look like a pleasant street, yet the girl felt no dismay. She only felt sorry that a bereaved lady should be compelled to live in such an ugly part of the city.

But if her surroundings left Christine undisturbed. the same cannot be said of the young man in the motor car. When he saw her turn into Hadly Street, blank dismay seized upon Mark Wareham. The car slowed irresolutely, turned, stopped entirely, and then started again with new decision. It, too, turned into Hadly Street.

When Mark had left his Aunt's house he had fully believed that the old lady was not deceiving him. She had evidently no guest at present, and he must have been mistaken in thinking that the lady he sought for had gone in at her gate. On the other hand, there was the evidence of his eyes, and his eyes were not bad as eyes go. If she had not gone in there she had disappeared somewhere in that neighborhood, and her disappearance had added the spice of mystery to an interest already keen enough.

The only thing to do was to wait, and Mark waited. The chauffeur he sent home, and, driving the car himself, he patrolled Amberley Avenue with such efficiency that he soon saw Christine coming out—and out of his Aunt's gate !

Had Aunt Miriam fibbed, after all ?

He did not care to settle the question now. The main thing was not to lose sight of the lady a second time. Effacing himself as far as possible in a big Panhard he watched her take a slip of paper from her pocket, read it and board a down-town car at the corner, evidently she was searching for an address ; he would search too, and the blame for such seemingly dishonorable action might be laid at the door of Aunt Miriam, who had made such procedure necessary.

Christine sat by the car window, once in a while she glanced out, but as she never seemed to notice him his presence could not offend her ; besides a cat may look at a king.

Where was she going ? As the better portions of the city were left behind he wondered more and more, and watched the unconscious face at the window with no little concern. When he saw her alight at Hadly Street he gasped with dismay. That lovely child—here !

Quite happy, and with no idea of causing distress in anyone, Christine walked on, looking carefully at the house numbers. The houses, she thought, were not nice-looking houses, but the one she sought looked rather nicer than the others. It seemed comfortable and had a small garden. But it certainly did appear to be lonely. Christine wondered how it could look so lonely in the midst of a long city street, but long streets are very lonely sometimes—especially when the houses are so much alike. Christine thought that a lady living here would need a very cheerful companion indeed. She felt her own spirits sink a little. Nevertheless, she rang the bell with resolute hand. As she did so an automobile passed down the street. After a slight delay the door was opened by an untidy maid.

"I have come in answer to this advertisement," said Christine,determined this time to have no misunderstanding. But this house had no side door and the maid showed her in at once.

"I'll tell her," she said, eyeing Christine curiously. "Just sit down."

The room into which Christine was shown was evidently the parlor, and bore its state in life with dignity. It might have been its boast that no one could ever have mistaken it for anything but a parlor. It had a "suite," a piano, a palm, a polished table with the poets nicely laid out in padded leather, and each wall displayed exactly two pictures hung at the same height and at regular intervals. Christine shivered. "But she can't possibly live in here !" she comforted herself, and, with a glance at the precise piles of music on the piano rack, "I don't believe she can play either."

"No, I do not play," drawled a soft voice from the doorway. Christine turned with a start. A lady had come into the room—at first glance she seemed a very beautiful lady.

"I am Mrs. Wilkins," said the lady. "I saw you looking at the music and making deductions. It does not look like music which is often played, does it? But you see it goes with the house."

"Oh, then it is a furnished house?"

The lady shrugged her pretty shoulders. "I hope you did not think that I furnished it! But it is really a perfect gem in a way. How does it strike you?"

"Very comfortable." The off-hand manner of the lady confused Christine.

"And prim? and respectable? It is very respectable, don't you think? That music, now—"Mendelssohn's Songs Without Words," is it not? Nothing could be more decorous. It is only the words of songs which are not respectable."

Christine laughed. The remark to her girlish ears sounded clever. Mrs. Wilkins sank into the rocking chair of the suite and arranged her floating draperies. Her face in the better light did not seem so attractive. It was hard, it was too pink and white. Christine thought that it looked "odd."

With the same unerring reading of her thoughts, the lady put up her handkerchief to her face. "Heavens! have I got too much on?" she asked interestedly, "The light was bad upstairs. I don't hold with over- doing it."

"What?" asked puzzled Christine.

Mrs. Wilkins tapped her fair cheek. "This! Now you—gracious, you're not 'done' at all!" Her glance grew keen. "I thought the maid said—"

"I came in answer to this." Christine held out the slip containing the advertisement "I'm in need of a position with good wages, and I am very cheerful."

"You!" To the poor girl's embarrassment the lady began to laugh—pretty, silvery laughter. "You! Oh, this is rich. Why, my good girl, I didn't advertise for a child!"

"But I am not a child. I am sixteen, and I am very cheerful. Young people are the cheerfulest. You are young yourself, Mrs. Wilkins, I do hope you will let me try."

The strange lady's laughter subsided, and her face grew suddenly grave. "I don't think you will do at all," she said abruptly.

"But why," urged poor Christine.

The other's eyes began to twinkle.

"Well, for one reason, you know, I need someone to go with the parlor."

Christine looked around with a puzzled air.

"Very respectable," prompted the lady, "very stiff, very prim—"

Christine smiled. "I am respectable," she declared, "and you remember you didn't say prim, you said 'cheerful.'"

"I meant prim. At least what I really meant was one who could be both cheerful and prim—upon different occasions."

"I don't quite understand."

"That's it exactly." Mrs. Wilkins' eyes crinkled up in the most enticing way when she laughed. "Sit down again and don't be cross with me. You see Mr.-um-Wilkins is away most of the time and it is annoying to be here alone without anyone but a clumsy maid, and then to a certain extent one thinks of appearances."

"But," said puzzled Christine, "it is perfectly correct for a married lady to live alone."

"Oh, yes, certainly," Mrs. Wilkins played rather nervously with her many rings. "I suppose you haven't a mother?" she said without looking up.

"No, but I have two sisters who have never let me feel the want!"

"Do they know you are here?" quickly.

Christine blushed. "No, it was to be quite a surprise."

"It would be," said the other dryly, "and now I think—there's the bell!"

She broke off abruptly and listened as the girl went to the door. The parlor door was open and they both heard a man's pleasant voice say," Good morning. Does Mrs. Alfred Smith live here?"

"No, she doesn't," said the girl, shortly.

A slight pause, during which Christine racked her brains to remember where she had heard the voice before.

"Might I see the mistress of the house?" asked the man at the door ingratiatingly.

"She don't see no agents."

"But I have here—"

"She don't want it." The maid shut the door with a bang.

"Gracious!" said Mrs. Wilkins, "What a nice voice he had. Some of these agents—why, look, he has an auto—pianos, I guess. I wish we had asked him in, only—" she glanced uncertainly at the girl. "I don't think you ought to stay—I mean I mustn't detain you any longer. You wouldn't do for me, my dear."

Christine thought that she looked rather tired and sad as she said it, but there was decision in her tone. It seemed useless to insist, so swallowing a lump of disappointment which seemed to leap into her throat, Christine held out her hand. The other did not seem to see it.

"Good-bye," she said. "Be sure to take the car at the corner."

The girl murmured an assent, but indeed she hardly heard the words. She was cruelly disappointed, the lump in her throat threatened to dissolve in tears, and she turned away from the house without noticing in what direction she was going. The brightness of the morning seemed dimmed somehow, for beside her own growing doubts and fears she felt the burden of the tragedy of another, a tragedy which she did not understand, but which she could dimly feel. Absorbed in her thoughts she walked on aimlessly, a strange figure indeed in that haunted street. Many watched her with curious eyes, some slunk out of her way, but at last one man, bolder or more vile, spoke to her. She did not hear what he said, but looked up with a quick smile. The look she met was something she had never seen, never dreamed of.

"If you're going this way, I'll go along with you," said the man, more loudly this time. He placed his hand upon her arm. Christine shrank back with a startled cry, and next moment the man's leering face was knocked out of her foreground and the man himself went spinning down the pavement under the force of a well directed blow.

"Excuse me," said a pleasant voice, "I think that fellow was annoying you."

"Yes," said Christine, "he—he was." She looked up into the face of the speaker with frightened eyes. But the face seemed somehow familiar. It was a dark, strong face, and the voice was kind. She felt none of the fear and repulsion for him that she had felt for the other man, and she spoke to him as she might have spoken to Tommy. "He was horrid," she admitted with a shaky laugh.

"I came up just in time," said the young man, pointing to a big green automobile standing by the curb. "In fact I was looking for you. My Aunt, Miss Torrance, sent me after you. She would very much like to see you if you can spare her a little time."

"Happily dreaming, a vision of Spring in Autumn."

Hope sprang up in Christine's eyes. "Oh, thank you," she said, gratefully. "Has Miss Torrance changed her mind? I will go at once. Can you tell me the nearest way to the car?"

"It is here." He pointed smilingly to the auto by the curb. "Will not this car do? It is much quicker. If you will trust me to drive you—"

The girl did not hesitate. She knew quite well that she could trust this young fellow who stood there so gravely before her. With a brief word of thanks she stepped into the car. He followed her and in a moment they were off.

"Oh, how fast!" gasped Christine.

The driver smiled. "I'll slow down presently. Let's get out of this first."

"Out-of-what?" asked Christine between bumps.

He looked at her sharply and his face brightened. "Oh, out of these bad roads," he told her. "Now, this is better," as they turned into a broad and quiet avenue. "I can go more slowly here."

Christine, to whom the novel ride had restored her spirits, laughed. "Surely it is an odd idea to go fast on bad roads and slow on good ones."

"Not at all. There is never any sense in lingering over unpleasant places, Miss—I think Aunt Miriam said that your name was Miss—"

"Brown," said Christine.

"Yes, of course, Miss Brown. I suppose you are wondering how I knew you, but the fact is I happened to see you go in to Miss Torrance's this morning."

"Why—and I saw you, too! I remember now. That is why I seemed to know your face. And your voice. You got out of this very auto. You had lost something, I think, and you said, "By Jove!"

"Did I, though?" Mark had the grace to blush.

"Did you find it?" asked Christine.

"What?"

"The thing you lost?"

"I don't know," stammered Mark. "I am still looking for it."

"Are you really very keen on going to my Aunt's at once?" he asked her presently.

"Yes, of course I am. It is very important. You don't know how important."

"Then I am afraid you are going to be very vexed with me. The truth is that I have you in this car under false pretences. I—I didn't have a message from Aunt Miriam."

"What?"

"No, I didn't. You see I just wanted to get you away from—from any annoyance, and that seemed the quickest way of doing it. You did not know me, but you knew her, and if you knew she was my Aunt it might be—like an introduction, you know. You see it all just happened. I did see you at Aunt Miriam's and so I knew you were a friend of hers—and when that tough had the impudence to speak to you I took the only way I knew of getting you away without disturbance. I hope you will forgive me."

Christine's face was turned away. The disappointment was so great that she could not have spoken had she wished. There was a horrible lump in her throat again.

"If you can't forgive me you might just as well say so," said Mark gloomily. Christine made an effort to swallow the lump.

"It isn't that. I'm sure you were very kind but—well, it is a mistake all through, I'm afraid. I am not your Aunt's friend. I called to apply for the position of lady's companion."

It was simply said and with dignity. It was evident that Christine did not think any the less of herself for the fact she related. Mark felt himself blush brilliantly. Then after a half glance at the lovely child-face so proudly turned away he cleared the air with a sudden burst of laughter.

"You! a companion to Aunt Miriam! Suffering cats!"

"Why not, indeed?" Christine's face was still prim but her voice gurgled.

"Why not? Oh, I don't know. Only its tremendously funny! If you knew my Aunt as well as I do you would laugh yourself. Aunt Miriam is really a corker, don't you know!"

"I thought her very nice, and when you said she had sent you I was so glad because I thought she had changed her mind and was going to have me. It quite cheered me up. Mrs. Wilkins wouldn't take me either, you see!"

"Mrs. Wilkins? Oh"—a sudden ray of light dawning. "Was it Mrs. Wilkins you called upon on Hadly Street?"

"Yes, but how did you know?"

"Well, I was just passing. I saw you go in—I—"

Christine turned around suddenly. "Oh, I know now when I heard your voice! You were the piano agent!"

The young man's confusion was so evident that she added quickly, "There's nothing to be ashamed of in being a piano agent."

Mark recovered himself. "No, certainly not—only—well, my family—Aunt Miriam, you know, especially, do not like it. I keep it dark."

Christine nodded. "I see. It is just what I was trying to do. I did not tell the girls a thing about my trying to find a place. They wouldn't like it either, although I don't see why. Celia is in a shop herself."

"A shop?"

"Yes, but of course she is the head of a department, and it is the best store in the city, Angers & Son. But like you, I felt that I wanted to do something for myself. One can't go on living on one 's family forever, can one?"

"No," said Mark, weakly.

"You look queer," said Christine. "What's the matter?"

In the infinitesimal pause Mark Wareham made a notable decision.

"I'm hungry," he declared, "and you must be hungry too, and I have to take a run out into the country, not very far. It's a nice little place, where they serve good meals and their piano is out of tune. I wonder if you couldn't come with me?"

"Oh, I'd love to, but—I don't believe the girls would let me. I'm afraid I cannot go."

"Did you promise to be home for lunch?"

"No—o. I said I might have it down town."

"Well, why not come? You know who I am now, and I believe you would enjoy it. I have taken dozens of girls out to Haffey's for lunch. It's quite the thing."

Christine considered. She wanted to go very much, and she knew that Ada would not expect her home, nor did she think that she would grudge her the pleasure of the offered trip.

Being a Canadian girl, brought up in an absolutely free though clean and healthy atmosphere, and under conditions which precluded eternal chaperonage she would have had no hesitation about accepting the invitation under ordinary circumstances. Ordinary circumstances in this case would mean that she had met Mr. Wareham in the customary way, and that he was known to her sisters. On the other hand, she wanted very much to go and her misgivings were purely artificial ones. In her heart she knew that there was nothing more proper and natural than that he should ask her and that she should go. Tommy would be furious, of course! but then Tommy was often unnecessarily fussy!

Mark did not urge her, but it was not from want of eagerness. His longing to keep her with him, even for that short time, surprised himself. Had he ever felt like this about any of the many girls whose courteous escort he had been? He knew that he had not,

Continued on page 38

The Gelatine in this package of

KNOX
PURE PLAIN SPARKLING
GELATINE

is divided into two envelopes, and makes two full quarts. Each package also contains a packet of pink color, for making fancy desserts.

Knox Gelatine is uncolored, unsweetened, pure, wholesome. It is granulated and dissolves quickly.

Send for the KNOX Recipe Book of many appetizing summer dishes

"Dainty Desserts for Dainty People," containing recipes for Desserts, Salads, Puddings, Ices, Ice Creams, Candies—illustrated in colors—sent you upon receipt of your grocer's name.

Pint sample for 2-cent stamp and grocer's name

CHARLES B. KNOX COMPANY
501 Knox Ave., Johnstown, N. Y.
Branch Factory: Montreal, Canada

FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS, and the AGED.

BENGER'S

FOOD

assists nature.

It is used mixed with fresh new milk and forms a delicate and nutritive cream which is enjoyed and assimilated when other foods disagree. It is entirely free from rough and indigestible particles which produce irritation in delicate stomachs.

The Lancet describes it as "Mr. Benger's admirable preparation."

BENGER'S FOOD, LIMITED,
Otter Works, Manchester, Eng.

Bengers Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere.

B21

With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

A Dire Disaster

ONE of our "Juniors," aged ten, has sent us the following sad account of the tragedy of Willie Bright:

Little boy named Willie Bright
Found a stick of dynamite.
Slammed it down upon a rock—
Funeral service two o'clock.

A Chapter in Charlie Chipmonk's Career

By Greta Jansen

CHARLIE CHIPMONK and his little sister lived in a snug little home in the sugar bush. Mother Chipmonk had taken great care in selecting and furnishing the home for her wee squirrels. It was in the centre of a high stub of basswood that the wind had broken off for fun, several years before. In the side of the stub was a large knot-hole, that made a fine door to as cosy a squirrel living-room as one could wish to see. This living-room was well lined with soft grass and moss, so Charlie and little sister were very comfy, after they had had their breakfast.

Mother Chipmonk's pantry had been well filled with hickory, beech, and butternuts, but all that was left now were the shells, that had been thrown down the stairway in the lower part of the stub. So, now, Mother Chippy had to dig up some of the nuts she had pitted in the previous fall.

Our two young chippies grew fast, and before long their mother told them they might practise running and jumping over the roots of an old stump fence (that was near their home), so they would be able to climb the tallest trees, and jump from the wind swings of the elm trees; but she cautioned, "Be very careful, children, don't go far on the stumps when I'm away to the nut pits, for your Great Uncle Red is very cross, and claims all that stump fence as his, though why he claims it, I do not know."

One sunshiny afternoon Charlie and his sister went for a game of hide and seek on the stumps. When they got tired of that game they tried tag. Sister Chippy was It, and as she was chasing Charlie on the jagged old fence he ran a little farther than usual. He turned to see if sister were near, and he was terrified to see Great Uncle Red dash from the bush and spring on the stump behind him. Oh! how cross he looked, with his round, bushy tail quivering over his back!

"Chir-r-r-r-r," shouted Uncle Red. Now that in squirrel talk meant, "What are you doing here? Clear out, or I'll make it hot for you, you impudent young chipmonk!" Poor Charlie, what could he do? Sister had scampered for home as fast as she could, with her flat, brushy tail waving in fright, and mother was away at the farthest hickory pits and couldn't hear him.

Great Uncle Red made an angry dash for Charlie, and away flew the little fellow over the pointed roots, never stopping till he came to the rail fence on the lane. Charlie thought he heard Uncle Red after him, so he scampered on, along the zigzag fence. By and by he stopped to rest, and, finding that Uncle Red had given up the chase, the frightened, tired little squirrel crept into a cubby hole under a flat rail for a good rest, and presently went fast asleep.

When Charlie awoke the sunshine had all gone, and a cold, shivery wind was blowing from the north-east. Oh, how cold and hungry he felt! Off he started to find the stump fence that would lead him home, but he was so cold and stiff he could hardly run at all. After going a long way Charlie thought he must have got turned round in his sleep, and was going the wrong way, so he turned and hurried the other way as fast as his little, stiff legs could carry him. But no stump fence could he find. Soon it grew dark and colder, and the lonely, hungry, little fellow gave up and lay down in a fence corner and cried himself to sleep.

Early the next morning, Mrs. Brown, who had been up all night with a sick neighbor, came along the lane. Just as she went to climb the fence she saw a small chipmonk, apparently dead, in the fence corner. She picked him up and found that Charlie (as they afterward called him) was still alive. Carefully she cuddled him in her warm hands and hurried on home.

"Here's a pet for you, Ida," said Mrs. Brown to her little daughter, "that is, if you can coax this half-dead chipmonk back to life." Ida ran for some milk, and put it and a little hot water into a saucer. She shoved Charlie's nose into the milk, that made him sneeze; then slowly his little tongue tried to clean the milk off his face. The milk tasted very good, and he soon began to lap it, when Ida held the saucer to his nose. After feeding him Ida wrapped Charlie in some flannel and put him in a little basket by the stove. It didn't take Charlie long to find out that this little girl and her mother, not only wouldn't hurt him, but that they were the ones that fed him. In less than a week Charlie Chipmonk was as much at home in the Brown's kitchen as he had been in the basswood stub in the bush.

Charlie became very playful, and would hunt all over for nuts and other dainties that Ida hid, just for the fun of seeing him rummage into boxes and pockets for his food. Charlie had several sleeping-places—on the lounge pillow in the sunshine, or under the pillow; but his favorite nap-bed was Mrs. Brown's lap, when she sat down to knit or sew. Now and then, when the door was open, Charlie would slip out for a run over the chip pile and up the apple tree that leaned over the window.

Once when he was playing in the apple tree a large black and white creature gave him a great scare. Another day, when he was frolicking over the chips, a big black beast jumped at him, saying, "Bow-wow-wow." Needless to say Charlie rushed home in fright. You see, Puss and Rover didn't know Charlie was a pet: they thought he was one of those saucy squirrels that came up the mountain side to steal the boys' nuts from the woodshed.

One day, in the fall, Charlie slipped out when Ida was away at school and never returned. Ida never knew whether the cat had caught him, or that some other chippies had coaxed him over the mountain edge to live in the hollow butternut.

THE LITTLE GOOSE GIRL.

May Apples

By E. F. McPherson

THE eastbound express thundered along a north shore trestle and whisked into a tunnel. Bobby shut his eyes and held his breath. Then the train rumbled out again and buzzed around a curve. Rocks and baby trees flew by Bobby was used to seeing baby trees in Manitoba. What he wanted to see was a great big tree, and most of all a great big apple tree.

"Oh, mother, dear," he cried, as a larger clump sped by, "is this Ontario now? Will the apple trees come soon?"

"This is Ontario, but there are no apple trees yet. Wait, dearie, until we are at grandpa's. Then you will see lots of apple trees."

Mother dear was dressed in black and her eyes looked as if big tears were just behind them ready to come out any time. Sometimes she hugged Bobby so hard it hurt, but he was brave and didn't say anything. He had promised papa to take good care of mother dear. Bobby didn't understand it all, but he remembered that he was proud to make the promise. Then, a few days afterwards, a great many men and horses and carriages came to their house and went away ever so slowly. One of the carriages had tall wavy plumes on it.

It was late in the night when Bobby and mother dear reached grandpa's town. Bobby fell sound asleep on the way out to grandpa's farm. A disappointment was in store for him, for it was not yet apple time. The trees were just making ready. Their fragrant dresses of pink and white blossoms shimmered in the moonlight and danced lightly to the music of the night wind.

Had Bobby been awake he would have noticed that mother dear was crying and that she snuggled close to grandpa. Then grandpa put his arm around her and called her his own little lassie come home again.

Bobby dreamed of an orchard full of apples, not blossoms, but lovely big apples hanging red from every bough, just as they did in his red and green picture book at home.

Next morning at breakfast grandpa said that perhaps Bobby would like some of those russet apples the boys had been keeping for him. One of the boys—he was really not a boy at all, but one of grandpa's grown-up sons—picked up a pail from the sink and told Bobby to "Come along, sonny."

Bobby's eyes danced and he trotted eagerly beside the "boy" to a field just behind the barn. There they stopped beside a pile of earth—the apple pit.

A few minutes later a very indignant little boy ran back to the house to mother dear. So indignant and so disappointed was he that he had to rub his eyes hard to keep back the tears.

"Oh, mother it was all a pack of fibs they told us in Manitoba. Apples don't grow on trees at all. They just grow in the ground, mind you, and then they have to be dug up just like potatoes!"

CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB

Five Hundred Beautiful Little Sterling Silver Pencils for Five Hundred New Members to the Club

Dear Journal Readers:

Right in the centre of every community, intimate with many friends, associated with their neighbors in all social activities, interested in the clubs and organizations of all kinds, we need a member of the Girls' Club. We must get acquainted with these people, for every one of them should be a reader of the Journal. Nearly every one of them will gladly subscribe with someone whom they can trust. There are thousands of subscribers waiting for some one with the courage and energy to say, "I am representing CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, the best women's paper in the Dominion. One hundred and twenty-five thousand Canadians give it their hearty approval, now will you give it a trial?"

Belonging to the Girls' Club means being one of hundreds of our readers throughout all Canada, who are telling all their neighbors about the Journal, showing them its attractiveness and interest, urging them to take a Canadian magazine. A request to give a trial to a home magazine seems entirely different from asking subscriptions for any other. It is the hope of nearly every Canadian that everything belonging to Canada shall prosper. And this work, which is not really work, done in your spare time, during afternoon calls or after social meetings, pays our members splendidly. It has raised funds for charity, for travelling, for room furnishing, for many desirable things that otherwise would be beyond the means of our members. Not just one year, but year after year, as subscribers renew and increase, the earnings become larger.

But if each member has a circle of even several hundred subscribers, think how many members we need in the club to reach all the should-be subscribers in Canada. So we want hundreds of new members to join us now, to be ready for the full subscription season, when the majority of magazine subscriptions expire. We need one in every small town and country community, several in every city. Will you join the club or tell some friend whom you think would care to be a member. Just write to the Secretary of the Girls' Club, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, Toronto.

To the first five hundred new members who send us fifteen subscriptions to the Journal, we will give a beautiful little sterling silver pencil, in addition to all the commissions and bonus. This offer is open to everyone who has not yet sent us any subscriptions. Not only is this a most attractive little pocketbook piece, of which I am sure you'll be proud, but one that will be of constant service. Of course I can not be positive, but I am almost sure that the pencils will not all be gone before the first of October, perhaps not till even later. So if you get fifteen orders in August and September, you are practically certain to get one. It all depends on how many Journal readers just at this time want money and are willing to earn it.

Interest in Canada and also approval of the Journal are most strikingly shown by the number of Canadians in the United States who subscribe, even with an increase of price to cover the extra postage and the good American magazines that are offered. It would seem that in Canada, where prices are reversed, that when the Journal is well known there would be little demand for foreign magazines.

The experience of one of our members is interesting. She was visiting in Rochester, and in a short time secured over twenty subscriptions for the Journal.

This is one of the club members whom I know personally, and because I feel sure you will be interested, I want to tell you something about her. This is with her permission.

About two years ago she was troubled with a cancer on her right arm. At first it did not alarm her much, but later became so dangerous that an amputation was necessary. All her life she had been unusually active, to do nothing was as tiresome as work is to many persons. Now she found herself debarred from most of her former occupations, can you imagine the terrible monotony of inactivity. She began to feel that her restlessness was a strain on the people around her. When it was becoming almost unendurable, someone suggested subscription work for the Journal, which she hailed as a welcome relief, although she doesn't at all need to earn money, and all her relatives are most desirous of visits whenever she will leave her married daughter.

From the beginning she has been very successful in securing orders, and thereby earned a good deal of money. This no doubt, has pleased her, for there are many ways of spending surplus money. But by far the most important part to her has been securing a very attractive occupation for her leisure time.

Naturally she started first among her friends, who not only very gladly gave her their subscriptions, but greatly encouraged her by their interest in the Journal. Soon she began visiting her unknown neighbors. "Visiting" certainly is the right word, for though the question "Do you know the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL"? is the introduction, many other topics are discussed. As she talks very interestingly, she has made many enjoyable acquaintanceships. She makes the Journal, its contents, its organization, and its ambitions as interesting to others as they are to her, and unless there is a very good reason for not ordering, she usually gets a subscription. So with her, securing subscriptions is pleasant work which she does in any spare time, sometimes she works a few hours each day, then no opportunity may offer for a week, or several weeks. Yet in the short time she has been working, she has earned nearly $50.00. Aren't there many things you could do with $50.00? Let me tell you about the club.

Very truly,

Secretary C. G. C.

Quaint Presents

CELEBRITIES are often the recipients of quaint presents. For instance, on the marriage of the late Queen Victoria the farmers of East and West Pennard, Somersetshire, wishing to show their loyalty, manufactured from the milk of 750 cows an immense cheese nine feet in circumference. The gift was graciously accepted and was stored at Buckingham Palace, where it would undoubtedly have found its way to the royal table had not its donors wished to exhibit it as an advertisement. An equally homely gift was made to the late King Charles of Wurtemberg on the morning of his marriage to Princess Olga of Russia. A peasant woman sent him a pair of trousers of her own design with a note expressing the hope that they might be found a better cut and fit than those which she had last had the honor of seeing His Majesty wear. When Louis IV. of Hesse Darmstardt was married to Princess Alice he received a gift of a dozen pairs of stockings knitted by a humble admirer.

This Guarantee— signed in ink—gets you new hose free if any wear out

Six Pairs of Hose Guaranteed

to wear without holes for Six Months

—the lightest weight, finest Hosiery ever made for men, women and children.

Island cotton yarn—the top market price. Common yarn sells for 9 cents. That is the ratio of quality all through. Send today for an assortment and see what a wonderful product they are.

You don't have to darn hose any more. You don't have to wear darned hose. We give you with every six pairs of Holeproof Hose the signed-in-ink GUARANTEE shown at the right. If one or all pairs wear to holes in six months we replace them with new hose free. These are the original guaranteed hose, the hose with the Carl Freschl Pres signature, on the toe, the first hose ever sold with a guarantee. These same hose are a whirlwind success in the United States. Last year 5,400,000 outlasted the guarantee—wore longer than six months—yet they are made in the lightest weights, are soft and attractive. No hose ever looked, felt or fit any better. They cost just the same as hose that wear out in a week, so you might as well have them. We pay an average of 70 cents per pound for our Egyptian and Sea Island cotton yarn—the top market price. Common yarn sells for 9 cents. That is the ratio of quality all through. Send today for an assortment and see what a wonderful product they are.

MEN'S SOCKS—Sizes 9 to 12. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, navy blue, gun metal, mulberry. In light weight, 6 pairs $1.50 (same in medium weight in above colors and in black with white feet, 6 pairs $1.50. Light and extra light weight mercerized, 6 pairs $2.00. Light and extra light weight, LUSTRE SOX, 6 pairs, $3.00. Pure thread-silk sox, 3 pairs guaranteed three months, $2.00. Medium worsted merino in black, tan, pearl, navy and natural, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in finer grade, 6 pairs, $3.00.

WOMEN'S—Sizes 8½ to 11. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl and black with white feet. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00. Same colors (except black with white feet) in light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Light weights in black, tan and gun-metal, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $4.00. Same in pure thread silk $3.00 for 3 pairs guaranteed three months. Outsizes in black, medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00 and in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00.

CHILDREN'S—Sizes 5 to 10½ for boys, 5 to 9½ for girls. Colors, black and tan. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00.

INFANTS' SOX—Colors tan, baby blue, white and pink. Sizes 4 to 7. Four pair, guaranteed six months $1.00. Ribbed leg stockings, in same colors and black, sizes 4 to 6½, 4 pairs (guaranteed six months), $1.00.

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

TO DEALERS—Write for our agency proposition. Excellent opportunity. Thousands of dealers in U. S. making big hosiery sales with "Holeproof."

How to Order If you can't get of your dealer the genuine "Holeproof" with the signature, Carl Freschl Pres on the toe, send to us, stating size, colors (whether all one color or six assorted), weight and kind you want, and send the price, and we'll send the hose and the signed guarantee ticket, insuring you the wear as stated above. Unless stated otherwise, six pairs are guaranteed six months. Six pairs of one size, weight and kind in a box. Colors only may be assorted.

Send in your order to-day. You'll always wear Holeproof Hose once you try them.

Write for free book, "How to Make Your Feet Happy."

Holeproof Hosiery Co. of Canada, Ltd., 15 Bond St., London, Can.

Reg. U. S. Pat. Office, 1906 Carl Freschl Pres

Are Your Hose Insured?

ML FLOORGLAZE

THE FINISH THAT ENDURES

Try it for Sailboats, Canoes, Motor Boats, Carriages, Wagons, Wicker Furniture, Kitchen Tables, Bath-rooms, Flower Boxes, Window Screens, Window Seats, Radiators, Lawn and Porch Furniture, Metal Beds, Pantry and Cellar Shelves, and a hundred other things about the house, indoors and out.

ML Floorglaze is the only Perfect Floor Finish

ML FLOORGLAZE

is not affected by dampness; will not gather mold nor mildew; will not fade, crawl, check, flake nor flour; lasts amazingly, though subjected to severe exposure and wear. Best for floors; better than paint for all woodwork and most iron work. Costs little and lasts long.

For Sale by most Paint and Hardware Dealers in Canada. DON'T ACCEPT A SUBSTITUTE

MADE IN CANADA BY THE

Imperial Varnish & Color Co., Limited

WINNIPEG TORONTO VANCOUVER

Gourlay Pianos

like rare old violins possess a tone that improves with use.

Why does a Stradivarius occupy such an exalted place among violins, when others may be bought for so much less.

Because of its purity of tone.

So, also, it is the purity of tone in Gourlay Pianos that has won for them such an exalted place in the esteem of Canadian musicians and music-lovers.

Over 4000 Gourlay owners are ready to testify that the tone improves with use.

Gourlay Winter & Leeming
188 Yonge St.—Toronto.

Jas. McHardy

"POCKET MONEY" TALKS No. 1

People with fixed incomes belong in two classes—those who pare down living expenses to buy the little luxuries, and those who live well and earn extra money for the extras. If you would shun the cheese-paring class and join the buoyant, care-free, moneyed people, write to the

"POCKET MONEY" SERVICE, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Argue it Pro and Con

THE cost of heating your home must be reckoned, not by the price originally paid for the heating system you install, but on the basis of actual results. On this basis an unprejudiced and careful examination of the facts will clearly show that for even, healthful and economical warmth, a far surpasses any other heating method for the modern home. True, it costs more at first, but the difference in price only faintly indicates the wide difference in results. Consider even fuel consumption. In ten to fifteen years the waste entailed by old-fashioned heating methods would easily pay the first cost and upkeep of a King Boiler and Radiators, not to mention the added comfort you have enjoyed.

King Boiler and Radiators

With a King hot water heating equipment your home is hygienically, cleanly, uniformly and economically warmed and the heat is always under your control—a simple turn of the valve being all that is necessary to regulate the temperature to any desired degree.

POST YOURSELF ON HEATING VALUES

Write for our illustrated booklet, "Comfortable Homes." It tells plainly and simply the real facts about heating and heating systems.

STEEL AND RADIATION, LIMITED

HEAD OFFICE: Fraser Ave., Toronto. SHOWROOMS: 78-82 Adelaide St. E.
Branches in All the Principal Cities and Towns

By JESSIE E. RORKE

IT is a mistake to suppose that a beautiful home is necessarily a costly one. It is true that money smooths the way and lessens the difficulties which one meets with in working out one's ideals, but a well filled purse has also its temptations, and quite as many luxurious homes fail to meet the requirements of harmony and simplicity as do the poorer ones.

If these two are kept in mind and carefully adhered to, though we may have long to wait we will in the end build up about us a beautiful home though it may be a most inexpensive one. But it is nesessary to have some definite end in view—a picture in our own mind of how we wish our rooms to look, and not to buy, in hit or miss fashion, the curtains that are offered as a bargain at the moment or the prettiest rug in the shop without regard to the position it must fill. True, we may have to buy our curtains at bargain prices, but let us wait until we can find the ones that are suitable, that fill their proper place in our scheme, even at the cost of patiently darning the holes in the last ones and making them last another season.

THE MEDICINE CHEST

There is not only harmony of color to consider, but harmony also of style and of purpose. Money will do little for us in securing harmony of color; not nearly so much as time and careful thought in planning out a color scheme that will include the whole house and not allow each room, however beautiful in itself, to show harsh and striking contrasts with every open door. Furniture of the Colonial and Louis XVI. period would look incongruously out of place in the same room, and mission furniture refuses to combine with any other style—all must be mission or not at all. Then, too, the woods that are used should harmonize; one beautiful piece of mahogany would seem sadly out of place if the rest of the furniture was of ash, yet the room might be pleasing in every way, if only the cheaper wood was used, providing it was of the best quality, and the furniture was of good shape and workmanship. Each room has its own purpose in the house, and the furniture and decoration should fit unobtrusively into the general intention or harmony cannot be preserved.

The very fact that we have little to spend in furnishing our homes forces simplicity upon us whether we will or no, and secures for us this essential of beauty. Simple, graceful outlines and soft rich colorings are beautiful enough without ornament, and greatly to be preferred to many of the more elaborate things that are offered for our choice. The careful thought that is required to make our purchases fit in with the amount which we may spend should ensure that the few things we buy for the purpose of ornament alone will at least be what we consider beautiful, if we are wise enough to remember that one exquisite little cast or piece of pottery will be better than a dozen poorer ones, and one good picture gives a lasting pleasure that several poorer ones would fail to give even in the beginning.

If the home is to be furnished from a small income, it is wise to remember that in some places it is extravagant to economize. This is usually the case where it is necessary to pay for labor as well as material, and with the things that entail a large outlay in the beginning. In selecting wall papers, the quiet and unobtrusive colors that will prove most serviceable will probably give the most pleasing results, but it rarely pays to buy a cheap paper. The cost of hanging will be just the same whatever the price of the paper may be, and a poor paper that must soon be replaced will double this expense. A rug that is serviceable at all means a considerable outlay, and a really good one will usually outlive two poorer ones, and will make the room much more attractive.

In selecting furniture, it is possible to find much that is really beautiful and not too expensive, if we are careful not to sacrifice line and workmanship for the sake of a prettier grain in the wood, or an added ornament. Curtains may be dainty and pretty, and still be quite inexpensive. It is true that a wider range of beautiful colorings are to be found in more costly materials, but many of the printed linens and cotton repps and tapestries are very artistic and hold their colors surprisingly well.

Beyond the articles of furnishing are the little individual touches that make a house into a home and give it its greatest charm, and these rarely have a money value; they are as possible in the poorest home as in the costliest.

* * *

COOL ROOMS.

FOR those who remain in their own homes during at least a part of the summer months, the problem of making the house cool and attractive, a pleasant retreat from the heat and dust of out of doors, is constantly presenting itself, and, though during some of the scorching July and August days it seems without a solution, much may really be done toward gaining that end. If we can make the thermometer actually drop a few degrees, we have gained much, but if we have only succeeded in making the house look cool we have gained something that is quite worth while and will at least give rest to nerves that are tired from the heat and glare of the day.

A SEWING TABLE

The first and easiest thing to do is to remove all superfluous bric-a-brac, and even furniture. Nothing suggests heat and stuffiness like over-crowding; let your rooms suggest space and airiness even at the risk at appearing bare. This will also lighten the burden of the housekeeper, and your choice pieces of porcelain or pottery will have a renewed interest when they come to light again in the fall. A few cut flowers in pretty vases, a potted fern or two, and the books and magazines that the family enjoy will be quite enough to make the room attractive, and the moments saved in dusting will give the busy housewife time to look cool and dainty herself.

The most effective way of really cooling the air is by tempering the light. There is no more successful way of accomplishing this than with the old fashioned shutters. The possessors of such old fashioned homes are indeed to be envied on the hot breathless days when they can retreat behind these cool dark screens during the middle of the day, the freshness of the early morning still lingering in the rooms, while later in the day, the shutters are thrown wide again to let in the cool evening air. But in most modern houses this effect must be attained by the use of shades and curtains. A dull grey green is the best color for the blinds, and if possible use inner curtains of some material that, while looking fresh and cool, is still thick enough to exclude much of the light. These should be arranged so that they may be easily drawn back to let in the air when it is not sunny. Either the plain or printed linens make an ideal material for this purpose. The windows should be closed during the hottest part of the day, but the remainder of the time should be opened as wide as possible to let in plenty of fresh air.

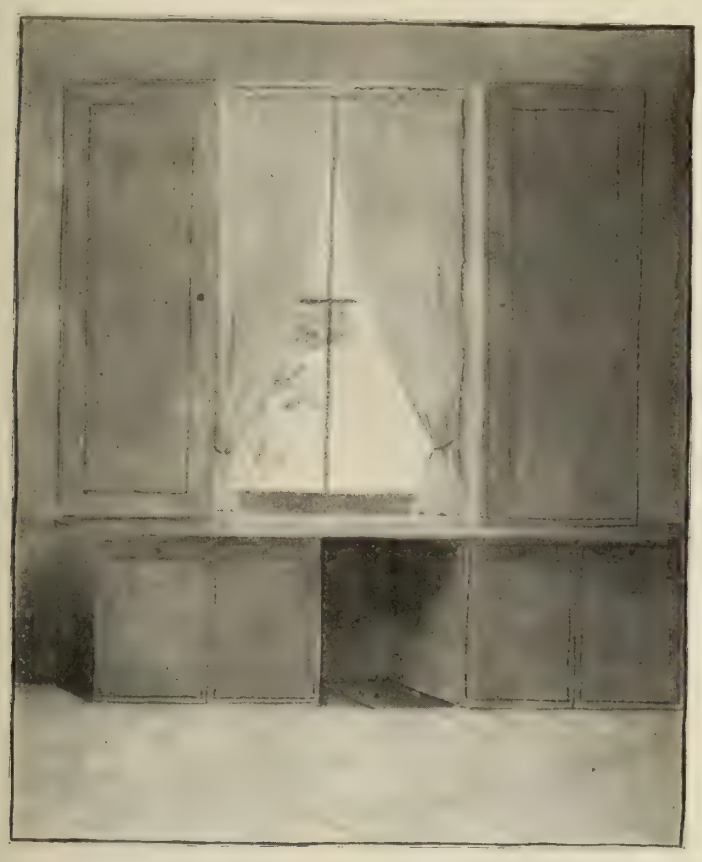
Where possible replace heavy covers with tub materials—stencilled linen is always pretty; banish unnecessary cushions giving those that remain dainty but serviceable wash covers.

It may be difficult to bring color to your assistance unless you have counted on summer changes in planning the original color scheme for your room, but if it is possible it will help greatly in getting a cool and pleasant effect. Shades of blue give the coolest effect, but greys, grey greens, and heliotrope and lilac shades are all cool and pretty. The greyer tones of any color are cooler than the brighter ones, and sometimes the most we can accomplish is to remove the brightest notes of color from a room and replace them with lower tones.

Flowers and plants about a house help to make it look cool with their suggestion of shady out of door corners, the white, blue and lilac colors or foliage alone being best to use in a sunny room, while if the effect is already cool and dark we may venture to use the brighter colors of such flowers as nasturtiums, poppies or orange lilies.



A PLEASANT WORK CORNER.

* * *

CONVENIENT CORNERS.

WE all agree that the beauty of a home must be based on neatness and order, and our mothers taught us when we were quite small that this can only be achieved by having a place for everything and everything in its place. But in a small home, or, indeed, in a large one, entirely suitable places for all the things that must be disposed of are sometimes difficult to find. We select some convenient spot where we lay away our small possessions in most orderly array, but as they slowly accumulate, as they seem to do with even the most reckless destroying of the worn out and old fashioned, we find ourselves in the position of the college girl who had a place for everything, and everything in its place, and that place the top dresser drawer. A miniature housecleaning and a stowing away in boxes restores things to order once more, but alas! we soon discover that this time it is not a convenient place and even prolonged searching sometimes fails to disclose just where things are laid away. But with a little careful planning and perhaps the aid of a carpenter, even a small house may be made to hold more than one could hope, and still look dainty, airy and fresh, without the suggestion of overcrowding. The solution seems to be in cupboards, closets, and pigeon-holes, numerous and well arranged.

A small cabinet for medicines will help in keeping things neat and orderly. This will be convenient if placed in the bathroom, and may often be built into the wall, thus taking up no extra room. It may be quite small, a couple of shelves and one small drawer being quite sufficient. If there is an invalid in the family, a medicine cabinet in the bedroom will be useful, and in that case the outside may be made pretty enough to be an additional decoration to the room.

The roll-top desk and the built in bookcase, or the many pretty ones in the shop from which we may choose solve the problem of how to keep books and papers in order, but a satisfactory sewing table is not so readily found, though one that is well equipped and light enough to be easily moved from one place to another will save much time and keep all the little necessities for sewing safely out of the way. A pretty and useful little table has one shallow drawer just beneath the flat top that is arranged with rows of stiff wire uprights to hold spools in much the same way as they are kept in the shops. So many of them accumulate in the various numbers in cotton and colors in silks, that it is a comfort to have then placed where they will not unwind and tangle and where the desired spool can be found at a glance. At the end of this drawer a small compartment is made for holding scissors and thimbles. Below this are three small drawers, the first divided into compartments for buttons and fastenings of various kinds, the second holding supplies for darning, and the third tapes and edgings. Near the bottom is a shallow tray where odds and ends of sewing may be placed while one is at work.

The carefully planned kitchen cabinets that are to be had now at any furniture dealers, have surely found a place for everything that a busy cook could need, but often a more pretty and attractive kitchen may be made by doing the planning onesself, and having the cupboards built in. A convenient arrangement, and one that makes a pleasant place to work, has a cupboard running beneath the window with a flat table top, and spaces below for flour and meals of different kinds. Above this on either side of the window cupboards are built into the wall, one to hold spices and other materials required in cooking, the other to hold cooking utensils. Another convenient kitchen cupboard has no shelves, only small hooks in the back from which the various small articles in constant use about the kitchen may be hung, and where they are found much more readily than if put away on shelves.

A small corner closet opening either into the kitchen or pantry, makes a most convenient place for keeping the cleaning utensils—brooms, mops and dusters.

Pictures, 2½ x 4¼ inches.

Price, $15.00

Kodak catalogue free at the dealers or by mail.

The 1A Special Folding Pocket KODAK

Here is quality and efficiency in small compass—and such simplicity that anyone can make good pictures from the very start.

Fitted with our quiet ball bearing shutter with a range of exposure from $\frac{1}{100}$ of a second to "time," and a superior Rapid Rectilinear lens; has every adjustment that is desirable in a hand camera. Loads in daylight with Kodak film cartridges for six or twelve exposures. Made of aluminum and covered with fine seal grain leather.

A dependable camera of quality.

CANADIAN KODAK CO.
LIMITED
TORONTO - CANADA

When the time comes to send the children away to school be prepared to meet the extra expense. Put away a little money for that purpose every year. Every dollar saved now means less privation for you and a better education for the children. We pay 3 per cent on savings accounts.

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$47,000,000

The Traders Bank of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada. Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Gowns for Summer Functions

SUMMER functions are apt to take place out of doors and bring the demand for just such costumes as the two illustrated.

The one to the left is made of eyelet embroidered linen combined with plain. It is exceedingly attractive, in the height of style, and the model is among the latest and smartest to have appeared. The skirt is cut in three pieces, and can be finished either with the high or natural waist line. The coat can be made just as illustrated with the big revers and round collar or with the sailor collar, but big pointed revers are greatly liked and are much to be desired. For midsummer wear, the eyelet embroidery is one of the most fashionable of all materials, but this suit could be made from any material adapted to street use with equal success. Plain linen made in such way would make a most satisfactory costume for general wear. Serge made after the same model would be excellent for travel, and for the incoming season.

For the medium size the coat will require 4¼ yards of material 27 inches wide, 2¾ yards 36 or 2½ yards 44; for the skirt will be needed 4½ yards 27 or 36, or 2¾ yards 44, with 2 yards of linen 27 inches wide to trim the entire gown. The pattern of the coat, 7044, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust; the skirt, 6827, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist.

The semi-princess gown shown to the right is an exceedingly dainty one. The sleeves and the blouse are cut in one and the skirt is five-gored. The trimming gives the fashionable panel effect. In this instance, the gown is made from marquisette and is embroidered by hand and trimmed with lace banding, but the model will be found appropriate for all the materials that are thin enough to be tucked successfully, and, in place of the embroidery can be used wider banding or applique or inset medallions, or any preferred trimming, or wide and narrow bands could be used on the skirt with two rows of lace applied within the panels, following the line of the lower one. Flowered cotton voiles are among the latest materials. This gown made from one of these, trimmed with lace insets only would be exceedingly attractive, and there are a great many other ways in which the design can be utilized.

For a woman of medium size will be required 8 yards of material 27 inches wide, 5¾ yards 36, or 5¼ yards 44, with 20 yards of insertion.

The pattern, 7023, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust.

Pretty Frocks for Little Girls

LITTLE girls are wearing dresses of many different styles this season, but there are no two models that are more fashionable or more attractive than these.

The dress to the left is made with peasant sleeves and with a little panel and yoke that are novel and attractive in the extreme. In this instance, the material is rose-colored linen and the panel and yoke are made of white eyelet embroidery, while the edges of the dress have been scalloped and worked with eyelets. The combination is most dainty and summer-like, and the frock one of the prettiest possible. Loose sleeves are becoming to little children and the scalloped edges are extremely fashionable, but, if preferred, the sleeves could be gathered into bands and the neck made with a standing collar. The closing is made invisibly at the back. The body and skirt portions are cut in one, so that the dress is very simple and easily made.

For the 6-year size will be required 3½ yards of material 27 inches wide, 1¾ yards 36 or 44, with 1 yard of all-over embroidery 18 inches wide.

The pattern of the dress, 7074, is cut in sizes for children of 4, 6 and 8 years of age; the embroidery pattern, 583, includes four yards.

The dress made in sailor style is always a favorite for the younger girls. This one includes a straight skirt that can be either plaited or gathered, and a collar that can be made square or round. In the illustration the material is linen, but frocks of this kind are made from various washable materials, from serge, from flannel, from cashmere, and, indeed, from very simple childish material with the collar either of the same or in contrast, as liked. The skirt is joined to a body lining and this lining is faced to form the shield. The blouse is separate. In this case, the lower edges of the sleeves are tucked to form cuffs, but they can be joined to straight cuffs to match the collar, if preferred. The linen illustrated is a fashionable as well as a satisfactory material, and will be quite appropriate for many weeks to come, but this same dress could be made of white serge with collar of blue or of blue serge with collar of white, to be exceedingly smart and to become available for cooler days.

For the 10-year size will be required 6 yards of material 27 inches wide, 4¾ yards 36 or 3 yards 44, with ½-yard 27 inches wide for the collar when made of contrasting material.

The pattern, 7096, is cut in sizes for girls from 6 to 12 years of age.

Many Materials

AN exceptional popularity for lingerie dresses is reported this year. The business done in these lines has even exceeded the expectations which emphasizes the fact that this summer will be pre-eminently a dress season.

A variety of materials which range all the way from checked ginghams to fine cotton voiles and marquisettes are shown in lingerie dresses. Cotton voiles are said to be exceptionally strong, while the great favor demonstrated for marquisettes has not subsided. The voiles are shown in white and colors. Cross bar effects and corded or satin stripes are good. Bandings of laces and embroideries are everywhere prominent in the white dresses; these are often used in connection with strappings of colored materials in soft shades of pale blue, pink, etc.

Empire styles, kimono sleeves, and low necks in round and square effects are features. The use of ribbons for trim-

Dress Pattern No. 7074
Embrnidery Pattern No. 583

Dress Pattern No. 7096

Coat Pattern No. 7044
Skirt Pattern No. 6827

Dress Pattern No. 7023

mings is quite a prominent feature. A sash of black velvet ribbon with long ends hanging down the left side in front is one of the latest ideas for wearing with lingerie dresses.

Striped linen dresses trimmed with white embroideries have been good sellers, and a demand is reported for white mulls.

Cotton foulards with Persian banding effects enjoy great favor. Ginghams in plaids and checks trimmed with plain colors have sold well.

Cassimere-de-soie, a non-transparent silk and wool material, which is almost as light weight as chiffon, is a new feature in New York. Batistes in plain colors with trimmings of Irish or Maltese laces are favorably talked of.

In the spring lines foulard silks have been very popular, and a continuation of this trade is expected for some time at least. Natural sheer linen in hand-embroidered effect are shown.

With the Fashionable Fichu

THE gown that is worn with a fichu is exceedingly fashionable this season, and it is so dainty, so essentially feminine and so thoroughly charming that its popularity is likely to be continued through several seasons. In the illustration, the gown is made of figured net, trimmed with flounces of lace edged with silk, and the fichu is of plain white net, trimmed with lace of the sort. The effect is one of unusual charm. The skirt is cut to the high waist line and makes its own finish. If liked, the fichu could be omitted, for the blouse and skirt make a complete costume without. This blouse is cut out to form a square neck and trimmed with straight banding, but the model is a plain one that can be treated in several ways. It is fitted by means of under-arm gores that are extended into the sleeve portions to form gussets. The neck can be round or high, or square, and the sleeves can be left loose or gathered into bands.

The skirt is six-gored. In this case, it is made without the trimming portions, and the straight ruffles are arranged over it, but the pattern includes trimming portions as indicated in the back view. No prettier nor more fashionable model for a summer dinner gown could be found, but one of the great advantages of this design is to be found in the fact that it can be used for many purposes. The skirt without the ruffles and either with or without the trimming portions, becomes adapted to tailors' materials, and makes an excellent model for the suit or the odd skirt of the incoming season. The blouse is equally satisfactory for the entire gown, and for wear with the separate skirt. The fichu can be terminated at the under-arms, as in this instance, or extended to form a sash, and it can be made either double or single.

For a woman of medium size the fichu will require 2 yards of material 36 inches wide, with 6 yards of banding and 9 yards of lace; for the blouse will be needed 2¼ yards 27, 1¾ yards 36 or 1¼ yards 44 inches wide, and for the skirt 6 yards 27, 4 yards 36, or 3½ yards 44 when material has no up and down, but if there is figure or nap 6¾ yards 27, 4½ yards 36 or 4¼ yards 44 inches wide will be required. To make the three ruffles will require 11 yards of lace with ¾-yard 21 inches wide for the silk banding.

The pattern of the fichu, 7056, is cut in one size only. The blouse, 7060, in sizes from 34 to 44 bust. The skirt, 6989, in sizes from 22 to 32 waist.

A Dainty Midsummer Gown

NO material makes dainter or more attractive midsummer gowns than embroidered Swiss muslin. This one is trimmed with Irish lace and with little frills. It is smart and in every way to desired. The blouse is one of the very new ones made with a sailor collar, and it can be finished with straight bands of trimming, as in this instance, or with shaped cuffs. If under sleeves are liked, they can be used, but the simple straight sleeves finished with frills are new and fashionable.

The skirt is cut in four gores, and the front and the back gores are stitched to give a box-plait effect. It can be made either to the high or natural waist line. The trimming over the hips and the trimming above a wide hem make an exceedingly smart combination, and one that is greatly liked, but the skirt is a plain one that can be trimmed in any way that may be liked. If a high neck blouse is preferred this one can be finished with the regulation stock collar and worn either with or without the sailor collar. The model will be found a most satisfactory one for the incoming season as well as for the present.

For the medium size the blouse will require 2 yards of material 27 inches wide, 1⅜ yards 36 or 44, with ⅝-yard 18 inches wide for the sailor collar and ⅞-yard of banding for the sleeves; for the skirt will be needed 5 yards 27 or 36, or 3¾ yards 44 inches wide, with 3½ yards of lace banding. When the plaits are laid flat the skirt measures 2½ yards at the lower edge.

The pattern of the blouse, 7086, is cut in sizes 34 to 42 inches bust. The skirt, 7094, in sizes from 22 to 34 inches waist.

Frocks for Young Girls

DRESSES that are made with the high waist line are the preferred ones for young girls. Here are two that are charming. They are youthful and attractive at the same time that they are in the height of style, and both will be found available for small women.

The dress to the left is made in semi-princess style with the skirt and blouse joined and closed together at the back. Both blouse and skirt are made of contrasting materials and the effect is a most attractive one. Eyelet embroidery and batiste are the materials shown, with the yoke of Irish crochet and trimming of ball fringe, but frocks such as this one can be made available for morning wear if plain material is used, for afternoon occasions when treated after such a manner as this one. The skirt gives the panel effect at front and back that is new and smart, and the blouse includes pretty close fitting under sleeves. If liked, it can be made high at the neck with a stock collar.

For the 16-year size will be required 3½ yards of all-over embroidery 44 inches wide, with 2⅛ yards of plain material 27 and ⅞-yard of all-over lace 18 inches wide to make as illustrated. To make of one material throughout will be needed 6¼ yards 27, 4¾ yards 36, or 3¾ yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, 7075, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The second dress is made with separate blouse and skirt, but the skirt is finished with a band of embroidery at the upper edge and adjusted over the blouse to give the semi-princess effect. Both are closed at the left of the front, and, if liked, they can be stitched together. The little chemisette and under sleeves are in every way attractive and the six-gored skirt can be trimmed just as illustrated or in any way that may be preferred. In this case, a band is arranged over it eleven inches from the lower edge and it is continued over the seam at the left of the front, but there are various ways in which this dress could be trimmed. A pretty effect could be obtained by scalloping the edges of the blouse and by lapping the edges of the skirt where now there is banding and scalloping to match. Scallops are greatly in vogue and any trimming that means hand-work is always distinctive, collarless necks are greatly in vogue, and much to be desired whenever becoming, but a stock collar can be added to the chemisette whenever desirable.

For a girl of sixteen years of age the blouse will require 2⅛ yards of material 27 or 36, or 1⅛ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾-yard 18 inches wide for the chemisette and under sleeves; for the skirt will be needed 5¼ yards 27, 3½ yards 36, or 3¼ yards 44; to trim the entire frock will require 6 yards of banding.

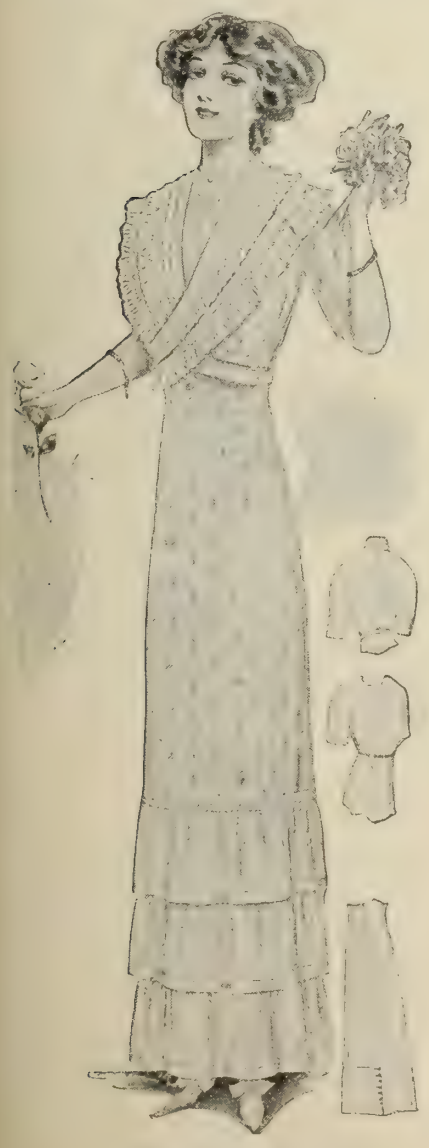
The pattern of the blouse, 7092, and of the skirt, 7093, are both cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Miladi's Handbag

NOT for a long, long time has there been such a radical change in fashions in handbags as this season has witnessed. The very practical leather bag has been the accompaniment of almost every costume for three or four years, but it is now temporarily in oblivion. All manner of gay, pretty and frivolous-looking bags have become the fad, but the fancy will probably be worn out in a season or two. The very fact that even the more elaborate ones are daily increasing in size seems to augur a speedy return to the more practical leather bag. Indeed it is so convenient as to have become almost a necessity.

In Paris the main idea in regard to the handbag seems to be to have it as large as possible. The larger it is the smarter the effect, so it is believed. They are shown square, oblong, or perfectly round in shape, while others are square at the top and taper to a point at the bottom. Some of the shapes are unique and really beautiful, but their most fascinating feature is their flatness. However large the bag may be, it must not bulge. In some of the bags, the real place for holding things is very limited, being only at the top; the sides of the bag are stitched together at a certain distance down, while a fringe weights the edge. The more expensive ones have a touch of gold. In fact, in spite of its large size, everything about the new handbag reveals that it is much more a thing of beauty than of practical use.

Gold and silver mesh bags are still being carried, and the familiar beaded bag has come into new favor. Tapestry bags are quite a novelty, and some of them are very pretty, when the



Fichu Pattern No. 7056
Waist Pattern No. 7060
Skirt Pattern No. 6989

Waist Pattern No. 7086
Skirt Pattern No. 7094

Dress Pattern No. 7075

Waist Pattern No. 7092
Skirt Pattern No. 7093

Jaeger Pure Wool Summer Shirts

The ordinary shirt is not quite good enough for the fastidious dresser.

Jaeger Pure Wool Summer Shirts appeal to him. The excellence of the material and the tasteful colorings, style, fit and finish are on a par with the quality. Send for samples of the material.

TRADE MARK

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Co. Limited

231 YONGE STREET - - - - - TORONTO
316 St. Catherine St. West - - - - Montreal
Steele Block, Portage Ave. - - - - - Winnipeg

A SAVING FOR ALL

BY OUR

PROGRESSIVE CLUB PLAN

Every year our subscribers send us thousands of new subscriptions, some are gifts, others from friends to whom they have recommended the Journal. These subscriptions may be scattered over several weeks or months. By this plan they will all get the benefit of the club rate. It will

SAVE YOUR FRIENDS MONEY
PAY FOR YOUR RENEWAL
LOWER THE GIFT PRICES

The start of the club is two yearly subscriptions for $1.50, each additional order before January 15th reduces the price.

EVERY ONE OF OUR 100,000 READERS SHOULD HELP US GROW.

CUT OUT AND PASTE ON POST CARD

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL:

I may be able to interest some friends, and I may send some gift subscriptions. Please tell me your "Progressive Club Plan."

Also send free sample copies to attached list of names. I will ask each for an order.

Name _____

Address _____

SEND THIS NOW AND HAVE FIVE MONTHS TO BUILD YOUR CLUB

colors are not too bright. The tapestries are intended as imitations of the wonderful old-time Gobelins, and the frames are usually of gold or silver.

Many handsome bags are designed especially to suit the costume with which they are to be carried, and a fashionable shop showed last week a window full of new bags, each one accompanied by a parasol that matched it exactly.

Romper Pattern No. 6273

Child's Rompers

THERE is no garment that the little child wears that is more serviceable or more to be desired than this one. It can be drawn on over the frock and used to protect it, or it can be worn in place thereof and it is roomy and com-Gingham, chambray, percale, all the inexpensive printed wash fabrics, are appropriate and also the sturdier linen and galatea for very hard usage. In this instance chambray is finished with plain stitched edges and the rompers are made high at the neck with a standing collar and with long sleeves. A rolled-over collar could be substituted, however, or the neck could be cut out square and three-quarter sleeves can be used in place of the long ones.

The rompers are made with front portions and legs that are cut in one and with the back portion of the body. The leg portions are gathered and joined to a band and are buttoned into place and the lower edges are finished with hems in which elastic is inserted to regulate the size. The sleeves are the simple full ones that are finished with straight bands, or cuffs, and the belt keeps the garment in position.

The quantity of material required for the medium size (6 years) is 3¾ yards 24 or 27, 2¼ yards 36 inches wide.

The pattern 6273 is cut in sizes for children of 2, 4, 6 and 8 years of age.

Child's Dress with Bloomers

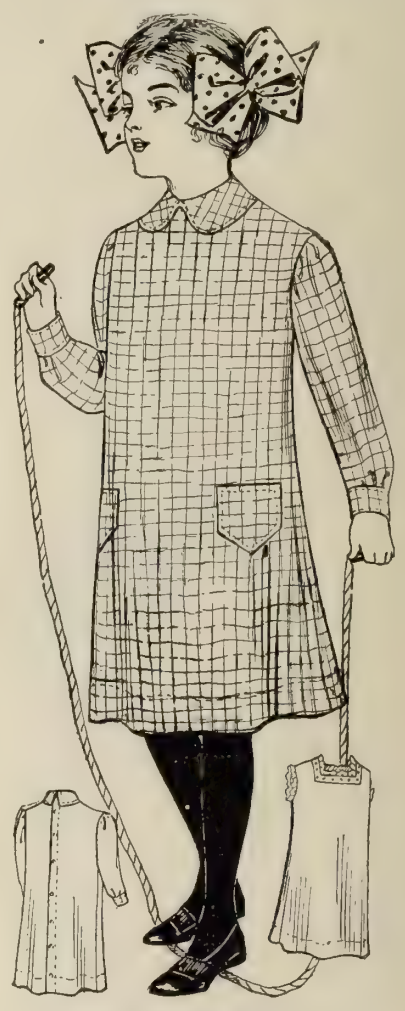
SUCH dresses as this one that are cut with waist and skirt portions in one are much liked for the little girls and are especially in demand at this season when washable materials are being made up. This one can be made either with the square neck or high, and it is equally desirable in both styles. It can be trimmed with bands or contrasting material as illustrated, or with banding as liked, or the edges could be scalloped and embroidered if a very dainty effect were wanted. Chambray is the material illustrated, and the bands are of white linen, but little girls wear linen and percales and all sturdy materials of the sort for morning, and the same dress would be pretty made from white lawn or Dresden dimity for afternoon occasions. There are accompanying bloomers which dispense with the need of petticoats and mean both comfort for the child and relief for the washwoman, but these can be used or omitted as occasion demands.

The dress is made with front and back portions, and is laid in tucks at the shoulders. It is closed to the left of the front in the fashionable Russian style. Whether the sleeves are long or short they are gathered into bands. The bloomers are circular and fitted by means of darts over the hips so that there is no fulness at the waist band.

The quantity of material required for the medium size, 14 years, is 5 yards 24 or 27, 3¾ yards 32, or 3 yards 44 inches wide, with ¾-yard 27 for trimming.

The pattern, 6605, is cut in sizes for children of 2, 4 and 6 years of age.

Dress Pattern No. 6605



Apron Pattern No. 6775

Girl's Apron

APRONS that really cover the dress are what active girls require. This one can be made simply and plainly, as in this case, or with square neck, or without sleeves and without pockets, as shown in the small view. It is simple and easily made. It is practical and protective. It is in every way suited to the hours of play. Gingham, chambray, linen and a great many of the inexpensive wash fabrics are appropriate for the apron with sleeves, lawns and the like for the one made as shown in the back view.

The apron is made with fronts and backs. When high neck is used the collar is joined to the edge. The sleeves are moderately full, and finished with straight bands.

The quantity of material required for 12-year size is 5 yards 24 or 27, or 3¼ yards 36 inches wide.

The pattern, 6775, is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10, 12, and 14 years of age.

Muslin Underwear

IT is noted that all classes of garments, regardless of price, are made of soft materials in sympathy with the prevailing garment style, which is close fitting. The fit of undermuslins is being more carefully looked to by manufacturers this season than ever before, and the result of this extra care bestowed upon them is to be found in a bigger variety of acceptable garments at popular prices than was hitherto produced.

Suit Pattern No. 6703

Boy's Suit

THERE is no suit that is better adapted to the small boy than this one made in blouse style with the big becoming sailor collar. It will be found appropriate for linen and for galatea, for madras and similar materials and it also is well adapted to the suit of cooler weather made from serge, shepherd's check and similar materials. For dressy occasions the same model will be pretty made from silk, and ribbed silk is much liked, white for really formal occasions, dark color for those of more frequent occurrence.

The suit is made with blouse and knickerbockers. The blouse consists of front and back portions, the front being tucked to give the effect of a wide box plait while the sailor collar is arranged over the shoulders. There is a standing collar at the neck edge. The sleeves are in one piece each, tucked at the wrists. The knickerbockers are made in regulation style, drawn up by means of elastic inserted in hems at the lower edges.

The quantity of material required for the medium size (4 years) is 3⅞ yards of material 24 or 27, 3⅜ yards 32 or 2¼ yards 44 inches wide with 4¼ yards of braid.

The pattern 6703 is cut in sizes for boys of 2, 4 and 6 years of age.

Boy's Sailor Blouse Suit

THE sailor blouse suit is a becoming and altogether satisfactory one for the younger boys. It means comfort to them and it means general neatness and attractive effect. This one is made with the deep sailor collar that is so well liked this season and with a separate shield and will be found available for all seasonable materials. Blue linen makes this one and the shield is of white, but galateas are much liked for boys' suits, cotton repp and khaki are much used also and for the really warm weather washable materials of still lighter weight are called into requisition. For immediate wear serge or shepherd's check with shield of white would be smart and altogether desirable. Blue serge is always pretty and blue seems to suit the sailor costume especially well.

The suit consists of blouse and trousers. The blouse is finished with hems at the front edges and with the sailor collar at the neck. There is a hem at the lower edge in which elastic can be inserted. The separate shield is adjusted under it and buttoned into place beneath the collar while it is closed at the back. The full sleeves are made in one piece each and gathered into bands. The trousers can be gathered into bands at the lower edge and finished with bands to which buckles are attached to regulate the size, or they can be turned up and hemmed and elastic be inserted as preferred.

Suit Pattern No. 6643

The quantity of material required for the medium size (10 years) is 5¼ yards 24 or 27, 4¼ yards 44 or 3 yards 52 inches wide.

The pattern 6643 is cut in sizes for girls of 8, 10 and 12 years of age.

Suit Pattern No. 6717

Boy's Suit

THE suit with the side-front closing is always a favorite for the small boy, and this model is simple as well as smart. It will be found appropriate for linen, galatea and all similar mate-

Dye Those Summer Things

Scores of summer things, such as fancy parasols, bathing suits, colored stockings, ribbons, feathers and artificial flowers, hammocks and cushion covers get faded and dingy long before they are worn out.

WITH MAYPOLE SOAP

The clean, easy home dye, you can give them a new lease of life, usefulness and beauty, and save many a dollar. No stained hands or kettles, no muss, no work to speak of—24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10c—black 15c—at your dealer's or post paid with free Booklet, "How to Dye," from

FRANK L. BENEDICT & CO. = MONTREAL

THE ONLY PROCESS THAT WILL PERMANENTLY REMOVE

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR

The harm that is being done and the misery that is so often caused to sensitive women that have been tempted by false and misleading statements in the announcements and literature of makers of depilatories is appaling. For twenty years we have been treating the victims of these people. Thousands of women have told us they would have had but few hairs, if they had not used various preparations promised to destroy the growth. The only process known to science that will eradicate the blemish was abused as a scar maker and too painful to undertake. Yet thousands of women, both strong and delicate are being successfully treated by us every year, by our reliable and antiseptic method of which, in a practically painless manner, destroys hairs on the lips, cheeks, chin, neck, between the eyes and on the hands and arms. It also destroys "Cowlicks", mouse marks and other birth marks, moles, warts, red veins, etc. Don't pull out hairs but come to us during the National Exposition, if you live out of town, and have the work done. Remember we assure satisfaction in each case. Write for booklet "H" and further information regarding any Skin, Scalp, Hair or Complexional trouble.

ELECTROLYSIS

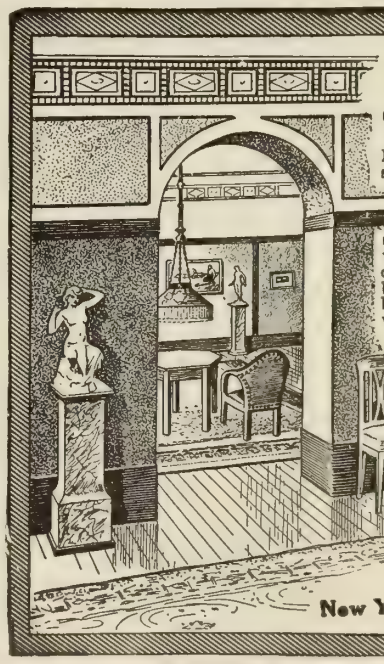
HISCOTT DERMATOLOGICAL INSTITUTE

HISCOTT BLDG., 61 COLLEGE STREET, TORONTO



MURESCO

Only One Coat Required. Easy to apply.

Muresco can be applied by anyone, to any kind of surface. It will not rub off or peel, shows no laps, spots or brush marks, and is the only material producing that flat, subdued, velvety effect, so much admired. It is made in a large variety of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be recoated any number of times and removed easily by washing when desired, thus insuring walls being kept in perfect condition. Beware of wall finishes containing lime or plaster that cannot be removed by washing when desired; they are neither practical nor sanitary, and will eventually peel off, leaving the walls in ruined condition.

Muresco is in use by the best decorators in the country, and sold by leading paint dealers everywhere.

Send for sample cards, descriptive matter and prices.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited

Sole Mfgs., Toronto, Canada

New York Chicago Carteret Cleveland

"NIAGARA TO THE SEA"

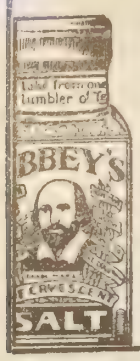
An Ideal Vacation Outing via the

Richelieu & Ontario Navigation Co.

For Rates, Folder, etc., address

THOS. HENRY, Traffic Manager, MONTREAL

H. FOSTER CHAFFEE, A.G.P.A., TORONTO



Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

A wise person knows when to use Abbey's salt.

Don't you think it time to get a bottle?

25c and 60c.

Sold everywhere.

82

Home Dressmaking

is simplified by using the celebrated

Hall-Borchert Adjustable Forms

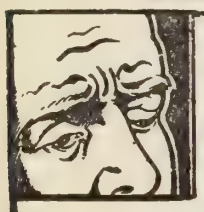
Adjustable to every size from 32 to 44 bust measure and can be raised to suit length of skirt.

Write to-day for our New Catalog. It shows a full line of Dressmakers' Forms.

CLATWORTHY & SON, Ltd.

Display Fixture Manufacturers

161 King St. West, TORONTO



A New Head in 30 Minutes

Exchange that aching, throbbing, suffering, muddled head for a clear, cool, comfortable one by taking a

NA-DRU-CO Headache Wafer

25c. a box at your druggists' or by mail from

NATIONAL DRUG and CHEMICAL CO. of Canada, Limited, Montreal. 28A

Oxide of Zinc

Vaseline

Quickly Heals Eruptions Sores and Wounds

12 Vaseline Remedies in Tubes

Capsicum, Borated, Mentholated, White Carbolated, Camphor Ice, Camphorated, etc. Each for special purposes. Write for Free Vaseline Book.

Chesebrough Mfg. Co. 1880 Chabot Ave Montreal

"CEE-TEE" UNDERWEAR

Always feels good

From first to last "Ceetee" Underclothing delights all folks—perfect fitting, healthy and comfortable.

Look for the "sheep" trademark. Insist on your dealer showing you "Ceetee." In all sizes for men, women and children.

The C. Turnbull Co. of Galt, Ltd.

Manufacturers—Estb. 1859

Galt • Ontario 2604

rials and is also well adapted to a suit for cooler weather made from heavier materials.

The suit consists of the blouse and knickerbockers. The blouse is made simply with fronts and back, and closes with buttons and buttonholes, while the sleeves are laid in tucks at the wrists. The knickerbockers are of the regulation sort, drawn up by means of elastic at the knees.

Blouse Pattern No. 7070

The quantity of material required for the medium size, 4 years, is 3¼ yards 27, 2⅝ yards 36, or 2 yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, 6717, is cut in sizes for boys of 2, 4 and 6 years of age.

Plain Shirt Waist

THE plain shirt waist that is made in peasant style is a new and smart one. This one is finished with the regulation box plait and with regulation sleeves, but it is no trouble to make, as the sleeves make part of the waist and do not require fitting to the armholes. The under-arm gores that are extended into the sleeve portions to form gussets provide additional freedom and snug fit. In the illustration, French percale is finished with simple stitching, but waists of this kind are made from all simple, seasonable materials, silk and flannel, as well as the washable ones.

The blouse is made with two main portions, that are joined at the center back, and the under-arm gores. The openings in the sleeves are finished with over-laps and the straight cuffs are joined to the lower edges. The pocket can be used or omitted as liked. The neck can be finished either with a neck-band or round collar.

For the medium size will be required 2⅜ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 36 or 44 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 7070, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44 inch bust measure.

House Jacket

BREAKFAST jackets that can be belted are always desirable ones. This one can be treated in that way or left loose as preferred, and it also allows a choice for square or high neck, elbow or long sleeves, so that it really supplies every demand. Ring dotted cotton foulard is the material illustrated with trimming of beading threaded with ribbon. When made with square neck the fronts are cut out but the back is left high.

The jacket is made with fronts and back. The fronts are slightly full and finished with hems. When cut out to form the square they are joined to a narrow band, when made high they are finished with the rolled-over collar. The elbow sleeves are made simply in one piece each, gathered at their upper edges. The long sleeves are moderately full and gathered into bands at the wrists.

The quantity of material required for the medium size is 4 yards 27, 3¾ yards

Apron Pattern No. 6952

32, or 2 yards 44 inches wide, with 2¼ yards of banding.

The pattern, 6580, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44-inch bust measure.

House Jacket Pattern No. 6580

Work Apron

THE apron that is becoming and attractive, at the same time that it is protective, is the perfect one. Here is a model that, added to all its other advantages is easy to make and easy to slip on and off. It is supplied with big pockets that add to its convenience.

The apron is made with front and side portions. The front is extended to form straps and the side portions are lapped at the back. There is a belt which is attached to one side of the apron and buttoned into place at the other. The straps are crossed and buttoned to the belt. The pockets are arranged over the side-fronts and stitched to position.

For the medium size the apron will require 4¾ yards of material 27 or 36 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 6952, is cut in three sizes, small 34 or 36, medium 38 or 40, large 42 or 44 inches bust.

H.P. SAUCE

is being widely imitated. So be careful of the bottle you buy.

H.P. Sauce has a Taste, a Quality, a Value all its own. It is a Sauce of Character

That's the bottle

Oriental Fruits and Spices blended cunningly with pure malt vinegar — that's the secret of H.P.'s wondrous flavour.

That's the bottle

Hot or cold meats, fish, flesh, or bread and cheese, H.P. works wonders with them all Grocers sell H.P.

Baby's Own Soap

unequalled for toilet and nursery use.

"Best for baby —best for you."

Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited Mfrs., Montreal.

E511

THE COAST LINE TO MACKINAC

DETROIT CLEVELAND BUFFALO NIAGARA FALLS

TOLEDO PT. HURON GODERICH ALPENA ST. IGNACE

THE LUXURY OF A LAKE TRIP

Where will you spend your summer vacation? Why not enjoy the charms of our Inland Seas, the most pleasant and economical outing in America?

Where You Can Go

Daily service is operated between Detroit and Cleveland, Detroit and Buffalo; four trips weekly between Toledo, Detroit, Mackinac Island and way ports; three trips weekly between Toledo, Cleveland and Put-in-Bay.

A Cleveland to Mackinac special steamer will be operated two trips weekly from June 15th to September 10th, stopping only at Detroit every trip and Goderich, Ont., every other trip.

Special Day Trips Between Detroit and Cleveland, During July and August

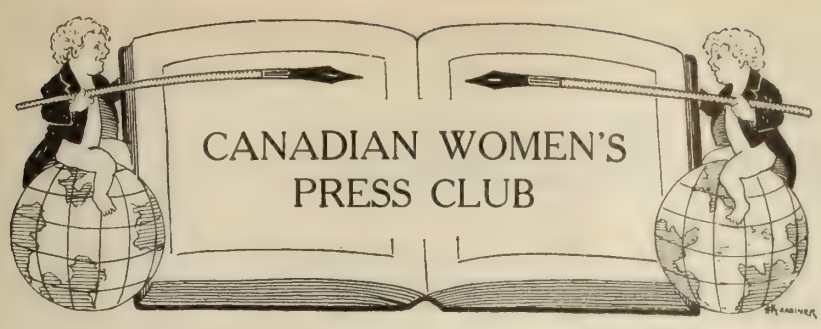
Send 2 cent stamp for Illustrated Pamphlet and Great Lakes Map.

Address: L. G. Lewis, G. P. A. Detroit, Michigan

Philip H. McMillan, President

A. A. Schantz, General Manager

Detroit & Cleveland Nav. Co.



THE Winnipeg branch of the C.W.P.C. will celebrate its fourth birthday next September. The air of the West has agreed with it splendidly, and it is healthy, strong and well developed. It started life in a very unpretentious manner, the outgrowth of a social gathering, following the 1907 Annual Meeting of the Dominion Club at Winnipeg, and its birthplace was the home of Mrs. Rockwell C. Osborne, who is president of the branch for the current year. Of charter members, there were about six or eight, and it was a mutual privilege when the election of officers resulted in Miss E. Cora Hind becoming first President. Miss Lillian K. Beynon held the position of MISS E. CORA HIND.

Secretary for the first year, and Miss Mary S. Mantle is the present Secretary. The branch now has twenty-seven members, and the different lines of work they undertake are both representative and interesting. Society, commercial, musical, theatrical, medical and municipal, home departments, children's departments, book reviews, poetry, literary notes, magazine articles, advertising, reporting, editing and authorship. All these branches of literary work have their representatives in the Winnipeg Women's Press Club.

The following brief accounts of the work of some of the members may be of general interest:—

Miss Lillian K. Beynon might be called a product of the West, although she was born in old Ontario. She came West when quite young, graduated from Manitoba University, and for six years taught in the public and high schools of the province. Five years ago she entered journalism as assistant editor of the weekly Free Press. Later she was editor of the "Woman's Department" in both the weekly and daily Free Press, where she is known as Lillian Laurie. At present, Miss Beynon is a regular contributor to the Free Press, does free lance work, and is organizer for the Women's Section of the Saskatchewan University Extension Department.

Miss Ella Cora Hind is a charter member of C.W.P.C. She is the commercial editor of the Manitoba Free Press, Western correspondent of the Canadian Farm, Toronto, editor "Woman's Quiet Hour," in Western Home Monthly, and "The Woman About Town," in Winnipeg Town Topics. Miss Hind also contributes to English papers letters on commercial and agricultural subjects. She was the first president of the Winnipeg local branch.

Mrs. C. P. Walker devotes herself to musical and dramatic work. She is press agent for the Walker Theatre, and for Mr. C. P. Walker's other theatres. Mrs. Walker is part owner of Town Topics, Winnipeg, and contributes to it, "The Matinee Girl," and the "Drama" sections. Mrs. Walker contributed to the Canadian Home Journal last summer a most entertaining account of her musical and dramatic career.

Mrs. Frederick Livesay, "Kilmeny" (formerly Florence Hamilton Randal, of Compton, Quebec), is editor of Children's Page, weekly Free Press, Winnipeg, and special writer. Her first verse and sketches appeared in the Canadian Magazine, Saturday Night and Globe. Was society editor of Ottawa Journal, resigning to go to South Africa as one of the Canadian teachers in Concentration Camps where she acted as special correspondent of the Ottawa Journal. Mrs. Livesay writes occasionally for Canada, and Standard of Empire, and for various Canadian and American periodicals. She was married to Mr. Fred. B. Livesay, Manager Western Associated Press, and has one daughter.

Mrs. Valance Patriarche began at fifteen as assistant editor of the Harbord Collegiate paper. Then she wrote street sketches for Saturday Night, articles for Sunday World, Globe, Grip, The Week, stories for Canadian Magazine, Munsey, and other American journals. While in Edinburgh, Mrs. Patriarche wrote some stories and articles for weekly papers there. Lately she has published a book—"Tag," some verse in Putnam's, and now has sketches weekly in Winnipeg Free Press.

Miss Florence B. Lediard entered journalistic work from school teaching in 1905, beginning her career with the Farmer's Advocate of London, Ont. Miss Lediard has been with the Farmer's Advocate Winnipeg, for five years. Before and during that time has written occasionally for magazines, including a poem, and some jokes. She counts it her greatest achievement and reward to have known the women of Western Canada.

Mrs. Jean Somerville Hughes is editorial writer and news editor for the Western Canada Medical Journal.

MISS ANNA LAKE, who is enjoying a holiday in Oregon, and who writes enthusiastically of its green valleys and rose hedges, was known to readers of the Toronto Globe, as "Maria." During her many years' association with that journal, her work, both as artist and journalist, has been of a high order. She understands thoroughly the varied requirements of a woman's page, and makes the most domestic topics entertaining to every reader. Her discussions on

MISS ANNA LAKE.

"the size of the loaf," in connection with Toronto's food supply was most capably conducted, and showed that "our daily bread" is ever a subject of absorbing interest. As a special correspondent on matters outside what is conventionally considered woman's sphere, she showed the same journalistic qualities of a grasp of the "news" aspect, and the ability to present it strikingly. Her bright and gracious manner makes her a most welcome member at Press Club gatherings, and it is hoped she may soon return from the Oregon valley to less glowing but not less friendly environment.

Use the GILLETTE
With the Angle Stroke

Jack-knife—draw-knife—plane—scythe—lawn-mower—all edge tools cut cleanest and easiest with the angle stroke.

The angle stroke was the only thing that made the old open-blade razor possible—except as an instrument of torture.

Yet many men use the GILLETTE like a hoe and expect it to cut clean and easy. The superb quality of its cutting edge is proved by the fact that even when used in this way the GILLETTE gives a good shave.

But to get the real satisfaction which the GILLETTE is capable of giving you, you naturally must use the angle stroke. Then you will know and appreciate the genuine luxury of the clean, cool, comfortable, easy three-minute GILLETTE shave.

Buy a GILLETTE and enjoy it—if you haven't one already. If you have one now, use it right and enjoy it to the full.

Standard Sets $5.00 — Pocket Editions $5.00 to $6.00.
At your druggist's, jeweller's or hardware dealer's.

The Gillette Safety Razor Co. of Canada, Limited
Office and Factory, 63 St. Alexander Street, Montreal.

Offices in New York (Times Bldg.), Chicago (Stock Exchange Bldg.) London, Eng., and Shanghai, China.
Factories in Montreal, Boston, Leicester, Berlin and Paris.

243

ALMA Ladies' COLLEGE
St. Thomas, Ont.
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE ON REQUEST

Don't Throw it Away
Does Your Granite Dish or Hot Water Bag Leak?
USE MENDETS
A PATENT PATCH
They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c. POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

Look at that Loaf!
That's Cream of the West Flour for you!

If you'll only try Cream of the West Flour I'll stand every risk. I know what Cream of the West will do. It will bake bigger loaves and more delicious bread, too.

Cream of the West Flour
the hard wheat flour guaranteed for bread

You just try it. Ask your grocer. Tell him you're to get your money back if it fails you on a fair, square trial. Tell him the Campbell Milling Company, Limited, say so. He can charge it to us.

The Campbell Milling Company, Limited, Toronto
ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, President
106

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

The Institute and the Home

"FOR Home and Country," the Institute motto, has frequently been dwelt upon, as an appropriate maxim for such an association. In a paper by Mrs. J. H. Coatsworth, of the Kingsville Branch, South Essex, the connection between the Institute and the Home is treated with discrimination.

It is in order, no doubt, to say a few words regarding the work and the object of our Institute. As our motto, "For Home and Country," indicates, our object is to arouse a desire to attain to an ideal home life in every respect.

In connection with Institute work, subjects are dealt with which relate to the teaching of a higher standard, morally, mentally, and physically. Many subjects are introduced and discussed which are interesting and beneficial to old and young alike. No woman is regarded as too old either to become a member of our Institute, or to express opinions on any question under discussion. We are pleased that we have quite a large number of young girls, who are taking an active interest in the work.

Some may think that we attend the meetings just to have a good time. Well, what if we do? Are not the busy housewives and mothers entitled to at least one afternoon of each month, in which they can have a good time? We are all familiar with the old saying, "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." In my opinion that saying applies just as much to Jill as it does to Jack. If too much work has a tendency to make Jack grow dull will it not have the same effect on Jill?

If we did nothing more than call together once a month, the mothers of our neighborhood that they might for a few hours forget, if possible, the anxieties of home duties, we would accomplish something towards making this world brighter and happier.

We members of the Institute were not slow to recognize the fact that laughter has a mission to perform in this world. So the sparkle of wit and humor is not frowned upon, but rather is encouraged at our gatherings. The good old proverb, "A merry heart doeth good like a medicine," is as true to-day as it ever was. If we can, by bringing those of cheery disposition in contact with those who feel discouraged and down-hearted, cause the latter to enjoy themselves for a short time, are we not administering the much-needed medicine referred to?

Any organization which has for its object the introduction of higher ideals and nobler sentiments, is distinctly missionary in its character. Yet we cannot allow our Institute to supplant our missionary societies. If we do, we are not loyal to our home or Institute. In order to fulfil our duty to the inmates of our homes we must endeavor to impress truths on their minds, which will teach them to look beyond the confines of their own community and develop in them a sympathy for those dark parts of the world where Christianity is unknown. By the interest we ourselves take in foreign work, can we cultivate in our children that generous and well-developed nature which will enable them to regard all mankind as brothers.

The home determines the position which any country will occupy in comparison with other countries of the world. Can you conceive of a more worthy object for any society than the improvement of the home? Is not the mother the most potent factor in the establishment of the home? Then, is it not a step in the right direction for us to meet and exchange views on the numberless questions which the conscientious housekeeper and home-maker daily meets with?

It is not the house which makes the home any more than it is the body that makes the human being, but it is the nameless influence which the child first remembers, and is last to be forgotten by the oldest man or woman.

Men may construct dwelling places which will be palaces, but to women belongs the secret of imparting the true atmosphere of home. Sometimes the boundaries of mother's home life may seem rather limited, but when we consider that to her pre-eminently belongs the task of molding and fashioning the characters of our children, is not hers the farthest reaching of all occupations entrusted to mankind?

We at our Institute are striving to put into actual practice the helpful suggestions regarding the ideal home, realizing that when it becomes possible for us to have the ideal home, the ideal country will be a natural result.

The 20th Century Farmer's Wife

MRS. S. LEE, of Newton Robinson, South Simcoe district, has written some valuable reflections on the above subject:

Farms and farm life are gradually improving. The twentieth century is emphasizing the gospel of leisure. Leisure not only for rest, but for culture, intercourse and pleasure. Like most other developments, this idea has reached the city before the country, but gradually it is permeating the rural districts.

Formerly the farmer bought an increasing variety of implements to hasten and also to lighten his work. Manlike, he thought of himself first, of the money he could save and the easier times he could have. The modern farmer realizes the equal rights of his wife, and in many cases gives her first consideration.

The rapid development of the past few years is but an augury of that which will take place in the near future. Indications of good times are in evidence. Improvements have increased rapidly during the past few years. Many homes have been beautified. Neat, comfortable homes have been erected with a view to utility and comfort.

Many of our country homes are already equipped with nearly every convenience found in a city home. We have our bath rooms, laundry rooms, soft and hard water, both hot and cold, in the house, and other appointments designed to make housework easier and life more livable.

The twentieth century farmers' wives are not the drudges their grandmothers or even their mothers were during the past century. Gradually many labor-saving devices have been added to the home, things that would have surprised our grandmothers during the early part of the past century. The cream separator has taken the place of the old-fashioned hand skimmer that our mothers had to use. Then we have our butter workers, bread mixers, kitchen cabinets and many other articles which save us so much useless work.

Laundries have opened up in all our nearby towns, where farmers' wives can send their laundry and have it washed and ironed at small cost. Of late years, even the family sewing machine rattle seems less frequently heard. Tailored and ready-made clothes take the place of home-made garments. This gives the housewife more leisure, and possibly better style.

Then much of the rough and heavy work has been lightened for her. All this gives the farmer's wife more time for outdoor exercise. We have more time for our gardens; consequently we should be more healthy. Then we have more time for reading and can keep posted on the leading questions of the day. We have more time to study the needs and conditions of our country. The future of Canada depends upon what Canadians are doing for themselves to-day. The boys and girls of to-day will determine the Canadians of the next generation. This applies to our agricultural population, for farming has always been the mainstay of this province.

IN AN ONTARIO FIELD.

As farmers' wives, we have much to do with the building up of the future generation. Let us see to it that we make our homes as attractive as we can. Let us set out a few shrubs and flowers, plant out a few trees and vines. Then we are learning more all the time of the benefits of fresh air. And yet how much we have yet to learn in regard to this great natural cure for so many ailments. It is a subject on which the farmer's wife should make herself an expert.

Then the well-regulated twentieth century farm home should give opportunity from the earliest years for the development in the home circle of the spirit of interest in farm life and farm work. The home atmosphere has much to do in determining the inclination of the boy and girl. The women of the farm homes would do well to study this problem.

Then our homes are the great controlling force in morals. Women are the most potent factors in developing the moral life of the youth. In these days of exciting competition for more wealth and power, it is well to keep before us the building up of prosperous, contented, happy rural families, upon which our country's future will so largely depend. We have our Women's Institute meetings, where the farmers' wives can meet together and talk over ways and means of promoting our own interests, easier methods of doing our work, and better ways of preparing food.

To the many other advantages, we have the introduction of the rural telephone, and it is doing away with the isolation of many farm homes. It also has the advantage of connecting distant communities and creating a friendliness among people who otherwise might not come in helpful contact with one another. These are but a few of the pleasures and conveniences of the twentieth century farmer's wife.

Summer Beverages

FROM the Rodney Institute, a paper by Mrs. A. D. McGugan, on "Summer Beverages," has been received, which we publish as of decided interest to many readers.

When it is remembered that the body is made up very largely of water, it will be understood how important to health is a constant supply of this fluid. Many people have the idea that to drink water in any amount beyond that which is actually necessary to quench thirst, is injurious, and acting on this belief they drink as little as possible. The notion, however, is wide of the truth. Drinking freely of pure water is a most efficacious means, not only of preserving health, but often of restoring failing health.

All the tissues of the body need water. The water of the tissues and that of the blood are interchangeable, and water in abundance is necessary for the proper performance of every vital function. Cleanliness of the tissues within the body is as necessary to health and comfort as cleanliness of the skin, and water tends to insure the one as truly as it does the other. These waste materials, within the body, are frequently poisonous, and many a headache, many rheumatic pains and aches, many sleepless nights and listless days are due solely to the circulation in the blood, or deposit in the tissues, of these waste materials which cannot be got rid of because of an insufficient supply of water.

When water enters the stomach, it does not stay there until it is absorbed into the system, but begins to flow almost at once, in little gushes, into the intestine. It takes about three-quarters of an hour for the stomach to empty itself of a pint of cold water. As heat increases the movement of the walls of the stomach, hot water escapes in even a shorter time. It is therefore an excellent plan to wash out the stomach the first thing in the morning with a drink of hot water, or, better still, with hot water to which a little salt has been added, as the stomach empties itself in a very few minutes of hot, salty water. But at any time of the day drink plenty of water. It will help to keep the food in motion, assist in dissolving the food, wash out all the digestive organs so no waste matter lingers in them, and help generally to keep the system in good order. Physicians at the sanitariums tell us to drink at least four pints a day.

We might consider for a moment some of the beverages we use daily in our homes. Tea, we all know, is made from the leaves of a plant. The treatment of the leaves after they are picked varies according to whether black or green tea is to be produced. For black tea the leaves are dried in the sun, then rolled until they are soft, and broken. They are then made into little balls, and allowed to ferment. While fermentation is taking place some of the tannic acid in the leaves is changed into an insoluble form, thus black tea contains less tannin than green tea, as green tea is not allowed to ferment before the final drying. In the olden days green tea used to be colored with Prussian blue or dried in copper kettles, but this has been done away with. The chief difference now is in the fermentation, which renders the tannin insoluble. Tea should never be boiled, but always made as an infusion. Pour boiling water over the tea and let it stand five or six minutes—not longer, or too much tannic acid will be extracted. The practise of allowing tea to boil, or of using leaves twice, with a small additional supply for the second pot, cannot be too strongly condemned. After the tea has stood five or six minutes the liquid should be poured off the leaves into a hot teapot, so no more tannin will be extracted. It can then be kept hot for any length of time.

Tea in itself has no food value. It is, however, a stimulant to the nervous system. Taken in moderate quantities it is not harmful. Where the mistake is made is either by taking too much or by drinking tea which has not been properly prepared.

Coffee, like tea, has to be cured by heat. It is a berry which has to be roasted to produce either odor or flavor. Coffee affects the nervous system much the same as tea, the stimulant being caffein. It is said by some that a cup of strong coffee will relieve headache. This is due to the stimulating effect of the large amount of caffein extracted in the preparation, and the nerves are over stimulated to renewed action. Later a feeling of lassitude will be felt, as coffee is a heart depressant as well as a nerve tonic. When first taken the heart beats more forcibly and rapidly, but this soon changes, and a heavy, stupid feeling is the result.

Cocoa was first taken to European countries from America, Columbus having carried it from Mexico in 1520, before either tea or coffee had been introduced into Europe. Cocoa is prepared from the seeds of a fruit which resembles a cucumber in appearance. These seeds, like black tea, are allowed to ferment, and are then roasted. This produces a dark color, and takes away the bitter taste of the seeds. They are then passed through hot rollers, which melt the seeds and removes part of the fat. The chief difference between chocolate and cocoa is that the fat is not removed from the chocolate. Cocoa has considerable food value, and has no injurious effect on the nervous system.

Of milk, we cannot take too much. Too often those who have to buy it think of it as a luxury which they can afford to take only in limited quantities. This is a mistake. It is one of the cheapest animal foods we can buy. In regard to its nutritive value, milk stands very high, and its worth is not appreciated as it should be, especially when we compare its cost with its value as a food. There is as much nourishment in a quart of milk or buttermilk as there is in a quart of oysters or a pound of beef.

No home-made beverage is more wholesome and delicious than those made with fruit syrups, and every housewife should provide a few jars of each in the season of small fruits. From analysis it has been proven that apples, berries, and stone fruits furnish a rich pure blood that nourishes strong muscles and a clean physical economy. It is perhaps not interesting to the average housewife to learn the amount of carbon, starch, albumen, and sugar this food contains. What she does wish to know is the best nourishment for the brains and bodies of those of her household and how to serve it so as to be healthful and attractive. Beverages made from our fresh fruits are both nourishing and refreshing. Properly made and stored they keep as well as canned fruits, and, besides making delicious drinks, these fruit syrups are fine for flavoring ices, creams, and other desserts. The fruit syrups require more sugar than jellies and should be made from perfectly ripe fruit. Use granulated sugar, earthen or graniteware vessels, and wooden or silver spoons. When done, they can be bottled, but are more convenient when kept in pint size fruit jars.

For currant syrup.—Wash, drain on a cloth, and stem the currants; mash thoroughly and set in a warm place for twenty-four hours, or until fermentation begins (this destroys the pectin contained in the fruit, and prevents the juice from jellying). Drain the juice through a cheesecloth bag that has been wrung out of hot water; measure and allow two pounds of sugar for each pint of juice. Set over a slow fire and stir constantly until every particle of sugar is dissolved. As soon as it is boiling hot take from the fire, skim, and when cold pour into jars and seal. Make cherry, raspberry, or a combination of raspberry and currant syrup in the same way. Use about a quarter of a glass of syrup to a glass of cold water.

For strawberry syrup.—Put four pounds of sugar over the fire in five cups of cold water. Stir constantly until the sugar is dissolved, measure, return to the stove, and boil steadily until a little dropped in cold water can be rolled between the thumb and finger. Have strawberries mashed and strained as for currant syrup; add one pint of juice for every quart of syrup, stir well, let come to a boil, skim, and seal hot, filling the jars to overflowing. Make pineapple and gooseberry syrup in the same way. We might mention that the juice of the pineapple is highly valued on account of its digestive qualities.

Delicious lemonade can be made from lemon syrup. Grate the yellow rind from six lemons, being sure that the lemons have been well washed, and mix it with three tablespoons of powdered sugar. Squeeze the juice from one dozen lemons and strain out the seeds. Boil the sugared rind for five minutes in two cups of water, add the juice, and for every cup of liquid allow one and one-fourth cups of sugar; stir until the sugar is dissolved, boil five minutes, skim, and seal hot.

Strawberry vinegar.—Wash, drain and hull ripe strawberries; put in an earthenware vessel, and nearly cover with cider vinegar, and let stand one or two days. Scald and strain; allow one cup of sugar for each cup of juice; stir until sugar is dissolved, then simmer for fifteen minutes. Skim often and seal hot. Currants, raspberries, or cherries are nice made in the same way.

Orangeade is nice made in the same way as the ordinary lemonade, substituting the juice of the orange for that of the lemon; or the following recipe makes a delicious orangeade, and is always ready: Grate the rind and squeeze out the juice from six oranges; add four pounds sugar, one quart of water, and three ounces of citric acid; let stand twenty-four hours, strain and seal. Use two or three tablespoons of the liquid to a glass of water. The citric acid of this recipe sounds much more indigestible than it really is, as it is simply the acid of lemons, limes, and other fruits, and is generally prepared from lemon juice.

For iced cocoa.—Boil half a cup of cocoa, three-quarters of a cup of sugar, and one cup of water to make a rich syrup. Put this in a jar on the ice, and it is ready to serve at a minute's notice by simply adding a large spoonful to each glass of cold milk.

Grapes are so prized for their medicinal value that I must add a word in their favor. Their free use has a salutary effect on the system, diluting the blood, and dispersing scrofulous humors. The juice of the grape, swallowed slowly, has a healing influence on the tonsils, and is curative in bronchial inflammation. Grapes have also a tonic effect on the liver and kidneys. To make unfermented grape wine put ten pounds of crushed grapes in a porcelain kettle with one quart of water and bring to a boiling point; strain through a jelly bag, add three pounds of granulated sugar, boil for a moment, and seal while hot.

Keeping Boys on the Farm

MRS. W. R. SWAIN, of the Valentia Branch, Women's Institutes, contributes some valuable advice on this subject.

That this paper may be practical, I write these few thoughts more especially to the members of our Institutes, who have their little boys around them, as it depends very much on how they are brought up whether they are fond of home.

Boys seem to grow away from a mother's care so much earlier in their lives than our girls do. For this reason we need to lose no time in instilling into their young minds thoughtfulness. To do this we must not deceive them. They will have their little troubles, but let us help them out of them, let them feel that mother cares.

Starting to school will be their first getting away from home. Our children should be our most important work, and the effect of our work and care will last throughout eternity. How important then that we instill right principles into their young minds.

Order seems to be one of the chief essentials. To make our homes attractive let the boys have a place to put their belongings, and see that they are kept there. It will save much con-

A Popped Question

Will you Buy a

DE LAVAL CREAM SEPARATOR

or do with a poor imitation?

Why do practically all competing machines imitate, if not infringe, the De Laval patents?

Send for Catalog.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 William St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER — WINNIPEG

Preserving Time Means

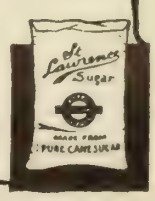
St. Lawrence Sugar

Every good housewife knows that poor sugar means poor Preserves.

The anxiety as to whether Jams, Marmalades, Preserves and Pickles are going to keep, can be entirely dispelled by using ST. LAWRENCE GRANULATED.

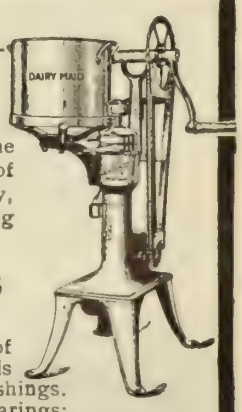
Remember to order ST. LAWRENCE SUGAR — either in barrels, 20 pound bags or by the pound.

The St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Co. Limited
MONTREAL. 34



When The Cow Has Done Her Part

OF COURSE it's important that the cow do her part. But after that, it's up to your cream separator. If it doesn't get highest quality cream—if it doesn't skim to a trace—you are robbing yourself of the profit that your cows have produced.



I H C Cream Harvesters get full value out of the milk, not for a few months only, but through years of constant service. They have proved their durability, close skimming, easy cleaning, and easy running advantages.

I H C Cream Harvesters

Dairymaid and Bluebell

are the only separators with dust-proof and milk-proof gears, which are easily accessible. The frame is entirely protected from wear by phosphor bronze bushings. These separators have large shafts, bushings, and bearings; the flexible top-bearing is the strongest and most effective found in any separator. The patented dirt-arrester removes the finest particles of dirt from the milk before the milk is separated. I H C Cream Harvesters are made in two styles—Dairymaid, chain drive; and Bluebell, gear drive—each in four sizes.

The I H C local agent will be glad to point out the above features and many others, or, write to nearest branch house for catalogues and other information.

CANADIAN BRANCHES—International Harvester Company of America at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, North Battleford, Ottawa, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.

INTERNATIONAL HARVESTER COMPANY OF AMERICA Chicago U S A
(Incorporated)

I H C Service Bureau

The Bureau is a clearing house of agricultural data. It aims to learn the best ways of doing things on the farm, and then distribute the information. Your individual experience may help others. Send your problem to the I H C Service Bureau.

IHC WAGONS HAVE STOOD THE TEST OF ALL LOADS AND ROADS FOR YEARS

THE real proof of the strength, durabilit , and value of I H C wagons is what they have done and are now doing for thousands of farmers throughout the Dominion. Light loads and heavy loads have been carried by I H C wagons, over good roads and bad roads, for so many years that there is hardly a farmer who is not familiar with the high quality that these names on wagons represent—

Petrolia Chatham

Either of these should be your choice if you want to be sure of lifetime service. The quality in both is the highest possible—the result of years of wagon-building experience, and the use of the best materials, shaped by skilled workmen operating with the finest manufacturing equipment.

Petrolia Wagons are constructed of the finest quality wood stock which is thoroughly seasoned by being air dried. The ironing is of the very best. The inspection of each part is most rigid. Petrolia Wagons must be made so that they will live up to the I H C standard of excellence or they are never sent out of the shops.

Chatham Wagons have a long record for satisfactory service in Canada. Made with hard maple axles, oak bolsters, sand boards, rims, and spokes, and oak or birch hubs—they represent the highest standard of wagon construction. When you buy a Chatham wagon it is with the assurance of getting the utmost service and satisfaction out of it.

Be sure to call on the I H C local agent. Get a pamphlet. Let him show you one of these wagons. If you prefer, write for literature or any other information you want to the International Harvester Company of America at nearest branch house.

EASTERN CANADIAN BRANCHES—International Harvester Company of America at Hamilton, Ont.; London, Ont.; Montreal, Que.; Ottawa, Ont.; St. John, N. B.

International Harvester Company of America
(Incorporated)
Chicago USA

I H C Service Bureau
The bureau is a center, where the best ways of doing things on the farm, and data relating to its development, are collected and distributed free to everyone interested in agriculture. Every available source of information will be used in answering questions on all farm subjects. If the questions are sent to the I H C Service Bureau, they will receive prompt attention.

CANADIAN NATIONAL EXHIBITION

TORONTO

AUG. 26th 1 9 1 1 SEPT. 11th

Splendid array of Women's and Children's Work and Household Arts in New Women's Building

Splendid Classification - - Increased Prizes

ALL ENTRIES CLOSE AUGUST 15th

For Prize Lists and Information, write

J. O. ORR, City Hall, Toronto

A fence of this kind only 16 to 23c. per running foot. Shipped in rolls. Anyone can put it on the posts without special tools. We were the originators of this fence. Have sold hundreds of miles for enclosing parks, lawns, gardens, cemeteries, churches, station grounds, etc., etc. Supplied in any lengths desired, and painted either white or green. Also, Farm Fences and Gates, Netting, Baskets, Mats, Fence Tools, etc., etc. Ask for our 1911 catalog, the most complete fence catalog ever published.

THE PAGE WIRE FENCE CO., LTD., Walkerville, Ont.

Branches—Toronto, Cor. King and Atlantic Ave. Montreal, 505-517 Notre Dame St. W. St. John, 37 Dock St.
The largest fence and gate manufacturers in Canada. 507

IN WRITING ADVERTISERS MENTION CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

fusion, and will teach the boys a tidy habit.

Decision is very necessary. When we tell our boys anything we should see that they do it. I have noticed how necessary it is to see that our boys have the right kind of company, that the influences may be for good. What they are taught in youth they never forget. What they read is next to be considered to their companions. What a great deal of harm those low novels and other such trashy books that are not fit to read have done the boys of our country, as well as other countries! We should watch closely the books that they read while they are young and while they are scarcely aware of the harm there is in them. They are so exciting that they take away the desire for better reading.

To make boys fond of the home they should have an interest in the home. Some of the brightest and most useful men of our day and also in the past are men from families that had to use the strictest economy. They had to work together to provide for the needs of the family. In this way they were taught to rely on themselves, and this brought out the best that was in them. If they are taught to be industrious they will be much more contented. I have noticed that those who have been the most successful in training their boys are those that told the boys all the business of the home, and fully explained their circumstances, and let the boy have some way to make some money that he could call his own. In this way they learn to do business and feel more independent.

This seems the reason why boys often get discontented at home—"When they have nothing that they can call their own."

From Various Branches

THE Branch at Rainham Centre has been one of the smallest in the county, but has taken a step in the right direction in having an oyster supper and concert to raise funds for the purpose of purchasing display cases for the protection of the pastry display at the fall fair. The event brought the Institute into the limelight in such a way that advertising could not have done. Great things are predicted for this Institute.

The oyster supper was served in the Vegetable Hall, which was lighted with gas, and beautifully decorated with the Institute colors (purple and gold), which hung in festoons, and added much to the enjoyment of all present.

After supper was served all repaired to the Town Hall, which stands only a few feet away, and were pleased with the profuse decorations of purple and gold and the Institute motto, "For Home and Country," interspersed with Union Jacks, covered the whole end of the hall.

The concert was of a high order, and was opened by the singing of the national song, "O Canada," followed by dialogues, recitations, songs, etc., each rendering their part very creditably to an appreciative audience.

Too much praise cannot be given Mrs W. S. Beam, president of the Selkirk Branch of the Institute, who occupied the chair. She gave a very interesting address concerning the Institute convention, held in Toronto some time ago, at which convention she was a delegate, and her manner of conducting the entertainment met with the approval of all present. During the evening several new members were enrolled.

* * *

The Women's Institute annual meeting, of Haliburton, was held in the Town Hall, May 10th. Every important feature of the work was taken up. Our members present were sixteen.

We endeavor to have a part in the meeting for each member by a response to roll call. Sometimes there is a helpful suggestion, again a recipe. At our May meeting our president was presented with some chinaware. One drawback in our meetings has been a lack of music, even if we have a piano.

The Institute has undertaken to furnish a curtain for the Town Hall, for use during entertainments.

On June 8th our delegate will be with us, from whom we hope to receive much benefit.

South Perth and Others

AT St. Mary's, on June 21st, was held the district convention of the Women's Institute of South Perth in the Methodist Church, Mrs. Proudfoot presiding. Delegates were present from every institute of the district. The reports of the various officers showed the organization to be in a very flourishing condition, last year being the best in its history. The election of officers for the coming year resulted as follows: President, Mrs. Hugh Thompson, St. Mary's; vice-president, Mrs. Valentine Stock, Tavistock; secretary-treasurer, Miss Pringle, Staffa; auditors, Miss Patrick, Mitchell; Miss Kerslake, Staffa. District directors, Mrs. Tyler, St. Paul's; Mrs. Kemp, Kirkton; Mrs. Roberts, Mitchell; Mrs. Woodley, Fullerton; Mrs. Bollin, St. Mary's; and Mrs. Kastner, Springville. Addresses were given by various members on the work of the institute, and the prospects are bright for increased prosperity during the coming year.

The Dufferin Women's Institute convention, which was held in the town hall, Shelburne, on June 5th, 1911, was well attended by enthusiastic delegates from all the branches in the country.

At the morning business session the following district officers were elected: Dist. Pres., Miss Jennie Hall, Shelburne; vice-pres., Mrs. E. Richardson, Laurel; sec.-treas., Miss E. H. Besley, Shelburne; auditors, Mrs. McClean, Honeywood, and Mrs. Endacott, Orangeville; rep. to W. I. Convention, Toronto, Mrs. Currie, Laurel. Interesting reports were read by the representatives from the different branches of their work during the past year, some of which being as follows: Corbetton Branch has beautified the parsonage and manse grounds with ornamental trees and shrubs to the value of $26.75; Orangeville, Camilla, and Laurel are saving funds to furnish wards in the Orangeville hospital when built; Shelburne is awarding 1st prize $3, 2nd prize $2, 3rd prize $1, at the Dufferin Central Exhibition for best collection canned fruit put up in pint jars and free from acids. This prize is open only to those living in Dufferin county. The district gave $23 to charitable purposes, and $7 to the Hoodless Memorial Fund. Orangeville Branch has resolved that they will not buy anything after 6 o'clock Saturday nights unless they carry it home themselves.

At the opening of the afternoon session the following address was read by Mrs. East, president of Honeywood Branch, to Mrs. Fife, retiring district president:

A COUNTRY ROAD NEAR ROCKWOOD.

Photograph by T. J. McArthur

Dear Mrs. Fife.—We, the members of the Dufferin Women's Institute, desire to take this opportunity of expressing to you our appreciation of the deep interest you have always taken in the work of the Women's Institute. And we feel there could be no more fitting opportunity than the present when representatives from all the branches in the riding are met together in this convention. One common object has drawn us hither, the object as expressed in our motto: "For Home and Country." The desire to learn more about the science of home-making and housekeeping, to discuss methods for the improvement of the home and its surroundings, and to get instruction and information to so elevate the whole tone of the home life that we will be instrumental in helping to build up a high and lofty national character, for we realize that the foundation of the nation is laid in the homes and hearts of the people. In the work that the Women's Institutes have been endeavoring to do you have taken an active part for a number of years. Though handicapped to a great extent by ill-health your interest in the work of the Institute has never flagged. The work has been growing successfully throughout the riding, and it must have been an encouraging thought to you many times that you were one of those who helped to form the Institute, to work for it, and watch its growth to its present strength. The different branches are grateful for the assistance and encouragement you have given them, and trust you may be spared to many years of continued activity in the work with which you have so closely identified yourself. We ask you to accept this gift as a small tangible token of our appreciation. We know that it cannot repay you for the hours of thought and labor you have expended on the work, but trust it will remind you of the good will and appreciation of your co-workers in the Dufferin Women's Institute.

Mrs. Crombie, of Blount, then presented Mrs. Fife with a handsome mantel clock in behalf of all the different branches. Mrs. Fife, although taken by surprise, made a very feeling and appropriate reply.

The afternoon programme was given as follows, and was both interesting and instructive: Opening address, county president; address of welcome, Miss Jennie Hall, Shelburne; reply to address of welcome, Mrs. E. Richardson, Laurel; address, Mr. G. A. Putnam, superintendent of Women's Institutes, Toronto; paper, "The Art of Conversation," Mrs. (Rev.) Rose, Corbetton; paper, "Why I Am a Member of the Institute," Mrs. McClean, Honeywood; paper, "Home," Mrs. Stewart, Bowling Green; paper, "How to Furnish a Living Room for Comfort," Mrs. Cox, Laurel; paper, "Character Building," Miss B. Thompson, Camilla; address, "Home Nursing," Miss Smilie, Toronto.

At the evening session the following programme was given, with Mr. G. A. Putnam presiding: Piano solo, Miss May Hall, Shelburne; address, "Canadian Literature and Writers," Miss Smilie, Toronto; solo, Mrs. Endacott, Orangeville; address, Prof. G. E. Day, O.A.C., Guelph; solo, Miss Berwick, Shelburne; address, Mrs. Endacott, Orangeville; National Anthem.

The Stamford Branch of the Women's Institute was organized on May 29th, 1911, at which meeting two very interesting addresses were given. One was by Miss Robson, of Ilderton, on "The Economic Problem of the Country Girl," and the other, by Mrs. Ferguson, of Strathroy, on "What Place the Institute May Fill in Our Lives." The following officers were appointed: President, Mrs. B. Marsh; vice-president, Mrs. Walters; secretary-treasurer, Mrs. A. C. Pettit. The next meeting was held on June 7th, 1911, at which the members expressed their opinion on Institute work. Mrs. G. E. Russell, Mrs. A. Wells, and Mrs. Culverhouse were appointed as directors. There are thirty-one members enrolled.

The 12th annual meeting of the Kemble Branch of the Women's Institute met during last May at the home of Mrs. H. Hurlbutt, who is a most genial hostess, and whose esteem is attested by the numbers present, about fifty in all. After the opening exercises, the annual report was given by the secretary, showing the Institute to be in a more flourishing condition than at any time in its history. There are over fifty paid members in all—average attendance about twenty. A number of papers have been given during the year upon many timely and helpful subjects, which are too numerous to write of here. After several nominations ballots were distributed and Mrs. John Jones was re-elected president and Mrs. John Ward vice-president, and Mrs. Jas. Gardner remained secretary for another year. As this was the principal business except some minor details, the programme proper was proceeded with, Mrs. W. McGregor taking charge of the roll-call, to which many responded by giving short selections of poetry, some practical, some humorous, and some pathetic. Then Mrs. Jas. Davidson gave what was the best thing for the afternoon, a paper upon the flowers of May, showing that Mrs. Davidson has a wide and practical knowledge of botany and the classification of plants and flowers, an education which it has no doubt taken years to acquire. She said that Canada produces more varieties of wild flowers, shrubs and trees than any other port of the world, and a great many varieties may be got within our own township and that so-called improved or hot-house varieties have not the inimitable shadings or the woody perfume of so many of our national wildlings. So the wild flowers are the very best ones to decorate our school grounds, and they need not cost us anything but the labor of obtaining them, and also gave directions for planting. At the end of this interesting paper Mrs. A. M. Boyle gave a demonstration upon the virtues of Wondershine as a labor saver in cleaning silver, and samples of work shown made by the "Girls' Club," of which the president is the director. When the meeting was dismissed, the hostess, assisted by a number of pretty girls in white frocks, served an appetising and dainty lunch, when all dispersed and went to their homes well pleased.

"King's weather" favored the brilliant gathering of the joint meetings of Wooler Women's Institute with the Farmers' Institute at the beautiful home of Mr. Esli Terrill, Floral Hill, Wooler. Everyone seemed in the gayest of holiday spirits, and the sun dispensed his beaming rays over a scene not easily forgotten. From one-thirty on to the time advertised as the starting hour—two-thirty—a constant stream of buggies made their way up the picturesque slope leading to the fine old home. As the hour approached there were fully two hundred present.

While the women of the Institute gathered on the fresh green slopes of the lawn, the "farmers" made their way to a place much more interesting to them—the barn. On view there was the fine herd of Holstein cattle which are famed far and wide.

As the women's meeting commenced one looked round on a most representative gathering.

Mrs. S. L. Terrill, the president of the Wooler Branch, introduced the speaker for the afternoon, Mrs. Hunter, of Brampton. She took as her subject one very near to the hearts of her hearers, "Institute Work." The address was interesting from the very start. First of all, she expressed the delight it gave her to be present at such a large, enthusiastic meeting. Warming to her subject she said that anyone engaged in Institute work was always sure of meeting the best women in the land. It was a membership that was always growing, and to-day there are sixteen thousand women, all belonging to this organization in the province of Ontario alone. She drew a vivid picture of the growth of the Institute from its start, from the time, in fact, when it was only called a cooking school. She touched on the question of why so many girls left home, who had no need to do so, and gave as her reason the dislike, among modern girls, of housework. Now, Institute places work on a higher level by teaching and studying household economy. Girls, therefore, ought to give the best of their talents to this, the highest of women's work, making and keeping the home. The mistress of the house should study and develop the mental talents as well as the physical, in her children, and have spare time to spend with them and her husband in the evening, instead of house cleaning all the time.

One of the greatest benefits of Institute work is that it has taken us women out of our homes and kept us from stagnating. It also helps to keep us cheery and helpful. A simple illustration was used of two women who had lived for years within four miles of each other and yet had never spoken till they met at the Institute.

Add water to milk—
You weaken the milk.
Add soft wheat to flour—
You weaken your flour.
Cheapens it too.
Soft wheat costs less—worth less.
Soft wheat flour has less gluten less nutriment.
Your bread is less nutritious, sustaining, economical.
Soft flour has less strength, less quality gluten.
Giving less good things for your money and things less good.
Use Manitoba flour—Manitoba hard wheat flour.
Having everything the soft stuff lacks.
Five Roses is all Manitoba.
Without a grain of cheaper wheat.
Strengthen your food values.
Use FIVE ROSES.

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

PURITY QUALITY UNIFORMITY

you get all three in

Seal Brand Coffee

—the favorite in a million homes
In 1 and 2 pound sealed tins only.

123

25 Corns Removed Every Minute

Five million corns every year—25 every minute—are being removed by Blue-jay. Nobody who knows them uses anything else.

A Blue-jay plaster ends the pain instantly. Then the bit of B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In two days you lift it out. No pain, no soreness, no inconvenience. The plaster is applied in a moment. It is so snug and so comfortable that you simply forget it. One is foolish indeed to suffer from corns when there is such an easy way to get rid of them.

See the Picture

A is the harmless red B & B wax which loosens the corn.
B is soft felt to protect the corn and keep the wax from spreading.
C is the comfortable narrow band which goes around the toe.
D is rubber adhesive. It fastens the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

At All Druggists 15c and 25c per Package

Sample Mailed Free. Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters.

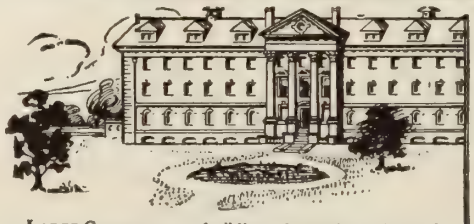
Bauer & Black, Chicago & New York, Makers of Surgical Dressings, etc.

(85)

PICKERING COLLEGE
NEWMARKET

A Residential School, with Preparatory, Commercial, and Collegiate Courses, Music and Art.

Fall Term commences Sept. 11, 1911



LARGE GROUNDS, new buildings, beautifully situated, with perfect sanitary equipment, electric light, steam heating, roomy, well-ventilated.

COMPETENT instruction, firm discipline, and homelike, Christian influences unite with these material advantages to make Pickering College worthy of your confidence. For Announcement write

W. P. FIRTH, M.A., D.Sc., Principal.

PURITY FLOUR

If that name is on the sack you can buy with confidence

"More bread and better bread"

33

IN WRITING ADVERTISERS MENTION CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

A HONEYMOON IN HIDING

Continued from page 12

barred, but there remained a number of well-known places where the risk of detection was infinitesimal.

"We'll go to the British Museum. In novels lovers always go to the British Museum when they want to meet in secret, and sit behind a statue. I'll make a point of prowling into every out-of-the-way corner to see if I can surprise any of them, and I'll bow to the mummy case, you must bow too, then perhaps it'll be propitiated, and send us good luck; and we'll go to the Tower, and Madame Tussaud's. I haven't been to Madame Tussaud's since I was ten. I'd love to see it again. It would be safe enough, wouldn't it?"

"Goodness, yes! It's not holiday time. You won't meet anyone there but strangers and tourists," said Pat positively. "Well! If I've to take my choice between marble and wax, I choose wax to-day, as being a degree warmer. Always did think the Museum was a freezing hole!" So to Madame Tussaud's they repaired without further delay.

Pat and Gwen enjoyed the waxworks like a couple of happy children, and were enthusiastic about the modern innovation of set pieces, or tableaux. Foremost among these, in that special year, was one purporting to represent a portion of the enclosure at Ascot, and the surprising up-to-dateness of the costumes worn by the ladies thereon won unmitigated praise from the bride, fresh from the purchase of her own trousseau.

"Look at the one in the grey satin! Look! My white canvas has exactly that back! The green one has ducky sleeves. I wish I had had my blue. And their hats—and their veils—so beautifully put on! Look at that blue girl standing by herself looking at the race-card! Isn't she exactly like life? I've a very good mind to cut short those blue sleeves, and—What is it?"

For answer her husband nipped her arm between finger and thumb, and pointed stealthily to the right. The sound of voices broke upon the air; between serried rows of effigies a female form approached, escorting two flaxen-haired children—a brief glimpse of her face showing as she bent and smiled. By all that was extraordinary and confounding—the well-known face of a friend of the family!

She was approaching along the aisle in which the Honeymooners themselves were standing; there was no turning to right or left; in another minute she would pass the screen of the next group, and confront them face to face! Gwen said no word. To the utter confounding of her spouse, she loosened her arm from his, dived nimbly beneath the protecting cord, and falling into position beside the Blue Girl of the Ascot Enclosure, slipped a hand through the waxen arm, and bent her own head over the extended card!

Of all the resourceful, quick-witted, audacious little wretches! Trust her for getting out of a scrape if a way were to be found on land or sea! The newly-made husband was breathless with surprised admiration, but—but—what of himself? What was he to do? On second thoughts, wasn't it a pretty low down thing to provide for herself, and leave him in the lurch? The faintest, smallest echo of a cough reached Pat's ear, and, looking up, he beheld the latest addition to Madame Tussaud's collection grimacing violently in his direction. She wanted him to do something, of course—but what? He was bothered if he knew. Never could understand what people were after when they mouthed and scowled. No good trying to act a waxwork, too. Couldn't to save his life, and what else was there? There was nothing else!

In subsequent hectorings Gwen demonstrated several different ways in which discovery might have been avoided, but as none of them occurred at the moment to the person in need, the next moment brought with it the dreaded encounter.

"You!" ejaculated Mrs. Freeman, incredulously. "You! Pat Hilbert, of all people in the world! My dear, good man, I thought you were miles away enjoying your honeymoon. What does this mean? I met your cousin only yesterday, and she said—"

"Yes, yes. Just so! Of course, and so I am." Pat's flushed conscious face was excellently in keeping with the sensations of a bridegroom unexpectedly run to earth. "Awful fag, but I—I had to come up to town. Things to do, you see—to look after—er—er—"

"Business! Yes, of course. Everything must give way to that, mustn't it!" assented Mrs. Freeman sympathetically. "I know what it is. We have scarcely ever had a holiday when my husband hasn't been summoned home in the middle, or obliged to shorten our stay at the end, but I imagined that professional men were exempt. In the middle of your honeymoon, too! Too bad! And poor, dear Gwen! So sad for her to be left all by herself. I do hope you won't be kept here long."

"Oh, no. I shall join her to-day. She's all right! She—er—er, as a matter of fact, at the moment she's with a party of friends. Enjoying herself a treat."

Now, Pat Hilbert, being a well-principled young man, felt a distinct glow of satisfaction in the absolute verity with which he had contrived to parry these embarrassing questions, but Mrs. Freeman looked a trifle surprised and chilled. Strange how even the nicest young people were infected with modern ideas! This young couple had appeared so simple, so attached, so content in each other in good old-world fashion that it came with a shock to hear of the bride making merry with strangers, while her newly-made husband was away in town. Then, being a humorous soul, her eyes twinkled, and she said smilingly.

"Your business is finished, I suppose, and you have a few hours to put in before your return? If one may ask, what in the name of all that is mysterious led you to spend them here, of all places in the world?"

Pat hesitated. The devil tempted him to declare that his train left from the Great Central, and that he had chosen the Waxworks as the most adjacent place of amusement, but better counsels prevailed; he recalled that, so far, honesty had protected him more surely than any fraud, and resolved to stick valiantly to the truth.

"Well!" he said smilingly, "since you ask me, I did want to put in the time, and there are precious few places in town where you can do so without the chance of running up against everyone you know!"

"I see! I see!" Mrs. Freeman laughed; a cheery, understanding laugh. "And so you came to dear old Madame Tussaud's, and made sure of meeting wax images only. Too bad of me to choose just this afternoon to bring my babies to pay their first visit! But don't be afraid, I won't give you away. I promise you faithfully not to mention to a soul that I have had a glimpse of you since you drove off for your honeymoon."

"Thanks, so much! I'll be grateful if you won't. I should get so horribly chaffed. We shall be 'At Home' in another fortnight, and I hope you'll be one of our first callers. I must say 'Good-bye.'—"

"Oh, not yet! Do come round with us, as you are here. It's not the least likely that another friend will come along, and we should love to have your company. What's this group? It looks interesting!"

To his horror, Pat saw the good lady's hand move towards the pince-nez which hung by a chain round her neck; he dared not turn towards the new member of the group, but knowing the risible qualities of the lady in question, trembled for her composure.

"Oh, there's a—there's a far better one further along. Let me show you! You can come back to this one later on. I should really like to show you the other before I leave," he cried hastily, pushing forward with such determination that his companions were constrained to follow. To the turn of the aisle he went, and then, safely round the corner, indulged in a flow of banal inanities about an undistinguished group, the while Mrs. Freeman listened with twinkling gravity. The poor dear fellow was so embarrassed he did not know what he was doing. But the poor dear fellow knew perfectly well! He was talking against time, until the tip of a white hat had safely vanished into space, and then and only then, did he bid his companions adieu.

(To be continued)

FROM THE PUBLISHERS

THE North has proved a veritable wonder land for the writer, as well as for the prospector and explorer. Dr. Cook may have lost his reputation in the frozen wilderness, but a respectable legion of would-be discoverers have found that a "dash to the Pole" is a sure means of notoriety.

However, when one turns to fiction, one finds that it is not necessary to penetrate the Polar regions, in order to find local color of the true boreal tinge. Yukon districts have afforded both poet and novelist attractive ground, and the writer of stirring tales is not slow to take advantage of the stern scenes of primitive struggles and transfer them to paper.

Mr. S. A. White, in "The Stampeder," writes a novel of thrilling incident, which whirls the reader from an accident at sea near Algiers to the rush to the Yukon. The hero, Rex Britton, is a gentleman of marvellous activities and of a bewildering variety of adventures. The story is melodrama of the most frank and "cheap show" order, but will be appreciated by many readers. There is a woman of the false, alluring type, and there is another of the "sweet, innocent heroine" class. The latter is, of course, triumphant in the end and becomes the hero's happy bride. The reader may become rather dazzled by the succession of weird happenings which fall to the lot of Rex, but, at least, the narrative is not lacking in "action."

The publisher of "The Stampeder" is William Briggs, of Toronto, who also brings out a Yukon novel by H. A. Cody, "The Frontiersman," a sturdy narrative of human effort and perseverance in penetrating the regions of the "great white silence." The first chapter introduces an attack of wolves on the lonely trailsman, Keith Steadman, who is a medical missionary from Eastern Canada. This fairly animated scene is an indication of what is to follow, and we find in the narrative a stirring account of the struggle against the dangers and difficulties which pioneers encounter in such a region. Several of the rough characters, especially "Pete," are depicted with a rugged realism, which gives one a vivid idea of the qualities necessary to win a way in the "North Countree."

AN extremely dainty and "informing" volume has been sent out by the Musson Book Company of Toronto. "The Canadian Garden — A Pocket Help for the Amateur" is a book to be desired, both for its contents and the style of presentation. It takes up in twenty-nine concise chapters the varied topics of interest to those who are planning their own garden and who are anxious to obtain the best and brightest results. Fruits, flowers and vegetables meet with due consideration, and their requirements as to soil and culture are discussed in bright and practical fashion.

"L'Envoi" is one of the pleasantest features of an attractive book, concluding as it does—"In retrospect we see once more the blue-and-white bed of English violets, with their subtle, bewildering perfume, where with one in harmony attuned they helped us to worship the Creator through His gift in the Sabbath stillness of Springtime. Could violets have a dearer mission?"

A STORY of old Southern days in Tennessee and along the Mississippi is found in "The Prodigal Judge"—a book which is deservedly among the best-selling novels. Vaughan Kester, the author, is evidently "to the manner born," so far as a knowledge of that country is concerned, and has a genuine gift for narration, as the reader discovers before the third chapter is reached. The romance and turbulence of those old days, when the War of 1812 was still in the memory, are keenly felt, and the casual reference to shooting or rioting is somewhat of a shock to conventional ideas of law and order.

The "Judge," himself, is a remarkable figure, whose tragedy is weirdly blended with grotesque humor. His final redemption has the pathos which grows out of the sacrifice of another.

The heroine, Betty Malroy, is the charming Southern girl with whom we are all familiar—who is pretty, high-spirited and winning in her sunshiny grace.

The villains of the story are of a consummate wickedness which gives one the thrills essential to the enjoyment of an old-time romance. The loyalty and devotion of Yancy to the small and mysterious waif, "Hannibal," is one of the most attractive features in a very enjoyable story.

The illustrations are of an unusual order of excellence and are quite the best which this year's popular fiction has shown. Toronto: McLeod and Allen.

FROM the Macmillan Company of Canada come four volumes, which form an agreeable addition to the pile of summer fiction. "The Sea Lion" by Patrick Rushden is, we believe, a first novel. The new writer may congratulate himself on having produced a book of more than ordinary interest. The title is somewhat "reminiscent," reminding the reader too closely of "The Sea Wolf" by Jack London. The narrative, however, is only remotely associated with the sea, and introduces many of the vagaries of modern social life in London, including the visit of the heroine to a marvellous clairvoyant. There are two "villains" of uncanny type, Sir James Ripley being the most unpleasant creature who has appeared since the days of Svengali. The story "marches" admirably and leaves the reader no idle moments. One may wonder how the heroine ever was deceived by such an underbred impostor as "S. Thornfield," but the wonder only adds to the dramatic interest of the situation. As a narrative of thrilling turns, and as a study of character it is worth careful reading, even in these days of a multitude of tales.

"Adventure," by Jack London, is a story of the sea, with one of the most wonderful heroines who ever tried to rule in a semi-barbaric territory. The book is correctly named, as adventures of the hairbreadth order tumble over each other's heels throughout the chapters which lead to the final and happy outcome. Some of Mr. London's romances are too crude and brutal for the fastidious reader, as he appears to delight in physical conflict of the most elemental type and describes it in a fashion which seldom has the virtue of reserve. The present volume is an enjoyable exception to that rule and belongs rather to the realm of romance.

"Phrynette and London," by Marthe Troly-Curtin, is a most diverting book, containing the reflections of a French girl of seventeen on modern life and manners, as seen in the British capital. There is a delicious naivete about the remarks of "Phrynette," but there is also a subtle social philosophy in her criticism, of which no French demoiselle of seventeen would be capable. As a contribution to international comparisons, it is a volume of some value and, in its arraignment of London rents and the "flat" system, is suggestive of needed reforms.

"The Unknown God," by Putnam Weale, is a story of much more serious order than the reflections of "Phrynette." It is a narrative, or rather study, of missionary effort in China. It appears to be unfriendly to the methods and aims of Christian missions; yet a closer analysis shows that only the unworthy specimens in the service are under criticism. The hero of the book, Paul Hancock, is both sincere and scholarly, and his ultimate decision to abandon the hypocritical Mr. Gray, who is using the mission for personal ends, bids fair to result in more effective work than had been formerly accomplished. The immense difficulties which stand in the way of the West dealing in the East, are realized by the reader, but the author does not say that the christianizing of China is impossible. The secret spread of Mahommedanism, in some respects so like the Mormonism of our own continent, is graphically described. To many readers, the scenes along the great and ever-changing river of the Celestial Empire will prove more attractive than the characters who traverse it.

ARTISTIC, SANITARY AND FIREPROOF CEILINGS AND WALLS

METALLIC INTERIORS do not crack and crumble into dust like plaster
—You are saved labor and embarrassment.

METALLIC INTERIORS do not tear and peal like wall papers
—You avoid frequent expense and annoyance.

METALLIC INTERIORS do not absorb the moisture nor harbor vermin or germs as do paper and burlap.
—You are thereby protected from pest and disease.

METALLIC INTERIORS come in a variety of designs, from which you may arrange in harmony the exquisite boudoir, the homely den, the diningroom, kitchen or parlor.

METALLIC INTERIORS are quickly cleansed with soap and water —Are the others?

If not convinced that your health, economy and pleasure demand Metallic Interiors, let us prove it further by sending to you free our interesting booklet:

"INTERIOR DECORATIONS IN METAL"

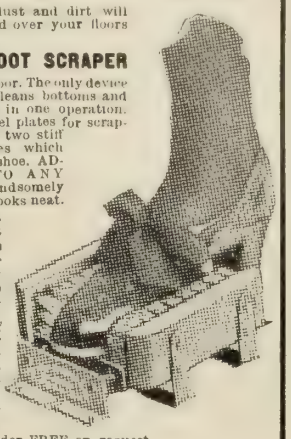
THE METALLIC ROOFING CO., Limited
TORONTO AND WINNIPEG

WIPE YOUR FEET

Mud, snow, dust and dirt will not be tracked over your floors if you use

GRAB'S FOOT SCRAPER

outside your door. The only device made which cleans bottoms and sides of shoe in one operation. Has ten parallel plates for scrapping soles and two stiff bristle brushes which clean sides of shoe. ADJUSTABLE TO ANY SIZE. Handsomely enamelled. Looks neat. Can be rotated and swept under. Fastens to doorstep or any handy place. Get one and save useless work. Price $1.00. If your dealer will not supply you, don't take substitute, but send your order direct to us. Illustrated folder FREE on request.



Live Agents Wanted Everywhere
ONWARD MFG. CO. - Berlin, Ont.

The New Make of BRIGGER'S Pure RASPBERRY JAM

Can now be procured at your grocers. Made only from the choicest, selected berries and pure granulated sugar. Brigger's Jams are absolutely pure—no adulterants or any artificial coloring or preservatives are used. The Dominion Government tests prove this.

Sold in Hermetically Sealed
5 lb. Pails and 1 lb. Jars

The Kindel Kind
FEATHER PILLOWS
PURE — CLEAN — NEW FEATHERS
GUARANTEED

Your health demands that you have the best and most sanitary. Insist that your dealer show you

The Kindel Kind

Prompt Service and Sensible Styles in Our Fashion Department
PATTERNS 12 CENTS EACH

The Original and Best Scotch Wincey. In range of beautiful colourings, stripes or in white. Ideal for LADIES' BLOUSES, CHILDRENS' DRESSES BABIES' FROCKS, and all underwear—Gents.' Shirts, Pyjamas, etc. Washes perfectly, and is UNSHRINKABLE. From 8½d. per yard to 4/6. Patterns Post Free.

FOR BABY.

Copy of UNSOLICITED testimonial.
"St. Jude's Vicarage, South Shields, 31 Oct., 1910. Mrs. De la Hey will be obliged if Messrs. Spence will send 12 yards of enclosed Wincey, for which cheque is enclosed. Mrs. de la Hey has NEVER used ANY OTHER Wincey which gave the PERFECT satisfaction of Messrs. JAS. SPENCE & CO.'s MAKE."

JAS. SPENCE & CO., GLASGOW, N.B

DOMINION EXPRESS Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They should be sent in payment of produce, gas, water, electric light, and other bills; Insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers, magazines, etc.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mail, we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge,

On Sale in
Canadian Pacific Railway Stations

Also in numerous Drug Stores conveniently located in residential districts. 20

Travellers' Cheques Issued.
Money sent by Telegraph and Cable

Home Study

Will help you to better things, if you will let us direct your work. Select one or more of these courses, mark them, clip out and send to us for particulars.

BOOKKEEPING
SHORTHAND
PENMANSHIP ARITHMETIC
DRAWING
PHOTOGRAPHY

The Shaw Correspondence School
391 Yonge Street, TORONTO
W. H. SHAW, President

For your own benefit

Eat Shredded Wheat for breakfast for the next ten days and note how different you feel during the day.

Wheat is the most perfect food given to man—rich in every strengthening, muscle-building element, so essential for the healthy, robust body.

SHREDDED WHEAT

Biscuit is just the plain, wholesome whole wheat, steam-cooked, shredded and baked a crisp golden brown—a delight to eat and to serve.

Its very crispness assists digestion—compels the necessary chewing and mixing with saliva.

Shredded Wheat is better than mushy porridges because you have to chew it, thereby getting from it its rich muscle and bone-building nutriment.

Two Shredded Wheat Biscuits with milk or cream and a little fruit make a complete nourishing breakfast, supplying all the strength needed for a half-day's work. Delicious with fruit for lunch. Your grocer sells them.

The only cereal made in biscuit form

Made by

Canadian Shredded Wheat Co., Ltd., Niagara Falls, Ont.

D62

HOW TO IMPROVE YOUR COMPLEXION

BEETHAM'S

La-rola

Entirely Removes and Prevents all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, HEAT, IRRITATION. Etc., and renders THE SKIN DELICATELY SOFT and VELVETY

It is the most perfect Emollient Milk for the Skin ever produced, and for the Toilet and Nursey is Invaluable. It is delightfully Refreshing and Soothing if applied after Motoring, Cycling, Tennis, Golfing, Boating, etc. It is neither sticky nor greasy, and can be used at any time during the day.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

has the largest opening of any washing machine. Practically the whole top opens up because the wringer attachment is on the side. No other washer washes clothes so quickly—so well—so easily. Tub made of Red Cypress—will last a lifetime. In every respect, the "Champion" is the champion of all washing machine.

If you want quality butter, use Maxwell's "Favorite" Churn.

DAVID MAXWELL & SONS,

St. Mary's Ont.

Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

The Harry Webb Co. Ltd.

TORONTO, CAN.

"POCKET MONEY" TALKS No. 2

One of the ladies who joined the "moneyed" people of our service has earned on an average of $7.00 a week for the last thirty weeks—just in the time she can spare from her household duties. Would $200.00 put you in the care free class? Write to and the new sensation was as keen as it was delicious. He would expose her to no comment by taking her to Haffey's. It was as he said, "quite the thing." They would be taken for an engaged couple probably, but that did not matter. In the unlikely event of his meeting one of his own friends there would be curiosity aroused, but he would know how to meet that.

"POCKET MONEY" SERVICE, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

He stole another glance at her face. It was serenely thoughtful. How lovely she was. Her hair, he had never seen hair like it, the curve of her faintly red lips, the droop of the white lids over the hazel eyes. Of what was she thinking? Would she let him know her, see her often, be her friend? He had known in that instant's pause which followed after she had told him who she was, and that her sister was a clerk in his adopted father's store that the answers to these questions would tip the balance of his fate.

If she would give him a chance, let him know her better, he would take that chance and let the lesser things go. So strangely are we made that Mark Wareham who, as a very handsome eligible, had for years been the special pet of Mammas and the favorite of their daughters, without a turning of the proverbial hair, was now at the glance of one golden-haired girl, calmly facing a probable giving up of his whole scheme of life, and hesitating in the choice no longer than one might hesitate between a pebble and a pearl. Mark knew very well what ambitions Adam Torrance held for him. He knew his pride, the rather selfish pride which had prevented him from identifying his name with that of the great stores he owned. He knew how deep was his affection for himself, and how he would suffer should Mark disappoint him. He had no misleading hope that such a man would ever consent to the marriage of his heir with a girl in Christine's circumstances, and with the name of "Brown." He sighed. It would certainly mean a breach with the governor!

"You must be very hungry," said Christine, timidly, noticing the sigh. "And I will go with you. I suppose I ought not but I don't feel that I ought not. So I'm going. I am enjoying it so much. I have always wanted to ride in an auto."

"Wanted to—?–'

"Ride in an auto. Like this. I have never before. It is like flying. I think it must be awfully jolly to be an agent. Though it would be still nicer to have an auto of one's own, wouldn't it?"

"You think so? Well, I don't know. In that case one would have to pay the bills."

"Don't you wish you owned this one?" asked Christine, practically.

"No, I wouldn't." As a matter of fact, this was true, for this car belonged to Mr. Torrance, and was of a make which Mark himself disliked.

Christine merely thought the remark showed strong-mindedness, and looked at him with added respect. "Celia is like that," she confided, "she doesn't worry about what she can't have."

"Celia is the one in the store?"

"Yes, she has been there sixteen years. Ever since I was born. She is very clever, when she isn't tired she makes more sales than all the rest of her department put together, and her eye is so good that she never makes a mistake in matching a shade. Ada says that perhaps Celia has a double share of eye-sight because, you know," sinking her voice, "Ada is blind."

"I did not know," said Mark gently. "Tell me about it."

So as they flew along under the yellowing autumn trees, Christine told him about her home. Told him, indeed, far more than she knew until he felt that he had known the three sisters all his life. Only of one thing Christine did not speak. She said nothing about their present troubles, nor why she had suddenly decided to seek work herself. Her innocent pride caused her to paint things brightly, and he saw only the pleasant if humble home at its best and happiest.

She told him, too, of her ventures that morning in quest of work, speaking with a quaint air as of one worker to another (for was he not an agent and piano tuner himself?) and he managed, without unduly frightening her, to get her to promise not to make any more efforts without the knowledge of her sisters. From what she had told him of them he felt sure that her morning's experience would not be repeated. For the rest, they were like a pair of children on a holiday. Christine learned to move the levers of the big machine, and they both laughed like babies at her first attempt with the steering wheel, and at the hideous screech of the horn whose valve was broken.

Neither of them ever forgot that drive. In after years a red leaf, the smell of ripe apples under a tree, a blue haze on the horizon of a sunny day, could bring it all back—as fresh and poignant as yesterday. At the time, Christine was not conscious of observing anything, yet afterwards she knew each foot of the road. It all belonged to the ineffaceable things of life. It remained always cloudless, spotless, completely happy, a day hedged about and set apart from all other days by the miracle of first love.

Not that she dreamed that the miracle had happened! She was conscious only of a new content and of a fresh wash of green and red upon the earth, a new blue in the sky. Nature had brightened up and shone resplendent.

They had lunch at the pretty gabled Inn (a transformed farm-house), in what once had been the farmhouse kitchen. It was pleasant there. The windows were long and low, and red leaves blew in at the open door. They ate and drank fare fit for gods and forget all about the piano which needed tuning. The old lady who waited smiled and nodded.

"That lad has brought many a lass before," she told her grand-daughter, "but this day he's brought the only lass for him."

"I don't see how you can tell, Granny," said the grand-daughter, wistfully. The old lady only shook her head. "When you're as old as me you'll know without telling," she said. But the girl only laughed, and shrugged her dimpled shoulders. "Oh, Granny, what good will it do me then!"

CHAPTER X.

THERE is nothing in life quite so perplexing as the problem of its might have beens. We feel ourselves so free, and we are so bound. We are like birds with strong wings and a limitless sky overhead. We say to ourselves, we will fly this way, and we will fly that way, and we beat the air cheerfully with our wings; but in reality our flight is determined by forces against which our poor wings are as thistle-down in a wood—"willy-nilly blowing." Fortunately, we do not dream of our own impotence How we walk as free men, defying fate. There is a story in a comic paper of a man who fell upon the street and was picked up dead. One physician said, learnedly, "heart-disease." Another said "apoplexy," but the street urchin who saw the fall said banana peel. We laugh at the story; we appreciate the discomfort of the grave physician, but put fate in the place of the banana peel and we unveil a tragedy.

None could have been more certain than Mark Wareham, that he held his destiny in his own hands, that afternoon when he left Christine at the door of the House of Windows. It was with the air of a man making his future that he asked her, timidly as lovers do, if he might call sometime soon to meet her sisters; and undoubtedly Christine thought that all the enquiries of fate were answered by her low voiced "Yes." Yet the determining factor in the lives of both of them was not Mark's request nor Christine's reply, but the apparently irrelevant fact that Martha (Miss Torrance's sour-faced maid) had eaten toasted cheese for supper the night before. This is easily seen, for if Martha had not eaten the cheese she would not have had dyspepsia, failing dyspepsia, she would not have asked leave to take a walk. The rest follows naturally, for on the walk she saw Mark and Christine returning in the motor from that divine luncheon at the Haffey Inn.

It all happened by what we contentedly call mere accident; but having happened, the result was inevitable. Martha was shocked; she told herself that she was grieved but how seldom do we feel real grief for the frailties of others. Martha might shake her head and sigh, but deep in her heart she felt a pleasurable excitement. Her estimate of the airs and graces of Christine had been right after all! Very sad, but, still, gratifying in the main.

"There she goes!" said Martha's inner nature, "just as I said! That's what comes of her pretty face. Look like hers is a snare to them as have them."

HUNDREDS OF OPPORTUNITIES TO SAVE MONEY

T. EATON CO. TORONTO, CANADA, MIDSUMMER SALE CATALOGUE, 1911
A PAGE OF BARGAIN VALUES
39¢
ONE PRICE ITEMS
BIG BARGAINS EVERY ONE OF THEM
MAKE YOUR ORDER UP TO $25.00 AND WE WILL SEND GOODS
HEMP STAIR CARPET A GREAT SNAP
BOOKS, Each 19c
19 CENTS
BUY YOUR HANDKERCHIEFS NOW—AT THIS PRICE
DON'T MISS THIS PAGE OF NINETEEN CENT BARGAINS
WOMEN'S FINE DRAWERS

THREE STRIKING FEATURES OF OUR MIDSUMMER SALE

UNUSUAL VALUES

OUR July and August Sale has always been a grand opportunity for you to save money, but no previous Sale ever held by THE T. EATON CO LIMITED has equalled this one We never listed values before which were quite as good as those contained in the 24 pages of our Midsummer Sale Catalogue We are not over-estimating them: in fact, we cannot do them justice by describing them.

YOU MUST SEE THE GOODS and examine them to appreciate the phenomenal opportunities to save money, which we are placing before you If you have not received a copy of our Catalogue, write for one immediately We are not exaggerating the merits of this Sale. It would be folly for us to do so, since our Guarantee allows you to return any article with which you are dissatisfied and get your money back in full

SUPERIOR QUALITY

ALTHOUGH the prices quoted in our Sale Catalogue are wonderfully low, nevertheless the quality of the goods has in no way been sacrificed to make the price. We have bough in enormous quantities, we are selling in enormous quantities, and to create two months of hustling business, we have reduced our already low margin of profit. Every item is something which every household is either needing at present or soon will be. Buy now either for present or future needs. It will pay you to do so.

WRITE TO-DAY FOR OUR
JULY AND AUGUST SALE CATALOGUE
IT IS FREE FOR THE ASKING

LOW PRICES

OUR prices are low—they are exceptionally low—in fact, they are the lowest ever quoted on similar goods by THE T. EATON CO LIMITED This Sale has already proved a great boon for thousands of shrewd buyers who are ever anxious to make a dollar reach the limit of purchasing power

MONEY SAVED IS MONEY GAINED, and this sale is your opportunity to save. Now is the time to take advantage of the wonderful values which we are placing before you. Send us your order—when the goods arrive look them over—if you don't like them send them back and we will refund your money in full. Try us once and do it now

REMEMBER OUR GUARANTEE "SATISFACTION OR YOUR MONEY BACK"

THE T. EATON CO LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA

TRY THE EATON MAIL ORDER SERVICE. IT WILL PLEASE YOU

COLGATE'S
BORIC TALC POWDER

Makes them Happy — because it makes them Comfortable

DELIGHTFULLY soothing, healing and refreshing. A boudoir luxury, a nursery necessity. Safest for you and your children.

Three delicate perfumes and unscented to choose from; and the perfumes as antiseptic as the powder itself.

All talcums are not alike. Colgate's is as proved by the analysis of an eminent chemist.

The Real Boric Powder

On request we will send a copy of this report showing that Colgate's Talc contains eight times more of that mild yet efficient antiseptic, boric acid, than the best of five other well-known talcums examined.. Besides this, Colgate's contains two other soothing and relieving ingredients not found in the other powders.

The new octagon easy-turn top is an added convenience. The flow of the powder is concentrated by the six-hole sifter.

Three perfumes—Cashmere Bouquet, Violet and Dactylis and Unscented.

THE SAFETY POWDER IN THE SAVING BOX

Trial Box sent for 4c

COLGATE & CO.

Dept. H. J., Coristine Bldg., Montreal

Makers of the famous Cashmere Bouquet Toilet Soap.

W. G. M. SHEPHERD, MONTREAL
Sole Agent for Canada

SEPTEMBER, 1911

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

TEN CENTS

FALL FASHIONS

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

Made in Canada

The increased cost of living is teaching housekeepers to be more discriminating in their purchases. The former "trust to luck" plan has developed into a more conservative plan of purchase. The standard and well known articles in daily use are given preference by those that study quality and economy. Magic Baking Powder when purchased in one pound tins has the combined qualifications of purity, quality and economy. You get more Baking Powder. Figure it out.

MAGIC BAKING POWDER

Contains no Alum and costs no more than the ordinary kinds.

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

EDITORIAL CHAT

OUR ADVERTISERS and our readers are quite naturally interested in one another. We have endeavored to secure advertising that is in every respect above reproach or suspicion. To show that we are entirely sincere in making this assertion, we would call your attention to the announcement made above, which is practically a guarantee of every advertisement inserted in each issue. The reader, in order to benefit by this measure, must be careful to refer to having seen the advertisement in this journal. We are sure that you will appreciate this guarantee and will feel a confidence in orders sent through this medium that you could hardly experience before. There is much to be said in favor of our advertisers, who have given a Canadian publication such loyal support, and we think our guarantee is the best and most practical form of showing our belief in their goods. The above announcement is intended to act as a protection to our readers and friends, who will find us cheerfully willing to act up to its obligations.

THE AUTUMN FASHIONS are beginning to absorb feminine attention, to the exclusion of almost every other topic. Fashion has played such strange tricks during the last year in skirts and hats, that we are kept in a constant "wonderment" as to whether the hobble effect is to be preserved, and whether the soup-bowl hat is to retain its popularity. In this issue we present our readers with what is practically a fashion supplement. The full-page plates will give you an excellent idea of the costumes which are designed for wear during the coming months. The advance announcement concerning fashions, which you will find in the form of a special letter, ought to be of particular interest to every woman, as we all like to know what are to be the modes of the future. Paris is still the arbiter in the realm of the modiste, and this information is obtained from headquarters. The unusual display of the latest styles in the number of the opening autumn was so welcomed by our readers last year that we decided this summer to enlarge

September CONTENTS 1911

FICTION

AT THE CROSS ROADS - 7
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - 9
THE BUCKIES' CORN ROAST - 11
A MAN FOR THE DIGGING - 12
A HONEYMOON IN HIDING - 14
NORTHERN SPY AND THE GREENING 16

SPECIAL FEATURES

FIRST COMMANDMENT OF HYGIENE - 6
CARNATION IN THE BUTTONHOLE - 6
THE GIRLS ON THE FARMS - 13

FASHION DEPARTMENT

FOR AFTERNOON OCCASIONS - 21
FASHIONABLE LONG COATS 22
SMART AUTUMN SUITS - 23
SIMPLE INDOOR GOWNS - 24
WORK APRONS - 26
TUNIC STYLES - 31
EMBROIDERED HAND BAGS - 33
IN THE SHOPS - 34

MATTERS OF MENU

A SEPTEMBER LUNCHEON - 17
CULINARY CONCEITS - 53

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - 36
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - 52

SPECIAL DEPARTMENT

THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - 16
AROUND THE HEARTH - 18
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - 35
THE DRESSING TABLE - 39
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - 49
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY - 54

MISCELLANEOUS

EDITORIAL CHAT - 3
EDITORIALS - 5
OUR MUSIC PAGE - 8
CANADIAN WOMEN'S PRESS CLUB - 46

EDITORIAL CHAT

the department further for the current issue in order to meet the demand for the latest and fullest information on the important subject—"Wherewithal shall we be clothed?"

OUR SPECIAL ARTICLES are worthy of your careful reading. The article by Dr. J. D. Logan, one of our best known and most scholarly journalists—"The First Commandment of Hygiene"—is a valuable contribution on a subject which concerns all of us. Health is the essential condition, if we are to be either useful or happy, and this article deals ably with the initial requirement. "The Girls on the Farms" is a heart-to-heart talk of the best order—breezy, sensible and discerning—by a girl who knows what she is talking about, and who will be glad to hear from other country girls about their hobbies or their hopes. We publish the photograph of "A Country Girl," and from her happy face and evident pride in the good steed, you may be assured of a wholesome and comprehending friend. We hope to have from her other talks with "the girls on the farms."

THE FAVORITE PROFESSION for Canadian women is undoubtedly nursing. In New York it is generally admitted that the Canadian nurse is in the front of the profession. In accounting for this excellence, the New York World recently admitted that in physique and amenity to discipline the Canadian girl is undeniably superior to her United States cousin. Hundreds of our girls are turning their attention to that essentially womanly calling, and are filling the hospitals of the continent. The last generation has seen a wonderful change in the system of training, and the nurse is now a most capable assistant to the medical profession. We expect to publish, during the coming year, a series of articles on the training and work of the nurse, written by a member of that profession, who is thoroughly acquainted with the subject, and who will give all our readers who are cherishing ambitions in the direction of nursing information as to its trials and opportunities. These

I Want to Emphasize the Importance of Getting Genuine Jap-a-lac

F. H. GLIDDEN, President
The Glidden Varnish Company

THIS is a personal word to the housewives of America—from the President of the Glidden Varnish Company.

I want to make it a word of warning.

You have learned of the superior merits of Jap-a-lac. If you have not used Jap-a-lac yourself, you have heard of its wonderful results—how it enables you to save money and to renew and beautify everything about your home from cellar to garret.

But do you fully appreciate that there is only one Jap-a-lac—and that when the dealer offers you an imitation he is giving you an inferior article.

The enormous sale of Jap-a-lac, reaching millions and millions of cans annually, has not only proved the superiority of Jap-a-lac—

It has stimulated the makers of these imitations, and unscrupulous dealers, to redoubled effort. They are trying hard to "cash in" on Jap-a-lac's reputation. Don't let them do it at your expense, Mrs. Housewife.

Get the genuine Jap-a-lac—insist! When a dealer offers you an imitation, claiming that it has the merits of Jap-a-lac, he practises wilful deception and actual fraud.

And any dealer who wants to sell you a substitute doesn't want to keep your confidence, and oughtn't to keep your trade.

Jap-a-lac is the result of half-a-century of experience in fine varnish making.

We've learned how to select the special oils and gums to produce the finest results. We've learned just how to blend them. We've learned how to produce in Jap-a-lac the finest all-around-the-home beautifier in the world. Jap-a-lac not only means far greater beauty, but far greater wear, far greater covering capacity than any imitation.

Use Jap-a-lac to give the home a complete going over. Bring down the scuffed-up furniture from the attic. Jap-a-lac it back to beauty. Use it on floors, on discolored woodwork, on baby's go-cart. There's nothing like Jap-a-lac for turning old tin or zinc bath tubs into enameled new ones.

There are household uses for Jap-a-lac by the hundreds. We've compiled them in a little book. Write me and I will see that a copy is mailed you.

Jap-a-lac is sold by good dealers generally. If you should strike a substituting dealer remember that genuine Jap-a-lac is most economical and best. A substitute is wasteful----and disappointing.

In the United States, Jap-a-lac prices are: (Full U. S. Measure): ¼-Pt. 20c; ½-Pt. 30c; Pt. 50c; Qt. 90c; ½-Gal. $1.65; Gal. $3.00. In Canada (Full Imperial Measure): ¼-Pt. 25c; ½ Pt. 35c; Pt. 60c; Qt. $1.10; ½-Gal. $1.95; Gal. $3.50.

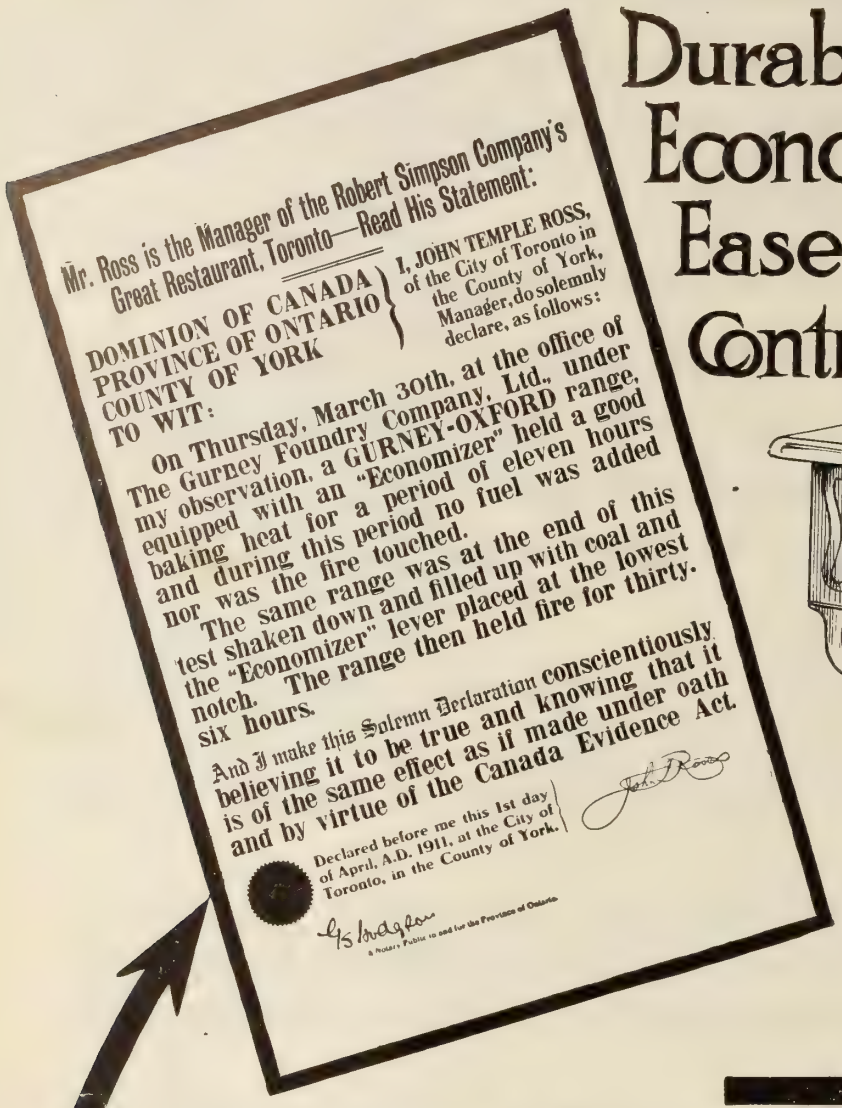
F. H. GLIDDEN, President

The Glidden Varnish Company

Factories: Cleveland, Ohio; Toronto, Can.
Branches: New York; Chicago

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have an unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or the money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."



Mr. Ross is the Manager of the Robert Simpson Company's Great Restaurant, Toronto—Read His Statement:

DOMINION OF CANADA
PROVINCE OF ONTARIO
COUNTY OF YORK
TO WIT:

I, JOHN TEMPLE ROSS, of the City of Toronto in the County of York, Manager, do solemnly declare, as follows:

On Thursday, March 30th, at the office of The Gurney Foundry Company, Ltd., under my observation, a GURNEY-OXFORD range, equipped with an "Economizer" held a good baking heat for a period of eleven hours and during this period no fuel was added nor was the fire touched.

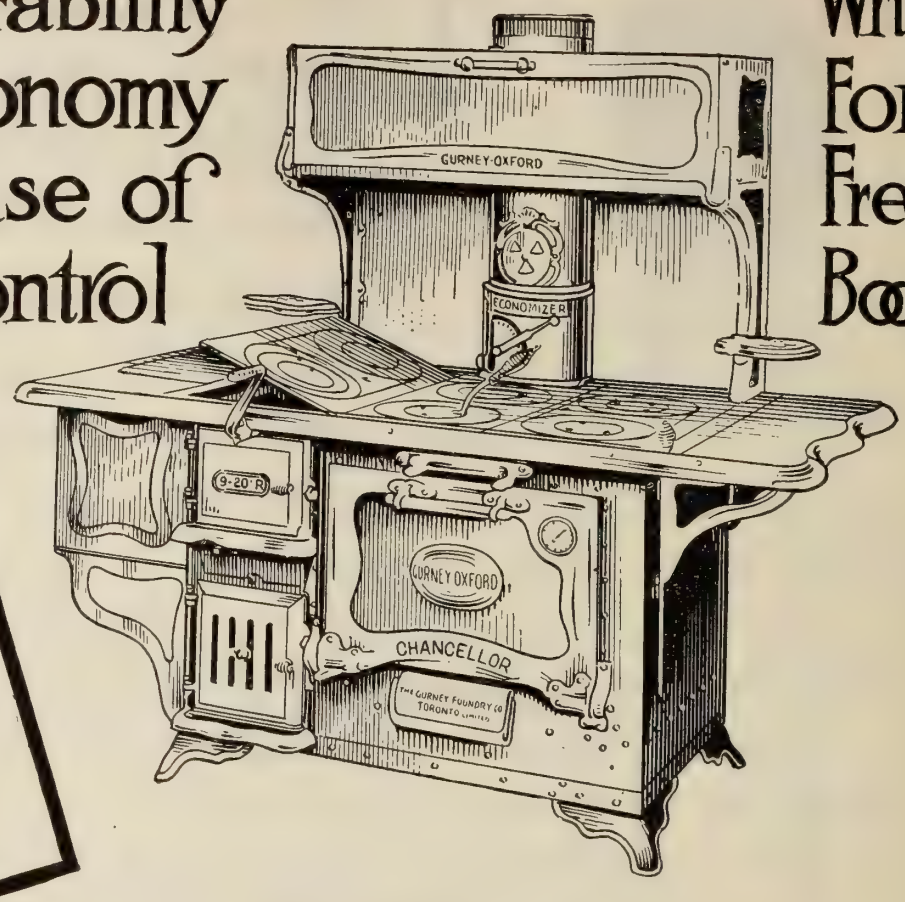
The same range was at the end of this test shaken down and filled up with coal and the "Economizer" lever placed at the lowest notch. The range then held fire for thirty six hours.

And I make this Solemn Declaration conscientiously believing it to be true and knowing that it is of the same effect as if made under oath and by virtue of the Canada Evidence Act.

Declared before me this 1st day of April, A.D. 1911, at the City of Toronto, in the County of York.

A Notary Public in and for the Province of Ontario

Durability Economy Ease of Control



Write For Free Book

A Cook Can't Make A Stove But A Stove Can Make A Cook

Most cooking success depends more upon the stove than on the cook.

Mr. John T. Ross, the author of the above tribute to Gurney-Oxford, is manager of the largest restaurant in Canada, and you may safely trust, not only his honesty, but the authority and experience from which he speaks.

GURNEY-OXFORD RANGES mean as much to you as to him. For no woman should put up with anything but the best in stoves. It means too much to her in time and labor; too much to the good man in grocery and fuel bills; too much to the whole family in health and proper diet.

STOVES GURNEY-OXFORD RANGES

The Dividing Oven Strip

is one of the star features of the GURNEY-OXFORD. This is a special division of the flue which forces the heat evenly all over the oven—front as well as back. Every woman who does her own baking will appreciate this.

The Grate is Easily Removable and the shaker works with greatest ease and simplicity, with one-half turn to the right. Owing to the strength of the "teeth" the hardest clinker is reduced to ashes in a jiffy. Now add to the above statement, and to our word, the proof of your own investigation. Ask your dealer for our Free Booklet, or if he does not sell Gurney-Oxford goods, write our nearest branch for the address of one who does.

Gurney-Oxford Ranges represent the highest standard in stove-making. No detail of material and workmanship is overlooked. Every stove that leaves the Gurney-Oxford factory has a reputation to sustain; a reputation for service, economy and ease of operation; a product that has stood the test of sixty years, and given life-long service in thousands of homes all over the country.

Mr. Ross, whose testimonial we are proud of, tells you about the wonderful heat-holding properties of the Oxford Economizer. Gurney-Oxfords are the only stoves licensed to use the wonderful device which makes this remarkable statement possible. The Oxford Economizer needs only to be set at a proper angle to hold the heat for hours.

This statement speaks volumes to the housewife whose range—to do satisfactory work—must not only cook properly, but economically as regards fuel, and with the greatest possible saving of time.

Another advantage of this device is its use as a first-class ventilator. It draws all odors of cooking—all the steam and smoke, up the chimney.

The Gurney Foundry Co. L't'd Toronto, Canada

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue

10 Cents a Copy

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

$1.00 a Year

Volume VIII TORONTO, SEPTEMBER, 1911 Number 5

The Autumn Days

SEPTEMBER is a month which seems like April in its opening of a new period of activity. In April we are looking forward to a garden, with all summer delights, to holidays by lake or sea or mountain, and to a blessed change from the monotony of every day. In September, we have come back brown and invigorated, with a host of plans for autumn and winter work.

Then a spicy breeze begins to play about kitchen and pantry, and the odor of pickles or catsup is wafted abroad until even the passer-by notices the good homely fragrance and has visions of bottles filled with brown sauce or toothsome dainties. There is the prophecy of long and comfortable winter evenings in the very air, and we welcome the suggestion of drawn curtains and grate fires, with a hot supper awaiting us.

Surely these autumn days are the best of the Canadian year, with their brilliance of coloring and soft haze resting on fields and woods. They must have captured the fancy of our writers and artists, for the charms of October are pictured in glorious tints in every exhibition of Canadian art and have a sonnet to themselves in every collection of Canadian verse. They are a time of ripe fulfilling, when we see the results of the year's work and look hopefully onward to the coming months of endeavor.

There is nothing more worth while than a walk through the autumn woods, and let us not be too busy to visit them in all their glory.

* * *

Are Canadian Women Extravagant?

A CORRESPONDENT writes with some indignation about the advice so lavishly bestowed upon woman, as to the style and the expense of her clothing and the financial management of her household.

"When a man fails in business or is guilty of dishonorable dealing, nine times out of ten, the wife is blamed and accused of extravagance. In most cases, her husband has kept her in complete ignorance of his financial condition, and she has no idea of what her household expenditure should be. If a man would confide his business affairs to his wife and help her plan the household spending, he would find her both willing and sympathetic."

So writes our correspondent, who will doubtless find many to agree with her. There are few women who are wilfully and deliberately extravagant, who would spend more than they should in utter indifference to a husband's financial position. Most women are anxious to appear well, but are even more anxious to avoid financial embarrassment or ruin. The wife should not be kept in ignorance of her husband's business standing, and it is mistaken kindness which would refrain from informing her concerning his obligations. There is no one more pitiably helpless than the woman who is suddenly confronted with financial wreck, and who is utterly ignorant of the business world.

There are some women who are woefully extravagant and who are quite callous with regard to their husband's business worries. But such women are in the minority. Let a woman be given an opportunity to share a man's perplexities and responsibilities and she seldom fails to be equal to the occasion.

THE GLEANER

By VIRNA SHEARD

As children gather daisies down green ways
Mid butterflies and bees,
To-day across the meadows of past days
I gathered memories.

I stored my heart with harvest of lost hours—
With blossoms of spent years;
Leaves that had known the sun of joy, and hours
Drenched with the rain of tears.

And perfumes that were long ago distilled
From April's pink and white,
Again with all their old enchantment, filled
My spirit with delight.

From out the limbo where lost roses go
The place we may not see,
With all its petals sweet and half-ablow
One rose returned to me.

Where falls the sunlight chequered by the shade
On meadows of the past,
I gathered blossoms that no sun can fade
No winter wind can blast.

—Written for "The Canadian Home Journal."

A Sense of Beauty

A LOVE for "pretty things" is part of the feminine nature which no wise person would wish to see repressed. What a dull world it would be if the merely useful objects were all that it contained! Ruskin has praised the love of brightness and radiance, declaring it an essential to noble living, and has reminded us that joy is the highest and ideal condition. There is no virtue in sad looks and dull garments. The wearing of black in supposed mourning for the friends who have left this world is a deplorable fashion which should not obtain in any country calling itself Christian. Crepe, as a badge of mourning, has almost disappeared, and the sooner black garments follow it, the better and brighter our world will be.

However, there is a danger of confusing beauty with costliness. A starry marguerite is as beautiful as the bloom from a conservatory, and is within reach of all of us. Nearly all those "little touches," which mean so much in making life brighter and more worth living are within the means of most women. Luxury is not necessarily beauty, and lavish spending does not always secure aesthetic results. A profusion of decoration or adornment is a mistake, and merely results in such confusion that the eye is wearied and the senses unsoothed.

The Puritans had many noble qualities which made them a force for righteousness, both socially and politically; but, in their excessive strictness, the later Puritans went to an extreme which resulted in a reaction of license. There must be beauty and amusement in our lives if we are to be healthy and symmetrical. We must give to the young an opportunity for play and the gratification of a national love of beauty, or we shall drive them to what is ultimately harmful and base. Every home may be beautiful.

The First Commandment of Hygiene

By J. D. LOGAN, Ph.D.
Author of "Democracy and Education," "How to Gain Health," Etc

EVERY generation experiences what may be called a mental epidemic. An idea so obsesses a people or nation, and so deranges their customary attitudes of mind and their social habits, that the result is a general mania or craze—essentially a mental disease.

Our own generation is obsessed by problems of personal and domestic hygiene. We have so "worried" ourselves into an over-anxiety about what we should eat and drink, how we should dress and exercise, and how we should ventilate, heat and light our homes or dwelling-places, that we have passed from a sane state of mind in these matters of health and happiness to a mental condition which discloses in our conduct the symptoms of mania or hysteria.

There is no exaggeration in this statement. Witness the marked vogue to-day of "pure food" fads, for instance. The innumerable advertisements of breakfast foods present to the imagination such a variety of vitalizing and health-giving qualities and of methods of preparing and serving these foods that one's wits become, as it were, addled, and one almost neglects to eat at all out of sheer helplessness in determining what and when to eat.

Again: witness our panicky solicitude for pure air and water. To us there is a very grim humor in the irreverent refrain of the parodist—

"There are microbes hovering round."

We have come to regard the air and the water as polluted and poisonous. It is no longer enough for us to have the windows in our homes wide open day and night, we must now sleep out of doors—on the roof or veranda. Water from wells or municipal reservoirs is, in our modern view, altogether noxious; public fountains and drinking cups are cesspools. We must now have pure spring water, "bottled at the springs," or water sterilized by boiling, and no one may drink the water of a public fountain, save from his own or her own "individual drinking cup," a portable utensil carried about by each person, in pocket or handbag, according to the sex of each potential thirst-quencher. (N.B.--To inventors--There ought to be "big money" for one of you who would devise and patent a "combination" individual drinking cup; say, a combination match-safe and cup for men, and sewing thimble and cup for ladies!!)

Finally: This twentieth-century health hysteria has passed beyond a solicitude for ourselves. It is now directed towards the "creature comforts" of our domestic animals. In fact, we house, tend, and even diet, them as considerately as we do ourselves, and sometimes more considerately than we do our children. In the days of their health we feed our cats peptonized milk, and our canines dog biscuit. When they fall ill we send them to the cat or dog hospital; and when "Tabby" and "Carlo" die, we give them formal burial, weep o'er their graves, and raise tombstones to their memory. If we thus go to such ends for useless animals, how shall we escape the conclusion that eventually we shall exhibit a still greater solicitude for the health of our useful animals—house and groom our horses and cattle elaborately, and delight their palates with rations of predigested oats, puffed corn, and shredded hay?

This question may seem in form a forced witticism, a bit of satiric humor, applied somewhat ungraciously to a phase of a very genuine and praiseworthy humanitarian movement. Be it so. When a movement becomes such as to tend to result in an absurdity, then must we declare it to have its origin in a pathological, or insane, condition of mind.

Now, our twentieth-century health hysteria is the outcome of our ignorance of the basis, or fundamental principle, of hygiene. The natural vitalizing basis of all living beings, animal and vegetable, is oxygen. We fuss endlessly over the nature, quality and preparation of the foods we eat, and over the purity of the water we drink, but we forget that the supply and quality of these are, in our times, almost wholly regulated by others than ourselves. But oxygen, which is the great natural energy-giver, is free as the air and chiefly the gift of the air. Only ourselves can pollute the quality of the air we breath and limit the supply of oxygen. In short: Oxygen is our Health Master. And the supreme principle, maxim, or rule of sane hygiene is this: "KEEP THE SUPPLY OF AIR—the chief source and common carrier of oxygen for respiration—ADEQUATE, FRESH, PURE AND FLOWING."

To apply this principle, to obey this rule, in our daily living, is the simplest and easiest matter possible. We have only to understand the nature of the necessities in the case in order to see that nothing more is demanded than proper ventilation, in which are included as its auxiliaries proper heating and lighting, for our homes, offices, public auditoriums, institutional buildings, social clubhouses, factories, and general business places.

The necessities in the case may be put summarily as follows. The average composition of the air we breathe, as it is inhaled, is: Oxygen, 20:81 p.c.; nitrogen, 79:45 p.c.; carbonic acid, 0:04 p.c.; aqueous vapor (argon), very small quantity. Now, when this inhaled air has been deprived by the lungs of as much oxygen as they can absorb and is then exhaled, the air given out contains a decrease of about 4 p.c. of oxygen (16:033), and an increase of about 4 p.c. of carbonic acid (4:38), with a slight increase of nitrogen (79:587) and of aqueous vapor. The carbonic acid is a poisonous gas and the exhaled aqueous vapor is impregnated with impurities from the lungs.

The poisonous carbonic acid and impure aqueous vapor, together with the reduced quantity of oxygen, exhaled into a relatively confined breathing space, necessarily contaminate, and gradually reduce the total quantity of the vital air within that breathing space. If the proportion of oxygen in the air is reduced, by exhalation and inadequate ventilation, to 13 p.c., ill effects are soon felt, and when it is decreased to 8 p.c. asphyxia is inevitable.

It is, then, a momentous fact that the air we breathe is equally the agent of life or of death. The average adult "respires," approximately, once in every three seconds, inhales and exhales from 20 to 30 cubic inches of air per respiration. If we make a "good square meal" on vital air (20 p.c. oxygen per cubic inch) at every inhalation, then, all other conditions, of course, as they ought, we shall secure health and vigor—in a word, life. But if we skimp our vital air and breathe the exhaled poisonous carbonic acid and argon, then shall we suffer illness and a general debility of our members and energies—in short, virtual, if not actual, death. For thus sayeth the poet, truly, though paradoxically, since her own years upon this earth numbered almost ninety:

"How short is human life! The very breath
Which frames my words, accelerates my death."

Every adult requires about 2,000 cuboc feet of air-space in order to have good health and vigor, and the air itself must be kept pure, fresh and flowing. Human beings, however, exhibit specially curious logic in this matter. First, in believing that if the air in the house is kept flowing by window ventilation, it is necessarily pure and fresh; and, secondly, in selecting their lighting systems, as if the only thing to be considered in home-lighting were its brilliance, convenience and economy.

Window-ventilation, to be sure, is highly necessary, but the air thus kept flowing must be valued from the point of view of its source. Obviously, it cannot be pure and fresh of it is wafted to the windows from districts containing crowded tenements, abbatoirs, stables, back yards unclean with garbage and refuse, and so on.

From our point of view of ventilation and oxygen supply, especially when, as in winter, the days are long and the weather bitterly cold, a right system of lighting in our homes is paramount for health. The reason for this is that besides respiration the chief factor in reducing the average percentage of oxygen in the air from the adequate 20 p.c. to the degree which makes asphyxiation imminent, is combustion.

Since oil lamps and candles are now practically antiquated, the problem of the choice of lighting methods in our homes and offices lies between gas and electricity. A single consideration will readily settle that problem. So far as ventilation or oxygen supply is concerned the facts are these: One burner of illuminating gas will consume from the air in a room or office as much oxygen as would be consumed by three persons, and, in addition, will free carbon monoxide and dioxide, argon, sulphur, dioxide and ammonium compounds (See any reputable textbook of chemistry or cyclopædia under the proper headings). On the other hand, incandescent electric lights, because they require no oxygen and free no deleterious products by decomposition, are, indubitably, the most healthful system of lighting. This statement, of course, is meant as one of scientific fact and not as an advertisement, for, under special conditions, other considerations besides ventilation and percentage of oxygen may have to enter into the choice of a system of lighting for our homes and offices.

This, then, is the conclusion of the whole matter. The problem of insuring health and vigor is not so much a problem of what we shall eat and drink, but of how we shall obtain an adequate supply of pure, fresh, flowing air wherever we dwell and conduct our business. Relatively viewed, the supreme principle of hygiene is this: Oxygen is Nature's primeval and primary vitalizer—the elemental "breath of life." It is of the air, omnipresent and free, as the air, and none may take from us this supreme gift of Mother Nature—save ourselves. Therefore this is the first commandment of hygiene: "Seek ye pure, fresh, flowing air, and seek it abundantly."

A Carnation in Your Buttonhole

By MARION WATHEN

DO something new every day; something out of the beaten track. It may be quite an effort on your part, but do it; that is if you want to keep bright, to keep young.

You have heard people talk of "settling down." Don't. If you do, when you want to "stir" you will find yourself so well "settled" that you will be like the quartz that it takes dynamite to move.

I do not mean for people to be scatter-brained, that they are not to concentrate their energies, for nothing worth while was ever accomplished without concentration. But I do mean this: Keep out of ruts. The very minute a person begins to dread doing things other than the habitual, that is the time to do them. When we begin to be "set in our ways" we begin to be old.

It used to be considered the proper thing for persons who had reached a certain age to retire to the chimney corner and become helpless and infirm. But now we see grandmothers and grandfathers riding bicycles, touring about the country in autos—not allowing themselves to lose interest in things, to get into ruts. And so they keep bright and healthy and young.

Shake yourself the minute you begin to lose interest in things, for then you are in danger of "settling."

Turn right about and start being interested in something. Learn to play a game, even if you're seventy years of age; learn to make bread, if you've never made it; get interested in making cakes; if you've never cultivated flowers begin to cultivate them. If you're a student of books and are in danger of "settling down" to that, learn how to play golf, how to swim, how to row; buy a pattern and make a shirtwaist, start taking physical culture—something to lend variety to your life.

A college professor, while delivering a course of lectures on psychology at a Chautauqua summer school, attended "between times" a school of domestic science and learned how to make bread. He made a practical application of his psychology; he realized that "variety is not only the spice of life, but it is also a necessary ingredient."

A lady who was a story-writer but who realized that if she would keep bright and young she must have a line of interest other than her regular vocation, began to do housekeeping things. Her first attempt was at making peanut cookies, of which she was particularly fond. They were a great success, and she was prouder of this attainment than though she had written a good story. She treated every friend who called to peanut cookies, accompanied by a, "I want you to taste my cookies, I am so proud of them." Invariably she met with the response, "You didn't make these?" with a heavy accent on the "you," and a tone that decidedly suggested surprise and that the idea that she could make cookies was the most absurd, unbelievable thing in the world. The writer-lady was so annoyed that she kept on "making things," till she proved to her friends that people who did successful work along one line must not necessarily be one-sided. And to her surprise she discovered that this outside interest was making her a better story writer. It is surely a great mistake for people to become machines along any one line. Versatility tends to happiness, it tends to health, it tends to greatness. Goethe was a poet, a statesman, an artist, a philosopher. Michael Angelo not only painted Madonnas but he built bridges and frescoes. It is said that Franklin was distinguished along eleven different directions. But it is not so much making a business of doing a number of different things that I would urge, but simply that we keep up an interest in something other than our regular vocation. Otherwise, we are almost sure to become narrow.

Whatever we do don't let our enthusiasms die out. If we do we have surely begun to "settle." Be enthusiastic about something, even if it is only a baseball match, a game of croquet, a plant, a book, a mouse trap, a hat—anything. The most uninteresting person in the world is the person who is not enthusiastic over anything, and he is usually the oldest. Keep hold of enthusiasm and you will keep young.

BE ENTHUSIASTIC

Grow not dull and lifeless—grey,
In this glad world; there's chance each day,
In earth of sky and trees and flowers,
In world of friends to sweeten hours,
For much of joy and interest—thrill.
Keep open-heart; it's child-land still.

AT THE CROSS ROADS

A Story of One Summer Night

By WINIFRED M. GRAHAM

"I HAVE given you great-grandmother's room, Ellice. I thought you would like to be there again."

Little Mrs. Kenyon surveyed her sister-in-law rather anxiously. How tired Ellice looked, she thought to herself. There were dark marks under the grey eyes, and a certain weary droop in the usually erect, lithe figure.

"Thank you, Marion. Yes, I love dear great-grandmother's room. How we used to delight in sleeping there as a treat when we were little. I believe we thought that great-grandmother watched over us while we were asleep. After all, it is good to be a child, with no cares or worries to disturb."

"You ought not to talk about cares or worries at your age, Ellice," returned Marion Kenyon, with decision.

"Oh! I am all right," said Ellice, hastily, a slight flush rising to her pale cheeks under her sister-in-law's scrutiny, "only London air is not so invigorating as country air, you know. But you have not told me who else is staying here, and it is nearly time for me to dress for dinner."

"Only Mrs. Markham is here yet," replied Mrs. Kenyon, "but I am expecting some more people to-morrow—the Dawsons and Mr. Shaw. Oh, by the way"—and Marion pretended to be very busy arranging the cups on the dainty little tea-table—"Jack met Dudley Orme to-day in the village. He came over to see his aunt. Jack happened to mention that we are expecting you to-night, and Dudley seemed to think that it was a long time since he had seen you, so Jack asked him to come to dinner and stay the night."

Ellice sat staring into the fire as though she had not heard a word. Her sister-in-law went on pleadingly.

"You will be glad to see him, won't you, Ellice? You and he used to be such chums. You must not forget old friends, you know, even for charming new ones—Mr. Shaw, for instance."

"Yes, we have always been friends," assented Ellice quietly, ignoring the end of Mrs. Kenyon's remark. Into her mind came the picture of Doctor Dudley Orme, tall, handsome, clever, struggling to make his way in the world, but hampered by small means.

Dudley had called her his little wife, and she had never doubted in those early days that she would marry him. But college and hospital work had separated them as they grew up, and though Dudley never wavered in his affection for his chum, to Ellice things seemed rather different.

Then came her elder brother's marriage, and immediately afterwards her father's death and the terrible awakening to find that the estate was heavily mortgaged, and could not support them all. Jack had never wished Ellice to leave Castle Lodge; he would manage somehow, he said. But Ellice was brave and independent, so she obtained a post as secretary to one of her father's old friends, and for three years she had managed to maintain herself. Jack had enough to do to keep up Castle Lodge and clothe and educate his younger brother Herbert, and Ellice would not be a drag on him. But it was a struggle to live on her salary, and Ellice, hampered and restricted, cut off from the things she loved, and the luxuries she revelled in, had made up her mind that she was not meant to marry a poor man.

There was nothing mean or petty about Ellice, only a girlish longing to be free from pinching and scraping. She did not know, in the least, how much Dudley Orme cared for her, or realize what he really meant to her. Hitherto his had been a silent love, for he had not been in a position to marry, but lately he had obtained an appointment which brought him in a small but secure income, and he was only waiting for a chance to declare his love to Ellice.

And lately she had made the acquaintance of a friend of her brother's, a Mr. Shaw, who had bought a fine estate only a short distance from Castle Lodge. He was evidently greatly taken with Ellice's girlish beauty, and Ellice was flattered by the preference of this middle-aged, rich man for her.

Mrs. Kenyon sat silent, fidgeting with the sugar tongs and eyeing her sister-in-law doubtfully. She was very fond of Ellice, but she could not understand her at times.

Ellice jumped up and gathered together her furs. "I will go and dress, Marion, I think," she said, a little abruptly, "or I shall be late for dinner."

It was over. Ellice had given Dudley Orme his dismissal, and now she was alone in hed bedroom, brushing out her long hair and picturing over and over in her mind the scene in the inner drawing-room, where they had been discreetly left by Marion after dinner.

How manly Dudley had looked, and how well he had pleaded. It was only a small home he could offer her, but he could give her a wealth of love if he had not much money. A great lump rose up in Ellice's throat as she remembered his dazed, white face when she refused him. His little chum refused him. Had she been possessed by a spirit of evil? she asked herself, angrily, as she looked at her white face and heavy eyes in the glass while she brushed her hair. Surely something had been curiously wrong with her as she had listened, unmoved, to that passionate wooing.

"It's too late now," she said, turning away resolutely from her image in the glass. "Poor Dudley, what a muddle we've made of our lives. And—and—I believe I love you, after all."

That was the sting of it. Ellice know now, when it was too late, what a bitter mistake she had made. Only her pride had kept her from calling Dudley back after she had sent him from her side. She felt in a fever of pain and misery. She could not possibly go to bed. How could she sleep when

"It was a glorious May morning."

Dudley was under the same roof and awake also?—she could not doubt it. Well, if it was any comfort to him she had the heartache too. Oh, how foolish she had been, and a strangled sob rose, only to be choked back with firm determination.

She glanced restlessly round the room with its heavy mahogany furniture of a bygone age. Her eye caught a painting over the mantelpiece in an oval gilt frame. It was the portrait of a dainty, sweet-faced girl, hardly more than a child, dressed in the quaint costume of a hundred years ago. This was Ellice's great-grandmother, after whom the room was named. The pathetic, pale face, big, serious eyes, and childish mien had always had a strange fascination for Ellice. As a tiny mite she had once been found crying piteously before the portrait, and on being asked what was the matter she had replied, "Poor dreat-drandmover, she do look so sorry, she makes Ellie sorry too."

No wonder the poor little lady looked "sorry," for the portrait had been painted on the eve of her wedding with Garvice Kenyon, the owner at that time of Castle Lodge, and there was a well-founded tale handed down to her descendants that the unhappy bride loved another man, whom her parents would not allow her to marry, because he was poor. She had yielded at last to her parents' persuasion, and had married Garvice Kenyon, a rich man, but in no wise suited to be the husband of a timid, shrinking girl.

Not long, however, did Emmeline Kenyon live to mourn her lover. She faded silently away like a broken flower, and only eighteen months after her wedding day they laid her to rest in the old churchyard, leaving her husband and a baby son of six months to mourn her loss. It was a tragic little life history, and Ellice as she stood before the crackling fire and gazed up at the sad young face, felt it afresh.

"Even great-grandmother looks reproachfully at me," she said half aloud, and then all of a sudden some words her brother Jack had spoken casually a few months before, when he had run up to London to see her, flashed across her mind. They had been talking of Castle Lodge and of some improvements which Jack was making there and somehow the conversation had drifted to great-grandmother's room, and Jack had said carelessly, "Pater told me just before he died that there was a story of a secret drawer in the old cabinet in great-grandmother's room, where some of her treasures and her diary were hidden."

Ellice had not heard whether her brother had ever found the drawer, but she thought he had probably forgotten all about it in the business of making the improvements on which he had been engaged during the last six months. A sudden determination took possession of her to find the secret of the old cabinet herself. No one loved great-grandmother as she did, surely no one had more right to search for her secret treasures. True, it might seem like sacrilege, but who could understand a woman's secrets like a woman—one who could sympathize, as no one else in the family could, with the poor little ancestress who had been forced to marry a rich man whom she did not love? Ellice felt a throb of sympathy for the girl who had married a rich man instead of her poor lover.

To think was to act with Ellice. Marion had often told her that she was a bundle of impulses. In a moment she was across the room and stood facing the great heavy mahogany cabinet. She threw open the doors with their beautiful inlaid work, and drew out the drawers one by one, feel methodically all round inside each opening for some spring which should betray a hiding-place. But all in vain. Her searching brought no result but failure. If there was a secret the cabinet guarded it well, and great-grandmother looked on in silence, and gave no sign. Ellice was about to give up in despair, when, glancing upwards to the carved ornamentation which adorned the top of the cabinet, she noticed the heavy, wide beading below. She took a chair, climbed up, and pulled at the beading. It yielded to her tug, and a long, shallow drawer was disclosed, but it was empty. Disappointed again, Ellice determined to make one more attempt. She thrust her hand into the narrow opening and felt carefully all around. There was a sharp click, and a small drawer shot out suddenly against Ellice's hand, making her fingers tingle with the impact.

But the girl did not heed the pain. With a little cry of triumph she climbed down, holding her treasure, and carried it over to the light, so that she might examine it better. There was not much in it, after all—only a miniature of a young man, with a bright, handsome face, and the one word, Rupert, beneath it a lock of fair curly hair tied up with blue silk, a gold locket which was tarnished and dull, and a thin book with a very discolored leather cover.

Ellice touched the treasures tenderly, with a feeling that they were almost too sacred for the human eye, these long-hidden possessions of a long-dead wife. Then, impelled by some impulse which she could not resist, she sat down and opened the book.

It proved to be the writing of which Jack had spoken. The writing was pale and faint, just a girlish writing in the precise pointed style of a hundred years ago. On the front page were the words "Emmeline Elizabeth Darcy—her book. May 15th, 18." Below was a note which read, "This is my

Continued on page 51

AN OLD-TIME LOVE SONG

"Believe Me if all Those Endearing Young Charms"

Words by THOMAS MOORE Music by SIR JOHN STEVENSON

Be-lieve me if all those en-dea-ring young charms, Which I gaze on so fondly to-
It is not while beau-ty and youth are thine own, And thy cheek unprofaned by a day, Were to-change by to-morrow and fleet in my arms Like fai-ry gifts fading a tear, That the fervour and faith of a soul can be known. To which time will but make thee more way! Thou would'st still be ador'd as this moment thou art, Let thy loveliness fade as it dear! Oh! the heart that has tru-ly lov'd never forgets, But as tru-ly loves on to the will; And around the dear ruin, each wish of my heart, Would entwine itself verdantly still. close; As the sun-flower turns on her god, when he sets, The same look which she turn'd when he rose!

THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS

By ISABEL ECCLESTONE MACKAY

ILLUSTRATED BY C.W. JEFFERYS

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia.

"WHICH means that he doesn't want me," thought the older man with something like a sigh, but he did not let the feeling show in his face. "Very well," he said. "Good-bye, my boy. Have a good time. Just use your eyes and tell me what you see. I'll write you at Vancouver." He held out his hand which Mark shook heartily. Looking keenly into the frank, young eyes his uncle could see no shadow there. Yet, somehow, just at that moment, a strange psychological impulse prompted him to let the lad stay. For an instant he hesitated—an instant too long, for the impulse passed! Instead, he gripped his hand harder. "Mark," he said, "you and I—we are not men who say much. But you understand? You know the position you hold in this house—the hopes I place in you. Do not disappoint me, my son!"

Mark bowed his head. "I'll do my best, sir," he said gravely. And they shook hands again.

Left alone, Adam Torrance looked around his pleasant library with a sigh. He considered himself a fair man and he was fair when the fairness did not clash too boldly with his own deep desires. He had an inborn conviction, scarcely recognized, but very potent, that things ought to arrange themselves according to his wishes. If they did not, he was inclined to use suasion. He hoped that he would not have to use suasion with Mark. He wished Miriam had been more explicit, but realized that it would do no good to ask for details. She had given her warning, more she would not do. Brown! It sounded like the name of a girl who might work in the Stores!

He was angry with himself for thinking of the Stores. He did not wish to think of them, for they lay heavy on his conscience. Something was continually telling him, if he gave it the chance, that he had not been quite fair to the Stores. He had intended to be, years ago, after that terrible thing had happened, the loss of his baby girl, and while the awful accusation of the letter was still fresh in his mind he had intended to do many things. But Edith, his wife, had been so broken in health. She had declared so pitifully that it would kill her to stay in the city where the child had been lost, that, after a few half-hearted attempts, he had given it up, and they had gone away. He had told himself then that he could not do otherwise, and probably he had been right. After his wife's death he had pleaded that he needed rest and change; travel and yet more travel; but, now that he was home at last, the pushed-aside but never-settled problem stared him fully in the face.

Had he been a completely selfish man he would have ignored it, brushed it away as thousands of rich men brush away unpleasant duties.

"Now that Mark is off my mind, I'll have to look into things," he thought. "I'll never have a moment's peace until I do. Mark would have been a help, but I am glad he has gone. Miriam knew what she was talking about. Lucky I happened to have those timber limits. I'll write to Macgregor to keep him busy till I give the word. If Miriam would tell me who the girl is (only she won't), I might be able to make it up to her." But the little voice, which tells all of us a bit of truth now and again, said plainly, "You know that you could not make it up to her—if she cared." "Nonsense," he told the voice irritably. "This girl is nothing to me, and Mark—Mark is all I have."

Suddenly, for no obvious reason, a strange despondency came upon him. The immediate present seemed to slip out of focus, leaving him, a startled entity, in the vast outside of things. He felt, as he had felt once before in that room, when he had given up the search for the child who would never be found, a sense of loss, profound and illimitable!

Then the familiar things rushed back, he got his grip again. But with a difference. The impulse to call Mark back was irresistible. He rang the bell sharply. "Send Benson to me!"

"Benson has left for the depot, sir. Mr. Mark—"

"What is the time?"

"Ten-twenty, sir."

"The train has gone?"

"At ten, sir."

He turned back into the library. After all, it had been a foolish impulse.

CHAPTER XI.

WHEN Mark Wareham closed the door of his uncle's house behind him he had no clear purpose in his mind. He had decided that he could not, in decency, call upon Christine; and yet it seemed intolerable to spend his small remaining time at a distance from her. It would do no harm, at least, to walk in the direction of her home. It was a long walk and the fresh air would enable him to think. Over and over again he wondered at the chance which caused his uncle to need him at this particular time. It seemed such a blind, blundering of fate, but, not knowing anything about the toasted cheese eaten by Martha, the real reason of his misfortune did not for a moment occur to him. Again and again he pictured the morrow, which was already among the might have beens, and with each succeeding picture the present seemed more unendurable. It seemed as if he could not go without something, some word, some look even, which would hold a promise for the future; and as his will, already in the grip of one of the most elemental of human passions, grew more and more defiant, his reason seemed to remonstrate, and it did not seem so impossible to see Christine, after all. At least, it would be quite proper to try to see her. He might not succeed, but, to go across the continent without trying would surely be the height of foolishness. He looked at his watch—not much time left and it was a long way to Brook Street! Why need he walk? One could get plenty of fresh air on a car and be able to think all the better for sitting still. On fire with impatience he swung himself upon the first car that came along. It was the wrong car, and he would have to transfer, but anything seemed better than a moment of waiting.

Why had Aunt Miriam fibbed about Christine—stay, perhaps she had not fibbed. It was possible Christine had been waiting for her interview while Miss Torrance talked to him. A simple and adequate explanation. An explanation also of why Miss Torrance, after seeing Christine, had declined to give her a trial as companion. He almost hated Aunt Miriam!

How slowly the car crawled. At the point of transfer an old lady of more than comfortable proportions got wedged in the doorway, and when extricated had succeeded in making Mark miss his car. The most considerate and good-humored of men, he now consigned all old ladies to a place not at all suited to them. There was one spot where the car switched also, and a place where it slowed down because of an open sewer, and once the trolly came off. But Brook Street was reached at last! a more cheerful Brook Street at night, losing some of its sordidness in the show of lighted windows and the hum of talk. To Mark it was a street apart, not subject to the laws of other streets. Love had passed that way.

There were many lights in the House of Windows. It seemed quite gay, for many of the blinds were but half-drawn and lamplight hides as much as it discloses. Mark walked past the open door. He knew that the sisters' rooms opened to the side, above the garden, and it was his fancy to see if he could pick them out. Afterwards he was inclined to take great credit to himself for his perspicacity though indeed one only needed eyes to see the difference. For instance, the blinds of the Misses Brown hung straight and did not curl up at the edges. The windows of the Misses Brown were all open and the curtains showed a dainty white, undisfigured by holes or dangling ornaments. The light, too, was different, clearer and more subdued.

As Mark stood gazing, someone moved into the lighted square of window—a girl's slim figure. Mark felt his heart leap and then fall like lead for the figure was now joined by another, a man's figure, short and broad-shouldered. They leaned together over the window-sill. The sight was like tinder to the torch of Mark's awakening love. In a moment passion was ablaze. His journey, his uncle's need, every other consideration seemed futile beside the necessity of knowing who it was who stood in the window beside the figure of the square-shouldered man. The last of his diffidence vanished like a puff of smoke and he strode in at the door of the House of Windows very much as a cave man might have entered the home of his chosen mate. The impetus carried him up a full flight and then, as no one opposed him, reason managed to get in a word. The acquired niceties of civilization strove with the primitive instinct and he paused.

What right had he?

Above, a door opened and closed; someone was coming down the stair. He must go on, he could not turn back now—

"You!" said Christine.

She stood a few steps above him, the dim light shining behind her hair, her face in shadow. There was a tiny pause that seemed endless, and then, with a woman's quick recovery, "How do you do?" said the girl coolly, "I am going down to post a letter." Her tone implied that he should draw aside to let her pass.

Now was the cave-man's chance. They were alone upon the stairs. Let him but assert himself and she must hear him. All he had to do was to hold his ground and speak. But something had happened. At the sight of her, at the sound of her voice, all Mark's love-born confidence, his fever to be doing, was merged in a calamitous timidity; of all the things which he wanted to do, he found he could do nothing.

"She stood a few steps above him."

Meekly hes tepped aside, raising his hat without a word, to let her pass.

With dignified deliberation, Christine came down the few remaining steps and passed him on the landing. She even went two steps down the other flight, then she hesitated, turned, and flashing him a look in which dignity vainly strove with mischief, she asked "Were you—going somewhere ?"

"Yes," said Mark. "I am going to Vancouver."

"Oh !" said Christine.

"I was coming to say good-bye."

"Oh !" said Christine again.

Mark was recovering his nerve. Time was flying. He must make the most of the few moments left.

"May I come with you to post the letter ?" he asked gravely.

"Yes" said Christine. It was she now who seemed to have nothing to say. They walked down the stairs in silence. Christine forgot to be vexed with him for coming so soon. Mark forgot that he had expected her to be vexed. There are times when little things take second place.

"I have to go to-night, at ten," said Mark, when they were out in the cool dusk. Instinctively they turned into the quieter way—not the way to the letter box ! "I could not go without seeing you again. I know that I—that we—he floundered, and Christine seemed not able to help him. "I mean I know that we have known each other only a day. But it doesn't seem possible. I've often read in books about people feeling that they have always known other people. Till now, I thought it was rot. Yet when I saw you going in to my aunt's I knew at once; not your name or anything about you but just you. Did you feel anything like that ?"

"No-o," said Christine thoughtfully. "Not like that. But," smiling shyly, "I seem to know you very well now. Otherwise," with sudden primness, "I wouldn't have gone to lunch with you or be walking with you now."

"Well, you see it is the same thing, only different. It means that you and I were meant to be—"

"Friends ? Do you think so ?"

"And now that I have to go away and do not know just when I shall be back I wanted to tell you myself and ask you to—" again that overpowering shyness seized him and turned a much bolder request into "to let me write to you."

Christine gave him a girl's frank look—a look that may have meant just anything.

"You may if you wish," she said simply.

"And you won't forget me ? You promise—"

"Christine !" said a stern voice behind them.

Christine turned. "Oh, Tommy ! you startled me ! What is the matter ? Is anyone ill ?"

"I do not know your friend," said Tommy icily.

"Oh, let me introduce you. Mr. Wareham, Mr. Burns." Mark bowed curtly. He recognized the man with the square shoulders when he had seen at the window.

"Gracious !" said Christine sweetly, "I thought I left you talking about the garden with Ada ?"

"Ada thought you had simply gone down to post a letter."

"So I did. But not simply. Here is the letter box now."

"It is the fire-box," said Tommy grimly.

"So it is—how funny !" This time Christine had the grace to blush. "Where is the old letter box anyway ?" she asked pettishly.

"Where it always is. Two blocks farther down the other way." Tommy's tone was the last thing in irony.

"In that case," interposed Mark politely, "perhaps Miss Brown will entrust her letter to me. I shall pass the box on the way to the station. And I must run. My train is due at ten sharp."

Christine held out the letter to him, turning her back upon the aggrieved Tommy.

"Yes, you must go," she said, placing her free hand in his. "Good-bye and good luck."

He held her hand and the touch of it was more powerful than the frowns of a thousand Tommys. Yet for her sake he restrained himself. "You did not answer my last question," he reminded her. It was his last chance.

Christine blushed divinely. "Didn't I ? "Well then—then—I promise ? An answer sufficiently obscure to Tommy, but which seemed to satisfy Mark entirely. "Not good-bye, then" he said, "but Auf Wiedersehen."

"What's that ?" demanded the angry Tommy.

"German," said Christine, placidly.

"Well, I'll be—"

"I don't doubt it," she turned to him now, her lovely face white and mutinous.

"Well ? What do you mean by it ?" she asked sharply.

"What ?"

"I say, what do you mean by it ? Why are you spying on me ? What right have you ? I tell you I'm tired of it. I won't have it !—Oh, Tommy, you're a pig ! I hate you." She put up her hands and began to cry softly in the darkness.

"Christine !" Tommy's horror was unfeigned. "Oh, Christine !"

"Go away. I don't like you. If you hadn't been here he might—have—" she sobbed incoherently.

"Yes, I think he might have," said Tommy with cold fierceness, "and now I want to know who he is and how you came to be walkiing here with him ?"

"You have no right" repeated Christine sulkily, but nevertheless she told him. It all came out, about her attempt to get a position, about Aunt Miriam, about Mrs. Wilkins, about the luncheon, and about the going to Vancouver.

When she had finished Tommy drew a long breath and said, "Thank God."

"What for ?" asked Christine sharply. "Because he is going away, I suppose."

"No, not that," said Tommy gently. "You don't understand, Christine. You gave me a fright, but its alright now. Stop crying, dear. Did he—er—ask leave to write to you ?"

"Yes, he did."

"And did you—but I see you did. Will you read the letters to—to Ada, Christine ?"

"Parts—perhaps," said Christine naively.

In spite of himself Tommy laughed. "Oh, Christine !—and yesterday you were a child !"

"That's just it, Tommy," said the girl slowly. "I was a child—yesterday."

He patted her hand tenderly. "Don't fret. We all have to grow up sometime—why are you looking behind you ? What is the matter ?"

"Nothing—only I thought I saw that old woman again."

"What old woman ?"

"An old woman I saw this morning. I've seen her before sometimes. A horrid old thing with red eyes. Sometimes I have a feeling as if she was watching me. Look behind quickly. I think she is there now."

Tommy, much amazed, turned sharply and thought he saw someone; but the impression was so indistinct that he could not say whether or not it was but a shadow of the night.

"There is no one there, what nonsense, my dear girl !"

"Yes, I suppose so. She can't be really watching me. But I see her often. A most dreadful woman ! And I am nervous to-night, Tommy—"

"Yes ?"

"You don't really think that I—that he—"

"No. I think it was all natural and right enough. But you must not think of it too much, Christine. Remember, you have only seen him twice ! He is a piano tuner, you say ?"

"Yes, but it is a good business. He said so."

Tommy smiled in the dark. "I expect it is. But his name was one of the things which startled me. 'Wareham,' you know, is the name of the young fellow who is Mr. Torrance's adopted son. A gay young fellow, if tales are to be believed, and engaged to Miss Alice Van Slyke. For one awful moment I thought it might be he."

"Well, it isn't," said Christine cheerfully. They had now reached the house door. "Is my face alright ? Celia mustn't be worried."

Tommy looked long at her flushed cheeks and happy eyes.

"It looks—different," he said a little sadly.

Christine rubbed her cheeks vigorously with her handkerchief. "Now ?"

"I think it is a difference that you can't wipe off, Christine !"

He smiled at her blush, but as she sprang away from him up the stair, he watched her with a sigh.

"Little Christine, too !" he thought. "How old we must be getting !"

The moon had risen and was shining on the blind girl's garden. In its light the tin cans shone like white lilies. An intolerable pain shook the commonplace heart of commonplace Tommy Burns !

CHAPTER XII.

CHRISTINE sprang up the stairs two steps at a time. It was an accomplishment which dated from her extreme youth and lately had been discarded in favor of a more ladylike progress, but this morning Christine was in a hurry. She burst into the room where the blind girl sat, like a young and frisky whirlwind and Ada had scarcely time to hide some knitting under her apron before she was lifted bodily from her chair in the whirlwind's strong young arms.

"I've done it !" said Christine, setting her back with a gentle thump. "Let's celebrate !"

The blind girl's face turned to her with bewildered questioning.

"I've got a place, a position, a job, a 'sit' ! I'm an independent working person. Votes for women !"

"Christine !"

"Yes, I know. I'm excited, but that will wear off. The fact will remain. I start work at 8 o'clock tomorrow morning."

"Oh, Christine."

"Now, Ada, be sensible. You know and I know that I had to do it. I will admit that if we had plenty of money I wouldn't want to work—this way. I suppose I would want to do something, sometime, but I'd have a good time first. Go to the University, you know, and do all the usual things. But as I cannot, I am quite resigned to my prospects. There isn't anything dreadful or pathetic in a strong girl of nearly seventeen earning her own living."

"I wish it could be avoided, dear. You do not know just what you are talking about, Christine."

"Yes, I do. I understand the three salient facts, anyway. I need to work, I can work, and I am going to work." She laid her hat aside and sitting down in her favorite position rested her yellow head on the blind girl's lap.

"You must help me to reconcile Celia," she said coaxingly. "For the dreadful thing is that I am going into the Stores. Mr. Flynn got me taken on. Mrs. Flynn said he had to. She thinks I am doing a very sensible thing."

"The Stores ?" echoed Ada. "Oh, Christine—Celia !"

"Yes, I know Celia will fret, but you must help me to win her over. It need not last. Something is sure to turn up and when it does I shall be, like Mr. Micawber, on the spot ! Don't you think it is foolish to make a trouble of the inevitable ? I believe I am a born fatalist. Have you noticed it ?"

Ada smiled. "I can't say that I have. Aren't you rather young to be anything so serious for a while yet ? All your experiences are ahead of you and I suppose our blundering efforts to save you from them must seem rather amusing to a looker-on. All the same I grudge your growing up. I have always thought of you as a child. But this last week you are different. I have been wondering—"

"How I knew about things ? Well, I'll confess. I heard you and Celia talking when you thought I was asleep."

"I guessed that. But it is about something else that I have been wondering. The difference in you was not caused by what you heard that night. There must be something else."

Christine felt her face grow crimson.

"What else could there be ?" she laughed.

"I don't know. But there is something. Last week you were a child, now you have grown up. I wish I could see you, Christine," wistfully, "there may be something in your face."

The girl sat up quickly. "What could there be, dear ? It is just that I am getting older. I have been growing up for some time, only you and Celia have not noticed it. You have been such darling sisters; no one could have had a happier girlhood; but now you will make me miserable if you do not let me help. Celia has worked in a store since I was a baby. Why should I be thought better than she ? And Celia must have a rest. She is tired out. Of course I will not get more than half of Celia's salary, but we can get on somehow. There is something left, isn't there ?

"A very little; but I think we can manage. I have a surprise too. Look." With a shy smile she drew from under her apron a soft mass of fine white wool. "It is a shawl," proudly. "There is one finished in the lower drawer of my dresser and I can sell as many as I can make to the wool-store. The profit is not much but it will help. Oh, Christine, just think of me being able to help !"

Christine kissed her. She could not speak for a moment, but Ada went happily on.

"The little Icelander woman who lives in the back suite on the first floor taught me. It is a very old pattern, so old that it is quite new again. Her great grandmother used to make them. Christine, if you only knew the hours and hours she has spent teaching me ! People are so awfully kind. I took a long while to learn although when you and Celia were away I practised and practised every spare moment. Celia nearly caught me once or twice, but never quite. No one knows I can do it, except Tommy !"

"You told Tommy ?" said Christine in surprise.

"Yes. Someone had to get the wool and arrange for the store to buy the shawls and—and everything."

"Oh, and Tommy did that ?"

"Yes, and he is so pleased. He thinks they are lovely. You know Tommy always understands me and he knew how I longed to do something to help. He says he feels like that himself only in his case it's hopeless because Celia won't let him do anything. Poor Tommy, he has been so faithful to Celia for so many years; ever since that night that you—I mean ever since you were a baby. I don't suppose he is likely to change now."

Christine looked at her unconscious face curiously. To herself she was saying that she didn't quite understand Ada. She, Christine, felt sure that she would know if a man loved her.

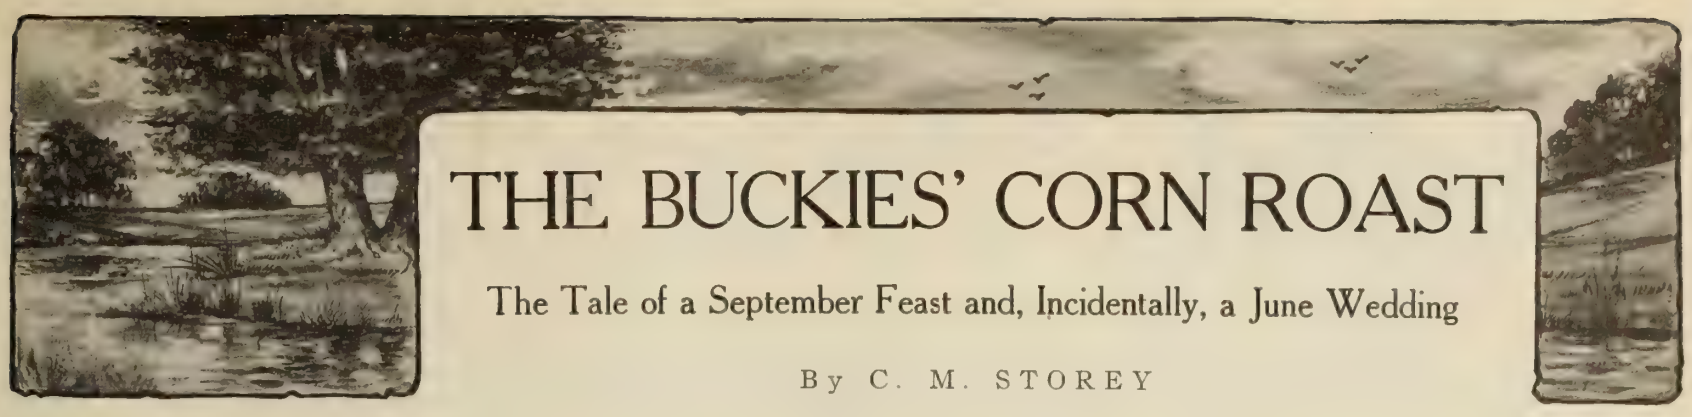
"You are blushing !" said Ada suddenly. She was often uncannily conscious of things of which the blind are supposed to be ignorant.

"I am always doing it. I think I must have a cold," said Christine. She got up quickly and busied herself in laying the cloth on the round table. "I think I'll make pancakes to-night for supper," she went on reflectively. "We'll fry them in butter for a celebration ! I wonder if Tommy will write me a poem ? 'To a Young Lady Upon Securing Work' would be a proper title. He could make it very touching. Really, Ada, I'm nervous about telling Celia ! She has not been like herself for these three weeks. Her eyes are so hard and bright and her lips look so drawn and thin. She is stern too. Celia never used to be stern."

"Does she look like that ?" asked the blind girl anxiously. "I am afraid she is worrying more than we know."

"Well, she has to stop it !" Christine broke an

Continued on page 48



THE BUCKIES' CORN ROAST

The Tale of a September Feast and, Incidentally, a June Wedding

By C. M. STOREY

THERE'S a time for everything: March for marbles, April for skipping ropes, May for moving, June for weddings, and so on down the calendar. September, the month of haze and sunshine, is the mother of twin joys—hay rides and corn roasts. These contain the nectar of a whole summer's brewing.

Although the lay members of the Buckies' Camp were legion, the Buckies proper were but four in number, and albeit, united by the ties of kinship. Josie, with crinkly hair and petite figure, was the most delightful bit of feminine incapability that ever attempted to darn a stocking or bake a pie. The spirit was willing, as many a luckless effort would testify, but she had been born without the homely gifts of domesticity common in a greater or lesser degree to most of Eve's daughters. However, the gods had been kind to her in another way. They had bestowed upon her social gifts that more than compensated for those she had been denied, and made her, perhaps, the most charming member of the camp, at least so said transient guests.

Janet shone where Josie failed. She was a domestic graduate with medals galore, and, as Tommy Ballantyne said, the viands she cooked always tasted like more. Josette, christened Josephine, once known as Josie, later dubbed Josette to distinguish her from the other Josie, was rather a strong-willed, but usually a very reasonable young person. Isobel, the beauty of the camp, fair and willowy, had no special accomplishments, unless it was the gift of being happy and making others so.

Regularly each year the quartette came to the same spot to camp, and, usually, they lingered on into the glorious days of September, concluding the summer's gaieties with a monster corn roast, as a grand finale, to which the riverside folk looked forward, with perhaps more anticipation than any other event of the season, unless the arrival of the Buckies themselves, for they were more than passing popular.

None knew better than they how to conduct a corn roast to a successful issue. With the boldness born of a lifelong intimacy with the river and the most inaccessible cliffs of shore and island, they selected as a site for the corn roast, on this particular occasion, a high promontory that ran out into the channel, the last place on earth that any but the Buckies would have chosen. But the young ladies perceived the spectacular advantages of the location and decided in its favor. Two perpendicular walls of bald rock, fronting the south and the west winds, rose Gibraltar-wise out of the blue depths of the river. The east side was more hospitable. By exercising great care and skill, one might climb its mossy sides, to the top; then, again, within a yard or two from the top, one might roll to the bottom, without let or hindrance. It was mighty uncertain climbing. From the rear a rugged and tortuous path serpentined its way through a dense growth of pine and hemlock, which thinned perceptibly as it approached the tableland at the summit, a rather pleasant path to tread if one took it slowly. Nature must have designed this promontory for some sort of revelry, for she protected the steep places with hedges of juniper, cedar and bramble, and the base she fringed with cedar and shivering birches.

Perhaps it was here, in the days of their glory, that the Indians held their pow-wows, and by the gleaming fires at night the young braves danced, weird and grotesque figures, or listened with pride and longing to tales of prowess told by the old warriors. Perhaps—but the Red Man has passed and will not come this way again. The revels that take place here now are of a more pacific, if of a less picturesque nature.

There was a tradition that whatever date was named for the Buckies' corn roast, the weather was sure to be propitious. Nevertheless, there was much consulting of oracles and "probs."

Loath to leave their island habitations, many of the cottagers, who loved Dame Nature in her gayest, gladdest attire, and could do so, remained to worship at her shrine among the islands where:

> "All day the dreamy sunshine steeps,
> In gold the yellowing beeches,
> In softened blue the river sleeps
> Among the island reaches."

All the cottagers were invited to the corn roast as well as all the riverside folk, great and small, rich and poor, for on these occasions the Buckies knew no caste limit. It was an affair of general good will, where 'good fellows got together" to hold communion. Nor was there any age limit. Young and old were bidden. Young and old came. None prayed to be excused, saying he had married a wife and therefore he could not come. None begged to be excused, save one. There was one fly in the pot of ointment, there nearly always is.

Since the inception of the Buckies' Camp, Kenneth McAlpine had been their first lieutenant. Never before had he failed to aid and abet them in all their plans, sane or otherwise. But for some reason which he failed to give, he flatly refused to attend the annual function, and nothing could induce him to change his mind. Tommy Ballantyne, and, in fact, all the boys from the students' camp, had been despatched by the Buckies, to bombard his decision with their logic, but the young man was as resolute as his doughty ancestor on the barren hills of Scotland centuries before.

"I'd just like to know what's the matter with the dear boy," pouted Josie, whom Kenneth had never deserted before. Josie, Janet, and Isobel were seated on a log discussing Kenneth's indisposition or whatever it was.

"I can't think why he should act so," agreed Isobel. "Usually he's a most tractable young man—as men go," she added thoughtfully. "He must have a good reason for it, though, for he's not the least bit whimsical."

"There's one thing sure, if Kenny doesn't want to tell us, no one will ever get it out of him. He's a regular oyster, when he wants to be. Do you remember how mum he kept when Sammy Black got into that scrape at college? Kenny knew all about it, but no one ever got a word out of him." This from Janet.

Josie was plainly disappointed and as nearly angry as she ever got. "And do you know, girls, Tommy says he's going back to college to take a post-graduate course in raising cabbages or carrots. Tommy wasn't sure which. Tommy never is sure of anything outside of rugby, the dear."

"In softened blue the river sleeps."

"Except that he's always in love with one or the other of us," laughed Janet.

"Even then he's not sure which one," argued Josie. "Last week I was the bright particular star to which he aspired, three days ago it was Janet, and it may be your turn next Isobel, or Josette's."

"You've not been keeping close enough tab on Tommy's heart, Josie dear. Only two days ago he was prostrate at Josette's feet, and got turned down so effectually that he didn't even seek the comfort of offering the remnant of his affections to me, as he usually does when the rest of you decline," said Isobel.

"I wonder," said Janet musingly, as she skimmed a pebble along the surface of the water, with considerable skill, "if that's what's the matter with Josette. Do you suppose she's sorry she didn't accept him? She's in what I always want to call her 'Ruskin mood.' When I see her go off by herself with Sesame and Lilies under her arm, I know she's not quite normal. It's a danger signal, for Josette is not particularly booky, coining a word to suit the occasion, particularly in summer, and she's the last person among my intimate friends to resort to Ruskin. I believe it's a ruse to get off by herself, and Sesame and Lilies is just a habit."

"Dear old Josette," commented Josie hopefully. "If she's sorry, she needn't worry, she'll have plenty more chances. Tommy'll propose to each one of us at least once more before we strike camp."

"Did it ever occur to you how very characteristic everything Josette does, seems to be?" asked Isobel. "When she feels disposed to solitude and Ruskin, which, according to Janet, are synonymous, she quietly departs without a word to anyone, leaving in her wake a 'follow-me-if-you-dare' atmosphere, and I'd as soon follow a roaring lion to the mouth of his den as to disregard her wishes. Not that she would say a word, not she, but the atmosphere would still be there."

"That's what I think so charming about Josette. She never dictates. She's a sort of disciple of auto-suggestion. When she says, 'Shall we have muffins for supper?' I always interpret it, 'We shall have muffins for supper,' and govern myself and my oven accordingly. If Josette says, 'Shall we have fish for breakfast?' the very fish seem to know, and straightway attach themselves to her hook. She subconsciously proposes and disposes."

"But, what's all this got to do with Kenny?" inquired Isobel when Janet stopped for breath. "He has evidently made up his mind to cut us. There, I have it, Janet. He adores your oatmeal cakes, and you haven't made a batch this summer."

"Which, I interpret to mean, 'one for Kenny and two for Isobel,' eh! ma chere? Well, you shall have some this very day."

Kenneth McAlpine was the only son of a wealthy farmer—perhaps agriculturist would sound better—who had a fondness for tracing his ancestry back through dusty, musty tombs to Kenneth McAlpine, first king of the Scots, and was wont to say with fatherly pride, that even a king might be proud of such a boy as his. Despite the tendency to "go West young man," Kenneth stayed "east," graduated with honors from an agricultural college, and, with his father, tilled their soil and tended their stock along lines prescribed by science. To these men, farming was as much a profession as the practice of law or medicine. It was to them a thing to be respected, enjoyed, and at the same time to furnish a maintenance, which it did. There was no more elegible parti along the river front than this same young man, who had so stubbornly deserted the Buckies.

However, in spite of this drawback, things pointed to the most successful corn roast the Buckies had ever had. The students rallied in a body to their aid. Josette emerged from her Ruskin retirement, and everything went merry, as the proverbial marriage bell. The oracles told true. A perfect September day drew a soft, gray mantle about her, and became the night, fragrant with luscious odors from nearby orchards, and the tang of pine and hemlock with frosted juice of maple and birch.

Attended by the students, the Buckies arrived early to welcome their guests, who soon began to appear from all directions, some on foot across country, over bronzed stubble, wholesome laughter announcing their approach while they were yet a long way off. Others drove to the foot of the hill by an unused road. The drip, drip of paddles and snatches of song heralded the arrival of others in canoes and small boats, while the chug, chug of a motor boat, towing a gaily bedecked scow, brought all the early arrivals to the edge of the cliff with shouts of welcome. It was a whim of the Motor Boat Man, to take the scow in tow and coast along by the islands, picking up guests at the various boarding houses, who, for the sake of novelty, preferred the scow to other means of transportation. The men were armed with long poles, with which they kept the scow clear of the shore when sharp turns were made in narrow channels. Each person provided himself or herself with a chair or stool. Fancy runs riot when it's twilight among the islands, and 'twas easy to imagine that one was traversing the rivers of China or Africa in the flat-bottomed boats one sees in travellers' snapshots, and for the motor boat, well, it was a thing to be ignored, but not so the Motor Boat Man. He was a person to be reckoned with.

The first to arrive and tether his calico steed at the foot of the hill was Daniel, the mail carrier. Josie often remarked that Daniel came "first after Kenneth" in his attentions. The Buckies were constantly debtors by reason of "lifts," parcels delivered, and numerous letters, which came to camp triweekly through the agency of Daniel. He was a thrice welcome guest, as were his wife, her aged father, and the twins, who came with him. Glowing with the heartiness of their welcome, they were

Continued on page 11

A Man for the Digging

The Story of a Girl's Speculation in Real Estate

By MARY S. MANTLE

"HARVEY, we've got to; I've set my heart on it!"

Harvey smiled indulgently. "We will if we can," he said, as the car drew up and they stepped aboard.

During the five-mile run into the city Ruth gave full rein to her fancy. It was not the new sub-division lying to the south of the car line which she saw, with its broad cuttings showing where roads would be, and its sign posts naming those unpeopled streets. What she saw, and described to her companion, was that ten-acre lot, yielding crisp, juicy vegetables, flowers in profusion, and a part wired off for the prize specimens of the feathered tribe she intended having.

"You certainly have got an imagination," he said in a tone of raillery. "Hadn't you better wait till you sign the agreement before you sell the eggs?"

"Oh, dear!" and she sighed, "how you do dampen a fellow's enthusiasm. Now, you know all the hard work I shall have to get that place started aright, and all the money it is going to cost to do it, and then you won't leave me alone for even half an hour with my comforting visions."

"It looks to me as if what would comfort you most would be to sign away two-thirds of that bank account of yours for a few acres of virgin prairie."

"Why can't you say," dramatically, "to start the finest market garden in Western Canada? I like an optimist," she retorted.

In this bantering vein their talk continued. As the car jerked around a sudden curve, he instructed her to be sure and pack her eggs well! It seemed but a very short time until they reached the city, and the office of the real estate agent by whom, a few days previously, they had been told of the land.

"We've got to get it," she whispered as they went in.

Harvey opened the proceedings for her diplomatically, by saying that they had seen the land, and that it was a long way out—further from the car line than they had expected—and the price was too high.

"Since I saw you another party has been after it. I have given him an option for thirty days," said the agent, smiling.

"Oh, I am sorry, I wanted it," said Ruth impulsively, but not tactfully, considering Harvey's attack.

It was rather disappointing. For three weeks the pair had spent all their spare time looking for a suitable plot of land. Ruth Raymond had been trained as a market gardener in an English agricultural college, with the expectation of taking a position in England at the end of her course. But in the meantime Canada had called to her, with the result that at the close of her college life she had determined to find out whether the West held her opportunity. She was just twenty-six, and a capable and energetic girl. Coming to Winnipeg, she had spent the winter working as a clerk in a store, so as not to encroach upon her capital while looking about and deciding whether the district was suitable for her venture. Negotiations for land were the outcome of the decision she had arrived at. Harvey Sutherland was helping her. He was an old friend, and had settled in the city four years previously. They had quickly found what she thought would suit her, but when Harvey tried to deal for the land the price was so high it was quite out of the question. And now there was this second rebuff.

"If at first you don't succeed, try, try, try again. You will have to find another rhyme with which to brace me up if our third attempt is not more lucky," said Ruth.

"Oh, no, young woman," and he laughed, "you don't draw any more good copy book maxims from me until you have properly worn out the one you have got. The rhyme calls for four tries!"

It was a glorious spring afternoon when next they were able to start out to "select a cabbage patch," as Harvey dubbed their mission. The crocuses, lacking the drapery of leaves, contrasted their delicate lavender tints with the bare ground. While travelling westward the news which that morning's mail had brought them both was the subject of their talk—Tom Carlyle had sailed for Canada.

"A fine chap, Tom," said Harvey. "I have been trying for three years to persuade him to come. He wasn't getting on any too well in England, but did not like to leave while his mother lived. Three months ago, when she died, I hoped he would turn his thoughts this way."

"He should be here now," said Ruth reflectively. "My home letters are full of his coming. What good times we used to have together, didn't we—you and Tom and the girls and I! Do you remember? You remember that afternoon when we all went fishing instead of going to school, and then didn't know what to do with the fish we caught?"

"You bet; they were jolly days. I guess since then Tom has travelled the stiffest road of us all. You knew he had been supporting his mother and two sisters for years past, didn't you, and paid for the education of the younger girl?"

"No; he never talked about his affairs, and since they moved away from Barleythorpe, six years ago, I have only seen him occasionally." But she did not tell of the many times she had wished she could have seen him, nor of her disappointment that he seemed to be quite content with occasional meetings.

"He should soon get ahead now," continued Harvey, "for one of his sisters has a position, and there is no longer a home to be kept up."

They talked of Tom, and his affairs a good deal that afternoon, for Ruth was interested, and Harvey was his closest friend. Harvey, who had kept up a regular correspondence with him, was full of his virtues, and delighted at the prospect of seeing him again.

The Sturgeon Creek car set them down three miles beyond the limits of the breezy, bustling, gateway city, into which, yearly, so many pass homeless, and out of which so many pass hopeful. Following closely the directions they had received, a tramp of about a quarter of a mile along a prairie road—for they were as much in the country as if twenty-five miles separated them from city streets—brought them to the place they were seeking. Poplars and oaks were plentiful on part of the land, but more than half of it was clear. From one side of the site to the other they tramped, viewed it from this angle and from that, examined the soil, and decided that both the land and the location seemed suitable. They even settled on the spot for the house, which was to be very small and unpretentious at first, just large enough for two. Ruth's sister was to join her as soon as she had the place ready.

"We had better sleep on it, and I'll get Hudson to look it over for us in the morning. If he thinks as we do, you should certainly try to deal for it." Harvey spoke enthusiastically.

Late the following afternoon, Hudson, having agreed with them regarding its suitability, the two met by appointment to negotiate for the property.

"I sold it this morning," said the agent.

They turned to each other in astonishment. "It looks like Fate," said Ruth.

"It looks like a nigger in the wood-pile," said the other belligerently.

"Anyway, it's discouraging," she said as they went slowly down the street.

"Got any enemies?" he questioned.

"Enemies? Why? No; at least, none that I know of."

"Well, it's a rum go," he said thoughtfully and expressively, "and I would like to get at the bottom of it. It isn't just accident, don't you believe it. Why, it isn't two days since we got particulars of that piece of land, and it's been on the market for months!"

"It is strange," she assented; "but only one or two know of my plans, and they are all girls, who are awfully interested to see me start. That second man made up rather a flimsy excuse, didn't you think," she continued meditatively.

"Flimsy! I should just say so," in a disgusted tone.

Ruth was a trifle despondent. "Oh, well, we'll make that fourth try and see what comes of it. But I warn you," as the humorous side of it appealed to her, "if we fail again, instead of a market garden I shall open an 'Agency for Tracking Elusive Spoil Sports.'"

They speculated on various explanations, but no reasonable one occurred to them. Ruth maintained that it was merely a coincidence, but Harvey was more sceptical.

"Although I don't know that I altogether like it," he said, "I'm interested in your experiment, and want to see what kind of a fist you are going to make of it; but it looks as if the powers were 'agin' you."

"Not much of an experiment," Ruth resented his slightly patronizing tone. "There is certainly an opening here for my work, especially if people get to know I am reliable, and I intend to be that."

"Still, it's a queer thing for you to go in for, isn't it," he suggested dubiously, with all a man's distrust of a new venture for a girl he likes.

She would not see it that way. If it suited her tastes and her health better to live out of doors, why should she tie herself to something which kept her in all the time?

"But you will marry some day, and what will become of your scheme then?" he wanted to know.

"Oh, no; I shan't marry," she said hastily. And he got the impression that that was a subject better not pursued.

Tom Carlyle arrived the following day, and they all found much pleasure in talking over old times. He seemed very much amused at the accounts of Ruth's repeated attempts and failures to secure land. However, as Harvey said, she had still another try coming. But she was rather annoyed at their way of treating her venture as somewhat of a joke.

"You shouldn't strike out and be so original," was all the comfort Tom vouchsafed her.

"What would you have a girl do," she fired up, "be a millstone around the neck of her relatives, or do something she is not fitted for, when she might have congenial work, and the free, open air to work in, and be all the better for it? Do you think it is only a man who likes an outdoor life?"

But he would not take her seriously, and she got far more annoyed with him about it than there seemed any occasion to be. Especially as apart from this one subject they got along splendidly together.

"I have got another proposition on the string for you." It was a few days later, and Harvey was keeping his promise to her—not to grow weary in well doing. "It looks all right to me. It will mean investing more than you intended, but I think we can get the terms arranged to suit you. The party from whom I heard about it wants us to meet him at the city limits on Thursday evening, and look it over. Can you go?

"Yes, I think so." She did not speak quite as enthusiastically as sometimes. She was feeling rather blue over the delays in her plans. "I hope it will be a bona fide deal this time."

"I don't think there is much doubt about it," he returned, reassuringly. "I have gone into it very carefully, and, personally, I think you are well out of the others if you can get this one through. From the plans I have seen it seems by far the most suitable we have looked at yet."

Unfortunately he was forced to telephone her the next afternoon. "I'm awfully sorry, Ruth, but I've just been told by the boss to go on to-morrow morning's train to Neepawa as witness in a case that our firm is interested in. I may be back by Thursday night, but I'm not quite sure. But you had better look over that deal anyway. You needn't decide upon it until I return, if you don't want to, but it would be well to look it over as we arranged."

He didn't get back in time, but Tom was willing to accompany her instead. They met at five o'clock on Thursday evening, and had tea together at The Tea Kettle Inn, afterwards setting out to walk to the appointed place. Up the wide main street their route lay at first. Turning westward, the buildings gradually thinned out, and vacant lots, each bearing the sign boards of four or five real estate firms, became more numerous than dwellings. Farmers, sitting uncomfortably on empty hayracks, were returning to the outlying farms, and, keeping to the ruts in the unmade roads, the teams toiled slowly along. Tom spoke of his prospects in Canada, as, leaving the busy streets behind, their talk became more personal. How he had long wanted to come, and meant to do well. A position had turned up already which promised to be good, and he was in high spirits. Ruth also was feeling more hopeful. She had her own interesting plans for the future, and, after all, the delays were only temporary, and certainly it was pleasant to see Tom again. For years she had rather regretfully thought of this friendship as belonging to the past only.

"It's not like Tom, though, to talk quite so freer about himself," she reflected; when he broke in abruptly on her thoughts.

"I wish I could persuade you to change your plans."

"Oh, you men," she laughed, "how you do hate a woman to do anything a little out of the beaten track! Why, there is nothing unwomanly in gardening, surely?"

"That isn't the reason," he said gravely. "I would like your plans to fit in with mine. For years I have wanted to tell you so, but I could not, hon-

Continued on page 45

THE GIRLS ON THE FARMS

A Friendly Talk With All of You

"FROM ONE COUNTRY GIRL TO ANOTHER"

TO all the girls on all the farms in all this great Dominion: Greetings! It matters not if your farm is called a homestead, or a ranch, or by any other name; also no matter if your home is a snug old farmhouse, built seventy-five or a hundred years ago by your Loyalist ancestors, or if it is a ranch house, or a bungalow, or a shack, or a sod house. If you are a daughter in your father's house, if you are living your life on one of the countless tracts of land given up to the pursuit of agriculture, horticulture, or any other natural "culture" I have You in mind, and wish to include You in my greeting.

I am a girl who was born and has lived on a farm. It does not matter under which of the above-mentioned styles of architecture I have my rooftree; but please believe me to be well acquainted with my subject (should not a quarter of a century of experience teach one?), to be sincere, to be honest, and to have but one object in my mind,—to tell you of the things which I have found of such material aid to the greater enjoyment of a secluded life, but perhaps also to discover any unknown—that is, unknown to me—pleasure which may be making some seemingly narrow and colorless existence both broad and happy.

I shall declare myself at once so I shall not be sailing under false colors. I am quite convinced that any girl on any farm has many opportunities of happiness which she overlooks, sighs for the fulfillment of many dreams which would end in rude awakenings, and believes in many airy structures which would not weather a storm as does the snug farmhouse which is home. I know that this is so, and that there are many girls who spoil their own lives and disturb the harmony in the home with a desire for something of which they are not at all sure, and who have an entirely false idea of the dignity and pride of their true position.

There is the girl who is willing to work, work, work at the thousand and one "chores" which are always to be found to do on every farm. If she is quite content it seems that she hasn't a mind above her work, and she really is not getting all that she might out of her life. Then there is the girl who feels the call of the city strongly,—the city with its brightness and its attractions and its many things which the country lacks. She thinks to be a shop girl and stand behind a counter for nine long hours every day, bedecked in the cheap and flashy imitations of the prevailing fashions, or to be a stenographer and bend over a typewriter in a dim office, or to have the family move to town and "keep boarders" would be much more enjoyable than her present commonplace life with such tasks as the washing of the breakfast dishes and the milkpails, and the feeding of hens and chickens. And also there is the girl who feels she has a place in the big busy world, who is convinced that her true and proper vocation is that of a teacher, or a nurse, or a musician or some one of the numerous professions.

These three general types embrace all of us, don't you think? There we are, you and I,—either the girl who is lacking in enthusiasm, or the girl with misplaced enthusiasm, or the girl with repressed enthusiasm. Do you recognise your own class? I won't tell you under which heading I come lest you lose all interest in me before I have aroused it. Curiosity is a great aid to continued concern; so, I'll keep you guessing if I can.

You girl with your mind too much on your work, stop wondering if you will have to make biscuits for tea, to save the bread, and don't worry about that speck of dust on the sitting-room table; just let yourself go in a nice restful heap in the most comfy chair you can find and ponder over what I want to impress on you. And you girl with your eye on the fashion page and your heart on a new dress in quite the most exaggerated style, wait and see if I'm really as prosy as you have concluded I will be. And you girl who can't set the table without leaving something in the pantry which should be out of it, because you are dreaming of what you think you should be doing, shake yourself and read this the second time and wonder if it's worth considering.

GIRLS, one and all, do you know what it is that is causing us to be misfitted pegs in circles which seem to us to be so much too small? We give too much thought to ourselves. Consciously or unconsciously we live self-absorbed lives and we are not altogether to blame since it is but the result of circumstances. Our environment does not tend to be diverting unless we educate ourselves to have the all-seeing eye, the most acute powers of perception and a sensitiveness to our surroundings. Our minds work in an ever-diminishing circle until, if we are not constantly on the alert, the circumference has become just our own particular self, our own individual ideas, our own special desires.

Get cross if you wish; I won't mind a bit. Say that I am maligning (or will some of you say "slamming"?) the subject I profess to champion if you desire; to malign my subject is to demerit myself. Contend that many girls of the cities, with all the advantages and privileges offered there to divert their minds into numberless broad channels, are as narrow-minded and self-centred as any country-bred girl ever dared to be; maybe I will agree with you. But it is of no moment or importance to me what the city girl does. It is the country girl, the girl on the farm,—which means you and me—that I am interested in and want to discuss. I repeat my statement and stick to it,—the majority of the girls who are living their lives on a farm, either voluntarily or as a victim of circumstances, cannot avoid a tendency to become narrow in their views and should be constantly on their guard against a realization of the possibility.

I do not presume for an instant to say I can give you a recipe for broadmindedness or a sure cure for a limited outlook. I want you to understand that I have continually to fight against the same propensities of which I speak and the remedies I mention are but suggestions which I have found it helpful to follow. In my estimation the hints are equally applicable to all three of the types I have mentioned. The cause in the main is the same, so why not the restorative?

A HAPPY COUNTRY GIRL

This is my first suggestion: Have a specialty! That may sound vague, childish, disappointing, but give it a second thought, please do! Call it a fad, a hobby, a marked fancy, a strong inclination for a certain length of time, or what you will, the name doesn't matter. The important thing is: Get the idea, then specialize it. When you have run it to the death and have tired of it,—choose another fancy and see how it will wear. The chances are that you will add one hobby to another, without losing all interest in the previous one, and thereby you will enlarge your interests most appreciably. If you have not the usual methods at hand for keeping the stretch of your mental survey in a state of elasticity then you must invent some of your own.

Let your mind run idly along the line of the pleasant things in your daily life—that is the things which give you pleasure—and you have surely found a variety of subjects from which to choose a specialty. I have had many and I am quite willing to confess that I have wearied of some of them and thrown them aside for a new diversion, but all of my fancies which in turn took up any unoccupied time I could find, enlarged my views and left ideas not only profitable to me, but also of great aid in my intercourse with other people both at home and abroad.

When I was a school girl I had a habit of writing in a blank book all the quotations and bits of poetry which especially appealed to me. It became a mania with me, but if I had not gone at it in such a whole-hearted fashion I would not have retained in my mind so many gems which have been of much pleasure as well as benefit to me.

It has often fallen to my lot to feed the hens and care for the "setters" in the spring. Frankly I do not care for hens—they are so lacking in individuality—but I managed to work up some enthusiasm on the subject and to make a hobby of it for some time at least. It made pleasant a task which would otherwise have been irksome.

I love horses,—no need to work for enthusiasm on that subject. I didn't make a fad of horses, no indeed, I became thoroughly acquainted with one particular horse, and it is not conceit but fact when I say I can groom that horse, harness that horse, and make a bran mash for that horse just as well as it can be done. Nor do I feel that I have taken from myself any of my femininity. If we country girls are to broaden our confined conceptions we must remember that false modesty is no hall mark of a womanly character. My motto is: Never be afraid to do anything you think right for you to do; never do anything you feel is not right for you to do.

And here is still another fancy of mine, which has been a profit to me incidentally, because I made a specialty of it, though it was from love of it. This is camping or living in the open air. Pick a small party of kindred spirits, with one old enough to make the neighbors satisfied with your conduct, yet young enough in spirit to enjoy the jaunt, pack your tents and a few necessities into your canoes,—or if you haven't a canoe or any water on which to float a canoe, then take a cart or any means of transportation,—and go to some spot unmarred by marks of civilization, and stop there. If life in this state of free unhampered living isn't a specialty to which you will turn on every possible occasion,—well, I'm sorry and you will have to find a more agreeable fancy in some other line; perhaps you would prefer fancy work! I have had simple accounts of some of my trips accepted by sporting magazines. So, isn't that a reward for learning about the packing, the cooking, and the uninteresting—or so considered by many—routine work as well as merely enjoying the experience?

And still another specialty which comes to my mind is common, ordinary, everyday cooking. Why not turn it into a hobby and make it uncommon, extraordinary, and quite as satisfying, if not much more so, to the family palate? And in the country where fresh meat cannot be procured every day, the specialist who can make the same roast do duty in several different forms has acquired an art of no mean order, while the girl who becomes an adept at working in the culinary odds and ends may, by lessening the household expenses, add to her own pin money.

There are so many many things, even in our narrowest, most shut-in existences, overlooked or regarded with contempt, that might be made a joy, a profit, an opening wedge to a broader prospective if we would but take them up with vigor and enthusiasm and determination.

I have been most personal but had to be, so as to disprove any notion that I might be talking of a theory which could not be practised. I wish I could go on and tell you of hobbies and more hobbies which have served in their turn, and ministered faithfully and well. I would like to bring forward some of my views on the finding of your and my particular talent, but I have spent my space and must stop. I shall hope that some one of all the girls who will read what I have written will have faith in me to the extent of trying my plan. If only you will go at the subject—or object—you have chosen, in a whole-hearted, determined fashion I have not one doubt as to the result, or of your approval of my suggestion.

Get Rid of the Slums

IN the city of Toronto the slum question has lately received a large share of editorial attention, following the report of the Medical Health Officer, Dr. Hastings. These remarks by the editor of the Toronto Globe may prove of general interest to those concerned in good citizenship:

"Toronto should make short work of her slums. They are a disgrace to the city and to Canadian civilization. Dr. Hastings' report on housing in the congested area south of College and Carlton Streets shows that over 26,000 people are living under conditions that are as bad for them morally as they are for the body. Of 4,696 houses inspected in the slum area, there were only 1,601 with baths, and less than half with inside closets. In 2,207 cases outside privy pits were found. No less than 2,137 of these houses had two families living in them. There were 198 one-roomed "dwellings" occupied by families aggregating 472 persons. These facts and many others secured by the inspectors on their rounds must disturb the self-complacency of the citizens who speak with pride of Toronto the Beautiful and Toronto the Good. No city can be in any real sense beautiful or good in which many thousands of people live without the most vitally important requirements for health and morality.

"It is to be hoped the Board of Health will follow up Dr. Hastings' report by the necessary orders for the abolition of all outside privy pits in the older sections of the city within a period of two or three years. It is possible that this might mean a harvest for the plumbers' combine, but if there were any signs of a disposition to charge unfairly high prices the board could do as the sanitary authorities of British cities do under like conditions —select standard workmen to install closets and baths at cost price.

"In addition to provisions for sanitary appliances in the houses of the slum sections of the city, the Board of Health should strictly enforce the existing regulations requiring a certain amount of cubic space for each inmate in a house or tenement. High rents are both a cause and an effect of overcrowding. In cases where the city, by failure to enforce the law against overcrowding, permits a dozen people to be herded together in space that should be given to half the number, it is responsible for the increase of rents that will inevitably follow, for the rule of the slum landlord is to charge 'all the traffic will stand.'"

A HONEYMOON IN HIDING

The Fascinating Adventures of a Romantic Honeymoon

By MRS. GEORGE DE HORNE VAIZEY

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

Gwen Nugent becomes the wife of Dr. Pat Hilbert, London, England, and as they start off on their wedding journey, the bridegroom discovers that he has been robbed of his pocket-book. He and Gwen return quietly to London and spend their honeymoon in their new house, avoiding their friends. They go to an East End restaurant one evening and the waiter advises them to seek amusement at a music hall where a competition is going on. Friends call at their home, but they hide and escape discovery. They visit various resorts, and Pat is recognized at the Tussaud Waxworks.

GWEN was not in the Great Hall; she was not in the vestibule beyond. At the street door he found her, crouching back on the seat of a taxi; crimson-cheeked, shaking, helpless with laughter.

"I've been a wax-work!" she gasped. "I've been a wax-work! Oh, Pat, it was the finest joke in the world to stand safely there, and listen to your cross-examination. You were splendid! Positively splendid! I nearly exploded with laughter. Oh, Pat, it's the most delightful sensation in the world to have been wax, and come back to life and find yourself the wife of such a nice, clever man. It's been the most adventurous afternoon!"

"Quite so," said Pat dryly, "Would you mind telling me—I'm really curious to know—what on earth made you think of such a crack-brained scheme as going into that group at all?"

Gwen laughed happily, and mopped her wet eyes.

"Think!" she repeated calmly. "I never think! I just do!!"

CHAPTER VII.

TEN days had passed by, and the honeymoon lovers, having spent a lazy afternoon indoors, were preparing to sally forth for a jovial dinner in the east.

The peaceful security of those seven days had obliterated all fear of discovery, until one precaution after another had fallen into disuse. Instead of peering anxiously through the peep-holes in the back door, and creeping out one at a time, Gwen and Pat now prepared to start out together, and actually exchanged remarks in normal voices as they went. Pat turned the key in the lock, stood aside to allow his wife to pass, and Gwen, serene and smiling, stepped jauntily forward—into the very arms of a man in blue!

There he stood: blue-coated and ponderous; his thick-soled boots planted well apart; his large, shorn face alight with subtle glee; "Run 'em to earth!" "Got 'em at last!" printed in capital letters on his smile. Pat jerked violently, muttered one lurid word, and stood still, chewing at his moustache. Gwen laid her hand on her heart, leant up against the door, and protested with a fine air of reproach.

"Oh! Oh dear! You did give me a start!"

The man in blue regarded her with small, cynical eyes.

"Apologize, I'm sure!" he said. "Sorry your nerves are so delicate. Wouldn't have thought it, if you hadn't told me. Nice little time you've been having, I don't think! Week-end cottage, I s'pose? Quiet and sheltered; side entrance from the grounds——"

"Stop that!" cried Pat suddenly. He had been for the moment too stupefied by surprise and annoyance to interfere, but now his voice rang out in so haughty a command that for a moment the constable was plainly impressed. Unfortunately, Gwen spoilt the effect by an inquiry put in her most artless and eager fashion:

"Do tell us! How did you find us out?"

The man in blue swelled with importance, adopting his best police-court manner.

"Hinformation from party next door. Hunhexplained nises in hempty 'ouse. Hodour of 'am through hupper winders. Vices!"

Gwen just sniggered helplessly, then shot a reproachful glance at Pat. In moments of emergency it is necessary to the feminine mind to have someone to blame, and although the suggestion of the rasher had come from herself, she was acutely remindful that it was Pat who had insisted that there could be no harm in opening the windows a few inches top and bottom during the repast.

Constable 27 interpreted the glance as a sign of guilt, and continued sternly:

"You'd better come quietly. We make it as pleasant as possible if you come quiet. Don't want to make it more public than you can help, I suppose? Then come along without a fuss!"

"Come along, WHERE?" gasped Gwen breathlessly. For the first time a hint of alarm mingled with the amusement on her face. She drew back a pace and stared with big, incredulous eyes in the policeman's face. What could he mean?

"'Ome," replied the policeman suavely. "'Ome, sweet 'ome! where people who 'aven't got one of their own, and goes to taking possession of hother people's, can be 'oused and fed free of charge. I should have thought meself, a good-looking gal like you—"

"Stop that!" thundered Pat once more. "Heavens, man, can't you tell a lady when you see one? My wife and I are staying here because—er—er—because we choose to! It is our own house. We have a right to live in it if we choose. I am Dr. Hilbert. I'll show you my card." He dived his hand into his coat pockets, then suddenly paused and frowned angrily at the remembrance that his card-case, with other superfluous trifles lay with the rest of his baggage at Waterloo Station. "Hang it! I haven't a card with me. I left them—"

"At 'ome. On the top of the peanner! You would do!" remarked the constable eloquently. "Don't try to bunkum me, if you please, young man. I've my duty to do, and I mean to do it. You come along quiet with me—"

Pat muttered violently beneath his breath. What a fool he had been! What a doubly, trebly, distilled fool to give in to Gwen's mad scheme, and imagine for a moment that they could succeed in escaping detection! Here was a pretty mess! How on earth was he going to convince this jack-in-office of the truth of his unproved word, in the face of such damnatory evidence as this quiet slinking out of a back door? He cudgelled his brains for inspiration, but only the feeblest of ideas occurred, so feeble that they were rejected as soon as thought of. For a moment he considered the possibility of fighting it out, but the policeman looked a formidable customer, and at the best the position could be only temporarily improved. He cocked an accusing eye at Gwen, as who should say: "This is your doing, Madam! Get us out of the scrape as best you may," and Gwen, reading its meaning, made haste to obey.

"But we are Mr. and Mrs. Hilbert! It's perfectly true! You must know that we are telling the truth. The London police are the finest and most intelligent body of men in the world. Everyone says so. You read it in the newspapers once a week at least, and you must be a picked officer to be on this beat. Now, look at us in your fine and intelligent manner and say if you really think we look like adventurers, who would want to sleep in empty houses that didn't belong to us! You see thieves and cheats and stowaways every day of your life. . . . . Tell me honestly . . . . . do they look like us?"

Constable 27 burrowed his chin in his neck and did as he was requested. He saw a tall, slight man in a shabby tweed suit, and a remarkably pretty girl in navy blue serge; and, possessing a modicum of the sense with which Gwen had credited him, he saw something else, too: that delicate, indefinable je-ne-sais-quoi which distinguishes one class from another, be it arrayed in garments ever so similar. He saw; he realized; but on the one hand he knew that offences against the law are by no means confined to one section of the community, and on the other he was far from ready to acknowledge himself in the wrong and relinquish the chance of a case. A momentary pause was succeeded by a solemn wag of the head.

"Hasserveration," he pronounced solemnly, "hasserveration his not hevidence! Hin the habsence of proof, the law is bound to hact upon hevidence. If you come quietly I'll make it as comfortable as possible."

It was at this point that the idea of bribery entered Pat's brain. He thrust his hand into his waistcoat pocket, fingered a sovereign, and held it out on a stealthy hand.

"Look here, I say. . . . Let's put an end to this! . . . I am telling you the truth, and you'll injure your own reputation if you insist upon playing the fool. Let us pass, please! I don't care to keep my wife hanging about in this lane. I shall see you again, later on."

But Constable 27 indignantly waved aside the offered tip. He straightened his back, and as Gwen declared in after descriptions of the scene, "swelled wisible" inside his tight, blue coat. His dignity was wounded—the dignity of the Force.

"That will be used in hevidence against you, young man! Heverything you say will be brought forward, so I hadvise you to keep quiet. Hany more himpudence or 'esitation, and I'll whistle for a mate! Hevery consideration I was willing to show for the sake of the young woman; but when it comes to bribery and corruption—"

"Yes, indeed. You ought to be ashamed, Patrick!" cried Gwen traitorously. "He didn't mean it, officer; he didn't, indeed. It is only because he is upset and worried. . . . . You are misjudging him, you see, just as he misjudged you. . . . What can I do to convince you? . . . There must be some way of proving the truth!" She screwed her forehead, and pursed her lips in anxious consideration for a minute—but a minute only. Then, like a flash of sunlight came the looked-for inspiration. "I have it! I have it! Come into the house with us, officer, for just two minutes, and I'll prove to you without a shadow of doubt that we are really Dr. and Mrs. Hilbert, living peacefully in hiding in our own house. . . . You don't mind giving us just two minutes?"

Constable 27 cast one keen, appraising glance at Pat's bulk, evidently satisfied himself that he was the better man, and signified a dignified consent, whereupon Gwen led the way into the upstairs den, followed by the two equally mystified and curious men. Pat had no idea of the form in which proof was to be offered, until he saw his wife approach the pile of newspapers in the cupboard, when he reviled himself for a thick-skulled idiot for not having had a similar inspiration.

"You see, officer," explained Gwen deferentially, "this newspaper comes from Brainford, in Essex, the home of Dr. Hilbert's parents. As they are some of the oldest residents, there is a whole column devoted to the account of our wedding. There it is: 'Marriage of Dr. Patrick Hilbert to Miss Gwendolen Nugent'—that's me! 'A large assembly of friends and relations . . . wedding presents costly and numerous. . . . Dr. Hilbert has taken a house in —— Street for the convenience of his high-class and increasing practice. . . . . Charming bevy of bridesmaids in white chiffon and wreaths of roses. . . . .' You see! A whole column of description."

"That's as it may be, mum. I never denied that I knows of that the marriage took place. The 'appy couple are now enjoying of their honeymoon."

"They are, indeed! You're perfectly right. A rather unusual honeymoon, but most enjoyable and exciting. There's something else I want to show you. Down here!"

Gwen turned and patted the newspaper with exasperating coolness. That was so like a woman: to play with her triumph, and gloat over a deliberate and artistic denouement. If it had been left to Pat he would have seized the sheet, thrust it in his accuser's face with a "See that, you stupid ass!" which would have been as the trumpet of battle. As it was, Constable 27 regarded the medallion portraits of the bride and bridegroom, as published by the Brainford Herald, with an expression of ludicrous embarrassment and contrition.

"Well, to be sure! Think of that, now! Asks your pardon, I'm sure. 'Ope you will understand, sir, that 'aving received hinformation, I 'ad no chice. 'Ope the lady will overlook it, and—"

"The lady is very happy to find that her house is so effectually guarded!" cried Gwen in her most gracious manner. "Now, I'm going to give you a glass of wine, officer, to drink our health, and my husband will tell you how it happens that we came to be staying here privately. We realise, of course, that it has a peculiar effect—"

So it came to pass that Constable 27 sipped a glass of claret in company with Dr. and Mrs. Hilbert, lent a sympathetic ear to the history of the stolen notes, and entered into a conspiracy to lull the fears of the occupant "next door."

"In another couple of days our time will be up, and we shall be coming home in state. Keep her quiet till then, there's a good fellow, with any story you like— it's all one to me. Tell her we are the caretakers, if you like. It's perfectly true."

"Right, sir; quite right! Hinformation correct has to parties in 'ouse next door. Further hinformation transpires, 'owever, that parties are located with permission of 'Ilbert himself. 'Ow would that do?"

"Capital! Capital!" Pat laughed heartily. Once more his arm swung out in casual, off-hand fashion. This time the arm of Constable 27 swung out to meet it; there hands touched, and parted.

"I drink your very good 'elth!" said the man in blue.

CHAPTER VIII.

IT was the hour for luncheon—the last, the very last meal to be consumed by Mr. and Mrs. Hilbert as Honeymooners in Hiding. As was meet on such an occasion, the menu had been provided by the simple means of sweeping the cupboard bare, so that no traces of invasion might remain. Items: Two and a half sardines (battered), left high and dry at the bottom of a tin; the small half of a sixpenny glass of potted shrimps; one (over) poached egg; three slices of cold ham; a rind of cheese; one apple; two cups of coffee (weak).

Now it is one of the fundamental and irrevocable differences between the sexes that every woman worth her salt adores a picnic meal, while every man abhors it from his heart, so that it can readily be believed that our Honeymooners regarded the viands spread before them with widely differing feelings.

"What a lovely scrappy meal! I do adore a lunch of scraps! Don't you?" cried Gwen.

"Um!" replied Pat vaguely; then, scenting suspicion in his wife's eyes, made haste to affect a fictitious glee. "Rippin'!" he cried, and finished the sardines at a gulp.

Gwen toyed daintily with the potted shrimps, disintegrating the tiny pink rolls, and spreading them at intervals on a slice of brown bread and butter. It was no novel experience to her. She was no gossomer nymph, but a fine, well built, upstanding, English girl, yet times and again she had survived the scrimmage of a day at half-yearly sales, on no other sustenance than a buttered roll and a pot of shrimps. She would cheerfully expend her substance on unnecessary trifles, thrillingly reduced from two-and-six to one-and-eleven-three; but the price of a solid lunch would have lain heavy as a crime on her feminine conscience. Now, in her own home, she drank her weak coffee and nibbled her bread with an air of complete content; but as the meal drew towards a close a shadow fell across her face, she grew silent and distrait, and from time to time her shoulders heaved in melancholy sighs.

"Oh! she cried suddenly, in heartrending lament. "It's the last, the very last meal we shall ever have together as Honeymooners in Hiding! It's past—it's gone—we may live to be a hundred years old, but it can never, never come back. Pat, Pat, our honeymoon is over!"

"Don't you believe it. We shall be back again in a couple of days, and as happy as ever—happier! Our honeymoon is going to last all our lives," declared the bridegroom sturdily. But the bride refused to be comforted.

"Oh, you may say so, but I know! It will never be the same. We shall never be all alone again, you and I, with nothing and nobody to think about in the whole wide world but just our own two selves. We shall be back here—yes! But there will be servants, and callers, and patients, and invitations, and interruptions every hour of the day, and—and—taxes and bills: household bills, grocers' bills—I know them!—mounting up higher and higher each week, and you will bite your lips and say, 'My dear—'" Gwen drew up on a short, dramatic pause. "Pat! promise me faithfully, on your honor as a British subject, that, no matter how high it gets, you will never address me as 'My dear'!"

"Er—er—certainly not, if it annoys you." Pat was quite startled to think how easily he might have fallen into this unpardonable sin. "But I really can't see why not. It seems to me a very innocent expression."

"It's not!" Gwen assured him. "It's the very reverse. It affects to be a term of endearment, but in reality it's reeking with deceit! 'My dear' is what husbands call the wives whom they don't love; or, if they do love them, they save up 'my dear' for moments of exasperation, when they would like to shake them but daren't! You will often feel exasperated with me. I'll confess if you won't throw it up at me that I am enough to exasperate a saint at times; but if you care for peace, steer clear of 'my dear'! Now, like an angel, get your things together while I wash up, and then we'll be ready to drive to the hotel in time for tea."

Before leaving the hotel at H— the bride and bridegroom had each despatched long and dutiful letters to their relations, warning them in each case that no further communications than picture post-cards need be looked for during the rest of the honeymoon. It was unnecessary to divulge that the said post-cards were all written at the same time as the letters themselves, and committed to the charge of a friendly chambermaid, with instructions to post one regularly at intervals of two days. With one exception these post-cards contained only a few words of greeting, but the last in order bore an important message:

> "Expect to arrive home at six o'clock on Wednesday evening. Kindly send in servants and prepare."

A letter of reminder had ensured the prompt posting of this message, which could therefore be counted upon to arrive at its destination on the following morning, and, pending the two days of preparation, the honeymoon was to be shifted to the Metropole Hotel. Recognition was now a matter of unimportance, and as the couple drove through the busy streets each felt the stirrings of pleasurable excitement. Before Pat's eyes there rose the vision of the long, brightly-lighted restaurant; he saw himself seated before a daintily-spread table, running a covetous eye over the menu, holding the wine-card in his hand. Gwen was obvious to creature comforts; she thought with delight that at last she could wear one of her real new trousseau frocks; decided on the pink, with the shot-rose scarf; saw a vision of herself walking down the crowded room, and was conscious to the very curl on her neck of the meaning of the whispered comments, "What a pretty girl!"

Under these happy circumstances it can be believed that it was in the highest of spirits that our lovers arrayed themselves for the table d'hote dinner a few hours later on. Bags and boxes had been rescued from the left-luggage office en route to the hotel; and it was delightful to meet all the dainty new possessions once more, and have the choice of a dozen garments, after living practically in one for a fortnight on end.

"Constable 27 regarded the portraits with an expression of ludicrous embarrassment."

Pat was shut up in his dressing-room with instructions not to dare to come out until he was summoned, so that the full blast of his wife's beauty might fall upon him unprepared. The result was all that could be desired, and even Gwen's thirst for compliments was assuaged by the assertion that never since the earth was created had such a lovely vision greeted the eyes of man. Then the bridegroom meekly requested a little attention for himself.

"Will I do? Shaved myself again to do you honor. Tie all right? Spoilt two before I could get one to please me."

Gwen nodded with queenly patronage.

"Quite! Your bows have always such nice little waists. Can't think how you tie them with your great fingers. But your coat, dear! It's very creased."

"What could you expect after being jammed up in my bag for a fortnight on end? I've not worn this coat since the night before we were married. What an age ago it seems—prehistoric history—eh? The creases will come out all right in the air. Shake it a bit—eh?"

Pat took hold of the silk-lined tails and flipped them violently to and fro. Suddenly, as he did so, his face changed; he stood rigid in the centre of the room, and gasped out his wife's name.

"Gwen!"

"What?"

"GWEN!"

"WHAT?"

"M—m—my—Look! In my pocket! My tail pocket! Lying there all the time! My—pocket-book!"

He held it out towards her; she leapt at him and tore it from his hands; she flicked over the pages, thrust her fingers into the pockets, shook it over the floor, and out they fluttered—one, two, three bank-notes—crisp, little, rustling, insignificant slips of paper, which represented a whole sixty pounds in golden coin of the realm!

There they lay on the drab hotel carpet, while the husband and wife gasped, and stared, and gasped again, and laughed, and exclaimed, and danced, and waved their hands, and behaved generally as any other happy, natural young couple would have done under the same circumstances.

"Safe—safe—all the time! Not lost at all! Lying in that pocket when you said you were sure—positively sure—"

"So I was—so I was! I could have sworn that I took it out, and put it in the pocket of my new tweed coat; but it was the morning of my wedding. Bates was in the room chafing me all the time I packed. I didn't know if I were standing on my head or my heels. Then when it couldn't be found I thought of the crowd, and that fellow who knocked against me, and made sure— And it was lying here all the time, safe and sound! Oh, my poor little girl, and you might have had your honeymoon after all!"

"I've had it—I've had it! The loveliest one that was ever known!" cried Gwen, and promptly, mysteriously, began to cry. Just why she, who had taken the great loss with a smile, and had smiled persistently throughout the Honeymoon in Hiding, should have dissolved into tears at the glad moment of discovery, is one of the inexplicable mysteries which will remain with us so long as young and charming women continue to inhabit the earth. Cry she did, however, but temperately, judiciously, with a careful dab of the eyes with a tiny lace handkerchief, since it behooved a bride on the eve of her first appearance in public in a pink trousseau frock to take care that the effect should not be spoiled by tear-staained eyes.

"It's only because—because I'm so glad!" she exclaimed to her astonished mate. "I always do when I'm too happy. We are the luckiest couple; it's too perfectly lovely to be true! Never say again that it's impossible to eat your cake and have it, for we've done it! We've had our honeymoon and kept our money; we've been as happy as two mortal creatures could possibly be, and we've kept a nest-egg to tide us over tight places in the future. Pat! you're a lucky man. Aren't you glad you married me?"

Dr. Patrick Hilbert declared with much emphasis that he was; he went on declaring it regularly throughout the years; he is declaring it at this present moment, when as a busy and successful London practitioner his happiest remembrances are of a certain fortnight when he lay perdu in his own house, slinking out of back doors to attend East End theatres and feasting on scraps cooked on a Beatrice stove, in the company of the sweetest and cheeriest little bride who ever shared a Honeymoon in Hiding!

THE END

Wisdom for the Wedded

MARRIAGE is of perennial interest, says M. A. P., and it is seldom that one comes across a book so filled with good-humored common sense as "Wooing and Wedding," by the Rev. J. O. Bevan. Although Mr. Bevan has no love for the militant suffragette, he is equally against the "milk-and-water" type of woman. His ideal is the wifely helpmate who is a real sharer in her husband's joys and sorrows.

Mr. Bevan's advice to husbands is of the best.

"The author once heard of a girl being rebuked by her companion for speaking of her 'feencee,' as she miscalled her 'young man.' 'No,' said the censor, 'not feence, but financier!'

"That is, indeed, so in the majority of cases. You are the financier, you work for a wage, you hold the money-bags. Nevertheless, she is a partner in the concern—she is the Co. You earn the wages! Certainly; but who sustains you, sends you forth to labor? Who, like the snail, carries the house upon her back? The wife. Her ministration in the home—as mother, nurse, upholder, guardian, general factotum, maid-of-all-work, head cook and bottle-washer—is none the less useful, necessary, exacting, menial, monotonous.

"'A man's work is from sun to sun, but a woman's work is never done!' Take her, then, into your confidence: share and share alike; if you appropriate a certain proportion of the weekly proceeds for your club, your drink, your tobacco, give her just so much for her own sole use and appropriation."

"The role of wife is the hardest and most exacting profession in the world," says our author, but he appears to think that her lot may be considerably lightened if she will remember the old motto to "feed the brute." Most married men will appreciate the following little sermon to a wife:

"What a want of consideration is often displayed by you in a recital of all the domestic grievances during the day at the very moment when the good man has returned home tired out with the contradiction of sinners outside! 'Oh! John, the kitchen chimney has been on fire; the cat has kittened; the rate-collector, the butcher have called again for payment; the 'nuisance' man has been enquiring as to the leak in the drain!'

"No, no!—let the poor man come in, put on his slippers and his easy coat; let him pacify the wolf within that cries for food."

In "Merrie England"

Maypole Soap Dye

is as strong a favorite as the time-honored Maypole itself, and like it, Maypole Soap is always an emblem of brightness and beauty.

It transforms faded, dingy, ready-for-the-rag-bag clothes and house furnishings into things of freshness and beauty. Dresses, petticoats, stockings, gloves, sweaters, golf coats, children's dresses, ribbons, feathers, colored tablecloths, curtains, cushion tops, couch covers, rugs — these are some of your possessions to which will give a new lease of life.

Maypole Soap

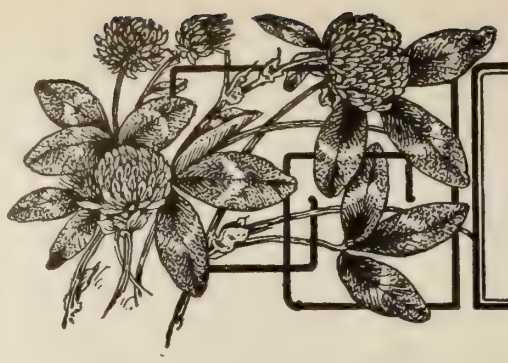
At one operation Maypole Soap cleanses and dyes to the brightest, prettiest colors — fadeless in sun or rain.

But one of the best things about Maypole Soap is the ease of using it. No muss or fuss —no scattering powder around — no stained hands or kettles. It's themost satisfactory home dye.

Made in 24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10 cents, black 15 cents—at your dealer's or postpaid with booklet, "How to Dye," from

Frank L. Benedict & Co. - Montreal



With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

The Holiday Competition

WE have decided to defer for a month the date for the close of our competition, for which we are offering two prizes, the first of three dollars, the second of two dollars, for the best letters on the subject, "Our Summer Holiday." Each letter must be accompanied by a signed certificate from parent or guardian, stating age of writer, and assuring the Editor that the letter is original work. No one over fourteen years of age is allowed to compete. A special prize of two dollars is also offered for the best photograph of a holiday scene sent in by one of our Juniors.

The date for the close of this competition is October fifth.

The Northern Spy and the Greening

By E. G. G.

ONE day a Northern Spy and a Greening apple met in a Barrel. How they came to be together they could not tell. It was better that they should never meet, for they always quarrelled, and it is better for such things to live apart.

Northern Spy was a strong apple. He knew he looked well and was very popular, so, whenever he met an apple that was his inferior, he put on "airs" to show how superior he was in every way.

The grocer who owned the barrel had overlooked the two apples, and when they rolled against each other Northern Spy darted quickly to the other side of the Barrel and said in a lofty tone:

"I cannot imagine how you got here. This was a Barrel of Spys."

"I don't know," Greening squeaked, "but I will not hurt you. I am as good as you."

Northern Spy sniffed in a truly superior fashion.

"I am King of Apples. I adorn the tables of the rich. My varied and artistic coloring is admired by all. Whether baked, stewed or raw, I am lord of the apple kingdom."

"You are very conceited," said Greening. "You have no manners, and I think you are hard and sour."

"You're a pale, green thing," retorted Northern Spy, "and you're always shiny as though you never wash your face."

"Oh, I shine because I am rich and juicy."

"You mean soft," snapped Spy. "You can't live half the winter, while I shall live a whole year if I am kept cold and dry."

"I'm good for pies and apple butter," said Greening.

"But I'm good for everything," boasted Spy. "I heard a man say to-day that no matter how one ate a Spy, it was always good."

"You shouldn't repeat praise spoken of yourself," said Greening; "it is foolish."

"If I should roll hard against you, I wonder how long you would stand it? I could bruise your sides so that you would be good for nothing only to be thrown out."

"Well, we need not quarrel; we are both in the same boat," said Greening.

Greening sighed.

"The same Barrel," correctel Spy.

"I had hoped to become a pie and have some fine lady say, as she ate me, 'I do think Greenings make such lovely pies.' I should die happy if—"

"Ah," sneered his majesty, "you'll never hear that, because, as I have said, I am the king—"

At that moment the grocer's boy began to clean the barrel and the two apples tumbled out on the floor.

Northern Spy hastened to roll as far away from Greening as possible, lest anyone should think he was related to her. A poor washwoman, who had come in to buy a loaf of bread, stooped and picked up the Greening.

"Kin I have this apple?" she asked.

"Yes," said the boy, "take it."

"It'll make me a bit of pie. I allus say as how Greenings make the best pies."

Northern Spy chuckled. "You'll be turned into a pie, but you'll not be eaten by a lady."

"How do you know?" Greening whispered from the pocket of the old woman. "Rags sometimes clothe a noble soul, while wrinkles and grey hair tell of work done and battles fought."

"You are wise for a Greening," growled Spy. "I hope you will enjoy being cooked and eaten."

The boy struck him with his broom, and he rolled away into a corner, where he stayed many days. The heat caused his beauty to fade, his skin became wrinkled and his pride withered as he felt his strength ebbing away.

"I wish I had stayed near Greening," he moaned, "for then I might have had a career. I might have been picked up by a schoolboy and eaten. Then I should have in time become part of a man, which would have been glorious. Pride has been my ruin."

Northern Spy died alone, a withered, shrunken thing of skin and core, while Greening helped to feed a brave old woman who worked to make a living, which we think was a good work for an apple to do.

HAPPY PLAYMATES

The Big Jar of Water

A LITTLE Japanese boy named Kwang, who was very clever because he always paid attention to his lessons and tried to understand everything that came in his way, was playing with some other children, when one of them fell into a large earthenware jar full of water. The vessel was a tall one, and none of the children could reach their comrade. Kwang took up a large stone lying on the ground and throwing it at the earthenware jar with all his might, broke the vessel. The water at once ran out, and the little boy was saved.

Holiday Letters

Holyrood, July 10, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

We take the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL and enjoy reading it very much, especially the Juniors' page. I will now write on "Our Summer Holiday."

One hot day last summer my cousins and I made a tent under a large willow tree. In the tent we had a lemon and soda water stand. We had a board on some bricks for a counter, and a box to sit on when we were tired.

To make the lemonade we took a little lemon peel, some sugar, vinegar, and plenty of water. We used just the same for the soda water as the lemonade, only we used the soda water instead of lemon peel. The lemonade we sold for two pins a glass and the soda water we sold for three pins a glass. We chose three pins for the soda water because it sometimes takes a lot of soda to make it fizzle.

My cousin Tom was my partner. He stood on the fence and called out, "Here's your ice-cold lemonade, only two pins a glass. Come this way for your three-pin soda water!"

I stayed under the tent and waited on our customers. We did a big business. We sold to ten boys, five girls, two babies, my grandmother and two aunts. But we drank the most of it ourselves. We were all sick that night, but cannot imagine what was the matter, unless because we worked so hard.

I will close now, wishing your page success.

Yours truly,

MAE HENRY.

Age, 13 years.

I certify that Mae wrote this unassisted.

MRS. T. HENRY.

* * *

Dear Mae:

What a fine time you must have had in the tent under the large willow tree! I remember playing circus a long time ago, when I took the pins and my brother turned somersaults. But we had no such delightful drinks as the lemonade and soda water which you served. I am sure I can't imagine what sickened the ten boys, five girls, two babies, grandmother and two aunts. You must write to us again, Miss Mae.

Warkworth, July 28th, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

My nicest and happiest holiday was spent in a camp at Lake Nipigon.

On my way there I saw many prosperous towns and got a general idea of the average beauty and prosperity of Northern Ontario.

I arrived at the lake in the morning, and my first impression of the place was its exquisite beauty. The trees

Continued on page 50

A SEPTEMBER LUNCHEON

PREPARED BY
MARY H. NORTHEND

THE many lovely wild flowers that grow in profusion along country and suburban roadsides offer an attractive decoration for any luncheon table. That their use for such a purpose is not more universal is not due to any lack of beauty on their part, but to a mistaken idea of many hostesses that only cultivated blossoms are adaptable for decorative use. Some of the prettiest tables I have seen boasted a central arrangement of wild flowers, and their long season of blossoming, as well as the variety in their kind and coloring, allows of their use from early spring, when the dainty wood violet pokes its head above the earth, until late autumn, when the golden rod gaily nods its bright plumed top. The list of wild flowers suitable for table use is a long one and might well include nearly all the known varieties. Their adaptability to any scheme renders them invaluable, and their inexpensiveness makes an earnest appeal in their behalf to the economical hostess.

In our illustration, one pretty arrangement of wild flowers is shown. Here Queen's Lace, that delicate, fragrant flower found in profusion throughout September, is massed with wild ferns as the central theme. Low glass vases, grouped about a tall vase, are the receptacles used, and the completed effect is that of a mound of lacey white interspersed with green. A tall-handled wicker basket, massed with the blossoms and ferns would be equally effective, as would a birch bark jardiniere. Queen's Lace is sufficiently decorative in itself to need no further embellishment, and surely there is no lovelier adornment for a September luncheon, even among the finest cultivated blossoms!

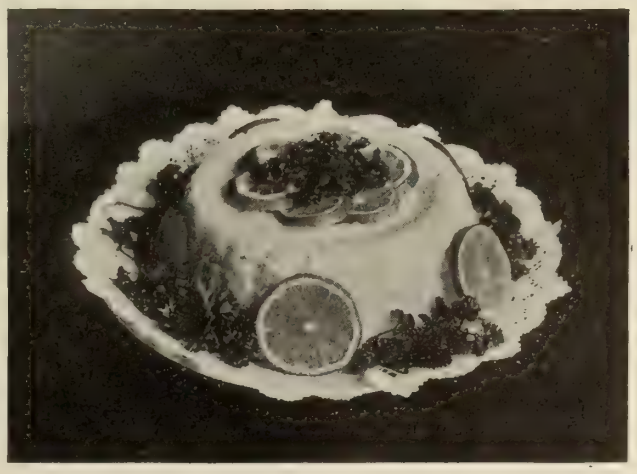
As to the menu suitable for an early autumn luncheon, any number of attractive dishes suggest themselves. The following is offered as a suggestion in the hopes that its easily prepared and appetizing concoctions may appeal to the prospective hostess, who may be in a quandary as to what to give her guests to eat.

Cauliflower Soup
Toasted French Bread
Chartreuse of Salmon
Potatoes Mushrooms
Baked Ham with Olives
Tomato and Egg Salad
Lemon Jelly
Kisses Coffee

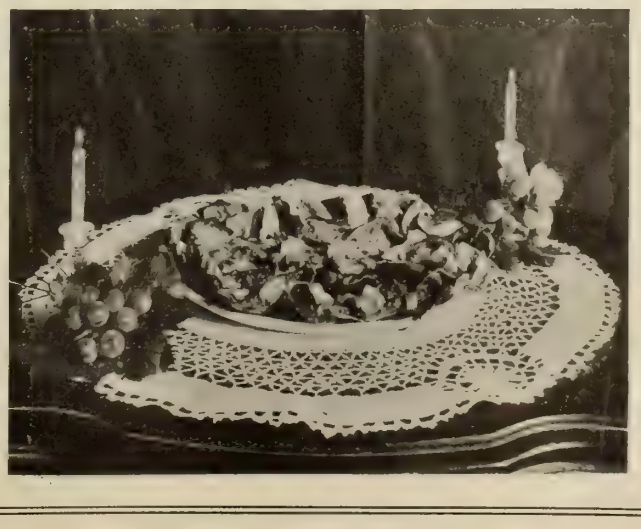
CAULIFLOWER SOUP—One head of cauliflower, one-eighth pound of butter, one-eighth pound of flour, one and one-fourth quarts of milk, one and one-fourth quarts of water, salt to taste, pinch of sugar and nutmeg. Wash the cauliflower, cut in small pieces, cook slowly in the boiling salted water, thicken the soup with the butter and flour, moistened by degrees with the hot milk to a thin paste. Add this to the hot milk, boil slowly five minutes, drain cauliflower when tender, add water in which it was cooked to the milk, allow to boil up, season with salt, a pinch each of sugar and nutmeg. Add cauliflower.

LUNCHEON TABLE WITH "QUEEN'S LACE"

LEMON JELLY



CHARTREUSE OF SALMON



TOMATO AND EGG SALAD

CHARTREUSE OF SALMON—Parboil one cup of rice five minutes; drain and steam until tender in about three cups of milk or stock, seasoned with salt and two tablespoons of curry powder. Line buttered mould with rice. Fill centre with a pound of cooked salmon, flaked, seasoned with salt, pepper, and lemon juice; cover with rice. Steam one-half hour. Serve with this egg sauce: Three ounces of butter, beaten with one ounce of flower; stir into it one pint of boiling water; salt and pepper. Cook fifteen minutes; pour into saucepan having hard-boiled eggs sliced or chopped in it.

BAKED HAM WITH OLIVES—Cover a ham with flour and water paste. Bake slowly for about five hours, basting often. Remove paste and skin except around shin bone. Brush ham with a beaten egg, sprinkle with bread crumbs, and set in oven until brown. Arrange a row of olives cut in halves along edge of skin. Garnish with lettuce leaves cut in ribbons, and paper frill.

TOMATO AND EGG SALAD—Take choice ripe tomatoes, dress liberally with best olive oil and a standard salad dressing, adding vinegar to latter if too thick. Use in proportion of two parts oil to one of dressing. Mix to uniform consistency and dispose on crisp lettuce leaves. Garnish with sections of hard-boiled eggs.

LEMON JELLY—Soak together for one-half hour one box of gelatine, and four lemons sliced, a little stick of cinnamon and one pint of cold water; then pour over it one quart of boiling water and four cups of sugar. Strain into round mould, and set in cool place or on ice. When ready to serve, unmould on plate, and, if desired, garnish base with blanched almonds. A cluster of flowers and feathery green, arranged in a small glass vase which will slip in the centre of the mould will lend a festive appearance. The flowers should be the same as those used for table decorations.

KISSES—Beat one cup whites of eggs until stiff; then beat in one-half cup fine granulated sugar. When clean cut can be made fold in second one-half cup of sugar; drop in spoonfuls on paper fastened to board. Bake three-quarters of an hour.

DELICIOUS APPETISING SATISFYING

That is what everyone says who has used E. D. S. preserves

¶ They are liked by all persons from youth to old age. THE CHILDREN like E.D.S. preserves for their sweet, toothsome flavor. THE MOTHER serves them to father and to visitors because they are even better than "mother used to make." THE OLD FOLKS like them for their satisfying qualities—they cannot eat much but the food they do eat they want to be good. Next time you order your groceries ask your grocer to send up a jar of your favorite fruit. You will find the are better than the ordinary kind.

E D S

BRAND OF PRESERVES

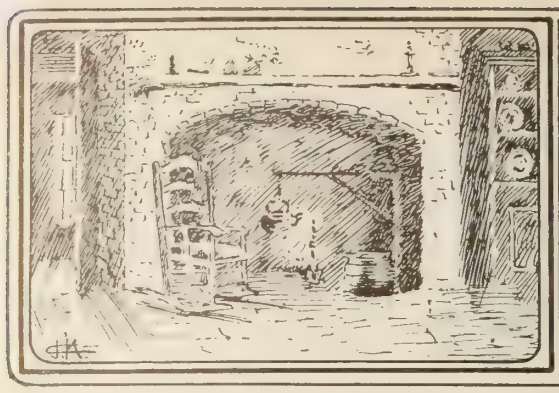
E. D. SMITH
WINONA,
ONT.



AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

"You are preaching a gospel,
A chapter a day,
By the deeds that you do,
And the words that you say.
Men read what you're writing,
Whether faithless or true.
Say, what is the gospel
Acording to you?"

SILENT INFLUENCE

MEMORY carries me back over the years, and again I am a little girl of ten. It is a summer morning, in a little church, and in a town where I spent my childhood. Everybody knew everybody in those days, for it was only a village then, and a stranger received all the notice and scrutiny they could desire or warrant. A new face was in one of the side pews, in full view of the congregation. She was a guest of one of the leading villagers, beautiful of face and figure, prettily dressed, and attracted much admiration. When the minister announced his text, she fixed her eyes upon him, let her hands lie idly in her lap, and, until the close of the sermon, her attention was rapt. She neither averted her gaze, nor moved.

How did I observe it all? I suppose I must confess that I watched her instead of the speaker, for of that discourse I remember not one word, but her influence over my childish mind has lasted until now. I never saw her again, and little did she realize as she earnestly listened that morning that all along the years of one child's life her example of perfect church demeanor should hold sway.

Whenever I felt tempted to turn around, or a feeling of restlessness overtook me in church, the quiet attitude of that unknown lady inspired me to emulation, and I literally forced myself to do likewise, and what one cultivates in childhood stays. It became easier all the time to control the desire to fidget, and though one cannot always prevent wandering thoughts from intruding, we can, and should, preserve the outward semblance of interest. The seed took root in that little incident, and who will say that she did not preach a gospel to a young heart that day, to a mind that perhaps was not capable of understanding the deeper theology of the Bible message?

A RECOLLECTION of mother. We had for neighbor an English woman, who believed in "smacking" her children for all offences, (now, though we were Irish, praise be, our parents did not believe in 'batin'), yet one who believed her neighbor's children were always in the wrong. Two instances of this were when she missed her clothesline prop, and once when the key of the milk-house was lost. My brother was blamed for the disappearance of the clothes stick, though he stoutly maintained his innocence; while I was the last one seen with the key, according to her boy's story. Both articles eventually turned up, the stick in her own yard, where the lads had been playing horse with it, and the key right at the door, where it had dropped out of the lock. My memory calls up an angry, loud-voiced, red-faced woman on the one hand, and a calm, low-toned, dignified one on the other. Young as I was then, the scene has remained ineffaceable, and while my mother never flinched for one second in defending her own boy and girl, her naturally pale face did not change its color or expression, and I have felt that influence through all the years.

When I see a woman stand at her gate and shrilly call her children, and as each one passes gives a ringing crack on the ear, or wherever her hand happens to alight, on the frightened, dodging offender, I think of my mother. When I see a parent following a child with a switch or a strap in her hand, and calling out occasionally for the benefit of the people who have run to their doors or windows to learn the cause of the uproar, "I'll give it to you, my girl, when I get you home," or "You'll pay for this, young man," my mind reverts to mother and her gentle ways. Have you ever seen a woman with her sleeves rolled up, and her hands all flour, run out to settle a children's quarrel? Or did you ever receive a sharp note telling you if you didn't look after your children, and make them behave, the writer would?

I received such once, written in a passionate haste of indignant phrases and blots. I answered it, and the woman was ashamed ever after. You see, the silent influence always hung over me, and I remembered what mother would have done. So I wrote it calmly, and with unusual care, saying I regretted that, as neighbors, our children could not agree, but thought it was foolish for parents to interfere in childish squabbles, which were forgotten in a few hours. She could rest assured there would be no further cause for dispute, and through it all rang the true mother note that I had the same right to believe my boy's side of the story as she had to believe hers. Then I read the prohibition act to my flock, and no amount of coaxing ever swerved my decision that henceforth each family should "play in their own back yard." Too many parents are guilty of childish behavior in mixing up in little disputes that amount to nothing. Don't do it; teach them to settle their own little spats and differences, and if the ways of other children are objectionable to yours, or you feel that their influence is having a bad effect, it should not be a difficult matter to keep them separate, and yet give no cause for offence.

"NO man liveth unto himself," must mean this silent influence that radiates all unconsciously from our lives, and helps to mould the manners and lives of those with whom we come in contact. Think you that a man can live in a community, and his influence not be felt by those with whom he associates or transacts business; or a woman live in a place and not impress her neighbors, whether acquainted, or not, by the way she carries herself, or spends her time, or decorates her windows? A family was moving from one city street to another. The neighbors next door said, "You will never know how much good you have done me. I'm a poor, uneducated woman, but I have learned some lessons from you. Do you remember when you first came here how much time I spent hanging over the fence gossiping? Nothing that went on in the street escaped me; I neglected my work, I noticed you never did that, and I copied you. I used to scream at my children, you just beckoned to yours. I have watched you closely when you did not know, and I am a better woman than before I knew you."

Yes, we are watched, and by persons we little dream of. They are taking our measure, "sizing us up," so to speak, as citizens, mothers, church members, and forming ideals based upon what we represent to their minds. We can never get away from that fact, and it is a solemn one when we realize that someone else is perhaps building character on a foundation framed from what they consider our virtues. Should we not govern our actions so that the structure they build will stand the test of storm and stress? Do you look out of scornful eyes at people who are not so highly favored as yourself? Do you curl your lip at honest but lowly toil? Are you ready to smile encouragement at an objectionable story, or raise your eyebrows in assent at a hurtful insinuation? Would you like to feel that some one watching caught your spirit and perpetuated it?

A schoolmate, upon returning from college made this remark to me: "Of course, now, I shall not notice every one. I shall select my friends. You will do the same since your absence from home." Still smarting from a meeting with a very pretentious individual, also "just from school let out," who was busily engaged reading a letter as she passed me, I promptly replied, "Indeed, I shall do nothing of the sort. I hope I shall never become so ignorant as to pass anyone I ever knew without speaking." What a mean, impossible way to impress people with our greatness, shutting out the light of recognition, because of a higher education in a distant school, towards the unfortunate classmate learning life's lessons in the school of adversity! That very privilege they have had, the advantage of that education, should have taught them that the greatest men and the noblest women are noted for their natural kindliness and their simplicity of manner and purpose. Beneath the plain surface blazons the fire of great genius, and underneath a quiet exterior lay wondrous capabilities, grand souls that have discovered the truth of "All things I thought I knew, but now confess,

The more I know, I know I know the less."

THERE are the home influences that follow us all through life, the school influences that are never forgotten. The different teachers, and the impressions that remain, it is impossible to set them aside. They have all had a part in your life. You remember the schoolboy who never got angry, his sunny face even yet sheds its joy as you recall him, and the patient, plodding seatmate, her persistency has helped you though you never knew it. In describing his teacher, my son said: "I have never seen him lose his temper. Under the most provoking circumstances he only bit his lip, and maintained utter silence." Could any parent wish a better example for a boy? The memory of that self-possessed man who could control his emotions is something to influence him all the rest of his life. Some one has said that silence is the most massive thing conceivable sometimes. It is strength in very grandeur.

Have you ever seen a strong man angry, ever seen his face pale, and a cold gleam come into his eyes, his lips compress, and his whole expression fairly make you shrink into yourself? Then, have you watched the fierce gleam fade, the color return, the firm lines relax, and never a word spoken? Then have you seen strength in very grandeur. Have you ever seen a calm-faced woman, under an abusive tirade, close her lips in silence, not even attempting to defend herself; or a boy or girl unjustly suffering blame, and, knowing it is undeserved, seek not to justify themselves, then have you beheld the same strength? It is the mightiest weapon one can wield in quelling gossip and slander, and if we could only keep back the cruel, stinging words of retort, that blast and blight everything in their path, making tender hearts wince and shrivel beneath their withering scorn, what a strength would be ours!

If the fathers in our land could never fail in their dignity, and show their children what a manly act it is to hold their temper in abeyance, and the mothers never let them see the angry flush of impatience and ill-nature wrinkle their brow, what an influence upon the characters of their children! If parents but realized how far-reaching and potent the example of their everyday lives were upon the children in their homes, it would tend to make them more cautious as to how they pattern their lives. Father worked so happily, so unceasingly,

"In and out of our home he went,
Year after year with a glad content."

And mother was so self-sacrificing, and on down the years the influence helped the boy and girl to bear the same yoke, and plod on over the same path. Gentle, patient lives, a soothing and quieting power as we view them in retrospect.

NOW, what is the gospel, according to you? Perhaps you feel that your influence is of little consequence, that your sphere is limited, that no one troubles to take notice. Do not deceive yourself; out from you flow waves of influence ever widening, no matter how humble your life may be. A poor cripple sitting at the window, sighing as the people pass, wishing he too had health and vigor to move about, laments that he is a burden. Little he dreams of the lesson his infirmity is teaching as the bustling crowd pass his window daily, and glance up at the pale, pathetic face. The cold and the heat, the labor and toil sink into insignificance, as they feel the strength of their limbs. The face at the window revealed their blessing of health and activity, it brought out their sympathy, and the unconscious sufferer knows naught of the power for good his very weakness appealed to in their highest and best natures.

Your gospel may be to always be found in your place, to exercise toleration under difficulties, to carry burdens cheerfully, to endure with heroism born of fortitude, to smile at misfortune. This little clipping may not be out of place here, as it bears somewhat on this phase of the subject: The novelists of the day are taking the "new" women for their heroines, women whom life has struck blow after blow until they have learned the art of laughter; women who know how to jest in the face of disappointment; women who have a comforting sense of humor. Hurt a woman's feelings nowadays, and she smiles gaily at you, or wilfully misunderstands your meaning; break her heart, she smiles still, and commands your admiration by the power of quiet laughter."

The influence of a woman, or a man either, for that matter, who can go through life leaving a streak of sunshine in their path as thus described is productive of results which cannot be estimated. That is just the kind of sunlight this old world needs, sending out its rays in kindly ripples of laughter. If the gospel our lives preach can show others that we can take the bitter with the sweet, can swallow the draught of severe bereavement, can accept the loss of money, or position, and smile with hope and trust in the face of it, then are we faithful to the true Gospel whose great Example lived His perfect life as though He daily asked, what is the Gospel according to Me, and His influence will live all through the ages.

To Clean Eiderdown

MAKE a lather of hot water and soap jelly, a heaped teaspoonful to the gallon, and add a little liquid ammonia. Steep the quilt in this for a few minutes. Then rinse well up and down, and use a second or third lot of suds if necessary. Rinse in two lots of clean water to which a little ammonia has been added, and run through wringer. If you have no wringer, hang in a windy situation and squeeze the bottom occasionally.

To the Family Grocer

—an appreciation

THIS is a simple word of appreciation—an acknowledgement of our obligation—a reminder of the obligation of the Public—to the Retail Grocers of the world. It is fitting to preface this acknowledgement to our season's advertising which will regularly tell more than twenty millions of people of the purity and excellence of Heinz 57 Varieties.

Perhaps you—the consumer—never stopped to think of it, but the reason why you are able to secure Heinz Products, wherever you may be, is only because of the splendid co-operation of the good grocers of the world.

And only because they are good grocers—because they look beyond the penny's profit in hand—because they put quality and service—your interests—first.

Here is something you should know. If your grocer has not told you, he should have done so. We are making this heretofore unpublished statement; in his behalf:

Our prices to your grocer are higher than he has to pay for similar lines.

Purity, the best materials and care —ideals—in the preparation of foods—cost money. Only fresh, sound materials, absolute cleanliness in preparation, and perfect means of natural preservation, are found in the great Heinz kitchens.

Obviously, we cannot compete in price with manufacturers who have a lower standard of product—of sanitation—who use artificial preservatives to market questionable materials. We do not attempt to compete.

Your grocer understands. He willingly pays more for Heinz Products, for the privilege of serving you better. But you who consume them, pay just about the same. Please remember that.

The constantly increasing sale and distribution of Heinz Products is one of the surest proofs of the high standards upheld today by the family grocer. And this tendency to supply you with the best is almost general—it is fairly typical of the grocery trade of today.

Of course the grocer is conserving his own interest in this. It holds his trade, and increases its growth.

But, remember, the grocer who sells you Heinz 57 Varieties shares with us the extra cost their quality represents —while you pay the regular market prices.

Thus, he deserves our appreciation and co-operation. He deserves your trade.

H. J. Heinz Company

Member Association for Promotion of Purity in Foods

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Autumn Fashions

DESIGNED FOR CANADIAN WOMEN

ADVANCE INFORMATION ON AUTUMN FASHIONS

FROM OUR CORRESPONDENTS IN PARIS, LONDON AND NEW YORK

THE opening of the autumn always is a time of special interest from the standpoint of fashions and dress. We used to think that the spring was the period of radical change, but latterly we have come to look to the fall for really new things. This season, however, there is little evidence of any really important change in the general trend of styles. For the street we will still wear narrow skirts with straight lines and short coats, although these coats will vary in length from what is known as wrist to finger tips. For the dressy costume three-quarter sleeves and big collars prevail. For the severe tailored suit of general wear long sleeves are preferred, and collars may be small or large as liked. Skirts are cut in many ways, but the prevailing width is two and one half yards. They fit closely, but are not exaggeratedly tight, and both good taste and fashion declare against the so narrow skirt that it marks the outline of the figure in a way that is far from attractive and savors of vulgarity. Both high and natural waist line will be used, but in a general way, it may be said that the natural waist line, or the skirt cut just a little above, will be the prevailing one of the street costume. For indoor gowns we are likely to see high waists and medium waists, waists indeed of every length.

Suitings are very beautiful and of every variety, but there is a general tendency toward the suits of serge and rough finished materials with taffeta and satin for the dressy costumes. Broadcloth is being extensively used as trimming; it is to be much employed upon wool and also upon taffeta. The combination is always a pretty one and the new effects are in every way charming. Ratine also is used as trimming while velvet in combination with cloth is to have great vogue.

Handsome costumes are further embellished by touches of embroidery, and embroidery executed in wool threads is among the smartest of all things for collars and cuffs. Some of the new skirts show little panels and turned over effects and these often are treated just as are the collars and cuffs.

The prevailing tendency in hats is for the high round crown with narrow brim that rolls up at one side. For the early season a great many hats of silk and satin trimmed with the same material or with ribbon, will be worn, but felt also is seen, and white felt with black velvet is smart and in every way attractive for the early season. Big hats unquestionably will be seen and they are always beautiful with ostrich trimming, but for general wear the high round crowns and narrow brims promise to be a favorite.

Buttons are to be used sparingly upon coats, but are exceedingly handsome and make a feature. Many of the costumes are closed with one, two or three large buttons, and these buttons are selected with the greatest care. Bags in envelope shape with cord handles are to be extensively used, and one of the latest fancies is to make them of the material or of the trimming of the gown, braided or embroidered in harmony with the costume.

Three-piece suits unquestionably will be much worn. They are always practical and consequently in demand. The general tendency in suitings is toward light weight. In many instances the skirt, the coat, and the lower part of the blouse are made of one material, with the upper of the blouse and the sleeves of chiffon, net or other light weight fabric, but while this is a fancy of the incoming season, the entire blouse of thin material in color to match the suit is in every way correct, and makes the accepted accompaniment of the tailored suit.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

No. 7082—Fancy Blouse, 34 to 42 Bust. No. 7046—Three-Piece Skirt, 22 to 30 Waist. 2½ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 1½ yds. 36, 1¼ yds. 44 with 1 yd. of all-over lace 18 in. wide and ⅞ yd. of lace 6 in. wide for blouse; 6 yds. 27, 4 yds. 36 or 44 with ¾ yd. of lace banding for skirt, for medium size.

No. 7119—Fancy Blouse, 34 to 40 Bust. No. 7076—Three-Piece Skirt, 22 to 32 Waist. 3¼ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 2 yds. 36 or 44 with 1 yd. of all-over lace 18 in. wide for blouse; 4⅞ yds. 27, 3⅞ yds. 36, 2⅝ yds. 44 with 2¼ yds. of banding for skirt, for medium size.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

No. 7087—Long Coat, 34 to 44 Bust. 7 yds. of material 27 in. wide, 5¼ yds. 44 or 52, ¾ yd. of broadcloth for collar and cuffs, for medium size.

No. 7057—Three-Quarter or Full Length Coat, 34 to 44 Bust. 8 yds. of material 27 in. wide, 4⅝ yds. 44 or 52 for three-quarter coat; 8¾ yds. 27, 5 yds. 44 or 52 for long coat; 1 yd. 27 in. wide for collar and cuffs, for medium size.

No. 7078—Raglan Coat, 34 to 44 Bust. 7½ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 5½ yds. 44, 4 yds. 52, for medium size.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

No. 7113—Single Breasted Coat, 34 to 44 Bust. No. 7108—Six Gored Skirt with Separate Panels, 22 to 32 Waist. 4¾ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 2¾ yds. 44 or 52, ¾ yd. velvet for coat; 10 yds. 27, 5 yds. 44 or 52 for skirt when material has figure or nap, 7¾ yds. 27, 3⅞ yds. 44 or 52 when material has neither figure nor nap, for medium size.

No. 7090—Short Semi-Fitted Coat, 34 to 44 Bust. No. 7117—Skirt with Tunic Effect, 22 to 32 Waist. 4¼ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 2¼ yds. 44 or 52 with ½ yd. 44 in. wide for collar and cuffs for coat; 2¾ yds. 27, 2 yds. 44 or 52 for tunic, 1¾ yds. 44 for skirt, for medium size.

No. 7044—Short Coat, 34 to 42 Bust. No. 7072—Six Gored Skirt, 22 to 32 Waist. 4¼ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 2½ yds. 44 or 52 with ¾ yd. of velvet for coat; 6¼ yds. 27, 4¾ yds. 44 or 52 for skirt, for medium size.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

No. 7107—Tucked Peasant Blouse, 34 to 42 Bust. No. 7123—Two-Piece Skirt, 22 to 30 Waist. 2¼ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 1¾ yds. 36 or 44, 4½ yds. of banding for blouse; 4½ yds. 27, 2¾ yds. 36 or 44 for skirt, for medium size.

No. 7032—Peasant Blouse for Misses and Small Women, 14, 16 and 18 years. No. 7027—Six-Gored Skirt for Misses and Small Women, 14, 16 and 18 years. 2¼ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 1⅜ yds. 36 or 44 for blouse; 5 yds. 27, 3¼ yds. 36, 2⅞ yds. 44 for skirt, for 16 year size.

No. 7106—Tucked Blouse, 34 to 42 Bust. No. 7034—Tunic Skirt with Five Gored Foundation, 22 to 30 Waist. 3⅝ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 3 yds. 36, 2¼ yds. 44 for blouse; 7 yds. 27, 5½ yds. 36 or 44 for tunic and flounce, 2½ yds. 27 for foundation of skirt, for medium size.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

Our Fashion Department

IN ordering patterns, our patrons will please keep in mind that when two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at twelve cents each. Send cash to Pattern Department, Canadian Home Journal, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada. Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. Paper patterns, twelve cents each, post paid.

Smart Autumn Suits

THE tailored suit is always a costume first in demand at any change of the seasons. Here are three that are excellent, which show all the latest features of fashion, and which represent different yet equally important styles.

The first suit is made from cheviot, with trimming of velvet. The coat can be made of the favorite wrist length or shorter. The collar is of moderate size and square, and either long sleeves with rolled-over cuffs or three-quarter sleeves in bell shape can be used. The skirt is one of the best liked that the season has to offer. It is made in six gores, with a separate panel at front and back, and the back panel can be made either with a round or square outline. Panels of the sort can be used with singular success of striped fabrics, but the plain skirt is an excellent one, and in every way correct without the panels as well as with them. For the medium size the coat will require 4¾ yards of material 27, 2¾ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with 1 yard of velvet; for the skirt will be needed 7½ yards of material 27, 3¾ yards 44 or 52 if material has up and down, 5¼ yards 27, 2⅝ yards 44 or 52 if it has not, and for the panels will be required 2½ yards of additional material 27, or 1¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide. The skirt at the lower edge measures 2¼ yards. The pattern of the coat, 7113, is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 inches bust measure, and of the skirt, 7108, in sizes from 22 to 32 inches waist.

Combinations of plain with checked material are exceedingly smart, and the second suit of the group illustrates a most effective use thereof. The jacket is a new one, closed somewhat to the left of the front, and with a collar that can be made either round or square at the back. The skirt gives a tunic suggestion, yet is all in one, the tunic portions being attached to the broad foundation on the line of stitching. Any two materials can be used in this way, or the suit could be made of one throughout with trimming of velvet or satin or broadcloth or other material of the kind. One of the latest fancies is to use ratine in contrasting color, and the entire suit made of blue cheviot with collar and cuffs and neckband and lower edge of the foundation skirt of tan colored ratine would be exceedingly handsome and fashionable. For the medium size the coat will require 4¼ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide; for the tunic portion of the skirt will be needed 2¾ yards 27, 2 yards 44 or 52 inches wide, and for the foundation skirt 1¾ yards 44 or 52 inches wide. The pattern of the coat, 7090, is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 inches, bust measure, and of the skirt, 7117, in sizes from 22 to 32 inches waist.

The third and last costume shown is an exceedingly smart one with a coat that gives the Empire line and which can be made either with a plain or two-piece back, and with three-quarter sleeves finished with cuffs or with elbow sleeves without the cuffs. The model is an exceptionally jaunty, attractive and smart one and combines with a skirt to make a most attractive suit. The skirt is novel in its treatment, but is a simple six-gored one; the box plait effect at the back, and with a trimming band arranged over the lower edge. In this case the band is cut on the bias and the coat is trimmed with velvet. For the woman of medium size the coat will require 3¼ yards of material 27, 2⅛ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with 1⅜ yards of velvet; for the skirt will be needed 5 yards 27, 3¾ yards 44 or 52, with 2 yards 27, 1¼ yards 44, or 1 yard 52 inches wide, for the trimming band. The pattern, of the coat, 7044, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 inches bust measure, and of the skirt, 7072, in sizes from 22 to 32 inches waist measure.

Pretty Corset Cover

THE corset cover that is made with a peplum is one of the best liked. It is easily kept in place, yet it is perfectly smooth over the hips. This one is just full enough to be becoming to slender figures. It is finished with hems and closed by means of buttons and buttonholes worked in a fly, so that the closing practically is invisible. Nainsook is the material illustrated, and the edges are finished with beading and frills of handkerchief lawn. Lace or embroidery can be substituted for the latter, however, and any material used for the cover.

The corset cover is made with fronts and back. It is gathered at the lower edge and joined to the peplum. The edges of the neck and sleeves are turned over onto the right side and covered with beading, which is threaded to regulate the size.

For the 16 year size will be required 1⅛ yards of material 36 or 44 inches wide, with 2 yards of beading and 2 yards of edging.

Pattern No. 7068

The pattern, No. 7068, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Japanese Silk Waists

THE comfortable and natty separate waist of the hour is the Japanese wash silk one of white ground striped with a color that matches the suit with which it is worn. These silks come in such a wide range of color and pattern that any taste or suit can be matched. Those with grey or black ground with white stripes are also useful. The little checked ones make up into dainty waists, but the stripes are ahead in favor this season.

Made in plain shirt style, wash silk waists are especially smart. Some women, wishing to insure a strict shirt style, send to their husbands' shirt-makers, and women who do not have to reckon their pennies too carefully have them made literally by the dozen for travelling. Such a waist takes about as much room as any wisp of silk, and it does not crush readily. If it does it can be pressed with a turn of the iron. And any laundress who knows her business can wash and iron them like linen, though a good many persons send them to the cleaner and stand the extra expense. More than one business girl who has learned economy at the hands of careless laundresses does such waists up for herself, washing them in a suds made with white soap, rinsing

Six Months Without Darning! It's Guaranteed

Get This Box

Here are hose for men, women and children—and six pairs are guaranteed to wear without holes, rips or tears for six months. If any pairs wear out, we give you new hose free. We give you a signed-in-ink guarantee and a return coupon for each of the six pairs. These are the famous Holeproof Hose that have sold so phenomenally in the United States. 9,0000,000 pairs will be worn this year. 95 per cent of these hose, last year, outlasted the six months' guarantee.

We pay for yarn an average of seventy cents per pound. Common yarn sells for thirty cents.

$60,000 a Year for Inspection

We spend more than $60,000 a year merely for inspection—to see that each pair is perfectly made. These hose are light weight, soft and sheer as any cotton hose on the market. With all their advantages they sell at common hose prices. You save nothing by buying hose that wear out in one-sixth of the time "Holeproof" last. Don't darn any more when there is no need to. Get "Holeproof" today. If your dealer hasn't "Holeproof" on sale, send the money to us in any convenient way and we'll send you what you want, charges prepaid.

FAMOUS
Holeproof Hosiery
FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

How to Order

Choose your color, grade and size from the list below and state clearly just what you wish. One size and one grade in each box. Colors only may be assorted as desired. Six pairs are guaranteed six months except when stated otherwise.

Men's Socks—Sizes 9½ to 12. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, navy blue, gun-metal, mulberry. In light weight, 6 pairs $1.50 (same in medium weight in above colors and in black with white feet, 6 pairs $1.50). Light and extra light weight (mercerized), 6 pairs $2.00. Light and extra light weight LUSTRE SOX, 6 pairs $3.00. Pure thread-silk sox, 3 pairs (guaranteed three months) $2.00. Medium worsted merino in black, tan, pearl, navy and natural, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in finer grades, 6 pairs $3.00.

Women's—Sizes 8½ to 11. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, and black with white feet. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00. Same colors (except black with white feet) in light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Light weights in black, tan, and gun-metal, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Same in pure thread-silk $3.00 for 3 pairs (guaranteed three months). Outsizes in black medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00, and in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00.

Children's—Sizes 5½ to 10½ for boys, 5½ to 9½ for girls. Colors: black and tan. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00.

Infants' Sox—Colors: tan, baby blue, white and pink. Sizes 4 to 7. Four pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00. Ribbed-leg stockings, in same colors and black, sizes 4 to 6½, 4 pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00.

Get This Mark

Holeproof TRADE MARK Hosiery
Reg. U. S. Pat. Office, 1906
Carl Freschl Pres

Don't wait. Save the next six months of darning. Send in order now, while you think of it. Write for free book, "How to Make Your Feet Happy."

TO DEALERS—Write for our agency proposition. Excellent opportunity. Thousands of dealers in U. S. making big hosiery sales with "Holeproof."

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY CO. OF CANADA, Ltd., 39 Bond St., London, Canada

Are Your Hose Insured?

(213)

Do you find it hard to get good help?

Here is the kitchen helper that lessens work.

Makes it easier to get meals ready.

Saves countless, needless steps.

Keeps kitchens tidier.

Banishes lots of kitchen bothers.

Economizes time, energy and foodstuffs.

Groups everything in handiest place.

Abolishes muss and confusion.

This is one of the five styles of Knechtel Kitchen Kabinets. Each of them is a practical, time-saving, woman-helping convenience that you need thrice a day in your kitchen. You should go and examine the KKK this very day.

LOOK FOR THIS TRADEMARK

Built to outlast two generations.

Handsomely finished.

By far the handiest and most useful kitchen cabinet made.

KNECHTEL KITCHEN KABINET
REGISTERED

Extension table top of shining aluminum that won't rust or tarnish.

Ingenious flour and sugar bins.

Fully equipped with canisters, etc.

Earns Its Cost Over and Over Again

In time saved when getting meals ready—in strength saved by abolishing needless steps—in foodstuffs saved by keeping them clean and dustfree—the Knechtel earns its cost many times a year. Visit your furniture dealer to-day and SEE ALL THE FIVE HANDSOME STYLES. Some very good store near your home handles the Knechtel. Examine and compare it. Its cost will not frighten you.

Booklet B mailed on request

Knechtel Kitchen Cabinet Company, Limited

Hanover, Ontario

Would You Pay $2.75 For Ten or Fifteen Years' Convenience and Comfort?

That is What Bissell's "Cyco" Ball Bearing Sweeper Offers You

Over 12,000,000 BISSEL Sweepers in use throughout the world—a strong testimonial in itself as to the merit of our goods. Once you install a BISSELL Sweeper in your home you will regret the many years of wasted energy, discomfort and loss of time suffered through the use of the corn broom.

BISSELL'S "Cyco" Ball Bearing CARPET SWEEPER

runs so easily a child can operate it, and practically everything about it is automatic. The brush adjusts itself to all grades of carpets and rugs, hence needs no attention beyond emptying the pans. The pans are opened with slight pressure, and close automatically. The "BISSELL" takes up miscellaneous litter that no other cleaning device can gather, without the slightest injury to carpets or rugs, and gives the greatest all 'round sweeping efficiency at the lowest possible cost.

For sale by all the best trade.

Price $3.00 to $4.75.

Write for free booklet.

BISSELL CARPET SWEEPER CO.
Dept. 3. Grand Rapids, Mich.

(Largest and Only Exclusive Carpet Sweeper Makers in the World.) (17)

A Wax That Ends Corns

In each Blue-jay plaster there's a dot of B & B wax. That soft wax gently loosens the toughest corn. In two days the corn comes out.

The plaster is applied in a jiffy, and the pain of the corn ends instantly. You simply forget it. In 48 hours the whole corn comes out.

No soreness, no inconvenience—no feeling whatever. Five million corns every year are removed in just this simple way This is the only treatment used for corns by folks who know. Sold under guarantee.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters
15c and 25c per Package

All Druggists Sell and Guarantee Them
Sample Mailed Free.

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York
Makers of Surgical Dressings, etc. (12)

BUST and HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms" do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co.,
of Canada, Limited.
70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

them and ironing them under a cloth when they are almost dry. An iron should never be put directly onto silk. If it is hot enough to do its work it will yellow the silk too easily for the amateur ironer to manage. And in any case the iron leaves a shine that shows it has been there.

Pattern No. 7071

Kimono with Yoke

THE simple kimono made with a plain yoke is always a pretty one and is adapted to a variety of materials. This one suits small women as well as young girls and will be found appropriate for silk, challis, cashmere, lawn, batiste, crepe, all the materials that are used for kimonos, with trimming of contrasting material or ribbon.

The kimono is made with a yoke and the full portions that are gathered and joined to it. The sleeves are cut in one piece each and are sewed to the armholes. The band that finishes the neck and front edges is rolled over to form a collar.

For the 16 year size will be required 5¼ yards of material 27, 4¼ yards 36, or 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1⅝ yards of any width or 3⅝ yards of ribbon 5 inches wide to trim as illustrated; for the short kimono will be needed 2⅝ yards 27, or 1⅞ yards 36 or 44 inches wide, with 1 yard of contrasting material.

The pattern, No. 7071, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16, and 18 years of age.

Work Apron

SUCH an apron as this one is liked by many women. It is amply protective and it suits the artist and the designer as well as it does the housewife. In fact, it will be found desirable for any occupation that means possible soil to the gown. Just as illustrated, with square neck and long sleeves, it is both becoming and practical, but it can be varied in several ways. The low neck can be cut on a round outline or the apron can be made high with a rolled-over collar. The sleeves can be cut off to three-quarter length, or can be omitted altogether.

Pattern No. 7080

The apron is made with front and backs. The sleeves are in one piece each, gathered into bands.

For the medium size will be required 7¾ yards of material 27 or 4½ yards 36 inches wide, with ½ yard 27 for the trimming.

The pattern, No. 7088, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40, 42 and 44-inch bust measure.

Pattern No. 7088

Square Yoke Nightgown

THE square yoke nightgown is always a pretty one. It can be made from one material throughout, or the yoke can be cut from all-over embroidery or from lace or can be embroidered by hand. This one is made from fine nainsook with the edges of

Well! Well!

THIS is a
HOME DYE
that ANYONE can use.

I dyed it with

DY-O-LA
ONE DYE FOR ALL KINDS OF GOODS

It's the CLEANEST and SIMPLEST
Home Dye
that one can buy.

You CAN'T make a mistake—

Why! You don't even have to know whether your goods are Wool, Cotton, Silk or Mixed. It's all the same to DY-O-LA Try It!

All colors from your Druggist or Dealer.

FREE color card and story booklet, "How Dot Saved the Day," from—

THE
Johnson-Richardson Company, Limited
MONTREAL - CANADA

"Now you've got the right idea"

Old Dutch Cleanser

does all kinds of cleaning and does every bit of it easier

EATON'S CATALOGUE IS

SAMPLES OF THE STYLES SHOWN IN OUR FALL AND WINTER CATALOGUE

WE CATER TO THE WANTS OF ALL

Every woman—whether her position be one of limited income or of affluence—can gratify her every whim, in all matters pertaining to wearing apparel, through the medium of our Fall and Winter Catalogue. Every woman admires substantial good taste, which is characteristic of the hundreds of stylish and moderately priced garments listed in our latest and greatest fashion book. We want you to have a copy of it. We want you to send us your name and address. We want to place our catalogue in every Canadian home.

A SPECIAL AP

Let us send you a copy of logue. It will undoubtedly prov profit. It illustrates and describe popular in the world of fashion, parison.

THE T. EATO
TORONTO

RELIABLE STYLE BOOK

TO YOU

nd Winter Cata-of pleasure and newest and most rices invite com-

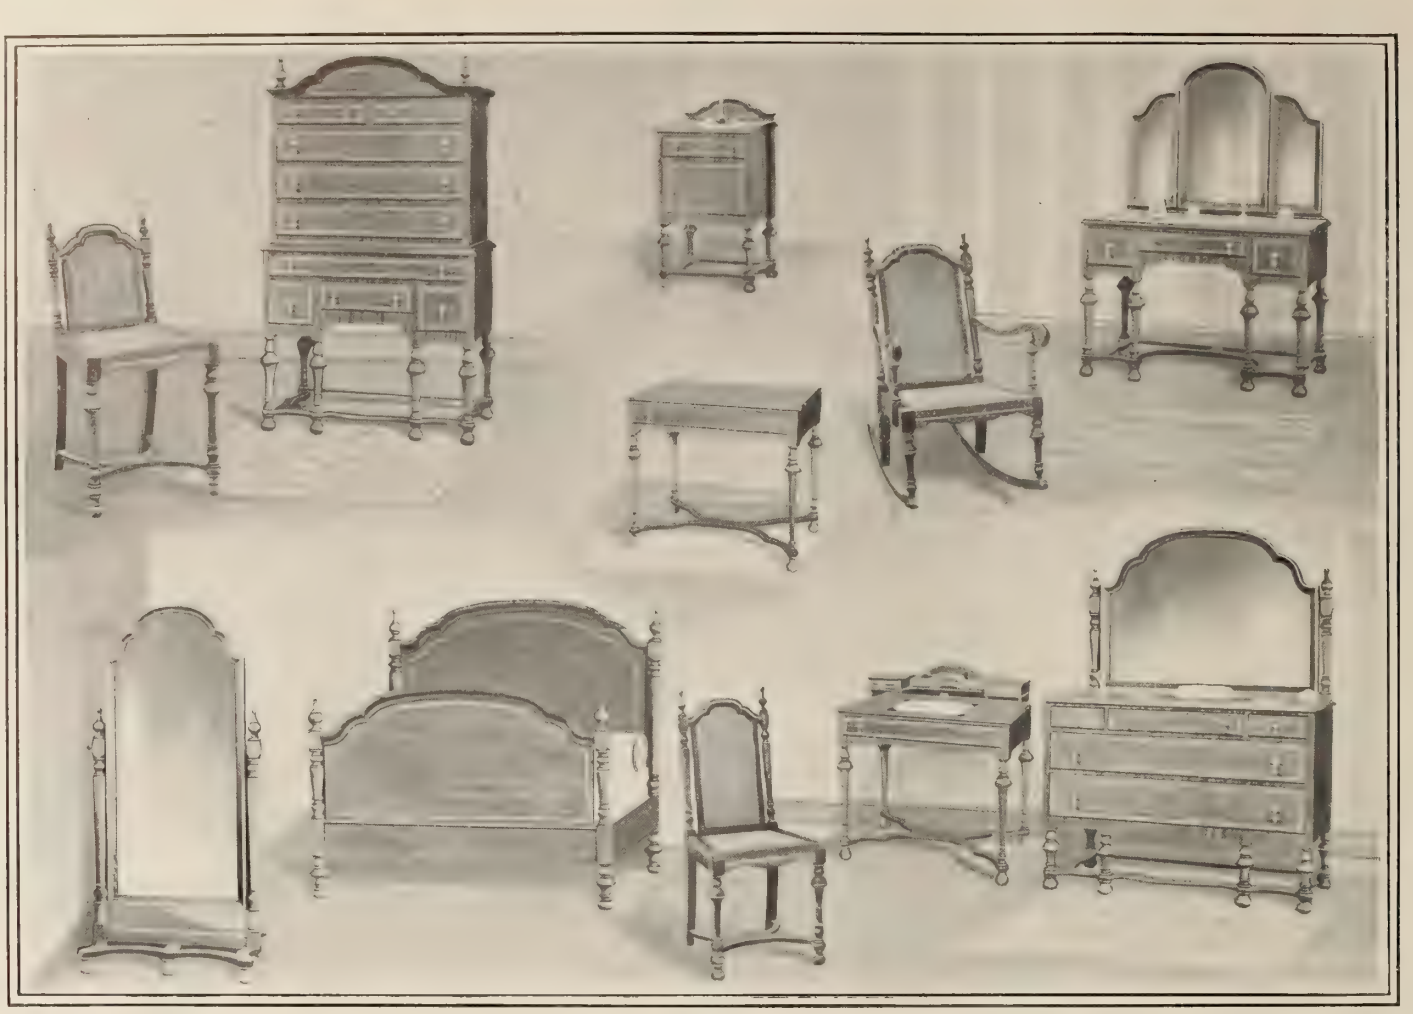
CO LIMITED
CANADA

OUR VALUES ARE MOST REMARKABLE

The selecting of the fabrics, the cutting, the designing, and the finishing of each and every article have been performed in accordance with the principles of our guarantee, namely, "Absolute satisfaction to you or your money refunded in full." Nothing has been overlooked, nothing has been slighted from the raw material to the finished product. Every garment is a genuine value, which we trust will be the means of making for us a permanent customer out of every purchaser. We want you to be one of them.

OUR FALL AND WINTER CATALOGUE IS FREE. WRITE FOR A COPY



PERIOD FURNITURE

In the June number of this Journal we illustrated a page of "Period Furniture." Since that page appeared, our representative furniture dealers have supplied quite a number of their customers with those pieces. Having also had so many inquiries from all over Canada for Illustrations of different styles of period furniture, we realize the taste of our Canadian home builders for genuine meritorious furniture, and are consequently illustrating herewith two Bedroom Suites in "Period Styles." The upper illustration shows the ever popular William and Mary period, which is characterized by its simple dignity and absence of "Gingerbread" or overdone details. It is for these reasons, principally, that this period is still so popular in England to-day. The Suite illustrated is made in Old English Mahogany and Italian Walnut, is inlaid with broad lines of Ebony and Holly. The lower illustration is the Modern Turned Colonial Style. The Colonial being the only style which is supposed to have been originated in America. The Suite we illustrate is made in Solid Select Figured Mahogany, finished dull. We know nearly all readers of the Home Journal will be interested in these styles, and for further information would ask you to see your dealer, or communicate with us.

TORONTO FURNITURE COMPANY, LIMITED
TORONTO - CANADA
MAKERS OF THE BETTER MAKE OF CANADIAN QUALITY FURNITURE

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

yoke and sleeves scalloped and embroidered with dots. In the back view, it is shown simply seamed to the yoke. The short, loose sleeves are pretty and generally liked, but the gown can be made with long ones, gathered into cuffs. When it is made with a high neck, it can be finished with a band or with a collar.

Pattern No. 7063

The nightgown is made with front and back portions that are gathered and joined to the yoke. Whether the sleeves are short or long, they are cut in one piece each.

For the medium size will be required 5½ yards of material 36 or 4 yards 44 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 7080, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

Child's Jacket

JACKETS with cut-away effects and finished with big collars are new and smart for little children. This one also includes pockets that are dear to the childish heart, and it is in every way in the height of style. Silk, cloth, pongee, linen and all materials that are used for children's coats are appropriate, with collar either of the same material trimmed, as in this instance, or of a contrasting one. White linen banded with embroidery makes the combination shown in the front view; pongee with collar of bright red satin the combination shown in the back view.

The jacket is made with fronts and back. The collar is seamed to the neck and front edges. The sleeves are made in two pieces each, in regulation style.

For the 6 year size will be required 2¾ yards of material 27, 2⅛ yards 36 or 1¾ yards 44 inches wide, with 2¼ yards of banding.

The pattern, No. 7063, is cut in sizes for children of 4, 6 and 8 years of age.

Pattern No. 7081

Child's Apron

THE really protective apron is the one that always is needed. This one can be made with long sleeves and high neck or with square neck without sleeves, becoming somewhat more dainty in effect. Used in either way it protects the dress, for it completely covers it. It is simple and easily made. All materials that are used for aprons are appropriate, the white lawns for the more dressy aprons, the ginghams and the like for the one with the high neck and long sleeves.

The apron is made with fronts and backs. The sleeves are cut in one piece each and gathered into bands. The high neck is finished with a collar, but when the apron is made with square neck and without sleeves, the neck and armhole edges can be finished in any way to suit the fancy.

Pattern No. 7064

For a child of 4 years of age will be required 2½ yards of material 27 or 2 yards 36 inches wide.

The pattern, No. 7081, is cut in sizes for children of 2, 4 and 6 years of age.

Semi-Princess Slip

THE slip made with a high waist line is absolutely necessary for wear under transparent gowns that are treated in the same way. This one is in every way attractive and practical, yet quite simple. It combines a moderately full corset cover with perfectly smooth fitting skirt and can be made from any material that is used for garments of the kind. In the illustration, white lawn is trimmed with flouncing, banding and lace edging, but slips of thin silk are greatly liked and the model is just

From Coast to Coast
Canadian Women are Interested

The advent of "Economist" garments is interesting Canadian women from Coast to Coast because it has opened to them the opportunity to dress well at a saving of from 25 to 50% on every garment required.

There is a charm to the style, make-up and finish of "Economist" garments which gives the wearer that comfortable, well dressed feeling every woman desires, and there's an individuality about them too that is very satisfying.

You Deal with the Makers in purchasing from us and get values that it would be impossible to offer you otherwise. You also buy under a liberal guarantee of absolute satisfaction or money refunded.

D157

Here are two of the values included in our catalogue —when ordering give the number

DRESSES

D157—Exceptionally handsome "Economist" dress in one piece sailor effect, made in No. 1 all wool Panama or French serge opening down the front. Square Sailor Collar with best quality inlaid satin tie and cuffs to match. All over lace yoke with satin edging and self covered button trimming down front. Colors—Canard, Wine, Tan, Grey, Rose, Cream, Myrtle, Reseda, Navy and Black. This handsome model regularly sells at $15 and upwards. When ordering be sure to state whether best Panama or serge preferred. Price - - - - - - - - $12.48

S106

S106—Charming tailored suit in all-wool Cheviot material. Coat is lined with heavy striped silk. 28 inches length with close fitting collar, long graceful lapels. Gored skirt with inverted plait on either side to knee. Colors Navy and Black. This is one of the most popular styles for the season. Special price - - - - - - $13.50

SAVE MONEY AND DRESS WELL

Our catalogue "B" shows many values that will be surprising to you—it is free for the asking.

Economist Cloak & Suit Co.
Canada's Outer Garment House
TORONTO - - - ONTARIO
We pay mail and express charges to all parts of Canada.

New Books issued and in Press

The Story of Tecumseh
BY
Norman Gurd
Companion Volume to "Story of Isaac Brock" in Canadian Heroes Series
Cloth, with illustrations in colors and in black and white . . $1.00 net
Postpaid

Prairie Born
BY
Robert J. C. Stead
Cloth . . . $1.00 net

Through Five Republics on Horseback
BY
G. Whitfield Ray, F.R.G.S.
Profusely Illustrated
Cloth, ink . . . $1.00 net
Cloth, gold . . . $1.25 net
Postpaid

Seeing Canada and the South
BY
H. P. Scott, M.A.
Cloth $1.00
Postpaid

Day Dreams of a Pioneer
BY
John Mortimer
Cloth . . . . 75c net
Postpaid

The Heir from New York
BY
R. S. Jenkins
Cloth $1.25
Postpaid

Our Western Trails in the Early Seventies
Frontier Pioneer Life in the Canadian North-West
BY
John McDougall
Cloth, with Frontispiece . $1.25 net

East and West
Essays and Sketches
BY
Adelaide P. Fitch
Cloth, with Frontispiece . $1.00 net

Songs of the Prairies
BY
Robert J. C. Stead
Limp Lambskin . $1.00 net
Limp Ooze Leather . $1.25 net

The Diary of Mrs. John Graves Simcoe
Wife of the First Lieut.-Governor of Upper Canada
With 236 illustrations, many of which are from original drawings by Mrs. Simcoe. With notes and a biography
BY
John Ross Roberston
Cloth . . . . . $3.00 net

Wm. Briggs, Publisher, 29-37 Richmond St. W., Toronto
AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers

THE FINEST PIANO
MADE IN CANADA

Gerhard Heintzman

Superior in tone quality, chastely beautiful in design and finish, and most durable in construction, the Gerhard Heintzman is the favorite in the home and in the concert hall.

It is the result of half a century of experience and study by masters of harmony —a recognized leader in the musical world.

Various exclusive designs to select from, but only one quality—the best.

GRANDS, UPRIGHTS and PLAYER PIANOS

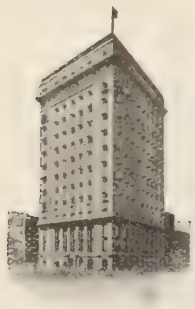
Your present instrument taken as part payment and easy terms of payment arranged.

Send for illustrated booklet to-day.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited
New Salesrooms: 41-43 Queen Street West
City Hall Square - Toronto, Can.



Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$47,000,000

Children's bank accounts can be opened in either of two ways—in the name of the child, or in the parent's name "in trust." By the latter method the parent controls the withdrawals.

In either case the child can make deposits and learn early the forms of banking and the value of economy.

Every child should have a bank account.

The Traders Bank
of Canada
INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue

as well adapted to that material as it is to lawn.

The slip consists of corset cover and skirt. The corset cover is made with front and backs and the neck can be cut on either a square or round outline. The skirt is five gored. The flounce can be joined to the lower edge or arranged over the petticoat as liked.

For a woman of medium size will be required 4¼ yards of material 36, 3¾ yards 44 inches wide, with 2¾ yards of embroidery 13 inches wide or ⅝ yard of additional material 36 or 44 inches wide for the flounce, 3¼ yards of edging and 3½ yards of beading.

The pattern, No. 7064, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40, and 42 inch bust measure.

Tucked Negligee

PRETTY negligees such as this one always are in demand. In the illustration, a dainty dotted muslin is trimmed with banding and lace frills, but the model can be utilized for all seasonable materials that are adapted to such use, the many thin silks as well as washable ones, while challis and albatross are also admirable. The sleeves are cut in one with the main portions, so that there is very little labor involved in the making. The plain peplum does away with the bulk over the hips.

The negligee is made with fronts and back and is tucked on indicated lines. It is gathered at the lower edge and finished with a perfectly plain peplum and belt.

Pattern No. 7062

For the medium size will be required 2¾ yards of material 27, 2¼ yards 36, or 1⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with 6½ yards of banding and 10 yards of ruffling.

The pattern, No. 7062, is cut in sizes for a 34, 36, 38, 40 and 42 inch bust measure.

The Uses of Lace

THERE is a collar for evening wear, comprising a band of clear lace, stiffened by means of fine wire at the back. There should be a well-defined pattern upon the lace, which must be outlined with beads to resemble jewels; and to fix the pretty trifle there will be needed a bunch of tiny roses and forget-me-nots of satin or mousseline, to be made at home, or bought ready made.

Then there is a very precious piece destined to make a broad crossover for the corsage or to edge an apron garniture, the apron being one of those made of the finest pleated cambric or marquisette.

If a summer hat that has been worn for some time already requires a fresh garnishment, could a more elegant one be secured than a big butterfly bow of iridescent gauze hemmed with silver lace? And supposing a shoulder-scarf should be required, lace may be used as a garniture in this case also.

A Cooling Drink That Satisfies

Just a small pinch of Abbey's Salt to a glass of cold water, is the most refreshing and satisfying thirst quencher this hot weather.

This makes a drink like lemonade—just pleasantly acid — sparkling and invigorating.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt 95

Abbey's Salt cools the blood —cools the brain — braces —satisfies. Try it.

Home Dressmaking

is simplified by using the celebrated

Hall-Borchert Adjustable Forms

Adjustable to every size from 32 to 44 bust measure and can be raised to suit length of skirt.

Write to-day for our New Catalog. It shows a full line of Dressmakers' Forms.

CLATWORTHY & SON, Ltd.
Display Fixture Manufacturers
161 King St. West, TORONTO

WIPE YOUR FEET

Mud, snow, dust and dirt will not be tracked over your floors if you use

Grab's Foot Scraper

outside your door. The only device made which cleans bottoms and sides of shoe in one operation. Has ten parallel plates for scraping soles and two stiff bristle brushes which clean sides of shoe. Adjustable to any size. Handsomely enameled. Looks neat. Can be rotated and swept under. Fastens to doorstep or any handy place. Get one and save useless work. Price $1.00. If your dealer will not supply you, don't take substitute, but send your order direct to us. Illustrated folder FREE.

Onward Mfg. Co., Berlin, Ont.

TELL OUR ADVERTISERS WHERE YOU SAW THEIR ADTERTISEMENT

Ask The Housewife

She will tell you that Windsor Salt does not get "lumpy"—nor "cake" in glass or silver.

In homes of refinement,

Windsor Table Salt

has long been the universal favorite for table and culinary use.

17

EMBROIDERED HAND BAGS

TRULY bewildering is the range and variety of hand bags which are shown to tempt the woman who loves pretty things. Not so long ago the average woman was well content in the possession of a handsome leather bag, which seemed to suit every costume and occasion; but, alas, in this age of extravagance one requires —absolutely requires—a hand bag to match every costume. At least the well dressed woman thinks so, and where is the woman who does not wish to appear tastefully and correctly dressed for every occasion?

No. 1394—Child's Hand Bag, 35 cents.

Many of the beautiful, fancy bags shown in the shops are too handsome and expensive for summer use, as their beauty is lost when soiled; so this difficulty has had to be met, and has been successfully solved by the appearance of embroidered linens, which are known as "The Summer Hand Bags," and are now most popular. The designs upon these are simple and the embroidery easily done, so that these dainty accessories are easily within the reach of all. Of course, these bags come already made up and the linings are left open at the bottom, so that they can be easily embroidered, the linings afterwards being slip stitched and turned back into place. Any selected initials may be stamped on these bags in addition to the designs which already appear.

No. 1386—White or Tan Linen, 50 cents.

No. 1375—Embroidered Pique Bag, 35 cents.

Many shapes and varieties of bags are now to be had, one of the newest being the "Coronation," or, as our American friends have called it, "The Sabretache," which is worn jauntily suspended from the shoulder. These bags first appeared made from heavy brocades and trimmed with gilt fringes and gimps, but such bags were too elaborate for daily use, and the linen bag, which is most practical, is made from heavy tan linen, finished with fringe and long cords to match. This bag is envelope in shape and has a dome fastener, and is lined with the same linen. The one illustrated has a design which is beautifully embroidered with Royal Floss in shades of dull rose outlined with black.

No. 1387—Linen Bag, $1.10.

Another dainty bag is No. 1391, which is stamped on natural pongee silk and mounted in a dull gilt frame finished with cord handles. This bag is embroidered in dainty shades of opalescent silk outlined with black, which brings out the design beautifully.

Another variety of bag is No. 1393, which has the balloon frame, and this bag, which is most suitable to carry with linen costumes or wash dresses, may be had in either white or tan linen and the stamped designs are simple yet effective.

No. 1387 is a very handsome tan linen bag, which is oblong in shape and handsomely mounted in a greyish silver frame. This very attractive bag is roomy, and the design pictured here has been beautifully embroidered in shades of dull heliotrope, green and black. Another useful and inexpensive bag is No. 1386, which may be had in white or tan. These linen bags have the added advantage of being easily cleaned when soiled, and thus may be kept fresh and attractive for an entire season.

No. 1391—Silk Pongee Bag, $1.25

The 1394 bag is for a child and is stamped on tan linen. It will require about three skeins of

No. 1393—White or Tan Linen, 75 cents.

Royal Floss to embroider any of the designs shown on this page, and these can be supplied at five cents per skein.

The 1375 bag is another variety which is stamped on pique and not made up. The stamping diagram shows the cutting out of this bag, which is envelope

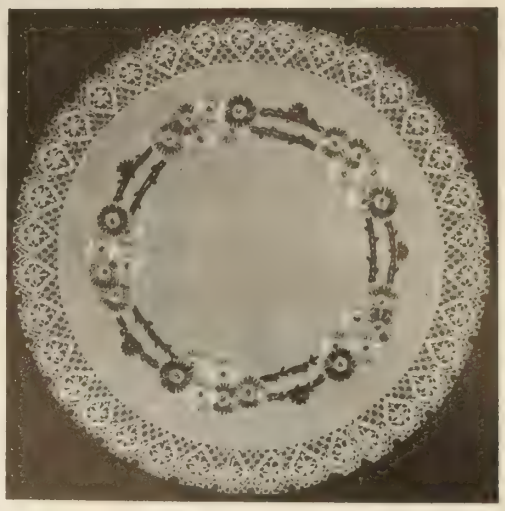
No. 1501—Sabretache Bag, 75 cents in shape and has two pockets. A piece of featherbone is slipped in at the top under the flap and stitched into place, and ribbon bows and strings complete this dainty summer bag, which is very dressy and suitable to carry with pretty muslin gowns.

If these articles cannot be supplied from your dealer write to Belding Paul & Co., Limited, Dept. L, Montreal; also for any other information you may require.

SEND AT ONCE

— 35 CENTS —



For eight skeins of ART EMBROIDERY SILK which is sufficient to embroider a 15 inch CREAM LINEN CENTRE PIECE, stamped for the fashionable Mille Fleur or Thousand Flower Embroidery which we will give you FREE and sufficient Cream Lace to edge this beautiful Centre Piece; ALSO A DIAGRAM LESSON which will enable any woman to do this embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send to-day, as this generous offer is good for a short time only.

This offer is made to convince every woman that BELDING'S ART EMBROIDERY SILKS are the best made.

Send 10c for a copy of Belding's Needle & Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for art embroidery.

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI CO'Y.
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

Simply say H.P.
to your grocer, he will hand you a bottle of the most appetising sauce in the world.

But be sure you do say H.P., because it is H.P. Sauce you want

You can easily tell it—there is a view of the British Houses of Parliament and the letters H.P. prominently displayed on every bottle of real H.P.

H. P. is used on the dining tables of the British and Canadian Houses of Parliament—that's why it is called

H.P. SAUCE

—LAWRIE & SMITH—
have for many years manufactured this fabric, which has been much appreciated, and goes on increas ngly so. The excellent quality of the material, which is practically unshrinkable, makes it most adaptable to those who make up garments for day and night wear in their own homes.

PRICES-
1/- to 3/6 per yard.
Write for Free Samples to
Lawrie & Smith, Ayr, Scotland.

Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

The Harry Webb Co. Ltd.

TORONTO, CAN.

A WRITER has told us that the years pass like summer clouds. Certainly, the seasons rush by us with their fleeting fashions with such swiftness that we are dismayed when we are told that the "new fashions" are to be displayed at the great shops. The summer girl has returned from Muskoka, Georgian Bay, or the St. Lawrence, with a liberal coat of tan on her smiling face, and is prepared to devote herself to the autumn styles and study what is most becoming in the new hats and coiffures. The housewife turns her attention to halls and bedrooms with the conviction that they need "doing over" before the winter sets in.

Now is the time for genuine bargains in rugs and wall papers. Axminster and Wilton squares are sold as low as thirty and thirty-five dollars, and in Oriental rugs Eaton's have shown most attractive and silky products in Shirvans and Kazaks for prices ranging from twenty dollars. The coloring of the Oriental rugs in softness and richness assures them a lasting place in artistic furnishing, and the woman who sets her heart on obtaining one is not likely to be disappointed in the quality of her purchase. What an infliction to a sensitive nature is an ugly carpet or a hideous wall paper! One may wear out an ugly gown or have an offending hat retrimmed. But a splashy wall paper is a daily and hourly trial, a violent-colored carpet is a continual eyesore. There never was a time when house furnishings were more attractive. Modern manufacture has brought them within purchase by the ordinary purse.

In the wall papers, the colors shown for dining-room, hall and sitting-room are brown, forest green, buff and red, with border and ceiling to match. The frieze is now almost universally used and is a needed finish in most apartments. Now, also, is the time for small touches of re-decoration. A shabby chair will look as good as new, after a liberal application of enamel, and a picture frame, which has been looking dingy for months, will present a shining appearance in a fresh coating of gilt. A few days spent in furbishing will make the old furniture and woodwork look as if they were fresh from the decorators.

The linen counters are crowded in these days, for towels, table napkins, and handsome scarfs are being sold at lower prices than will obtain later on. The elaborate tea-table covers are not popular with those who display best taste in home furnishing. Irish linen, hemstitched and embroidered in a small and dainty design, is the favorite fabric. A scarf of this nature can be bought in the early autumn sales for a dollar and a half, while towels of the best quality are sold at a correspondingly low figure. Among these may be noted the guest towel, of small size, which comes in scalloped ends at a price which makes it desirable to add a dozen to the linen chest.

DURING last spring and summer it was noticeable that the Frenchy fashion, "a touch of black," was observed in both gowns and millinery. It continues to be popular and is seen as a hair-line stripe in many of the autumn suitings. The all-black gown is going to be worn more for evening costumes than has been the fashion for some time. The black silks in duchesse, paillette, and mousseline have been selling at unusually low figures during the last month, and many of us, who consider the wardrobe incomplete without a waist or gown of black silk, have invested in a blouse or dress length. Cheap silk is never worth while, but if you will watch for a sale at a reliable shop you can often buy a gown of good quality for a comparatively small sum. The French printed foulards are still in fashion and the designs in navy and white, brown and white, and green and white are in high favor. The greatest recommendation of the foulard fabric is its light weight. No one who has realized the comfort of a foulard gown would be without this charming addition to one's stock of garments.

As for the hats, those already on exhibition show little change from the styles of the last two seasons. Crowns are higher, but the broad, sweeping lines of the wide-brimmed hat are still seen everywhere in the early autumn displays. The trimmings are the conventional styles, which come with the hint of colder days. The velvet bows are of richest coloring, and the ribbons are a triumph of artistic coloring and weaving. Autumn foliage, in gleaming satin and richest velvet, is seen on some of the most attractive headgear, and fruit makes its appearance in clusters of grapes and autumn berries, which are extremely effective.

IT looks much as though the majority of our clothes would be changeable in color next autumn. This idea is already beginning abroad, and is quite the moment's madness among the women who are expected to exploit something new each month. At the Coronation in London a great number of gowns, hats, wraps, parasols and stockings were worn that were changeable and iridiscent.

The stockings in changing colors have been worn for some weeks with summer gowns, but the parasols are new, and the shaded straw hats have a good deal of novelty about them.

There are also combinations that show more than two colors, such as raspberry, black and violet. These are deftly mingled, and present a far more harmonious service than one might think.

Felt hats, it is said, will carry out the idea, and instead of being dyed in a solid color, will be done in two or three mingled ones, and then trimmed in changeable satin or velvet ribbons. As for velvet, which promises to be again in fashion next year, we may expect to see it in every kind of changeable combinations, as its pile is so adaptable to this kind of color work.

There is no doubt that this novelty will be greeted with a good deal of enthusiasm. There may be many mistakes in choosing the unbecoming and ungraceful colors, but the amateur can be more safely relied upon to do this than she could to choose among the vivid colors, such as red, blue, green and black, that have been forced upon her for the last two years.

Mind you, these changeable tones will not be vivid; there is no splash of opposing colors such as in plaid or stripes or checks; the mingling is very well done by artistic dyers, and the fabric simply looks one color in one light and one color in another.

We have been delighted with the effect, as already seen in chiffon cloth and in gauzes. They prevailed last winter among those who dressed exceedingly well, and the effect was alluring. The gauzes lend themselves admirably to the changing lights and shadows of mingled tones, and as they were draped over solid colors the effect was not startling.

A soap bubble is always less vivid than a rainbow, and so it is that a changeable surface is far less conspicuous than a well-defined one in more than one color. We have become so used to stripes and plaids that we will probably consider soap bubble effects as most demure.

This rumor has already brought into being the use of shaded flowers, especially sweet peas. They are of satin, velvet and silk, and are used in bunches on straw hats or at the belt or bust of a corsage.

BOVRIL
FOR WORKERS

We work at high pressure, and digestion is frequently faulty.

All the valuable proteids of beef are concentrated in BOVRIL. It is therefore highly nourishing, and it is at the same time a valuable aid to digestion.

Kodak Negative—Ordinary Window Lighting

The Simple, Kodak Way

There's no more delightful side to photography than the making of home portraits. It's all very easy with a Kodak; no dark room for any part of the work, not even when you do your own developing and printing.

To make every step perfectly clear we have issued a little book—"At Home with the Kodak"—that tells in a non-technical manner just how to proceed. It is profusely illustrated with pictures, which not only show the Kodak results, but show how they were made.

Whether you are already a Kodak owner or not, we will gladly send you a copy on request, or it may be had from your dealer.

Canadian Kodak Co.
Limited
TORONTO, CAN.

HAVE YOU READ OUR GUARANTEE WHICH APPEARS ON PAGE 3

Common Sense Exterminator

KILLS ALL BUGS

Completely rids the house of them. Beats any "insect powder". Absolutely safe and certain. Use it on the beds and in the kitchen. Money back if you are not satisfied.

Remember Two Kinds { 1—For Rats and Mice. 2—For Roaches and Bed-Bugs.

At all dealers or from 20
COMMON SENSE MFG. CO.
381 Queen St. W., - Toronto.

WE have had the most trying July on record, and, during the most heated term, happy were the women who might remain indoors. For the business girl, those days were a trial, indeed, as she is expected to look fresh and cool at all times, and not to allow the most torrid heat to ruffle her temper. Some good advice, which may be passed on, runs as follows:

The girl in business should take extremely good care of her eyes. As she must perforce use them steadily all day long, it is only common sense to rest them as much as possible in the evenings and at the noon hour.

The girl who eats a hasty lunch and then spends the rest of her rest hour in reading or embroidery is in great danger of eye-strain. Eye-strain causes the eyes to become red and watery, inflames the lids, causes the lashes to fall out, and finally dims the brightness of those "windows of the soul." Also avoid reading as you go to and fro every day on the train. The very best use you can make of your eyes on the train is to close them.

Rested eyes do not have crows' feet around them, rested eyes do not lose their lustre, rested eyes do not squint, and, most important of all for the business girl, rested eyes will not give out half so soon as eyes that are never rested. Nothing can be better for tired eyes than to treat them to a boric bath at the noon hour. Have your druggist put up a small bottle of three per cent. solution of boric acid and at the same time buy a dainty little eye-cup. Persevere with this soothing treatment and your eyes will become strong, do their work well, and, at the same time, look pretty enough to satisfy the most exacting woman.

If you are subject to headaches and cannot see to do your work, the sensible and shortest course is to take a few minutes' vacation. Go away to some quiet part of your office and wrap ice-cold bandages around wrist and neck, then dip a small towel in the cold water and hold it firmly to your throbbing temples. In nine cases out of ten, if you sit perfectly relaxed and quiet, your headache will be gone in seven or eight minutes, and you will be yourself again.

The hands of the business woman are often rough, red and chapped, because of imperfect cleansing in cold, hard water, and careless drying—in fact it all spells carelessness.

Substitute a bowlful of warm, sudsy water for the cold water, add a pinch of powdered borax and make good use of a hand brush. Scrub and scour until every spot of grime has been dislodged, paying particular attention to the nails.

Empty the bowl and fill again with warm clear water and plunge in your hands, shaking them up and down until every bit of soiled lather has been rinsed off.

Now take a towel and rub until your hands are as dry as friction can make them. It takes two minutes to give your hands their bath.

Well-cared-for hands are more essential, if possible, in the office than in the home. The girl who is careless about her person is the girl who holds a second-rate position. As a matter of business policy, if nothing else, keep your hands in a spick-and-span condition. It will pay.

When the long, busy day has come to a close and you are ready to wend your weary way home, spare two or three minutes for a general primping up.

Take a deep breath and hold your hot face in a bowlful of tepid water for a second, then withdraw your head, take another breath and again hold your face well beneath the water. Repeat three or four times.

After your face is dried your skin will look as soft and fresh as heart could wish. When a dainty powder-puff has been whisked hither and thither over chin and cheeks and brows, and you have smoothed your hair and straightened your tie, you will look and feel a hundred per cent. better, and will probably enjoy every bit of your ride home.

A cup of cool, creamy milk as soon as you reach home, followed by a quick sponging of the body in cold salt water, will send you downstairs sweet and fresh for your evening fun. Nothing is so refreshing as the above treatment after a day of strenuous effort.

It makes you feel as good as new; and as to looks, why! one would think you had been spending an idle day, instead of working till head and back—and heart, perhaps—throbbed with pain.

Working in a hot, stuffy office has a peculiar effect upon the hair, which becomes dry and stringy. As fluffy, luxuriant tresses are one of the nine points of beauty, it behooves the business girl to rub the scalp with some good pomade before cuddling down for a long night's rest.

Use just the tiniest bit of pomade, as you don't want the hair to be oily.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

SUBSCRIBER—Massage with a good skin food is the best treatment for the trouble to which you refer. It is possible that the sight is defective, and you should find out if there is any eye strain. A lotion containing about a teaspoon of boracic acid is the most beneficial treatment which can be given tired eyes, and may be used every night. This may help to scatter the fine wrinkles. If you send a stamped and addressed envelope we shall forward the name of a good skin food. Avoid the habit of scowling. It is all too common in these days and gives a disagreeable expression.

E. S. G.—In answer to your rather extended list of inquiries: 1. Be careful about diet, avoiding greasy or highly-spiced food. Use a good skin food every night. 2. Avoid high collars. Use a good cold cream. Buttermilk often has an excellent effect. 3. See answer to former question. An almond cream is good for this. 4. The preparation you mention is not known to me. 5. Deep breathing is an effectual exercise, and is best taken early in the morning. 6. The ordinary calisthenic exercises with clubs or dumb bells ought to help you. 7. This cannot be answered without further details. Diet, scrupulous cleanliness, and exercise in the fresh air have much to do with it. Yes, the brush you refer to is to be commended. 8. The preparations you mention, especially the first two, are quite safe and beneficial. In all these cases you must be careful to follow the directions explicitly. 9. You should not wear such slippers, unless they are entirely in harmony with the rest of the costume. In warm weather, such footwear would be quite appropriate.

E. L. T.—The complexion food to which you refer would hardly remove the trouble which you mention. You are probably in need of a good tonic, concerning which you had better consult a physician. Daily application of skin food and brisk massage would help the other condition. For the hands, a cold cream should produce the desired result. Protect the hands when you are doing rough work and avoid, as much as possible, putting them in extremely hot or cold water. If you wear gloves at night they should be "ventilated" by having fingertips removed and a small hole cut in the palm. In treating any difficulty of this kind it must be borne in mind that constant care is necessary, if the desired results are to be obtained. Your skin is probably very sensitive and must, on that account, receive extra attention. It is quite possible to perform the ordinary domestic work without serious injury to the hands, if only care be exercised. There is no reason why the housewife should have rough or unsightly hands, and a soft, white hand, like a low, sweet voice, is "a most excellent thing in a woman."

Visitors to Toronto should visit Canada's foremost hair goods and beauty culture establishment

DORENWEND'S

Our goods have earned a distinction that has come to no others, and their high standing is conserved by basing prices on the cost of production, and not on the purchasing powers of any certain class of buyers.

You are positive of securing distinctive styles, the same superior quality of workmanship, and superb appearance that has made the name of Dorenwend famous.

Transformations, Pompadours, Coils, Switches, Curls, Puffs, Etc.—The Latest American and European Fashions.

To people who cannot call we will send on request our handsome illustrated catalogue, together with a booklet on BEAUTY SECRETS, FREE ON REQUEST to any address. Write to-day.

Hair-Dressing, Manicuring, Massage, etc. Courteous and expert service. We have the only perfectly equipped, and the most handsome parlors in Canada. Appointments Main 1551.

DR. L. PARTIN

Scalp Troubles, such as Falling Hair, Dandruff, Itching of the Scalp cured. Premature grey hair restored to its natural color, without the use of any hair dyes. Superfluous hair and all facial blemishes removed permanently, and painlessly. SATISFACTION ASSURED. Write or call for PARTICULARS. FREE CONSULTATION 10 to 5.

THE DORENWEND CO. OF TORONTO, LIMITED

(The House of Quality Hair Goods)

103-105 YONGE ST., TORONTO, CAN.

DOMINION EXPRESS Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They should be sent in payment of produce, gas, water, electric light, and other bills; Insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers, magazines, etc.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mail, we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.

On Sale in

Canadian Pacific Railway Stations

Also in numerous Drug Stores conveniently located in residential districts.

20

Travellers' Cheques Issued.
Money sent by Telegraph and Cable

"Best for Baby—best for you."

Baby's Own Soap

Made of specially purified and refined vegetables oils. It will not hurt the most delicate skin.

Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited
Mfrs.,
Montreal. D511

Borated Vaseline

A Valuable Remedy for Catarrh.

12 Vaseline Remedies in Tubes.
Camphor Ice. Mentholated.
Carbolated. Camphorated.
White Oxide of Zinc. Capsicum.
etc. Each for special purposes.
Write for Free Vaseline Book to

CHESEBROUGH MFG CO (Consd) 1880 Chabot Ave. MONTREAL

THE COAST LINE TO MACKINAC

DETROIT CLEVELAND BUFFALO NIAGARA FALLS

TOLEDO PT. HURON GODERICH ALPENA ST. IGNACE

THE LUXURY OF A LAKE TRIP

Where will you spend your summer vacation? Why not enjoy the charms of our Inland Seas, the most pleasant and economical outing in America?

Where You Can Go

Daily service is operated between Detroit and Cleveland, Detroit and Buffalo; four trips weekly between Toledo, Detroit, Mackinac Island and way ports; three trips weekly between Toledo, Cleveland and Put-in-Bay.

A Cleveland to Mackinac special steamer will be operated two trips weekly from June 15th to September 10th, stopping only at Detroit every trip and Goderich, Ont., every other trip.

Special Day Trips Between Detroit and Cleveland, During July and August

Send 2 cent stamp for Illustrated Pamphlet and Great Lakes Map.

Address: L. G. Lewis, G. P. A. Detroit, Michigan
Philip H. McMillan, President
A. A. Schantz, General Manager
Detroit & Cleveland Nav. Co.

That Splitting Headache

will vanish if you take

"NA-DRU-CO" Headache Wafers

Give quick, sure relief, and we guarantee they contain nothing harmful to the heart or nervous system. 25c. a box, at all druggists'.

NATIONAL DRUG and CHEMICAL CO. of Canada, Limited, Montreal. 26A

Don't Throw it Away "Does Your Granite Dish or Hot Water Bag Leak?"

USE MENDETS A PATENT PATCH

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.

Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

Bruce County Convention

THE people of Bruce County are famed for their thorough and successful accomplishment of anything which they undertake. Hence we are not surprised that the Women's Institute of that county is in a flourishing condition.

The account of the convention held in Wiarton on June 15th is of much interest, and we quote from it extracts which may be of much benefit to all.

The Women's Institute held their first convention for the County of Bruce, in the Town Hall, on Thursday of last week, and while there were not as many delegates present as had been expected, still the convention was a very successful one, great interest being taken. Wiarton is rather far north and the railway facilities not of the best, but as it would be just as difficult for delegates to get from North Bruce to a convention in East Bruce, we decided to set the ball rolling. We were somewhat surprised to find Lions Head, Mar and Hope Bay without representatives, and the railway could not be blamed for that, or was it the lack of it.

Mrs. McTavish, president of Bruce County, was not able to be present for the opening, but Mrs. Root, president for North Bruce, took the chair and opened the convention, Rev. J. M. Nicol offering the opening prayer.

The reports of delegates were all good, showing great interest being taken in the work by the members of the different branches and a great increase in membership. Colpoys was the youngest branch represented, they having been organized only six months, but we warn the Town Council to keep their eyes open, for there will be something happening in that town pretty soon.

The convention discussion took up some time, and it was decided to keep on and organize the county, and to hold the next convention in Chesley some time in next June.

Several papers were given, all good, but we have not space to give them. "Twentieth Century Farmer's Wife," read by Mrs. Beacock, Hepworth; "Home Discipline," by Mrs. Owens, Chesley; "Domestic Science in Rural Schools," by Mrs. Gandier, read by Mrs. Root; "Is the World Growing Better?" by Mrs. A. Baker, Allenford, read by Mrs. Farrow, Park Head.

The following officers for the county were elected: Pres., Mrs. D. McTavish, Port Elgin; 1st Vice-Pres., Mrs. Root, Wiarton; 2nd Vice-Pres., Mrs. Beacock, Hepworth; Secretary, Mrs. Arthur Watt.

Mrs. Watt was tendered a vote of thanks for her services as secretary to this convention.

At the evening session, Mrs. Root, who was in the chair, gave an address on the aims and work of the Institute. There was an excellent musical programme rendered. Then Mayor Foster, in giving an address of welcome to the delegates, said in part: "I extend to you cordial welcome, and I trust that those of you who are gathered before me will have so pleasant and profitable a time that you will again choose Wiarton as your place of convention. I suggest if you have not taken into consideration the welfare of mere man that you will begin to do so, because if you can impress upon him that you are simply the ways and means of doing his wishes then you will more likely have his co-operation. There are few men, an odd one here and there, who think themselves the head of the household, and sometimes the wives will cater to this idea. Of course she knows all the time the so-called head of the house will be herself."

Dr. Foster went on in his own witty way to show that the wife did pretty much as she liked with her own head. Our mayor is rapidly taking first place as a platform speaker, and when talking to the ladies is a "broth of a boy." The Wiarton Institute are proud of the fact that he is an honorary member.

Rev. J. Nicol gave a very pointed and forceful address on "The Influence of the Home upon the Nation." He pointed out that the great task of man was the bringing of his will into the submission of the higher will. Man comes into the world and feels that there are forces against him which make him rebel, and he wants to do the thing that he knows he ought not to do.

> Our wills are ours, we know not how,
> Our wills are ours to make them Thine.

Men must be made to obey the "Thou Shalt" of the Higher Being, and just as man's will is brought into obedience will he become a useful life. The government of the country lays down certain laws and the desires of the one must submit to the desire and will of the many for the man's good, for the country's good. Government is simply housekeeping on a large scale. Housekeeping is simply a kind of government. The king is there in state, and constitutes authority, that is the father; and the parliament is there in which there is great deliberation, for the mother represents the parliament and the members of parliament; and there is also the judge and jury, represented by the mother, and the army and navy behind the government, that is the father. Of course the troops are seldom called upon to administer discipline; they are simply figureheads. It is the mother that makes the home, the personality of the mother that lives in the home, not the father. The great problem of the home is to win the child to submit its will to obedience of the home laws, that it may find in so submitting its will that it is doing the best for itself and the best for other members of the home. You will find a little child a month old begins to assert its will against the comfort of the family. It cries when there is nothing wrong, and if you respond to that cry it will cry again, just for the response; so for the comfort of the home, training must be given. Then that child may learn that others are there and that it must yield to the comfort of the home. No boy is so well qualified to assume the duties of the nation as the boy who grows up in the home and has been trained to respect and love the authority of the home. You cannot do your boy or girl a greater injury than to allow them by coaxing or argument to obtain their own way, and set aside the will of the parent, who knows what is the best interests of the child.

Mrs. McTavish, of Port Elgin, the beloved president of Bruce County, in a very practical address on Economies in the Home, spoke of the waste of time and energy on the part of the mother, so that she was not able to have the vacation she should have. "Man works from sun to sun, but woman's work is never done," has been said again and again, yet it is largely our own fault. We should live more simply. Every mother takes pride in having her children nicely dressed, and when there is one or two it costs the mother a great deal of time. Often the dresses must be white with plenty of frills and tucks, and the mother spends half her time in washing and ironing, longer sometimes than the dress is on the child. Is the child any better? Is the mother any better? Dress the child plainly, for the comfort of the body and allow it to play in the sand, and the mother will have more time, and both the mother and child better health. Then too much time is spent on the table. The mother will spend a lot of time baking pies and cakes. I have known a child who had pie for dinner ask for another piece on going to bed, and that often the only food of the day, and the mother thinking he has eaten so little gives it to him, and then the next day if he is sick wonders what has made him so. It would have been better for the child's health and better for the mother, if she had saved the time and come out once a month to the Institute and given herself that vacation from home studies. It does the mother good to get away once in awhile for she meets others and gets an interchange of ideas, and goes home refreshed in body and mind.

NEAR LAMBTON MILLS

Photograph by Elsie Banks

There is also economy of money. Very often the mother tries to make one penny do the work of two, but it is poor economy to buy a poor piece of goods, better to buy a good piece of material, it does not cost any more for lining and trimmings, and will last much longer than the poor piece, and will often do to make over for the little ones, and anything bought because it is cheap, when it is not needed, is not economy, for it is dear at any price. She also spoke of the necessity of the mother taking time for the reading and study of good books, and overlooking the reading of her children. There are plenty of good biographies, historical works, books of travel and the study of nature. There is also good fiction, but keep away from the light trashy novels. The mother owes it to herself to read and study, so that she may teach her children what to read.

In speaking of the work of the Institute she said there has been in the past, a great misunderstanding. Many people think it is only for farmers' wives, but that is not so, it is for all women interested in the welfare of the home; others again thought it was connected with the fall fairs, but it is not. The Institute is doing an educational work, taking up the study of subjects relating to home welfare, sanitation, clothing, care of children, hygiene, diet, purity and many others. We are not suffragettes, we are quite satisfied with the vote as it is, and we would not wish to put such a weapon into the hands of thousands of ignorant, unlettered women who cannot even speak our language, and who are now pouring into our country. The woman who studies the welfare of the home influences the vote as it now is, and that is sufficient for us. Come out to the Institute meetings, the fee is only twenty-five cents a year, and it is money well spent, you will find. In closing, I thank you all for your kind attention.

The Women's Institute is deeply grateful to all who came so kindly, and heartily gave us of their best, thereby helping to make this, our first annual convention, a very successful one. Wiarton may be lacking an industry or two to make it progressive, but we have got a large number of very talented young people who can give us a programme second to none anywhere. We hope none of them will ever think of going West or anywhere else.

Concerning the Laundry

FROM the Woodville Institute we have received a paper by Mrs. R. N. Thomas on the subject of "The Laundry"—one which is of immediate interest to every household. We might say here that papers of this nature are especially welcome. The members of our Institutes are eminently practical and ask for what is of direct importance, in connection with the day's work. The quality which has been assigned a place next to godliness is of notable value, and the way to attain it in clothing is of weekly, or rather daily interest.

The one great privilege of the rich and poor alike, as well in the country as in the city, is cleanliness of clothing. Sunshine, air and water are free, and soap is cheap. Even if a garment be only half-washed, it may be quite cleansed by hanging in the air and sunshine. Cleaning is a sanitary measure, and gives better conditions for good health. Dirt in itself may not always be harmful, but at least its presence forecasts harm, and its removal may be just the necessary ounce of prevention. One of the most important sanitary measures in the home is the weekly washing. Washing has a three-fold reason—to remove dirt and open the pores of the cloth, to dry the cloth so as to renew its power of absorption, and to destroy any bacteria which may be present. A bountiful supply of water good for laundry purposes is an important factor in successful laundering. A water good for the laundry should be clean, soft, clear, and free from discoloration.

If the available supply of water is hard, the problem of us all is to find some means of removing the lime or of reducing its ill effects. A number of materials are on the market for softening water. The cheapest and best of these are alkalies, washing soda, lye, borax, and ammonia. The next we need is soap. The best advice for us all, I think, is to select a soap manufactured by a reliable firm, and give it a trial. It is not economy to use cheap and poorly made soap in the laundry. Three grades of soap should be used—a mild soap for flannels, woollens or delicate colors; a medium soap for the more durable colored goods; and a strong soap is best for much of the white goods, both cotton and linen.

Starch is also needed. There is a two-fold reason for the use of starch in laundry operations. First, the glazed surface of the starched garment keeps clean for a longer period of time; second, the increase in body of the starched garment causes it to resist moisture longer, and is considered more attractive in appearance.

Borax, cooked in starch, increases its gloss, aids in preventing the starch sticking to the iron, and gives greater body and more lasting stiffness by its use. Alum is used alone or with borax in starch to improve color and to thin the starch mixture without the use of water. When alum is with the starch paste it causes the paste to become thinner. This cooking thin with alum does not affect the strength of the starch mixture and is an advantage in those cases in which a stiff starch is desired, but the mixture is inconvenient to handle. Wax, turpentine, kerosene, lard and butter are sometimes used to give a glossier finish, and to prevent the starch from sticking to the iron. In making starch a naturally soft water is greatly to be desired, also thorough cooking.

White fabrics have naturally a creamy tint which may be deepened to an unpleasant pale yellow after careless washing, or if the clothing is insufficiently rinsed or is not properly subjected to the bleaching influence of sunlight and fresh air. The use of blueing has developed, to hide this yellow color, as blue and yellow are complimentary colors, and when used together in proper proportions give the effect of white. No one kind of blueing can be recommended. We must experiment for ourselves and choose one good variety and learn to use it properly. Sufficient blueing should be used to make a little of the liquid taken up in the hand show a pale sky blue color. Better make a small amount of strong blueing in a bowl and then use this to color the water in the tub. The ordinary washing process is sufficient to get rid of most of the dirt in clothing, but certain stains may require special treatment to insure their complete removal. It is wise always to look over clothing and remove them before washing begins, as some stains are insoluble in water and soap, and thus become permanently set during the washing. Time will only allow me to speak of several of the common stains. Tea and chocolate stains, sprinkle with borax and soak in cold water. Coffee, fruit and wine stains may be removed by pouring boiling water over them from a height so as to strike stained part with force.

While Monday has long been chosen as the household day for washing, there is less good reason for this choice than for the postponement of the process until Tuesday. As I said before, the clothing should be gone over to discover rents and stains, and should be carefully sorted and put to soak. The object of soaking clothes before washing them is to soften and separate the fibres of the cloth and to soften and loosen the dirt. Water alone accomplishes this to a great extent, but the use of soap, to which has been added borax or ammonia, makes the washing process both easier and quicker. All the clothing should not be put to soak in the same tub. If three tubs are available, soak table linen and clean towels in one, bed and body linen in a second, and soiled towels and clothes in a third. If only two tubs are available, wash table linen and clean towels without soaking. Soiled towels and cloths should always be soaked before washing. If colds have prevailed in a family, the handkerchiefs should be put to soak by themselves, separately washed and boiled ten minutes.

While washing, keep adding plenty of hot water from time to time, and as suds are used up add more. Rubbing is essential for soiled garments. This may be accomplished by wash board and tub or by washing machine. It is well to have board for bands, hems, and edges; but the machine is a great improvement on the older method if properly used. If machine is used do not put enough water in to float the clothes, as they escape the mechanical action of the dashes, and are not sufficiently rubbed. Clothes should be clean before putting on to boil, as boiling process is not to remove the dirt, but to give clothes a better color. Use plenty of water and light suds but do not overfill boiler with clothes. Bring gradually to boiling point and boil ten minutes. Each boilerful of clothes should be started with clean, cold water.

Rinsing is an important part of the washing process. The clothes should be lifted from the boiler in a pan and water drained from them. It is not always practical to have more than one rinse water, but better results are obtained where it is possible to do so. Wring from rinsing water and shake out garments. Now the clothes are ready for blueing and starching. If colored clothes are to be soaked, cover with warm water very slightly soapy. No alkali should be used, and soap should be mild. After washing, colored garments should be turned inside out and hung in a very shady place and taken in as soon as dry. Fading is more often due to careless drying than to any fault in washing. Colors set in print.

In washing woollens, strong soaps should never be used, nor should the soap be applied directly to the garment. A great deal of stress may be laid upon not having the water more than "lukewarm." Shake and brush garment free from dust and wash garment by drawing through the hands and avoid rubbing if possible. Rinse, using several waters; wring through loosely set wringer. Turn wrong side out and hang in a warm place, but not near a fire, as heat causes shrinkage.

Underwear and woollen stockings should be stretched into shape and not ironed.

The process of drying clothes should not, if avoidable, be so carried on as simply to remove moisture. Clothing should be hung where it will be freely exposed to the action of fresh air and sunshine. Have a clothes pin bag or, better still, a clothes pin apron with a deep, wide pocket, and keep the pins clean. Each article should be turned wrong side out and shaped as nearly as possible in its natural shape. Avoid hanging pieces by the corners, as it pulls them out of shape. Fasten garments by bands when possible. Table and bed linen and towels should be hung very straight, and the larger pieces pinned in at least four places, as it is nearly impossible to iron properly a badly hung piece. Careful hanging greatly reduces the labor of ironing. Starched pieces should be removed from line as soon as dry, as long hanging reduces their stiffness.

Clothes should be dampened some hours before being ironed. This is best done the night before, as this distributes the moisture. Clothes should be well dampened, but not soaked. Very often trouble in ironing is due to over-wetting. A clean whisk kept for the purpose is the best thing, and use warm water. Care should be taken to fold and roll smoothly, as this aids in ironing. The rolls of dampened pieces should be packed in a basket lined with a clean cloth and covered with a clean cloth. Table and other linen should be made very damp. If sprinkled with mixture of one part alcohol and four parts water the result will resemble that of new linen.

For ordinary ironing a good firm surface is desirable. A thin woollen blanket and a linen cover are sufficient. Keep near your wax for waxing the iron, a cloth to wipe your iron on, and a folded piece of paper for testing it. For embroideries a thick covering is better, as the fabric should sink into a soft foundation, and bring out the pattern. Iron that part of the garment which will be least mussed by further handling. Everything should be ironed dry. If garment is trimmed, iron laces and embroideries first, as these dry out quickly because of their porous nature. Leave as much of garment folded as possible to keep it moist.

For ironing tablecloths, iron partly on wrong side and complete on right side, to bring out pattern. Table napkins, handkerchiefs, and towels are ironed in the same manner. The hems of sheets must be smoothly ironed, and it is a good plan to iron only this part, when time is a consideration. Colored garments should be ironed on wrong side, with not too hot an iron. Woollens should be shaped while drying by pulling and stretching. Underwear and woollen stockings should be stretched into shape and not ironed. If flannels are to be pressed, cover with a slightly dampened piece of cheesecloth and iron with moderately hot iron; but, if properly stretched and hung, they may be folded and put away without further treatment. After ironing, each article should be hung on a frame or clothes-horse to air, before putting away.

Institute Notes

THE Department of Agriculture will have a tent on the grounds of the Canadian National Exhibition during the time of the fair, from August 28th to September 9th. A

DURABILITY

"Although I am only in the prime of life, I am satisfied my

DE LAVAL CREAM SEPARATOR

will last longer than I will."

H. TREBELL,
Cannington, Ont.

That's only one of the things you get in De Laval quality.

Send for Catalog.

Agents everywhere.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

Give me a chance to PROVE my flour

I WANT folks to know what a splendid flour Cream of the West is. I want you to buy a bag at your grocery store. Use it for a couple of bakings and see the result.

Cream of the West Flour
is guaranteed for bread

With Cream of the West you will have success or your money back. Your bread will do you credit or you don't pay one cent for the flour. Bring back what you have left in the bag and your grocer will refund your money in full.

It's an absolutely straight guarantee, madam, and all the best dealers co-operate. A strong, nutritious, light-rising flour, unbeatable for bread. That's Cream of the West. Try it.

Guarantee

WE hereby affirm and declare that Cream of the West Flour is a superior bread flour, and as such is subject to our absolute guarantee—money back if not satisfactory after a fair trial. Any dealer is hereby authorized to return price paid by customer on return of unused portion of bag if flour is not as represented.

The Campbell Milling Co. Limited, Toronto.
Archibald Campbell, President

101

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publisher

Player-Piano Individuality

The average person is under the impression that all Player-pianos are practically alike, and no matter what make they purchase the results will be the same. This is a mistaken idea, and the artistic instrument which the maker has spent many thousands of dollars in perfecting should not be confused with so-called "Players" which are offered at very low prices.

Special features in the

NEW SCALE WILLIAMS

place it in a distinctive class and make it the only Player-piano which will produce the effects the trained musician is after.

We will be pleased to give you full particulars about the New Scale Williams Player-piano, and if there is no dealer in your locality, will arrange to supply you direct from the factory.

Ask about our extended payment plan.

THE WILLIAMS PIANO COMPANY, Limited

OSHAWA ONTARIO 240

PEASE THE FURNACE

What it does Stands for simplicity in furnace construction. Distributes heat evenly from every register. Requires the least attention.

Lasts longer with a minimum of repairs.

Extracts the greatest quantity of "heat" possible from the fuel used.

Has a special contrivance which assists in consuming the gases which would otherwise escape up the chimney.

Makes practically no dust at all in the house, on account of its specially constructed cup joints.

Is the most economical both from a fuel burning standpoint and cost of upkeep.

What it costs It may cost a little more to instal than most furnaces because only the highest quality materials are used throughout its entire construction.

But it costs less for fuel because of the special construction of its combustion chamber, air blast, and radiating surface.

It costs less to operate because owing to the high quality of material used throughout it costs practically nothing for repairs and lasts longer.

What it saves Your temper, because it always works right and is "on duty" all winter through.

Labor, because there is practically no dust when you use a "PEASE."

Money, because it burns less fuel and needs almost no repairs.

Backache, because you don't have to stoop with its new shaker.

It will save you from all future heating troubles if you instal one this summer.

"ASK THE MAN WHO HAS ONE."

Write for our Books: "The Question of Heating," or "Boiler Information." Sent free on request.

PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY, LIMITED

TORONTO 35 WINNIPEG

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue

representative of the Institutes Branch will be in attendance to confer with officers and members of Farmers' and Women's Institutes regarding the work of these organizations, and especially plans for the winter series of meetings.

The exhibits of canned and preserved fruits, etc., by Women's Institutes at the above exhibition last year were very creditable indeed, and the officials of the exhibition are anxious to have the competition enlarged this year. The prize list is given below and we trust that many of the Institutes will exhibit as a society, and that the individual members will also exhibit in the general classes.

PRESERVED FRUIT.

Class XVII.—Quart Sealer of Canned Fruit of each of the following varieties:

	$	$	$
111. Blackberries	2.00	1.50	1.00
112. Cherries, black or red	2.00	1.50	1.00
113. Cherries, white or yellow	2.00	1.50	1.00
114. Gooseberries	2.00	1.50	1.00
115. Grapes, black or red	2.00	1.50	1.00
116. Peaches (white fleshed)	2.00	1.50	1.00
117. Peaches (yellow fleshed)	2.00	1.50	1.00
118. Pears	2.00	1.50	1.00
119. Plums, blue or red	2.00	1.50	1.00
120. Plums, green or white	2.00	1.50	1.00
121. Raspberries, red	2.00	1.50	1.00
122. Raspberries, black	2.00	1.50	1.00
123. Strawberries	2.00	1.50	1.00

124. Special for member of any Ontario Women's Institute taking highest aggregate in prize money in Sections 111 to 124, $4.50, $3.50, $2.50, $1.50.

Class XVIII.—Pint Jar of Jam of each of the following varieties:

	$	$	$
125. Currant, black	2.00	1.50	1.00
126. Gooseberry	2.00	1.50	1.00
127. Grape	2.00	1.50	1.00
128. Peach	2.00	1.50	1.00
129. Pear	2.00	1.50	1.00
130. Plum	2.00	1.50	1.00
131. Raspberry	2.00	1.50	1.00
132. Strawberry	2.00	1.50	1.00

Class XIX.—Half-pint Jar of Jelly of each of the following varieties. Jars or Glasses containing from 7 to 12 ozs. allowed.

	$	$	$
133. Apple	1.50	1.00	0.75
134. Crab Apple	1.50	1.00	.75
135. Currant, red	1.50	1.00	.75
136. Grape	1.50	1.00	.75
137. Quince	1.50	1.00	.75
138. Raspberry, red	1.50	1.00	.75

The size of the jars will be left to the discretion of the exhibitors. Small jars are advised.

Class XX.—Grape Juice, etc.

139. Grape Juice, unfermented, one quart bottle $3.00 $2.00 $1.00

140. Special for member of any Ontario Women's Institute taking highest aggregate in prize money in Sections 125 to 139 ..... $5.00 $4.00 $3.00 $2.00

141. Display by any Branch Women's Institute, to consist of Ontario grown fruits and vegetables, preserved, canned, dried, pickled, or put up in any other way intended to prolong keeping qualities for food; not more than 2 jars of any one kind ... $10.00 $7.00 $5.00 $3.00

Arrangements are being made for a series of lectures of special interest to Women's Institute members to be given in the lecture room of the Women's Building, at the Canadian National Exhibition. These lectures, so far as arranged for, are given below:

August 29th—Prof. A. P. Knight, Kingston, "Medical Inspection of Schools."

August 30th—Dr. J. A. Amyot, Toronto, "Purification of Water Supplies."

August 31st—Dr. Charles J. Hastings, Toronto, "Home Sanitation."

September 1st—Dr. James Roberts, Hamilton, "Prevention of Typhoid Fever."

September 2nd—Dr. G. D. Porter, Toronto, "Prevention of Tuberculosis."

September 4th—Dr. W. T. Connell, Kingston, "Rural Water Supplies."

September 5th—Dr. Chas. A. Hodgetts, Ottawa, "The Housing Question."

September 6th—Dr. C. Gordon Hewitt, Ottawa, "The Fly Question."

September 7th—Prof. H. H. Dean, Guelph Agricultural College, "How to Procure Pure Milk."

September 8th—Dr. Helen MacMurchy, Toronto, "Infant Mortality."

September 9th—Dr. W. H. Doherty, Toronto, "The Necessity for Dental Inspection of School Children."

Annual Provincial Convention

THIS convention will be held in Toronto on the 15th and 16th of November. Full announcements regarding programme will appear in a later issue. We wish to remind the Institutes that it is desirable to have every part of the province represented at this gathering. While each branch cannot hope to be represented, we trust that arrangements will be made to send persons from each riding to give reports of the proceedings to the various branches. News of delegates should be sent to the superintendent as early in October as possible.

The Clean Mouth League

MUCH has been said and written lately about the "Clean Mouth League," which aims at the purifying of the language from profanity and coarseness by co-operation. It is generally agreed that such an effort is much needed.

All right-thinking people are asked to unite in using their influence publicly and privately to this end as they go about their daily life. Those who can do more aggressive work are asked to carry the battle into schools, Sunday schools, colleges, factories, etc.; in fact, wherever it is needed.

Unity is strength, and a local branch should be formed in every town, and as honorary secretary appointed, and work and meetings organized. The society has a pledge card which can be had by applying to Mrs. Harry W. Jackson, honorary secretary "Clean Mouth League," Box 424, Kemptville, Ont.

After all, the future purity of our language depends chiefly upon the mothers. If they will instil into the little ones a horror of bad words, a fear of wrong-doing, and a reverence for God and His Holy Names, we shall have a purer atmosphere and a people of strong true character, for the words of a man help largely in moulding his character, even as his character is shown by his words.

Through the co-operation of the Women's Institute Branch of the Department of Agriculture, the Women's Institutes have been asked to use their influence in furthering the objects of this association. A sample pledge card is being sent to the officers of the Institutes. Where it is not thought well to form a separate society for this work, its objects can very well be attained by the appointment of a committee by the Women's Institute. The secretaries of these committees should report from time to time to the honorary secretary at Kemptville as to the progress of the work.

Three Programmes

RAVENNA sends the following programme:

June—Babies' field day. All the babies to be brought, all the mothers of young children to get up a paper on how to manage, clothe, feed, amuse them, etc.

July—Patriotism. Value of rest in the hot season. Salads.

August—Country homes and the advantages of country life. Guests in the country home. Saving steps.

September—What we learn by attending exhibitions. Canning fruit and tomatoes. Making pickles. Why is autumn so beautiful in nature? Compare it with the autumn of our lives.

October—General exchange of ideas on butter-making. Old fashioned paring-bees and quilting-bees. What should a child be taught before being sent to school?

November—Thanksgiving for prosperity and welfare of our Dominion. Holiday trips described by those who have taken them.

December—The dying year. Reflections on the past.

January—Report of delegates to the Provincial Convention. What is a man's duty around the home? Winter evenings in the country.

February—Is a woman's time worth anything? Home influence on the young.

March—Spring weddings. Cleanliness of the surroundings of the home. Our Institutes, the benefit we derive from meeting together.

April—Washing of fine woollens, blankets, and bedding. Best methods of preparing fish.

May—Annual meeting and election of officers. Roll call.

Question drawer at all meetings.

Agincourt sends the following, which closed in June, 1911:

July—Mrs. A. Grant, Coleman. Music, instrumental, Miss B. Grant. A talk, "Care of Children's Teeth," Dr. Spaulding, D.D.F. Music, vocal, Miss Carrie Reesor. Paper, "What Money Cannot Buy," Mrs. A. McCowan.

August—Mrs. W. W. Walton, Wexford. Music, vocal, Miss L. Watson. Demonstration, "Cool Dishes for Summer," Mrs. Blackburn. Music, instrumental, Miss M. Galbraith. "Management of Poultry," Mrs. W. Loveless.

September—Mrs. J. Fleming, L'Amaroux. Reading, Mrs. J. Paterson. "Hints on Home Dressmaking," Miss A. Hood. Recitation, Miss Jean Ormerod. Paper, "Our Advantages in Country Life," Mrs. J. Rennie.

October—Mrs. M. Elliott, Agincourt. Music, instrumental, Miss M. Morgan. Demonstration, "Waxing Autumn Leaves," Miss Watson. Music, vocal, ladies' quartette. Talk, "Bulbs and Plants," Miss A. Third. Roll call. Music, duet, Misses Brown and Green. Paper, "Value of Cheerfulness," Mrs. Quantz. Music, vocal, Miss Flo. Green. Demonstration, "Tea Biscuits," Mrs. W. A. Young. Roll call, members respond by "favorite quotations."

May—Miss A. M. Holden, Wexford. Paper, "The 20th Century Farmer's Wife," Mrs. J. White. Guitar music, Misses Holden and Galbraith. Discussion, "Simple Meals—Their Refining Influence," Miss Winnifred Richardson. Annual meeting. Election of officers.

June, 1911—Mrs. R. Paterson, Agincourt. Annual picnic.

The Merrickville programme is also well worth consideration, and it is hereby reproduced:

June—The annual picnic.

July—Roll call, "Suggestions for improving local conditions, to exterminate flies, and to improve methods of distributing milk, bread and meat." Subject for paper, "Civic Improvement," Mrs. G. W. Elliott.

August—Roll call, "Suggestions for Autumn Gardening." Subject for paper, "The Management and Care of House Plants," Mrs. A. L. Mills; (bulbs), Mrs. S. Jakes.

September—Roll call, "Storing Winter Vegetables." Subject for paper, "Desserts." Hot desserts, Mrs. Magee; cold desserts, Mrs. Bedell.

October—Roll call, "Ways and Means of Obtaining New Members." Subject for paper, "Contamination of Food by Chemicals and Preservatives," Mr. G. W. Elliott.

November—Roll call, "Suggestions for Simple Christmas Gifts." Subject for paper, "The True Spirit of Christmas Giving," Miss Jaques.

December—Roll call, "What Use to Make of Pretty Booklets." Afternoon tea.

January—Roll call, "Home Amusements for the Children." Subject for paper, "Literature for Children," Miss Mary E. Pearson.

February—Roll call, "Home Duties for Boys and Girls." Subject for paper, "Emergency Treatment," Dr. Bedell.

March—Roll call, Quotations from Tennyson. Subject for paper, "Suggestions for the Care of Poultry, and for Obtaining Winter Eggs," Mrs. C. Jakes. "The Raising of Early Chickens," Mrs. R. Telford.

April—Roll call, "How to Keep Cheerful During the Worries of Housecleaning." Subject for paper, "Storing of Winter Garments to Prevent the Ravages of Moths," Mrs. R. C. Percival.

May—Roll call, "How We are Benefited by Meeting Together." Annual meeting.

THREE STURDY WESTERNERS
Photograph by Miss J. Cook, Kelowna, B. C.

members respond with quotations from favorite author.

November—Mrs. J. Baird, Woburn. Demonstration, "Cocoa Making," Miss M. B. Thomson. Music, instrumental, Miss Mabel Hall. Recitation, Mrs. (Dr.) Sisley. Paper, "Thanksgiving for National Blessings During the Reign of Edward the Peacemaker," Mrs. W. W. Irwin. Music, instrumental, Miss Muriel Secor.

December—Agincourt. Particulars of December meeting announced later. Delegates expected.

January—Mrs. J. J. Weir, Malvern. Roll call, members respond with quotations from Longfellow. Music, instrumental, Miss Vera Weir. "Half-an-hour with Longfellow," Miss Margaret Scott. Music, violin, Mrs. J. Empringham. A talk, "The Favorite Recipes of Famous Women," Miss Edna Chester. Music, vocal, from Longfellow, Miss Mary Purdie.

February—Mrs. C. Thomson, Malvern. Music, instrumental, Miss A. Baird. Debate, subject to be selected. Leaders, Mrs. W. A. Young and Mrs. A. Muir. Music, vocal, Miss Munroe. Discussion, "Simple Appetizing Dishes for Supper," Miss Taylor.

March—Mrs. B. Vradenburg, O'Sullivan. Music, duet, Misses Nichol. "Reminiscences of West Africa," Dr. Coutts. Question drawer, conducted by Mrs. T. Weir. Music, vocal, Miss I. Thompson.

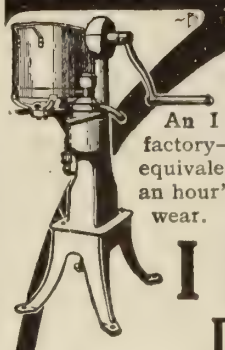
April—Mrs. W. W. Irwin, Agincourt.

Not Sure

"DO you think he is really in love with you?" asked Maud.

"I don't know," answered Mamie. "He says he is, but his letters don't sound a bit silly."

Bigger Cream Checks Sure For Years To Come



Just because a separator skims close is not sufficient reason for buying it. Equally important is the question of durability.

An I H C Cream Harvester was put to a year's test at the factory—running steadily for 10 hours every working day. This is equivalent to 20 years of ordinary use, figuring on a basis of half an hour's daily service. Yet in all this time there was no perceptible wear. What better proof of I H C durability can you ask?

I H C Cream Harvesters
Dairymaid and Bluebell

have been paying cow owners big dividends for years. Their skimming qualities are unequalled—their ease of turning—ease of cleaning—and durability are easily proved by the testimony of owners. Why not investigate?

You will find that I H C Cream Harvesters are the only separators with dust-proof gears, which are easily accessible. The frame is entirely protected from wear by phosphor bronze bushings. The I H C has large shafts, bushings, and bearings. The patented dirt-arrester removes the finest particles of dirt from the milk before the milk is separated.

I H C Cream Harvesters are made in two styles—Dairymaid, chain drive, and Bluebell, gear drive—each in four sizes. The I H C local agent will be glad to point out the above features and many others, or, write nearest branch house for catalogues.

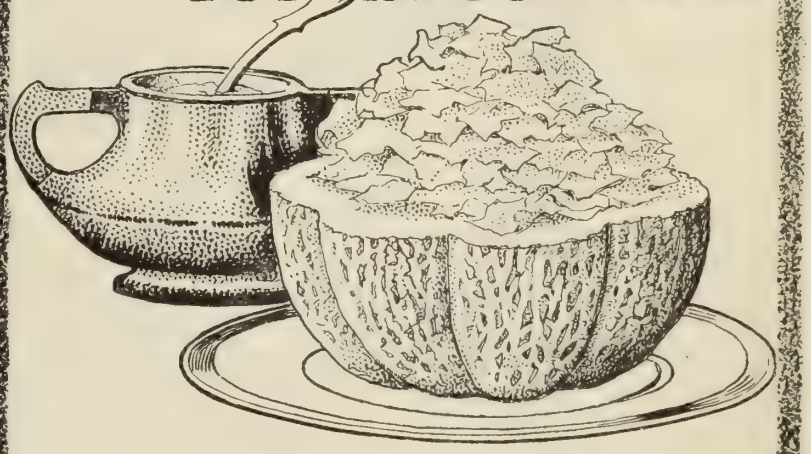
CANADIAN BRANCHES—International Harvester Company of America at Brandon, Calgary, Edmonton, Hamilton, Lethbridge, London, Montreal, North Battleford, Ottawa, Regina, Saskatoon, St. John, Weyburn, Winnipeg, Yorkton.

International Harvester Company of America
(Incorporated)
Chicago USA

I H C Service Bureau

The Bureau is a clearing house of agricultural data. It aims to learn the best ways of doing things on the farm, and then distribute the information. Your individual experience may help others. Send your problem to the I H C Service Bureau.

A real delight for breakfast



Fill a canteloupe with Kellogg's

10c. per pkg.

Cut canteloupe in half; clean out centre; fill with Corn Flakes, adding a little sugar to suit the taste.

TOASTED CORN FLAKES

Made in Canada 32

OWNERS ARE PROUD OF I H C WAGONS

There is a certain pride in owning a wagon that you know is built of the highest quality materials obtainable—a wagon that is not only attractively finished with the best paint and varnish, but which also gives perfect service, day after day, and year after year. That's why I H C owners are so proud of their wagons.

If you want to be proud of your next wagon—choose one of these two in the I H C line—

Chatham or Petrolia

The loads they carry, the roads they traverse, and their wonderful durability make others wish they had bought a Chatham or Petrolia.

Chatham Wagons have a long record for satisfactory service in Canada. Made with hard maple axles, oak bolsters, sand boards, rims, and spokes, and oak or birch hubs—they represent the highest standard of wagon construction. When you buy a Chatham wagon it is with the assurance of getting the utmost service and satisfaction out of it.

Petrolia Wagons are constructed of first quality woodstock which is thoroughly seasoned by being air-dried. The ironing is of the very best. The inspection of each part is most rigid.

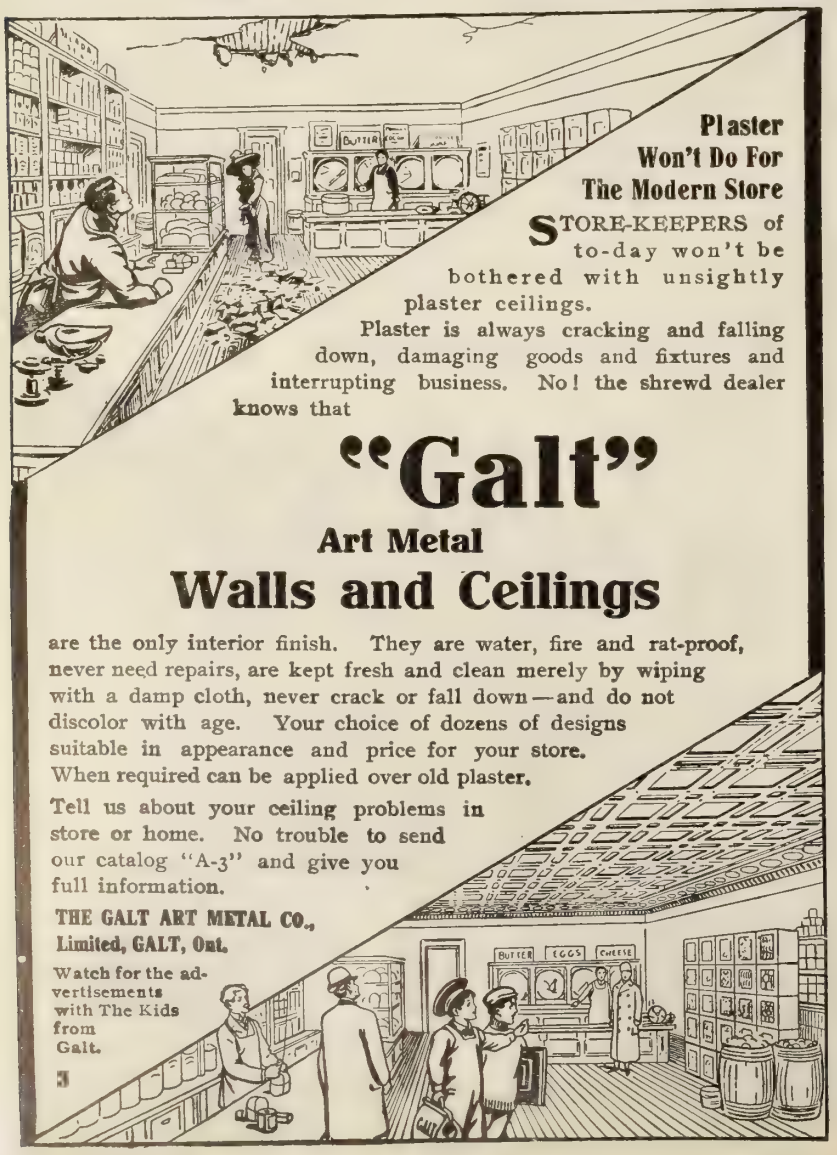
Be sure to call on the I H C local agent, get a pamphlet, and let him show you one of these wagons. If you prefer, write the International Harvester Company of America at nearest branch house for any information you want.

EASTERN CANADIAN BRANCHES:—International Harvester Company of America at Hamilton, Ont.; London, Ont.; Montreal, Que.; Ottawa, Ont.; St. John, N. B.

International Harvester Company of America
(Incorporated)
Chicago U S A

I H C Service Bureau

This Bureau is a clearing house of agricultural data. It aims to learn the best ways of doing things on the farm, and then distribute the information. Your individual experience may help others. Send your problems to the I H C Service Bureau.



Plaster Won't Do For The Modern Store

STORE-KEEPERS of to-day won't be bothered with unsightly plaster ceilings.

Plaster is always cracking and falling down, damaging goods and fixtures and interrupting business. No! the shrewd dealer knows that

"Galt"
Art Metal
Walls and Ceilings

are the only interior finish. They are water, fire and rat-proof, never need repairs, are kept fresh and clean merely by wiping with a damp cloth, never crack or fall down—and do not discolor with age. Your choice of dozens of designs suitable in appearance and price for your store. When required can be applied over old plaster.

Tell us about your ceiling problems in store or home. No trouble to send our catalog "A-3" and give you full information.

THE GALT ART METAL CO., Limited, GALT, Ont.

Watch for the advertisements with The Kids from Galt.

3

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue

THE BUCKIES' CORN ROAST

Continued from page 11

left to enjoy the panorama afforded by the "Carnival of Isles" that lay before them, while the hostesses received other guests.

A college professor with a papier-mache complexion and a taste for "specimens" rather than humans, was persuaded by Josie to attend the corn roast this year, for the first time. At first, some of the plainer folk stood in awe of him, but it's wonderful what possibilities there are in college professors. Even his wife scarcely knew him as he came out of his shell and joined in the fun with the youngsters. It was good for him and good for them. The man from the capital came with his household and gramophone. Grandmother and Grandfather Temple, who would celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding in a day or two, climbed the hill like a pair of mountain goats, at least so said Tommy Ballantyne, whose offer of assistance was refused. The dear old lady was subject to rheumatism, but, strange to say, she hadn't felt a twinge since the date of the corn roast had been fixed, and it was only by exercising a great deal of diplomacy that Tommy had induced her to sit on a chair instead of a stone. But, then she was only seventy years young. Some of the younger folk, most of whom came in the canoes and small boats, had the temerity to try to climb up the mossy embankment, only to roll down each time amid shouts of laughter, proclaiming their defeat, and only the thicket of cedars below kept them from rolling into the water.

A little after eight o'clock all the guests had arrived, but it was not till Mr. and Mrs. McAlpine came, and in answer to an inquiry, stated that Kenny had "gone down the road," that the Buckies actually gave up expecting him. In each heart there had been a secret hope that he would relent, because, somehow, he seemed a part of the corn roast and had been instrumental in getting up the first one.

The distinction of lighting the fire was conferred on Uncle Billy King, who was the oldest person present. Uncle Billy lighted the match in the most approved fashion and gallantly handed it to Grandmother Temple, who touched it to the kindling. Everybody cheered Uncle Billy for his gallantry; then the Man from the Capital touched the button, and the gramophone played the National Anthem, and the corn roast was declared "on," just as a passing steamer saluted. Dicky Smith had a set of bones, and the Man from the Elbow came with his fiddle, and there was music fit to cheer the savage breasts that possibly made merriment here hundreds of years before.

When the fire had burnt up sufficiently, luscious ears of corn, fastened on the end of long wire spits were held over the fire to roast. When browned to a "turn" they were buttered, and the older folk—there were no old folk—were served first. Many a rugged, wrinkled face bore smudgy testimony to having feasted. Although almost toothless, Uncle Billy managed to get not a little enjoyment out of a beautifully browned ear which, Josie assured him, she had roasted for him herself. The twins displayed a wonderful capacity for corn, and the professor proved an adept at roasting it. Altogether, it was a very happy group that gathered around the blazing fire that night. There were never any discordant notes at the Buckies' corn roast. Whatever animosities might exist, they were buried for that one night at least, and sometimes forever, which proved what perfect hostesses the girls were.

After much laughing and visiting, for some had not met since the last corn roast, and some were meeting for the first time, fresh fuel was put on the fires, the apples were passed around, and all seated themselves in a circle to listen to the story tellers and the music.

"Now," said Josie, to the Man from the Capital, "please make your music-machine play 'Put on Your Old Grey Bonnet,' in honor of Grandmother and Grandfather Temple, to take them back to their honeymoon, and afterwards Uncle Billy is going to tell us a story. I hope it's going to be the true story of Chimney Island, for I've designs on the pot of gold that rumor says is hidden some place on the island, and I believe you know where it is, Uncle Billy. Now, don't tell me that it isn't true."

The music began, and from the outer edge of the circle a grey clad figure stole out into the shadow so quietly as to be unnoticed, and stood under the sentinel pines that crested the eastern slope. The flames leaped up and revealed her more distinctly than she liked. She took a step forward, caught at a twig of the tree to support herself. Snap! a shuffle, and a scarcely perceptible rattling of small stones among the moss. That was all; and none of the corn roasters knew that a Buckie had rolled down the hill and was lying in a semi-conscious bundle among the cedars at the water's edge.

Frightened, she lay in a heap, vaguely conscious of dripping paddles approaching, and a suppressed but anxious voice calling to her to speak. Standing under the pines looking out across the water something told her that someone was down there watching the party on the promontory, though she could see no one. Now, she knew she had not been mistaken, and the voice thrilled her like electric needles. Her first impulse was to lie perfectly still and let him go away, but as her senses became clearer, she knew that the owner of that voice would never give up until he had found her, or any of the Buckies whom it might happen to be, even though he had to sound an alarm. That he had seen and recognized her on the bank she was sure.

"Here," she responded timidly.

"Are you hurt?"

"I don't know, that is, not much, just a little bruised," she said, trying to make light of her accident.

"That's bad enough, let us hope it won't turn out any worse. Do you think you could make your way to the elm? This is such a beast of a shore, but there is a passage along under the elm that I think I can make."

It was as he said, a beast of a shore, abounding in shoals under the water, boulders above it and weeds where one least expected them, without a shallow place or shelving rock for yards on either side of where the girl lay. Ages ago, when the world was younger, Nature must have been kinder to this miniature Gibraltar, because in the crevices were tangled roots of ancient trees, and the trunk of one splendid elm, bent with its weight of years, hung lifeless out across the water, like the wraith of an ancient bridge.

Slowly the unfortunate Buckie made her way in the darkness to the trunk of the elm. Creeping was slow work, and she had time to recover her senses. The bushes grew so thickly along the shore that she could not possibly have fallen into the water, so there was no special occasion for profuse gratitude to her rescuer, who was none other than the stubborn absentee, Kenneth McAlpine. He had declined their invitation and had cut them to all intents and purposes. Yes, she would be very formal and independent. What right had he to be prowling around looking for damsels in distress? However, she would have to accept his assistance now. She had gone too far to retreat gracefully. "I'm afraid that you'll have to come out on the trunk a little way. I'm as near the shore as I can come, but I've a match here that I'll light, so that you can see to get a start. Do you think you can do it?" As he held the lighted match up he saw how pale she was.

Plainly there was no other way; so she crept along the tree trunk until she was directly over the canoe, and managed to get both feet on one side without falling off into the water.

"How lucky for me, Don Quixote. Do you often go out like this in quest of adventure, and do you often find such awkward maidens as myself to provide them for you?" She affected a note of satire, which she only thought she felt and which was entirely foreign to her nature. But he appeared not to hear her and said quietly:

"Don't jump, you may capsize the canoe. You'll have to permit me to lift you down."

"Indeed, I'll not. I'll sit here till morning first."

"As you like, but if you choose to stay, so shall I. However, I'm afraid you will soon be missed. Don't you think you had better let me help you down?"

"Help" didn't sound nearly so bad as "lift," and in her heart she blessed him for it. It gave her a chance to compromise without humiliation. It was like Kenny. To be sure, what a gentleman he was! He was more worthy to be called a prince than any man she knew. And how perfectly horrid she had tried to be to him.

At any cost she must get back to the party before she was missed. She made a movement as if to let herself down, but he held her back.

"Easy now, little girl, I don't want to have to answer to Tommy for your life. If you should tip the canoe and drown, I'd feel obliged to drown too."

"Tommy! What do you mean, Kenneth McAlpine? No, never mind what you mean, please help me into the canoe and take me back."

Kenneth was beginning to think that he had been acting like a goose for the past few weeks and seemed to have resolved suddenly to find out how much ground there was for his suspicions.

"Not till you tell me why you turned me down for Tommy Ballantyne, and whether I'm to congratulate you or not. At least, you owe that much to an old friend. By the way, wasn't it a bit careless of Tommy to let you roll down the hill? I'm sure I shouldn't if I had been there." How provoking he was getting to be.

"It was as if the leaves of a novel had suddenly blown over, till an open page lay before her revealing the mystery of the plot." She knew now that Kenneth's pride had been hurt and that she had been the unconscious cause of it, and she sought for the simplest explanation she could make.

"Indeed, Kenneth, we were expecting company, and I really couldn't go out sailing with you, and you didn't come back in the evening as you promised. I should have gone then."

"But you went in the afternoon with Tommy after refusing to come with me."

"That's the absurd part of it. There wasn't any butter for supper, and someone had to go for it. Tommy was there and offered to paddle one of us down to the farm for it. We cast lots and it fell to me to go, and you haven't any idea how provoking that boy can be. He dawdled about among the islands half the afternoon, and when we got back Janet's muffins were ten minutes overdone. Now, are you satisfied?"

"Not quite," he said very coolly. "When I asked you to sail with me that afternoon it was with the intention of asking you to marry me. If fate hadn't bungled things so, and I had asked you, would you have turned me down for Tommy—or anyone else?" Just at this juncture the inquisitive old moon thrust its red face above the horizon, ostensibly to show the corn roasters the way home, but in reality to see what was happening at the old elm tree. But all he saw was a young man helping a rosy-cheeked maiden down into the canoe which glided off across the water, and the girl stole from among the shadows just as the final number was being played, and someone inquired what had become of Josette. However, the answer must have been satisfactory, because, when June, the month of weddings, came around again there was a wedding, at which Josie, Janet and Isobel were bridesmaids and Tommy "best man," while Kenneth and Josette were the "happy couple."

A Man for the Digging

Continued from page 12

orably, before now. Ruth," and he turned to her appealingly, "don't you know that I have loved you for years?"

What a wave of humility swept over her as she listened to his quiet words! When love touches a responsive chord it thrills to a sense of unworthiness. But it was a responsive chord he had touched, and she told him so. They walked on for some time, taking no account of their bearings, until Ruth suddenly awoke to the fact that they were at least half a mile beyond the place at which they were to meet their man.

"Oh, dear. We must go back quickly; I didn't notice where we were going."

Tom shot a glance at her flushed face.

"It isn't necessary," he said, meaningly. "I am the man you came to meet, and I've told you all about the proposition."

When she had recovered from her surprise she asked him rather shyly, "Did Harvey know it was this?"

"Yes, he knew." Then, slipping his arm through hers, he asked a little anxiously, "Open confession is good for the soul, isn't it?"

"I am sure I don't know, I never indulge," she said lightly, as if this turn in the talk was rather a relief after the tension of strong feeling which had preceded it.

"Well, I'm going to try it," he continued, "and hope for a sympathetic confessor."

"Is it murder, treason, stratagem, or spoils that is on your conscience?"

"Worse than any; it's real estate."

She was all attention now. "What do you mean?" she asked quickly.

"Harvey was your spoil sport."

"Harvey!"

And then he confessed that in correspondence with his friend he had learned of her planns, and haw when the way unexpectedly opened and he knew he could shortly follow her to Canada, he had asked Harvey to try and prevent her from making an investment, of taking any definite step until he could come and ask her to keep step with him. Harvey had managed it, although several times he had been very hard put to it to succeed.

"You can have a garden, dear, if you like; but not a market garden," he concluded.

And Ruth laughed happily, and said that although she never, never, NEVER, would forgive that hypocrite Harvey, she would be willing to drop the prefix "market" for the compensation of having a man around to do the digging!

Hospitality in Japan

IF a Jap invited you to his home, you would probably be shown into the dining-room; but, if you were to call again next morning, you would be surprised to find that that room had disappeared, and its place was occupied by perhaps the best bedroom or a general siting-room. For, as Sir Henry Norman puts it in The Real Japan, "when you wish to make a new room you simply 'form square' by sliding enough panels in their grooves to enclose the space; or, at your pleasure, all the rooms can be thrown into one."

In Japanese houses chairs and tables are quite unknown, and when you are tired you throw yourself on the floor, which is kept scrupulously clean, so that there is no danger of spoiling your white linen suit. The Japanese posture of repose is to seat oneself on one's heels, and this is very painful at first.

When you wish to retire for the night, you do not get up and go to your bedroom; you merely remain where you are, and slide the wall round the spot you have chosen for your slumbers. The most comfortable way is to have a "futon," or thick quilt, and roll yourself in a rug or blanket upon it.

On being invited to dine at the house of a Japanese gentleman, he will greet you with:

"How can you condescend to come to such a poor house as this?"

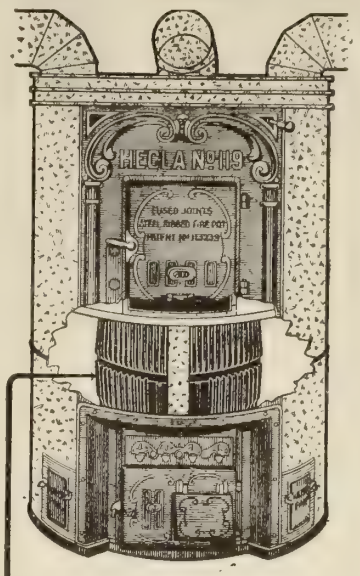
And your reply should be:

"How can you, indeed, be so kind as to receive such an unimportant person as myself under your distinguished roof?"

These speeches are punctuated with low bows, and the sound of breath sucked rapidly between the teeth, which expresses the great honor your host feels at your condescension in visiting his humble abode.

Dinner begins with a kind of soup and fish in a lacquer bowl. You drink the soup, and eat the fish with your chopsticks. According to Sir Henry, it is easy to acquire the art of eating with chopsticks. The next course consists of four or five little heaps of food on a lacquer dish—a purdee of chestnuts, a salmi of some small bird or wildfowl, a few boiled lily-roots, and a mess of stewed seaweed. Then follows sake, a kind of wine resembling dry sherry, which is always served warm. It is drunk from tiny cups, each holding a tablespoonful.

A FURNACE THAT WILL GIVE YOU AS MUCH HEAT FROM SIX TONS OF COAL, AS YOU EVER GOT FROM SEVEN, IS ONE YOU CANNOT AFFORD TO OVERLOOK.



¶ The "Hecla" will do this: It is built to save coal at every point, but the big coal-saving feature is the Steel Ribbed Fire Pot. By adding Steel Ribs to the Fire Pot the surface which radiates heat is increased three times.

Every Furnace has flanges or projections of some sort on the fire pot to get more radiating surface, because the heating capacity of the fire pot increases as you increase the radiating surface. But the "Hecla" is the only Furnace that has attained the greatest possible radiating surface and the reason is that where other Furnaces have clumsy cast-iron Flanges, the flanges on the "Hecla" are made of steel plate and fused to the fire pot casting by our patent process.

STEEL RIBBED FIRE POT
Constructed to save Fuel
Flanges of steel plate—97 in number—are fused into the Fire Pot casting, increasing the radiating surface three times. This gives the air better access to the source of heat so that the heat is conducted away from the coal as rapidly as it is created and without waste.

"Hecla" Furnace

A test extending over three years, demonstrated that this ribbed fire pot made a saving in coal—13⅜%.

Isn't that worth looking into?

Ask someone who owns a "Hecla."

You will find the "Hecla" the best warm air Furnace you ever saw. You will find that it gives an even distribution of heat—heat that is moist and free from gas or dust.

You will find the "Hecla" a Furnace easy to run. One that does not waste live coals when you shake it down. You will find a Furnace that burns wood or coal equally well.

Get this Booklet.

It gives interesting information about Healthful Heating.

149

CLARE BROS. & CO., LIMITED, - PRESTON, Ont.

PLANS Send a rough diagram of your house and we will send complete plans and estimates for heating it. FREE

MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

is unsurpassed in every way. In design, appearance and working parts, this Washing Machine has no equal at any price.

MAXWELL'S "CHAMPION" has the largest opening of any washer. Practically the whole top opens up—gives you plenty of room for working.

The tub is Red Cypress—the wood that grows in the water — that won't shrink or rot — that lasts a lifetime.

The "Champion" is the only washer that may be worked with side crank as well as with top lever.—Perfect construction, high speed, balance wheel make Maxwell's "Champion" the easiest running washer in the world.

Don't put up with a wash-tub when it is so quick and easy to do the family washing with Maxwell's "Champion".

Write for our new catalogue free.

David Maxwell & Sons,
St. Mary's, Ont.

97

2 IN 1 SHOE POLISH

Won't stain the clothing.

It gives a hard, brilliant and lasting polish.

Shines easily, just one or two rubs.

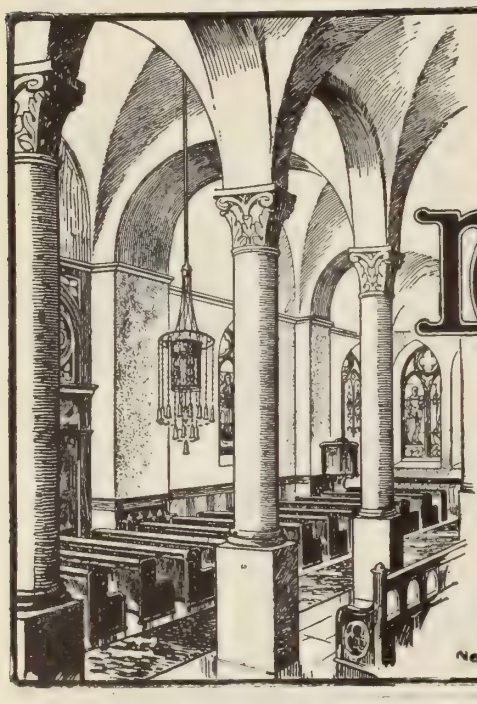
Absolutely free from acid, turpentine or other injurious ingredients.

It is good for your shoes.

N.B. To test a polish for turpentine apply a lighted match but be careful.

THE F. F. DALLEY CO., Limited, 15

HAMILTON, Ont., BUFFALO, N. Y. and LONDON, Eng.



The Best Wall Finish

Only one coat required
Easy to apply

Most beautiful, economical and sanitary wall coating made, can be applied by anyone to any kind of surface. Will not rub off or peel, Shows no spots or brush marks. Produces that subdued, velvety effect, so agreeable to the eye.

Muresco

Muresco is made in a large line of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be re-coated any number of times, and entirely removed by washing, thus rendering it a simple matter to keep walls in perfect condition.

Beware of wall finishes that cannot be removed by washing; they are neither practical or sanitary. Will even usally peel off, leaving your walls in ruined condition.

Muresco costs no more than othe finishes an goes farther. Call for sample card and see handsome combination effects.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited

Sole Manufacturers, Toronto, Canada
New York, Chicago, Carteret, Cleveland.

PURITY FLOUR

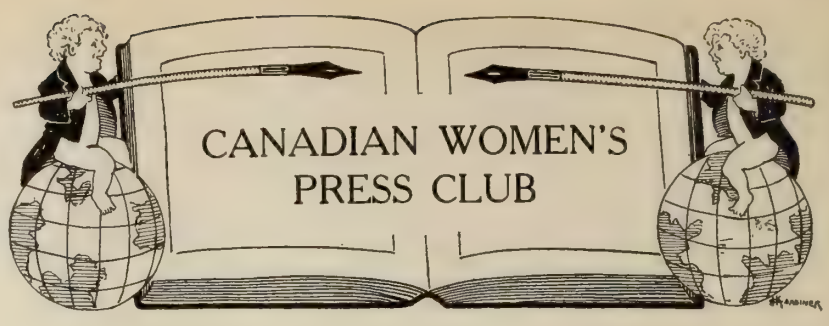
Buy it once and you will choose it every time

More bread and Better bread

Try it!

32

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue



WINNIPEG members have such a variety of journalistic activity that we continue in this issue an account of the work done by the members of that progressive and pioneer branch.

Mrs. Pearl Richmond Hamilton conducts the Women's and Boys' and Girls' departments in The Canadian Thresherman. She also writes a page every month on "The Young Woman and Her Problem," in the Western Home Monthly. Her ambition is to make a thorough study of problems concerning young women.

Miss Frances Beynon is one of the pioneer women writers of Canada to take up advertising as a profession. More than two years ago she entered the employ of The T. Eaton Company as a special fashion writer. From that she branched out into general advertising, and is now conducting the Tribune page for that Company.

Miss Nan Moulton is editor of The Western Municipal News. Has contributed articles, mostly descriptive, to Canada Monthly, Canadian Home Journal, Toronto Globe, Canadian Courier, Montreal Standard, Sports Afield, Chicago, Travel Magazine, New York, The Red Funnel, New Zealand, and Field, London.

Miss Grace Cornell holds the position of society editor of the Manitoba Free Press.

Miss Kennethe Haig says:—"I cannot explain why I entered journalism. My name is not Agnes, neither was it the call of blood, for none of my relatives were connected with the newspaper world—we have always been a most respectable family! Perhaps, like Topsy, I just growed that way. A reporter on the Winnipeg Free Press, upon the resignation of Miss Lillian Beynon, whose assistant I had been, I became editor of the Women's Department. The position is many sizes too big for me, but please remember that I have not as yet celebrated my first journalistic birthday."

MRS. R. C. OSBORNE, PRESIDENT WINNIPEG W. P. C.

Mrs. M. Louise Thomas-Long is a writer of prose and poetry, and has contributed to various magazines, including Modern Culture Magazine, New York, Truth, The Varsity, Toronto, The University Monthly, Toronto, and is a contributor to Holroyde's Magazine, Winnipeg. She has also contributed to the following newspapers, Toronto Saturday Night, Mail and Empire, Globe, and Utica Globe, Utica, N. Y. She is preparing her poems for publication in book form.

Mrs. Florence G. Bale has made a specialty of illustrating her descriptions of places with her own kodak views—several of her "Little Kodak Journeys" appeared in The Trail, as a series, covering interesting places in Canada, from Fort William to Victoria. Her illustrated sketches are popular on the other side of the boundary, where Canada is now a much discussed country.

Mrs. Helen E. Vialoux is a Manitoban, being a daughter of a pioneer of '59, in Old Fort Garry. She is a newspaper correspondent and writer of sketches of outdoor life and nature studies in Manitoba, as well as articles on poultry keeping. Mrs. Vialoux is the writer of the tale "Bridget's Chicks," now running in Bulman's Magazine.

Mrs. Byrtha Bowman Stavert, who at the present time is editor of Bulman's Magazine of Country Life, and associate editor of The Dominion, began as a newspaper reporter twelve years ago on the Minneapolis Tribune, and since that time has occupied the editorial chair of three dailies and two magazines of the United States; has been feature writer for two American syndicates. Mrs. Stavert is the author of many short stories, including the series "The Experiences of a Cub Reporter."

Miss Annie Ferguson Playfair is owner and editor of the Hartney Star. She previously owned and very successfully edited The Belmont News, and only sold it to make a larger investment in her present paper. She says of her work:—"In so far as newspaper work is concerned, I entered not in by choice nor because of preparation, but by accident; fell, as it were, out of the clouds of doubt and despair into a print shop, without one hour of business training, or one atom of knowledge concerning a printing plant, buying, stock, prices, wages or the conduct of work on a paper, and was hardly able to write a respectable local. Now, if nothing else, I am carrying a pretty fair notion of the value of a plant, the general needs of a paper, and how to buy and sell. I do my own buying, charging, book-keeping, collecting, soliciting, correspondence, writing of locals, editorials, and sometimes even attempt to help out an odd busy patron with an ad. If necessary, I can feed the press, look after the inking on paper day, and set a little type if we are rushed.

Mrs. Abbie Lyon Sharman is an American whose Canadian husband returned last fall to his native land. For ten years their home was near the University of Chicago, where Mrs. Sharman followed advanced studies in English literature and history. Two years ago she began reviewing books for the "Friday Review" of the Chicago Evening Post. This work the editor of the "Review," urged her to continue even after her home was moved to Winnipeg.

Mrs. Francis Graham has been editor of Women's Department in the Grain Growers' Guide for nearly two years, and occasionally contributes articles to various publications expounding the ethics of equity as applied to the financial status of the sexes.

Through her recommendation and support, the Women's Canada Club of Winnipeg (of which she is hon. secretary), is taking the initiative in a campaign of petitions to be finally presented "en bloc" to the Dominion Government praying that the free homestead privilege shall be extended to women. She has for years been quietly but forcefully working on a dower law (dropping a word or a letter here and there), for Manitoba women, and at last has secured the absolute pledge of a member that he will bring in and firmly support, in the Manitoba Legislature, at its next session, a bill framed upon the Ontario dower law plan.

Our President Abroad

ONE of the many pleasures which I have looked forward to when I came back to Canada was telling the Canadian Women's Press Club how kindly those of us who had work to do in London at the time of the Coronation were treated for the sake of Canada and the C. W. P. C. There were eight members of the Canadian Women's Press Club staying in London during the month of June. Mrs. Fitz Gibbon, for several years honorary president, was writing a series of articles for several Canadian papers, including the Vancouver Province, the Manitoba Free Press, and the News of Toronto. Mrs. Simpson Hayes, first corresponding secretary and an honorary member, besides doing some journalistic work, had been engaged by the Canadian Pacific Railway to give information as to the West of Canada to intending settlers. Miss Agnes Deans Cameron, who seems inclined to stay in London for some years at least, was lecturing, writing magazine articles, and getting two or three books under way. Mrs. J. S. Hughes, of Winnipeg, spent part of the month of June at the Lyceum Club, and returned again in July, after a visit to Scotland. Miss MacLeod Moore, a member of the C. W. P. C., whose permanent residence is in London, is the London correspondent of the Toronto Saturday Night, has been for years connected with the Montreal Star, and is a contributor to The Canadian Gazette and Canada. Miss MacLeod Moore is the honorary secretary of the United Empire Circle of the Lyceum Club. Miss Birchall has been in London for eighteen months. Her letters to the Toronto Star are regular features of both the daily and weekly editions. I made the seventh member of the club at work in London last June. Mrs. Everard Cotes spent the winter and spring in London, and sailed for Canada a few days before the Coronation. It was a pleasure for the members of the club to meet each other during Coronation time, either by chance or appointment, in the rooms of the Society of Women Journalists, at the Lyceum Club, at the many entertainments given for the people from overseas; or at the Naval Review on the Saturday following the Coronation, and, greatest of all, in the south triforium of Westminster Abbey, where three members of the C. W. P. C. were allotted seats to view the Coronation. Mrs. Bedford Fenwick was invited to the Abbey in her official capacity as president of the Society of Women Journalists. Her seat was also in the south triforium.

I am quite unable in a word or two to give any idea of how wonderful and beautiful these weeks in London were. London's hospitality was truly imperial. But the Coronation itself outshone everything else. For one person who saw it I can say quite frankly that it was a far greater event than the beautiful sight I had expected to see. It was something to remember all the rest of one's life. The meaning of the Coronation was greater than its beauty, and its beauty was very wonderful.

The Society of Women Journalists gave a Coronation dinner on the evening of the twentieth of June, two days before the Coronation. Five members of the C. W. P. C. were present at the dinner, Mrs. Simpson Hayes, Miss Agnes Deans Cameron, Miss MacLeod Moore, Miss Birchall, and the president. Mrs. Fitz Gibbon, who, as one of the council of the S. of W. J., had been assigned a seat at the guest table, was unable to attend. The dinner was held in the banqueting hall of the Criterion restaurant, and between three and four hundred people were present. Mr. Israel Zangwill proposed the health of the society and coupled with the toast the name of Mrs. Baillie-Reynolds, for the Society of Women Journalists, and my name for the Canadian Women's Press Club. I felt greatly honored in being given an opportunity to reply for the club, and, as I told them of a membership that counted representatives in places as widely separated as Halifax and Victoria, I was proud to belong to Canada and the club. Mrs. Baillie-Reynolds made the end of her speech a very pretty welcome to the representatives from Canada; and the way that one after another of our own Press Club members managed to catch the eye of the next speaker and wish her luck with a nod and a smile was a backing worth having when one had to follow such celebrities as Sir Mortimer Durand, Mr. Zangwill, and Mrs. Katherine Cecil Thurston. Even if I had the heart to do such a thing as inflict my speech on you the speech was not written out and so I could not repeat it if I would. But, after all, it was only necessary to say "thank you" as sincerely as one could.

The Naval Review was very wonderful. But, perhaps, nothing was more wonderful than Coronation London itself. I shall never forget the look of the people on Piccadilly the afternoon and evening of the day before Coronation, nor the look of the street itself, with its swinging yellow globes and green wreaths. Joyous expectancy could not reach a higher point.

After my work was finished I went over to Paris for a week, then had a final week in London, and then came home as happy as only a Canadian can be to see Canada again.

With best wishes for every member of the club we love the best,

Faithfully yours,

M. MacMurchy.

MRS. MARGARET MANSON, AUTHOR OF "OVERLAND TO CARIBOO IN 1862."

Vancouver Branch

THE Vancouver Branch of the Canadian Women's Press Club now numbers fifteen members, with a prospect of two or three more being added in the near future. Meetings are held every third Tuesday of each month, the married ladies of the club being the hostesses. These meetings are purely informal and social, and, while it is not always possible for every member to attend every meeting, yet it is an established fact that every member tries not to miss a meeting, because they are always enjoyable.

Mrs. Alice Ashworth Townley, the president of the club, is keenly interested in the woman suffrage movement, and is president of the Political Equality League, in Vancouver, through which the work is being done in that city. At the author of "The Opinions of Mary," Mrs. Townley has won an enviable reputation for herself, and those who enjoyed Mary (and who has not) may look forward to reading another book from Mrs. Townley's pen in the near future, as she is at present preparing the manuscript for it.

Mrs. McNaughton Manson is resting on the laurels of her book, "Overland to Cariboo in 1862." She is, however, contributing occasional articles about her beloved Cariboo country.

Mrs. Blanche Holt Murison, one of the best loved poets of the West, wrote a Coronation song, which was used at the public Coronation services in Vancouver. It has been copied all over the Dominion, and brought its author much praise. Mrs. Murison is now completing the manuscript for two volumes of poems, one entirely Canadian in tone, the other miscellaneous.

A GLADSOME MESSAGE FOR EVERY WOMAN

We mean all women who pride themselves on looking well, or who want to look better, that have some slight, but distressing and disfiguring blemish or skin trouble the removal of which will make life more bearable. We know there are thousands afflicted thus because we have successfully treated tens of thousands during the past twenty years. For Pimples, Blackheads, Blotches Eczema, Psoriasis, Rashes Tetter, Moth Patches, Freckles Discolorations, Red Nose, Etc.

We have reliable home treatments that have been tried, tested and found satisfactory in so many other cases that we can recommend them for yours. We invite enquiry. No expense. For the permanent and satisfactory removal of

SUPERFLUOUS HAIR

there is no home treatment. Our method of treatment by antiseptic Electrolysis is safe, sure and wholly reliable. Our personal assurance and reputation as Canada's premier complexion specialists is behind our work. This treatment also eradicates Moles, Warts, Red Veins, Etc.

Catalogue "H" and sample of greaseless toilet cream mailed on request.

Hiscott Institute
Hiscott Building
61 College St. - Toronto

A Pure Healthy Food

Brigger's Orange Marmalade

Contains all the rich food properties of nutritious Seville oranges, combined with best quality granulated sugar. You cannot eat a more appetizing and delicious preserve.

Your grocer sells it in the vase shaped jar or in five pound gold lined pails.

Put Brigger's on your next order.

G13

Prompt Service
and Sensible Styles in Our Fashion Department
PATTERNS 12 CENTS EACH

The Original and Best Scotch Wincey. In range of beautiful colourings, stripes or in white. Ideal for LADIES' BLOUSES, CHILDRENS' DRESSES BABIES' FROCKS, and all underwear—Gents.' Shirts, Pyjamas, etc. Washes perfectly, and is UNSHRINKABLE. From 8½d. per yard to 4/6. Patterns Post Free.

FOR BABY.

Copy of UNSOLICITED testimonial.

"St. Jude's Vicarage, South Shields, 31 Oct., 1910. Mrs. De la Hey will be obliged if Messrs. Spence will send 12 yards of enclosed Wincey, for which cheque is enclosed. Mrs. de la Hey has NEVER used ANY OTHER Wincey which gave the PERFECT satisfaction of Messrs. JAS. SPENCE & CO.'S MAKE."

JAS. SPENCE & CO., GLASGOW, N.B

"There are Sweaters and Sweaters"
That is to say—there are Jaeger Pure Wool Sweaters and all other kinds

Fine quality, good workmanship and the pure unmixed wool of Jaeger Sweaters make them what Sweaters should be, comfortable, durable and safe after violent exercise or in chilly weather.

TRADE MARK

DR. JAEGER SANITARY WOOLLEN SYSTEM CO. LIMITED
316 St. Catherine Street - Montreal
231 Yonge Street - - Toronto
Steele Block, Portage Ave., Winnipeg

MUSKOKA

The Gateway to MUSKOKA LAKES is MUSKOKA WHARF

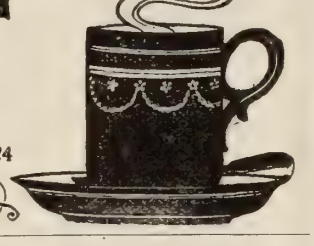
Reached only by the Grand Trunk Railway System. Trains making direct connection with Steamers leave Toronto 2.15 a.m. daily (Sleeper open 9.30 p.m.) and 12.20 p.m. daily except Sunday.
Full particulars from agents or address
A. E. DUFF, D.P.A., Toronto

The best Coffee costs but little more than the poor grades. You get the best that money can buy at moderate price when you use

Seal Brand Coffee



Packed in 1 and 2 pound cans only. 124

BENGER'S

One of the most valuable foods known to the Medical Profession.—"The Lancet" describes it as "Mr. Benger's admirable preparation."

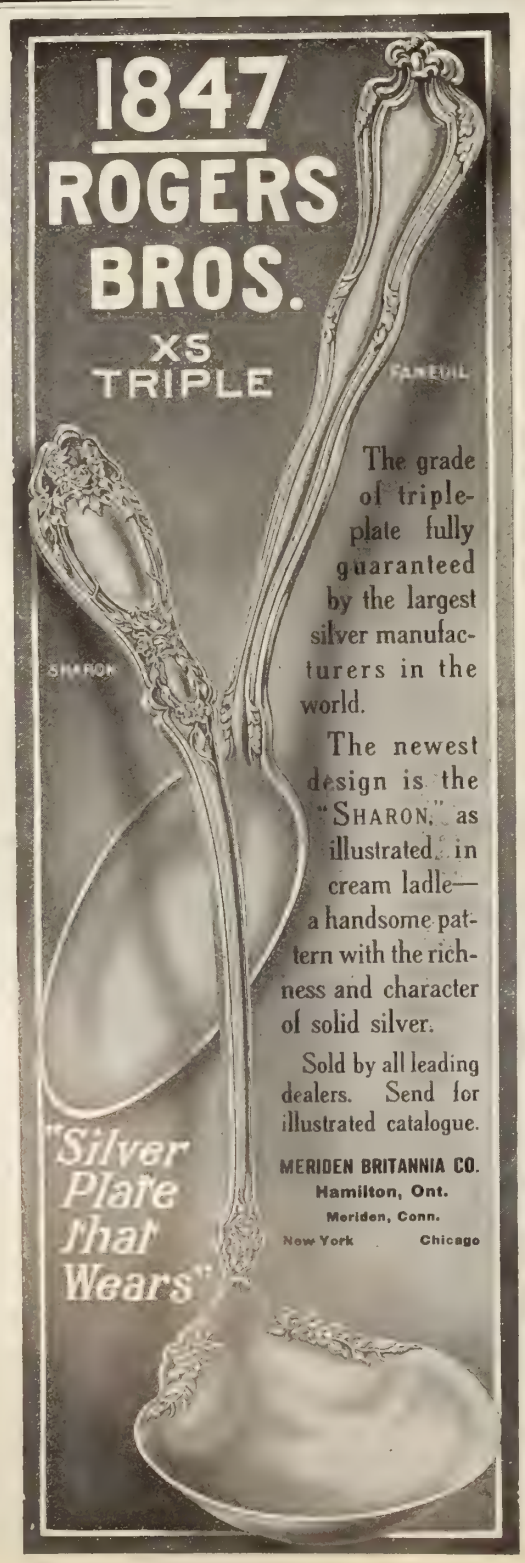
Benger's Food is distinguished from the others by the ease with which it can be digested and absorbed.

BENGER'S FOOD IS FOR INFANTS AND INVALIDS, and all whose digestive powers have become weakened through illness or advancing age.

Mothers and interested persons are requested to write for Booklet, "Benger's Food and How to Use It." This contains a "Concise Guide to the Rearing of Infants" and practical information on the care of Invalids, Convalescents and the Aged. Post free on application to Benger's Food Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, Eng.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere.

B24



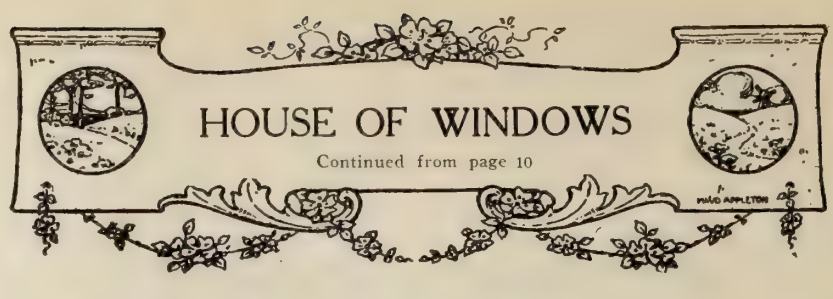
The grade of triple-plate fully guaranteed by the largest silver manufacturers in the world.

The newest design is the "SHARON," as illustrated, in cream ladle—a handsome pattern with the richness and character of solid silver.

Sold by all leading dealers. Send for illustrated catalogue.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
Hamilton, Ont.
Meriden, Conn.
New York Chicago

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue



HOUSE OF WINDOWS

Continued from page 10

egg into a bowl with an emphatic hand. "Ada, was there (where's the egg-beater?)—was there any mail to-day?"

"Any bills, you mean? Yes, there is one. It felt rather big. I put it away so that Celia might not see it until she has had her supper. It's on the mantel behind the clock."

Christine bent over her egg, beating vigorously. Lucky for her, now, that the blind girl was not near enough to sense the furious rush of color which crimsoned even her slim white neck. He had written! She did not need to look at the envelope to know.

"Can't you find it? asked Ada, innocently.

"In a moment!" Never was egg so well beaten before! What should she tell Ada? If she said that the letter was not for Celia but for her, the secret would be out. Celia would never rest until she knew who the mysterious correspondent might be. And Christine did not want to tell, she could not tell—yet. If she said nothing, Ada would conclude that it was for Celia and after supper would speak to her about it. She might say it was only a circular and pretend to burn it. That would be lying and Christine naturally hated a lie. Slowly she reached for the letter behind the o'clock. Perhaps it really was a circular! It felt like it. She was afraid, almost, to look at the other side! She turned it at last with a sudden fli—

Miss Christine Brown.

Yes, it was for her. A big, strong, handwriting—a writing she had never seen before and which she knew instantly.

"If it is Jones' bill, perhaps you had better open it," suggested Ada.

"It isn't Jones' bill. It's a circular!"

She had told the lie without flinching! Her face grew hot. What would he think of her if he knew she could tell a lie like that? She crushed the letter into her pocket.

The blind girl sighed with relief. "That's good," she said. "I was afraid it might worry Celia. We ought to keep all worry from her just now if we can."

"Yes, we ought." Already the lie seemed more than justified. Christine mixed the flour with her egg with the sense of a crisis past. Perhaps lies were like other things—relatives. Doctors often tell lies to patients—for their good. So it could not be altogether wrong and there were times—

"Ada," she said suddenly, "What would happen if everybody always told the truth?"

"Why, I don't know. The Millennium, probably."

"Would it? Think now?"

"Well," smiling, "I'm not so sure either. Truth is unpleasant sometimes. Perhaps we are not meant to tell all of it. But I suppose there is a difference between not telling the truth and telling what isn't the truth."

"Oh, how profound! But if it were for a person's good?"

"One would have to decide that for oneself. I remember once when you were delirious with measles you thought you saw a white cat sitting on the chair. Celia had to declare that she saw it, too, and I had to feel it and nurse it in my lap—for your good!" She laughed, reminiscently.

Christine's letter did not seem such a weight in her pocket now and the pancakes were ready for the pan. Ada's quick ear had already caught Celia's step on the stairs. Quietly she slipped the knitting into the table drawer. Christine watched the concealment with a laugh.

"Pancakes!" said Celia cheerily, as she opened the door. "And butter! It smells nice—if we only can forget how much butter is a pound. Christine, don't you think the bacon dripping—"

"This is a celebration!" said Christine hastily. "Something nice has happened. We'll tell you after you've had supper."

"If it's nice, why not tell me now."

"Ask me no more. Like Grape-nuts, there's a reason!" Christine's voice was light but her quick eyes had not missed the weariness in Celia's face.

Celia indeed, in spite of her forced cheeriness, was more than ordinarily exhausted. She did not know why; she told herself fiercely that there was no reason for it, but at heart she knew that every day was bringing her nearer to the last of her strength. She fought well, but fighting is a privilege of the strong: still she was not beaten yet. She tried hard to eat the tempting cakes, to drink her tea and to take an interest in Christine's chatter.

"I shan't tell you the surprise at all if you don't eat," declared Christine.

Celia murmured something about having had a big lunch,

"What did you have?" questioned Christine, severely.

Celia was understood to say that she couldn't remember. "But really," she declared, "I am not hungry. Ada, was there any mail

"Nothing but a circular, dear. Christine burned it."

(Christine was certainly very much flushed—probably it was cooking pancakes).

"A circular? What was it, Christine?"

"Oh, what?" with a nervous start. "The circular?— I don't know—er—pianos, I think."

"Pianos? How strange to send piano circulars to Brook Street. You ought not to bend so near the fire, dear. Your face is crimson."

"Christine has a cold," said Ada. "Perhaps she is feverish."

Tired as she was, Celia immediately rose and felt the girl's forehead with an anxious hand.

"She has a little fever, I think," she answered in a worried voice. "Did you get your feet—"

"No. Really, Celia, it isn't fever. It is the heat from the stove. That and feeling worried about what I have to tell you. Are you sure you can't eat any more? Well then, it is just this—that I've got work. I am going to begin to-morrow."

For a moment there was silence. Celia's face settled into hard lines. She did not look at Christine.

"Where?" she asked, briefly, coldly.

Christine was frightened. She glanced at Ada appealingly and the blind girl felt the look.

"Celia," she said gently, "Perhaps Christine is right. It is only for a time. Things will be better soon. And she will take no harm. You have done it all so long, dear, surely you can let us help you now?"

Celia, usually as wax in Ada's hands, did not seem to hear her.

"Where are you going?" she asked Christine again.

"With you," said the girl. "I've got a place at the Stores."

Celia drew a sharp breath. Then she laughed, a laugh such as they had never dreamed could come from Celia, bitter, hard. She looked at Christine, a glance which swept her from head to foot. "A shop-girl!" she said, "You!"

Christine pusher her plate aside, "Why not?" she asked quietly.

"I forbid it. That's all. If you must work, wait until you find something else. You have youth, health, beauty and courage. That is what the Stores want. They'll take it all, day by day, week by week, year by year, they'll take it all! "First your youth, then your health, then your beauty—or no, they take your courage first, I think, so that you have none when you want to break away. They fill you so full of the fear of life that you daren't let go. Don't I know it! And then when these are gone they take what's left and—" she looked around in a frightened way— "I don't know just what they do with what's left," she said in a half whisper.

"Celia," said Christine, "you are not well. You are not yourself!"

"Yes, I am quite myself. I see very clearly. You have heard me speak of Alma Stone? She worked beside me for years. She was young and pretty—not half as pretty as you. She stood it a long time—and then she broke away.

She had still some good looks, and a little courage left. She said she was going to make a bid for freedom! Today I heard what happened to her."

"What was it ?" asked the girl interestedly.

Celia laughed again. "You—you don't even know !" she said, "and you won't if I can help it. Now listen, Christine, you must give up this idea. It is true that I do not see any prospect of your going back to school just at once, but that is a different matter. You must promise me—"

"But, Celia dear, I have tried so many different things, uselessly—"

"I know, but there must be something. If you enter the Stores now, it will break my heart. All these years that I have worked there, seeing my youth and strength going from me I have kept my heart warm with the thought that it would save you from a like fate. The reason is stronger than you know. Don't let me feel now that it has all been in vain, and that the Stores have got you too. It isn't necessary. I have not given out yet."

Christine rose and stood beside her, smoothing her still soft and plentiful hair with gentle hands.

"Celia" she said. "I promise. If it isn't necessary I will not go. But if it is necessary you must promise not to feel like that. You're looking at it wrongly. Indeed you are. You have done for me more than a mother could do. You have been mother and sister too. I will obey you. But if your health demands a rest and I can help no other way, you must let me help in the only way I can. Is it a bargain?"

Celia, relieved of the fear and despair with which Christine's proposal had plunged her, smiled happily. She felt stronger. She was sure that she could get along until something else was found. And the love and reverence in the girl's eyes made her glow with happiness. "It is a bargain," she said and kissed her.

Later, Tommy came in. He had a new poem for Celia, a new book for Christine and some late flowers for Ada. "Like those by the east wall in the garden," he told her unblushingly. The room brightened wonderfully under the influence of his kindly chatter.

But suddenly in the midst of a laugh Celia caught her hand to her side, gasped and fainted !

The doctor, hurried in by an excited Tommy, found her still unconscious and very white upon the bed.

"A bad break-down," he said after a quick examination. "She must not move for weeks. Complete quiet. Nourishing food, absolute rest of the body and mind."

"We can give her rest of body," said Christine, "but what about her mind ? She is sure to worry because she does not want me to work and now I must."

The doctor looked at her, standing there straight and young with her love-face and fearless eyes. "I don't wonwer!" he said involuntarily. "But—well, do the best you can. And for awhile, at least, you will have no trouble. She is too weak to worry. She may not ask a single question." He glanced at Tommy curiously. "Your sisters?" he asked courteously.

"No" said Tommy shortly.

"Well, don't worry. I think she will pull through."

Relieved of his worst anxiety, Tommy's eyes wandered from the bed to where Ada stood listening. The doctor caught their expression, and smiled understandingly.

"Same old triangle," he mused drawing on his gloves. As he turned to go he looked very closely at Christine and, on sudden impulse, drew Tommy aside.

"You are not really going to let that child go into a store, are you?" he asked curiously. "Why, she has a face —whew! it will be a risk!"

"What can one do ?" asked Tommy, miserably.

"That's so. But—I'll tell you—I need someone in my office just now. Clerical work, appointments, etc. How would that do, eh ?"

Tommy looked at the man keenly. He had a handsome face but it was set with the unmistakable seal of fast living. Something in the eyes seemed greedy, repulsive. The look he cast at Christine brought the blood ito Tommy's face.

"I don't think it would do at all," he said, shortly.

The doctor laughed. The greedy light in his eyes faded out. He was cold again, professional.

"No? Well, probably you are right," he agreed, and bowing, took his leave.

Tommy came slowly back into the inner room. Celia lay in a semi-stupor with Ada crying quietly beside her. But Christine stood erect, her hand resting upon the foot of the bed.

"Well, that is over!" she said. "Tomorrow I go to work !"

CHAPTER XIII.

THE theory of coincidence to which we refer so many of the curious happenings of life will explain perhaps the fact that one week after Christime entered the Stores the semi-annual ribbon sale began. It was Christine's first experience of a sale's true inwardness, and the marvels which she noted were not dissimilar to those same marvels observed by Celia in the same place sixteen years before. Save for the complete change of personnel and a few minor differences the scenes might well have been counterparts of each other. In the ribbons themselves the main distinguishing feature seemed to be that whereas plaids had been the fashion then it was now stripes which were most in evidence .The fashion in hairdressing had also changed, and the young ladies behind the counters, who, in Celia's day, had been content with neatly coiled or braided tresses, were now resplendent in towering structures which held the eye with the fascination of the wonderful. It was all simple enough to one who understood the mysteries of rats and buns and turbans and puffs and curls, but to the uninitiated the result was little short of miraculous, for even supposing that nature in lavish mood had supplied such hair—how did they get it to stick on? The costuming also had changed, for now, instead of a medley of colors, the clerks were uniformly dressed in black; black of all degrees of blackness, in all stages of newness and oldness, and of all kinds of materials and grades of quality, but still, as far as the color scheme was concerned, blackness everywhere. The uses of this funereal rule were just now becoming apparent to Christine, who was watching one of her fellow clerks.

"Yes, madam," the girl was saying. "This is a true yellow." She tossed the end of a ribbon over her black sleeve. "This other is more on the tuscan shade. The difference," throwing the end of the second ribbon beside the first, "is quite discernible against the black."

"I wish to goodness that customer would go and let Miss Blake get a chance to straighten up," whispered one of the other clerks to Christine, "but you'll see, she'll stay till the bell rings. Miss Blake has been ten minutes behind the rest of us all the week. That's what it means to have obliging manners! That woman doesn't intend to buy anything anyway."

"So many don't," said Christine. "I wonder why?"

"One of three reasons," said the other, "they don't know what they want, or they don't really want it, or they want it and can't get it—are you tired, Miss Brown?"

"No," said Christine, but as she straightened up an involuntary sigh betrayed the effort.

"Oh, no! of course not!" gibed the other with sympathetic irony.

"It's my back," explained Christine, "I never knew I had a back before, and now its difficult to know anything else. To-day has been the worst yet."

The girl nodded. "Sales are fierce," she admitted. "Did you ever see anything like that scramble for the sash ribbons at 9 o'clock. One woman had on a chiffon scarf which must have cost six dollars anyway. In the scrimmage it was torn to pieces—but she got the twenty-cent ribbon she wanted! And they say we must be polite to them! At noon to-day three women had hold of the same piece. They fought for it like dogs for a bone. Polite? You might as well try to be polite to a lot of—"

"Oh, be careful," said Christine, "somebody might hear."

The other girl, who was a brunette of a coarse but handsome type, tossed her overladen head. "Don't care if they do," she declared. "I'm going to get out of here next week."

Christine sighed.

"If you'll take my advice you'll get out of it too. You've got a weak back. Every new girl's back is sore at first, but it wears off. Yours is getting worse. You won't stand this for a year. Better get out before your health goes. And, besides, you're—too pretty!"

(To be continued)

May be the dough had forgotten to rise.
Or had risen quickly overnight and fallen again—
To rise nevermore.
Twas weak flour, of course.
Meaning weak in gluten.
But FIVE ROSES is strong, unusually strong.
With that glutinous strength which compels it to rise to your surprised delight.
Stays risen too.
Being coherent, elastic.
And the dough feels springy under your hand.
Squeaks and cracks as you work it.
Feel the feel of a FIVE ROSES dough.
Note the wonderful smooth texture—soft—velvety.
Great is the bread born of such dough—
Your dough!
Try this good flour.

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers

JOURNAL'S JUNIORS

Continued from page 16

sloped gradually down to the lake, their images pictured in the calm water with the natural tints and shapes, so that the eye could scarcely discern which was forest and which reflection, but for their reversed positions. The camp was pitched in a clearing on the shore, and a view of the lake in all its magnificance could be obtained from it.

One afternoon was spent in preparation and that night all "retired," fatigued from the day's exertions.

Fishing, hunting, canoeing, and sightseeing were our pastimes throughout vacation, and weary campers went to their beds of cedar boughs after enjoying a delightful evening around the roaring camp-fire, feeling that the finest and most restful place in the world was this very spot near Lake Nipigon.

Of all enjoyments, I liked canoeing best. The swift, gliding motion and the enjoyable feeling of a ride over the placid lake seemed unequalled by any other enjoyment.

But every enjoyment passes and the happy care-free days went by with nothing to mar their bliss.

Soon, however, school and business called, and the jolly campers went back to grim Mr. Toil and the "madding crowd."

But I have never forgotten the dear, old camp, and I still long to see its familiar attractions and scenery again.

Wishing "The Journal" success I will close.

Your new cousin,

CHARLES BOOTH.

This is the sole work of Charles.

K. B. Booth.

My dear Charles:

You are a very welcome new cousin, and I am sure all the Journal's Juniors will be interested in your holiday experience. I sympathize with your liking for canoeing. It is the most delightful way of enjoying our beautiful lakes. Have you read Pauline Johnson's "The Song My Paddle Sings"? My first experience of a canoe was on Shadow River, near Rosseau, and I shall never forget the beauty of that stream at sunset.

How do you like the following story? I wrote it one evening, during a flight of imagination. It starts off the old way, "Once upon a time," and ends up, "And lived happily ever after."

THE MAGIC BOX.

Once upon a time a famous family set out for their summer home. This family consisted of a girl, aged twelve years, named Dorothy, but called Dot for short; a boy fourteen years old, named Samuel, or Sam for short; and Mr. and Mrs. Neil. They lived in a village which we can call Roseland.

When they arrived at their destination they found a message saying their bank had failed. This left Mr. Neil almost a poor man.

After they had been at their cottage about a week Dot and Sam were walking down the beach, when, to their surprise, they found a cave.

"Oh" cried Dot, "how I should like to explore that cave! What fun it would be."

"All right," agreed Sam, "we will."

So off they started, eager to see what this wonderful cave might contain.

They walked on for a while, when suddenly it branched off into another passage.

Now at this time a story had gone around that in some cave a box of vast treasures had been hidden by a pirate who was very rich, but hid his treasures in all sorts of places.

This man had been drowned at sea, and never returned to gather his treasure.

So, as the children walked on, Sam noticed a key lying on the floor of the cave.

"What is that, Dot?" asked he.

"Oh, oh! a key, how exciting," replied Dot. "There must be a door to fit it some place; let's try to find it."

She gazed all around, and presently saw a crack representing a door. It was about two feet square, and had a keyhole in it.

"There is a door," cried the girl. "See, there, almost at your elbow."

Sam looked, and sure enough, there was a door.

Send for this Great Catalogue

Your Address on a Post Card will bring it.

TO-DAY

We Pay Delivery Charges to any Destination in Canada

In the New FALL AND WINTER CATALOGUE of

THE SIMPSON STORE

you'll find that on everything from a packet of pins to a load of furniture, we pay all delivery charges to your nearest Railway Station, no matter where you live in Canada.

The time is past when you must worry out just what an article will cost when you receive it and have paid delivery charges. NOW, when you send an order to Simpson's, you know that the price we quote is exactly what the article will cost you laid down at your nearest Station or Post Office with all delivery charges paid.

If for any reason you find the goods we send you unsatisfactory, return them within seven days after you receive them, in good condition, and we will exchange or refund money, and pay all freight, express or mail charges both ways.

We will not issue a Christmas Catalogue this year. You will find all Christmas Goods included in this one.

TORONTO

A feature of this Catalogue is its forty-four pages of delivery-paid furniture. Just write on a post card: "Send me Fall and Winter Catalogue No. 33.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue

"I'm going to fit this key to it," cried Dot. "Yes, it fits, too. How fine!"

She turned it in the lock, and slowly the little door swung back, displaying a casket which had a card on the middle of it engraved in big black letters.

> If you want > a wish be granted > tap three times
> upon the metal.

Dot and Sam took the box out and read the card.

"Oh," said Dot, "if this isn't grand. Now papa will be rich again."

Sam looked around and said, "Let's go home, I'm hungry. I wish I were there now."

"I'm awfully tired," acknowledged Dot. "Oh, I'm going to wish we were both home, and father out of trouble."

So saying, she tapped three times upon the box, and the next minute they both rushed in the door of the cottage.

Soon after their father came home that night, a messenger suddenly arrived, saying Mr. Neil was to start immediately for Cobalt, as a rich vein of silver had been struck on one of his claims.

So, through the magic wish they became rich and lived happily ever after.

Hoping to see this in the Juniors' Page, and wishing the Circle every success, I remain, MARION A. REYNOLDS (age 12).

(Certified).

An Unfortunate Vacancy

ELIZABETH, just six, had been going to kindergarten, and enjoyed very much the little motion-songs taught there. She was very enthusiastic at learning all the words, but one day she realized that, try as she might, she could not make her voice harmonize with those of the other children. Thoroughly disheartened, she ran home to her mother and with a sigh said:

"Oh, mama, I don't know what I shall do. I'm so full of words, but so empty of tune!"

An Ambitious Boy

DEAR young brothers and sisters: There was once a boy who lived in a small town. His father was not poor, neither was he very rich, but he was anxious to give his son every advantage that would help to make him a useful, happy man. Among other things, he wanted Dick—that was the boy's name—to go to college. So, from the time that Dick was twelve, he heard his father and mother discussing to which college they would send their son. He listened to them while they planned about the money part of it, and felt happy and proud when he heard them say to each other, "Our boy will carry off all the honors of his class and become a famous man."

Then one day Dick woke up in just one second. "Why shouldn't I be doing something, and helping father and mother when they are doing so much for me?" he said to himself. All day he turned this idea over and over in his mind. When evening came and his father returned from business he had a plan ready.

"Father," he said at dinner that night, "mayn't I have some chickens? I'll take care of them myself and see that they don't wander out over our grounds or the neighbors'."

"Why do you want chickens, Dick?" his father asked kindly.

"Because I want to make some money, father, and I can do it by selling eggs and broilers."

"And why do you want money?" his father inquired. "Isn't your allowance enough for everything that you need?"

"Oh, yes, sir, but I want to begin to save money to put me through college. I don't suppose I can make very much, but what I do make will help a little."

His father gazed thoughtfully at him a moment over his glasses, then announced decidedly:

"Good for you, Dick. You shall have some chickens just as soon as we can fix up a place for them."

Well, not long afterward Dick got his chickens and because it was vacation time he was able to give his scheme all his attention. The result was that by the end of the summer he had made a neat little sum which went into the bank with his father's money.—New Idea.

MADE IN BERLIN

THE "ONWARD" AUTOMATIC VACUUM CLEANER

Even the most cheerful housewife wearies at times of the labor and drudge of sweep-sweep-sweep, with the dirt flying all around, and then the monotonous round of dusting to follow.

Save your wife—mother—sister or friend this heavy work and dull routine—brighten the house-keeping game.

The "ONWARD" Automatic is a real Automatic Cleaner at a price that brings it within the reach of every overworked housewife.

The One Hand-Power Cleaner that blows as well as sucks.

It sucks all the dust and grit out of carpets, rugs, upholstered furniture, curtains, mattresses and clothes. Cleans fabrics through and through, inside and out, and holds all the dust in the tank.

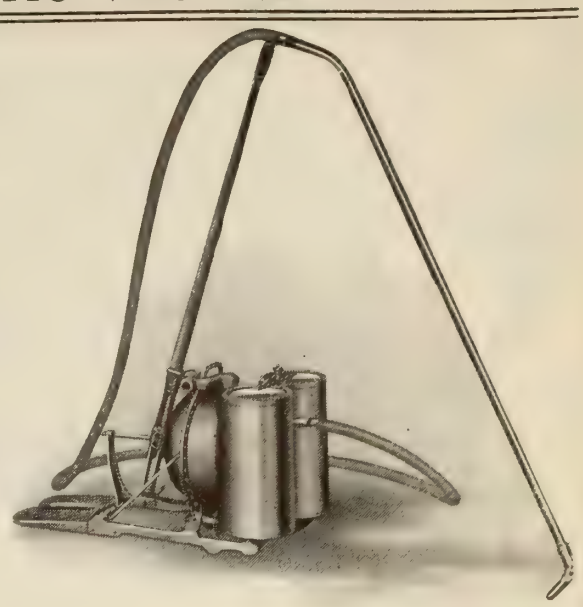
Easiest to empty, because our exclusive double tank device for separating the dust from the air catches 95 per cent. of the dust in the bottom of the tank, without screens or water. Only 5 per cent. is screened, and that on the outside of one canvas-covered cylinder. Other makes of Vacuum Cleaners have only one tank and screen 100 per cent. of the dust in complicated screens, bags, etc.



May be operated by one or two persons
Fully guaranteed or money refunded
Freight prepaid to your nearest railroad station

Price $25.00

Send for our Circular.—It's free.

ONWARD MANUFACTURING COMPANY

BERLIN, - - ONTARIO

Largest Builders of Hand and Electric Power Vacuum Cleaners in Canada

Our Pattern Business continues to grow, proving that we have what our readers want and that we supply their needs in this branch satisfactorily. They receive prompt service, and could help greatly by showing the JOURNAL to friends and placing orders together. All patterns 12 cents each.

TRINITY COLLEGE SCHOOL
Port Hope, Ont.

Residential School for Boys. Healthy Situation, Fireproof Buildings, Extensive playgrounds, large gymnasium, skating rinks, etc.

Boys prepared for the Universities, Royal Military College and business. Special attention given to younger boys.

Next term beging Sept. 13. New boys must report Sept. 12th.

For Calendar and all information apply to the Headmaster,

REV. OSWALD RIGBY, M.A. (Cambridge), LL.D.
Port Hope - - - - Ontario

IF YOU CARRY A

"SWAN"

FOUNT-PEN

you are always ready to "jot it down." The "Swan" has no intricate or delicate parts—consequently it never gets out of order, and is always ready to write without adjusting or coaxing. Good for a lifetime. Sold by Stationers. $2.50 upwards.

CATALOGUE FREE

MABIE, TODD & CO.
124 York St., Toronto
London, New York, Chicago

"Pocket Money" Talks No. 3—

Hundreds of thousands of people are sending new or renewal magazine subscriptions during these next few months, and many thousands of dollars are to be earned by ladies who will get these subscriptions from their friends and neighbors and send them to us. Write for our rates—you'll be surprised how large they are.

"Pocket Money" Department
Canadian Home Journal

A Waterpan worth while

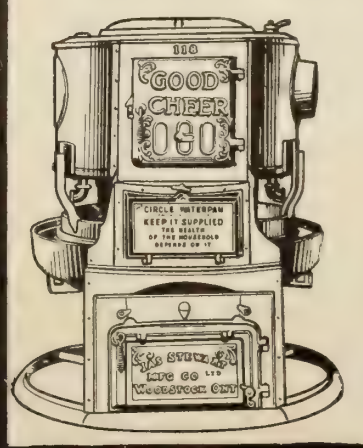
The object of the Furnace Waterpan is to give back to the warmed air the natural moisture that the fire has dried out. But in the average Furnace the Waterpan is made insignificant and insufficient and placed in the least effective position. But the

"Good Cheer" Furnace

Has A Big Circle Waterpan

entirely encircling the fire-pot. This waterpan holds 4 to 6 gallons, and is placed where it will evaporate the water rapidly. It keeps the humidity of the air up to the normal 60% or 70% while the air from the average furnace often contains less than 25% of moisture.

Besides the vast improvement this makes in comfort and healthfulness, the house feels as warm at 65° as it does at 70° when the air is parching and dry. The consequent saving of coal is a big item.



"Good Cheer" Furnace construction throughout is of the same high standard of excellence as the Circle Waterpan.

It's well worth your while to write for Booklet and full information about the advantages of the "Good Cheer" Furnace. 9

The James Stewart Mfg. Co., Limited
Woodstock, Ont. — Winnipeg, Man.

INGERSOLL CREAM CHEESE

SPREADS LIKE BUTTER

You can buy twice the quantity of Ingersoll Cream Cheese in blocks for the same money as you would receive in jar cheese, besides there is just as much difference in the quality in favor of Ingersoll Cream Cheese as there is in the price.

Never Becomes Hard. Every Particle Can Be Consumed.

Sold only in 15c and 25c blocks

For Sale By All Grocers

MANUFACTURED BY

INGERSOLL PACKING CO. Limited

INGERSOLL, ONTARIO

CANADA

NOTICE THE NAME

CLARK'S

On all your purchases of Prepared Meats and so protect the health of your family and guests.

You must often feel the need of something tasty for Lunch, Dinner or Supper, but do not feel like undertaking the task of cooking.

THEN IT IS THAT CLARK'S GREAT VARIETY OF PREPARED FOOD DELICACIES OFFERS A WAY OUT, and enables you to provide a repast at once, appetizing and nourishing, either hot or cold, for the Individual. for THE TWO, or the Family and guests.

ISN'T THE TIME, WORRY AND ENERGY SAVED WORTH CONSIDERING?

Just glance back at Clark's list in last month's issue, and GET THE HABIT OF KEEPING SOME IN RESERVE.

W. CLARK, MONTREAL

MANUFACTURER OF THE FAMOUS "CHATEAU" BRAND CONCENTRATED SOUPS

Summer Strength and Summer Satisfaction come from foods that are easily digested—foods that supply the greatest amount of nutriment without taxing the liver or heating the body. Cut out the flesh foods and indigestible pastries for awhile and eat the whole wheat food that is ready-cooked, and ready-to-serve. All the meat of the golden wheat prepared in its most digestible form. Give the cook a "day off," close up the hot kitchen and serve Shredded Wheat Biscuit with berries or other fresh fruits. It means health and strength, with freedom from work or worry. Place two Shredded Wheat Biscuits in a dish, cover them with berries or other fresh fruits, then pour over them milk, adding a little cream and sugar to suit the taste. Nothing so wholesome or satisfying in the Summer or nothing so easy to prepare.

SHREDDED WHEAT

TRISCUIT is the Shredded Wheat wafer, made of the whole wheat, steam-cooked, shredded, baked and pressed into a wafer. A crisp, tasty Summer snack for the camp or the long tramp, for the bungalow in the mountains, for picnics or excursions on land or on sea. Eaten with butter, salt, cheese, caviar or marmalades.

Made by F66

Canadian Shredded Wheat Co. Ltd., Niagara Falls, Ont.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue

Homemade Enamel

"WHILE visiting some English friends," said a Newark woman, "I learned how to make an admirable enamel paint, which, to all intents and purposes, is equal to the regulation product one buys. It is applied as a finishing coat to the paint, and leaves the surface not only hard but with that gloss which is so much to be desired.

"How is it made? Well, my friends told me it was an English formula which they had used for years, and I have tried it since my return, and had great success. Take a wineglassful of spirits of turpentine and drop into it a piece of caustic soda the size of a marble. When this is thoroughly dissolved, stir the mixture into a two-pound tin of white zinc paint. Stir this for some minutes, until it is well incorporated. Now the mixture is enamel, and is ready for use."

Color in Decoration

HOW many of us understand the great truth that color is a language, each tone of which expresses a definite feeling different from every other tone? asks Frank Alvah Parsons in Arts and Decorative. We know this is so of sound; we do not question the definite appeal to the sense of taste made by vinegar, salt, pepper or sugar, and still we fail to comprehend the force and meaning of color tones. This is partly because we do not think about it and partly because painters have monopolized color into an emotional trust. There are more people making homes than there are painting pictures, and nowhere is a knowledge of color more useful than to the home maker.

Volumes have been written about color, principally by those who have some taste or color feeling. Generally these things are merely statements of individual opinion based upon personal feeling, therefore have no general value, no two people feeling alike. Let all understand the elementary facts of color significance and then use some common sense in application of the same to home decoration.

Most people know that we see color because of the light, and that the less light there is the less color we see. Yellow is nearest like light, therefore the most powerful color in producing light effects. Use it, then, in rooms that seem too dark and in those that have no direct sun rays. Where this color dominates there will be cheer, brightness and hopefulness. To the melancholy, the pessimistic. the despondent this color is a life tonic.

Another factor one always has to reckon with is intensity, or brilliancy, in color. Probably this is the least understood, therefore the most badly treated of the color qualities. A full, intense note of color is the strongest, loudest possible expression of that idea. A full red tone says red to the human intelligence as powerfully as red can be said. A soft, neutralized tone of the same red is very much less powerful and less exacting and exciting in its appeal. The walls, ceiling and floor of a room are the shell, or background, upon which furniture, pictures, bric-a-brac and people are to be seen and appreciated. What human being has sufficient vitality to stand against a full-intensity red or blue wall paper? What picture, chair or rare vase can hope to get a passing glance when exploited against such vicious, loud, protesting backgrounds as we often see upon the walls. Nothing short of a color which has lost half of its full strength by neutralization is fit to color the walls of any room. In fact, nothing is more helpful than this general law: "Backgrounds should always be grayer or softer than objects which are to be shown upon them."

About Fruit Jars

HERE is a wax said to be excellent for sealing cans and jars: One ounce of gum shellac, one ounce of beeswax, and eighteen ounces of resin. This cools instantly. You can dip pieces of strong domestic into the fluid and press them down over the tops of jars, by putting your hands in cold water and then handling the waxed cloth quickly before it cools.

An old-time housekeeper says that for strawberries and blackberries (especially strawberries), common stone jars, carefully sealed, are much better than cans or glass, as fruits retain their color and flavor much better in them. She gives the following plan for putting up such fruits: Place the cans or jars in hot water and keep them there until filled with fruit that has been allowed merely to come to a scald in syrup made to your taste, remove instantly and seal. If bubbles arise when pressing down the cover, drop on a few more drops of wax and press down until there are none. In a very few minutes the wax will be perfectly hard, and you can set away your jars.

Many cooks object to putting any sugar in their canned fruits, but others claim that it improves the fruit, preventing the leathery look and feel that some fruits have when canned without. Bottles are properly sealed if, after being tightly corked, the necks are dipped in the hot sealing wax, as it cools and hardens instantly.

If sugar is used, the syrup must be boiling hot when the fruit is put in, and must be brought to a boil before canning. After putting into the can or jar all the fruit it will hold, pour the syrup, boiling hot, into the jar, overflowing, so as to fill every air space between the fruit.

It pays to get new rubbers, and the metal tops must fit each particular jar, or the fruit will spoil.

Bits of Advice

A good bait for a rat trap is a paste made of cornmeal and eggs.

If new boots don't polish quickly, rub over with a piece of lemon.

Cucumber and almond cosmetics both cleanse and whiten the skin.

The interior of every refrigerator should frequently be scalded with soda water.

When silver is not in constant use a piece of camphor will keep it from tarnishing.

If meat used for soup is cut into small pieces more nutriment will be obtained.

To peel tomatoes without scalding, rub them backward with the blunt edge of a knife.

To polish aluminum make a mixture of borax, ammonia and water. Apply with a soft cloth.

Frequent dusting saves sweeping. A room that is dusted often and thoroughly will not require such constant sweeping as one that is dusted carelessly and seldom.

On buying a new pair of gloves, turn back the wrists and write name and address on the inside with ink.

Never put meat directly on the ice but always on a plate, as direct contact with the ice will destroy its flavor.

A piece of court plaster on the end of the forefinger of the left hand will protect it from needle pricks when sewing.

The stains on a tablecloth, napkins or a frock should be soaked in sour milk as soon as possible and washed out in soap suds.

Libby's 100 Foods

One of them is
HAWAIIAN PINEAPPLE

New ideas for tempting salads and desserts in the new edition of our booklet, "Libby's Luscious Fruits." Write for it. It's free. Address Canadian Kitchens, Libby, McNeill & Libby of Canada, Ltd., Dept. CJ-1, Chatham, Ontario

To be certain of fine flavor in each of these foods . . . ask your grocer for Libby's

Packed in Canada

Catchup	Sweet Mixed Pickles
Mustard	Sweet Gherkins
Pork and Beans	Sweet Relish
Apple Butter	Sweet Mustard Pickles
Sauer Kraut	Sweet Midget Pickles
Sauer Kraut Juice	Sour Gherkins
Queen Olives	Sour Chow Chow
Stuffed Olives	Dill Pickles
White Onions	Homemade Style Pickles
Mince Meat

Other Libby Foods

Corned Beef	Mexican Tamales	Peaches	Maraschino Cherries
Vienna Sausage	Chili Con Carne	Pears	Prunes
Corned Beef Hash	Chop Suey	Apricots	Dried Prunes
Roast Beef	Meat with Spread	Plums	Asparagus
Lunch Tongue	Ragout (Beef Stew)	Sliced Pineapple	Spinach
Ox Tongue	Potted Meat	Crushed Pineapple	Sweet Potatoes
Veal Loaf	Deviled Meat	Fruits for Salad	Pumpkin
Sliced Dried Beef	Potted Ham	Muscat Grapes	Tomatoes
Beef Steak and Onions	Deviled Ham	Berries	Ripe Olives
Frankfurter Sausage	Bouillon Cubes	Royal Anne Cherries	Red Alaska Salmon

(Partial List)

LIBBY McNEILL & LIBBY ~ CHICAGO

prices of [illegible] you FREE. Write TO-DAY for a copy—don't put it off and forget. A post-card request will bring it. Write NOW!

COMPANY
LIMITED.
QUEBEC - CANADA

If you are one of those who are looking for an efficient dentifrice without a "druggy" taste, try—and assure yourself that its delicious flavor does not Lessen its Efficiency. Ask your dentist, or notice for yourself the difference in your teeth after a month or two of its twice-a-day use.

TO DENTISTS

You will please your patients and induce them to take care of their teeth—and your work—if you recommend the regular use of Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream.

As a neutralizer of excessive acidity of the mouth, and as an efficient cleanser, it has the endorsement of eminent dentists and of expert chemists.

Every day letters are received from well-known dentists in praise of the benefits which Ribbon Dental Cream confers on their patients.

READ WHAT THESE DENTISTS SAY:

"It is positively the first cream I have found that will polish gold crowns and bridge work in the mouth."

"I heartily endorse your Ribbon Dental Cream. It has a tendency to stimulate gum tissue."

"It leaves a cool, delicious taste in the mouth."

"I know of no more cleanly, efficient, convenient and dainty dentifrice to keep the teeth clean and the breath pure."

Names will be given on application.

Educators all over the country have found this pleasant-tasting dentifrice their greatest aid in teaching their scholars the importance of "Good Teeth—Good Health."

Colgate's Ribbon Dental Cream cleans, preserves and polishes perfectly and antiseptically, leaving the mouth in that sweet, clean, non-acid condition which counteracts germ growth.

A trial tube of this delicious, efficient cream sent for four cents in stamps.

Address Colgate & Co., Dept. H.J., Coristine Building, Montreal

Makers of the famous Cashmere Bouquet Toilet Soap

W. G. M. Shepherd, Montreal, Sole Agent for Canada

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

OCTOBER 1911

HOUSE FURNISHING NUMBER

PRICE 10 CENTS

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

Made in Canada

QUALITY--ECONOMY

For the reason that the highest grade materials are used in the manufacture of Magic Baking Powder, it costs the dealer a few cents more per dozen than the ordinary kinds in which alum is used to cheapen the cost of production. Because of this some dealers attempt to substitute some other brand when Magic Baking Powder is asked for, claiming it to be "just as good." You pay no more for Magic Baking Powder than for the ordinary adulterated kinds. The one pound tin at 25 cents is the most economical size to buy.

MAGIC BAKING POWDER

Contains no Alum and conforms to the high standard of Gillett's Goods.

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

EDITORIAL CHAT

HOME-FURNISHING to-day implies an almost bewildering variety of details. Only the woman who has studied the matter with system and discrimination can select from modern materials what is best suited to home needs. Primitive housekeeping in the cave or the garden may have been the genuine simple life; but, after all, the cave-dwellers missed a great deal. There may be anxiety about the task of modern selection, but the true woman is never happier than when she is choosing the new furniture or deciding on the wall decorations. The present issue of this Journal takes up the various departments of home-furnishing and discusses for the housewife's benefit the modern equipment for comfort and convenience. The contribution by Miss Ridout, "The Making of Oriental Rugs," is an interesting article on a subject which is yearly becoming more attractive. Mr. Paul Fitzpatrick, who has contributed to several of our home-furnishing numbers, has written two articles which should be of value to our many readers. "The Girl's Room" is a criticism of the average feminine apartment and contains several suggestions which will be useful to our girl friends. Mr. Fitzpatrick contributes also "A Treatise on Wall Paper," which takes up the history of this important feature of home-furnishing, with a sketch of its modern development, and illustrations which show some of the latest designs. Electricity is being used so extensively in the housekeeping of to-day, that it is almost indispensable in the various domestic operations. Ironing, sewing and cooking are all being done by means of electricity, and the article, "Electrified Housekeeping," deals with several of the latest inventions. "A Touch of Paint," by Mr. Mihell, is a comprehensive and "informing" article on the use of paint in connection with house decoration.

CULINARY TOPICS are of eternal interest to the feminine reader, and we are assured by our Journal circle that we are meeting their wishes and needs in the space which we devote to these matters. For instance, the series of luncheons which we have published from month to month, prepared by an excellent authority on all matters relating to the cuisine, has been appreciated in a most encouraging fashion. The department of "Household Exchange," which is an occasional rather than a regular feature, is one to which we would call your attention. We are anxious to have contributions from any of you who are in possession of special items of domestic information, which would be of use to the general reader. Recipes are not required, but short articles of two or three hundred words of particular information. Names and addresses must be included with the items, as these will be published by way of guarantee. Payment will be made for such items. We expect, during the winter months, to have several articles dealing with dishes of especially seasonable nature. The matter of diet is receiving more attention at this time than has been paid to it by preceding generations—perhaps because this is an age of noise and nerves. We hope to publish several articles on this subject, which will be of real value, from the technical standpoint, as well as interesting from the popular.

OUR FICTION is becoming more pleasing than ever, if we may judge from what our correspondents tell us. Mrs. MacKay's serial story, "The House of Windows," grows in interest with each number, and we are sure that you will follow the beautiful heroine's fortunes and misfortunes with increasing eagerness. You will be interested to know that this popular writer has won high favor with an English publisher, and that a book of hers will be published next year by a well-known firm. The serial, "The Cost of a Crime," which begins in this issue, is a story of absorbing interest, which describes the fall of a hitherto honest citizen and his subsequent suffering. It is not unhealthily sensational, but shows the consequences of a crime all too common in these days of extravagance and social aspiration. The short stories in this number are both worth reading. "The Stray Man" is a snatch of romance which should appeal to all admirers of a bright and human love-story. "Susan the Indispensable" has a moral underlying the narrative, and is a keen bit of social analysis.

OUR MUSIC PAGE is always welcome, and the "lullaby" published this month is as sweet a melody, with words of tender sentiment, as you have heard.

CONTENTS

October 1911

FICTION

THE STRAY MAN - - - - 7
SUSAN THE INDISPENSABLE - - 9
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - 11
THE COST OF A CRIME - - - 13

SPECIAL FEATURES

SCHOOL TEACHERS VS. MOTHERS - - 6
MAKING OF ORIENTAL RUGS - - - 15
ELECTRIFIED HOUSEKEEPING 16
THE GIRL'S ROOM - - - - - 19
A TREATISE ON WALL PAPER - - - 20
A TOUCH OF PAINT - - - 22
SOME STENCILING - - - 40

FASHION DEPARTMENT

PRETTY GIRLISH GOWNS - - - 31
SMART SUITS AND COATS - - 32
THE USEFUL TUNIC - - - - - 34
ABOUT CLOAKS - - - - - - 34
FRINGES AND BROCADES - - - 35
EMBROIDERED CENTREPIECES - - 37
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - 38

MATTERS OF MENU

AN OCTOBER LUNCHEON - - - 17
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - - 53

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 24
GOOD TASTE IN CURTAINS - - - 25

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

AROUND THE HEARTH - - - 10
THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - 23
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - 26
THE DRESSING TABLE - - 39
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - - - 42
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY - - 54

MISCELLANEOUS

EDITORIAL CHAT - - - - - - 2
EDITORIALS - - - - - - - 5
OUR MUSIC PAGE - - - - - - 18

What One Boy thinks of Gurney-Oxford Stoves

The prompt call to dinner is a welcome sound in this boy's ears, and meals are always on time since his mother got this new Gurney-Oxford Range.

It saves him bother and chores, too. He seldom has to split any kindling—that wonderful Economizer is such a good way to hold the heat that the fire lasts for hours and yet burns very little fuel—much less than any stove they ever had before.

And they never have to trouble with clinkers or ashes. It is perfectly simple to manage both with the new reversible grate. And this helps coal bills, too. It burns to a fine white powder.

Cookies and bread are even better than they used to be. They say it is because the Gurney-Oxford range has a divided flue strip along the top of the oven which guides the heat evenly all over it. But the boy doesn't care about the reason; he only knows that he never gets any hard crusts, and the cake is always done in the middle.

• • •

This youngster's enthusiasm is echoed by grown-ups in every family where a Gurney-Oxford Range is used.

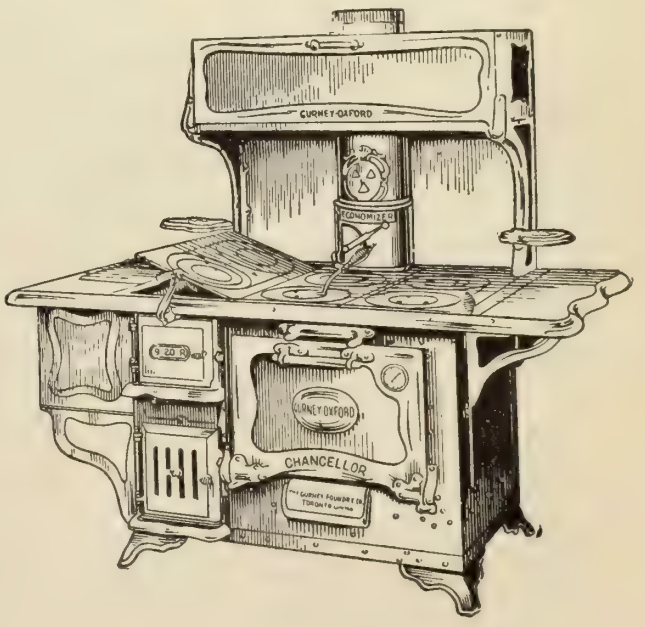
GURNEY-OXFORD

Its exclusive patent device, the OXFORD ECONOMIZER, saves not only fuel and time but food values, because of the slow simmering possible without stirring or attention. It is a good ventilator, too, and takes the cooking odors up the chimney.

• • •

In short, Gurney-Oxford Ranges represent the highest present-day development in stove-making. Simple and strong in construction; reliable and easy in operation; and in outward show, shining, spick and span, this Gurney-Oxford range is an ornament as well as a necessity to any kitchen.

Ask your dealer to show them, or if he does not keep them, write our nearest branch for a convenient address and free book.



The GURNEY FOUNDRY COMPANY, Limited, Toronto

Montreal Hamilton Winnipeg Calgary Vancouver

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have an unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or the money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

Yes, Mr. Grocer, you do pay more for Heinz 57 Varieties. You pay more to give your customers more quality for their money.

Your customers ought to know this. They will appreciate your standards as a good grocer when they realize that in selling the best brands you always have to pay more and that your margin of profit is less. But the advance you pay does not begin to cover the advance in quality you give your customer when you sell any one of Heinz 57 Varieties.

It isn't possible to duplicate Heinz quality. The same goods could only come from an organization just like the Heinz organization—from kitchens just like the Heinz kitchens, operated in the Heinz way.

We are farmers and gardeners. We raise our own seed—we have our own experiment stations where we have developed our own types of vegetables and fruit.

Therefore, you never find Heinz taste and the Heinz flavor except under a Heinz label.

We use no preservatives except those that Nature supplies; we need no chemicals; we use sound materials; we prepare them in clean kitchens; our uniformed employes are clean, they work in the sunlight, under the most modern sanitary conditions.

Chemicals are only necessary for preserving inferior materials. Good food, sound food, clean food, does not require artificial preservatives. But, it costs more to give you clean, sound, naturally preserved products.

If this were not such a huge industry—if we did not save all in-between profits—if we did not operate our own farms—if we did not have canning and pickling and preserving plants located right in the heart of the districts where we grow—Heinz quality would cost you from a third to a fourth more, instead of only the slight advance you now have to pay.

Explain this to the consumer when you sell any of the Heinz 57 Varieties.

You are entitled to receive credit for giving more value at the same price.

For instance, when you sell a bottle of Heinz Ketchup, call attention to the fact that you are selling pure ketchup; ketchup that is made of fresh, ripe tomatoes direct from the vine and bottled hot —instead of being made of cannery waste, preserved with Benzoate of Soda.

When you suggest Heinz Baked Beans, lay stress on the fact that they are really oven baked. And don't forget to mention the quality of the pork in every can, or the rich, fruity tomato sauce that gives such zest and individuality to the dish.

So, take your customers into your confidence—tell them that you could sell something else and make more profit on the single sale but that you prefer to pay a little more in order to give them more value, and thus deserve their larger patronage.

You should also call attention to Heinz Tomato Soup, Sweet Pickles, Preserves, Jellies, Apple Butter, India Relish, etc., and especially to Heinz Pure Vinegars.

H. J. Heinz Company

Member Association for Promotion of Purity in Foods

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

10 Cents a Copy

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

$1.00 a Year

Volume VIII TORONTO, OCTOBER, 1911 Number 6

Pure Milk Supply

NOW that the last rose of the summer of 1911 has faded, we may admit that it was a season of an unusual degree of heat, during which the infant and the aged population suffered extremely. The mortality rate of the former has shown, once more, if such proof were needed, that Canadian cities are not yet alive to the importance of a better milk supply. In our crowded foreign sections, the mothers are exceedingly ignorant regarding the care of their infants, and are in need of instruction from competent and scientifically-trained authorities. Montreal, which has been the greatest sinner in this respect, is awaking to the necessity for ridding itself of unenviable notoriety for high infant death rate. Tne press of that city deserves credit for its exposure of slum conditions, and its urgency in the matter of instruction.

In Toronto, Dr. Hastings, the Medical Health Officer, is showing decided vigilance in the matter of milk inspection. The report of the Chief of Dairy Inspection on September 12th showed that four hundred and forty-six quarts of milk had been emptied because of formaldehyde, while of forty-seven samples of milk examined for bacteria, the counts averaged 23,000,000 a cubic centimetre. Dr. Hastings stated that hundreds of epidemics and outbreaks of typhoid have been traced directly to the milk supply.

A Toronto woman said recently: "I have tried three dairies and have not yet been able to get a glass of milk."

* * *

A Serious Lack

WE are rather given to boasting about our educational system and challenging international comparisons. While there is much of which we may reasonably be proud in our public school equipment, there is a serious lack in our higher educational institutions. If a girl seeks to enter upon a university course of study, she must attend a co-educational institution. There is not a university for women throughout the length and breadth of our fair Dominion. There is not an educational institution for Canadian women which may be compared with Smith College, Vassar, Wellesley or Bryn Mawr in the United States.

Why is it that we have been so niggardly in our provision for feminine education? Lord Strathcona has been most generous to the Royal Victoria College, the residence for women attending McGill University. There are several such residences in Toronto, such as Annesley Hall and Queen's Hall, for girl students attending co-educational universities; but nowhere in Canada is there a university for women.

The life of the girl attending a university for women is naturally much freer and pleasanter than that of the girl attending a university of "mixed" classes. When shall we have a Canadian Wellesley or Bryn Mawr? It is time for some of our surplus millions to be turned in this direction.

* * *

Healthful Talk

A WOMAN who is a member of a family noted for its good health and cheerfulness, recently paid a visit to certain distant cousins living in a remote village.

"I am not going there again," she announced on her return. "They are the most dismal and unhealthy people I ever met—and everyone who called seemed to talk about all the diseases in the village. Every day, I heard about pain and sickness until I felt, myself, as if it were my duty to develop symptoms of something or other. So, I cut short my visit—and don't let anyone ever mention nerves or rheumatism to me again!"

There is a great deal of common sense in the advice so lavishly given in this age as to "talking health." Death, disease and disaster should be debarred from polite conversation. It is an unmistakable mark of the peasant or the provincial to dwell upon the horrible or ghastly. Do not read about murders or calamities, and, by all means, do not talk about them. A Canadian editor says that women are the chief offenders in this regard and are far more interested in unsavory details of crime or misfortune than are men readers.

* * *

Our Political Press

FOR the last two months, our papers have been filled with politics—and little else. Making all allowance for the exaggeration which attends upon a contest, there is much for the unprejudiced citizen to regret in the matter and manner of the press accounts. To have read Reform and Conservative papers in one day meant confusion and consternation.

Women are accused of being the gossipy sex, but in this respect, they are surely not worse than their brethren. No group of feminine detractors could be more "catty" than the writers of our political paragraphs. Pettiness, spite and unfairness to opponents were in painful evidence throughout the whole campaign. It is all very well to say that such attacks are "mere politics," and that a week after election the political enemies will be completely reconciled. The effect of such attacks remains, with the result that our best citizens can hardly be induced to become candidates. Women are especially sensitive regarding such attacks on father, husband or son, and many a woman has been heard to express thankfulness when her husband retired from the political arena.

Canada is "our" country and must be governed by the best, if she is to attain the best. A political campaign should not be made such a season of mud-slinging that a man of dignity and good taste hesitates to enter upon a contest, while a woman dreads the spiteful and personal abuse which is sure to follow a nomination.

* * *

In the Fashion

HOW far should we conform to the modes? We women are accused of being slaves to Dame Fashion, of being afraid to wear what is out of style or old-fashioned. There is a couplet by one of England's poets which is supposed to offer good advice on this subject:—

> "Be not the first by whom the new is tried, > Nor yet the last to lay the old aside."

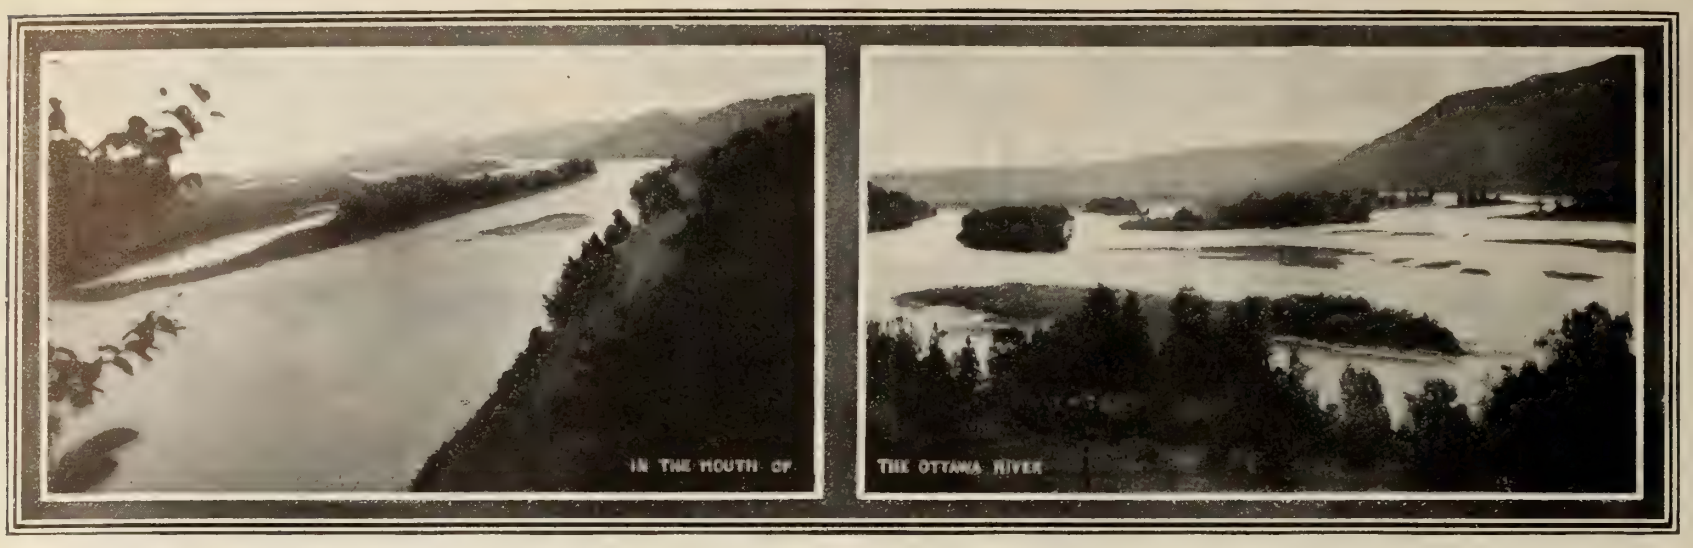
It may occur to the logical woman (and many of us possess the power of reasoning), that if this advice were followed the fashions would never change. Better advice, probably, is that given by a woman who is in the front ranks of the dressmaking "profession" in England—to study one's own style and select from the prevailing modes that which is individually becoming. It is manifest that the coat which is suitable for the woman who is tall and slender will not be the correct wear for her who is short and stout. No one need despair, even when the first glance reveals half-a-dozen costumes, not one of which will suit one's particular hue of complexion, or style of figure.

PICTURESQUE SCENES ON THE OTTAWA



Photographs by Elsie Banks.

PUBLIC SCHOOL TEACHERS VERSUS MOTHERS

By a PUBLIC SCHOOL TEACHER

YOU have seen the title, "Public School Teachers versus Mothers." What does it mean? It means that a public school teacher, throwing aside all malice and evil-speaking, is about to dart upon the mothers of the English-speaking people the arrows of her long-pent-up speech. They are not poisoned arrows, remember, but the bow is bent with a true English love of justice. The public school teacher has taken in silence the criticism and censure of mothers since public schools began, and now the mothers must in their turn listen to advice and censure. I use the word "must" advisedly, for teachers' chairs will soon be vacant if there is no alleviation of the present situation. I am addressing mothers and not fathers, because I am a strong believer in the old saying,—"The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." If the mother awakens to the gravity of the situation, and takes to her heart the admonition found here, I doubt not but that her influence will soon leaven the American continent.

I must first show that it is with infinite consideration that public school teachers should be treated. Now I know that you always say, (admiring yourself the while for your broad sympathy) that preachers and teachers are classes that have your deepest sympathy and consideration. Nevertheless your sympathy has not yet been strong enough to lighten the burden or sweeten the life of the teacher.

The average class is one of forty-five children with, the distraught teacher often thinks, one hundred and forty-five varieties of disposition. I want the ear of that earnest, wise, tenderly solicitous little mother who asks advice of sages, past and present, as to the best method of dealing with Johnny. "For you know he's no more like Mary! Now I can persuade her usually, or at worst times a little tap or two will do, but, do you know, Johnny is so different! I do get so discouraged." Don't you? Don't you? I rather think we teachers who have not the inexhaustible store of mother's patience, nor do not see with the same partial eyes, get quite as discouraged in dealing with our forty-five.

Consider! We are judged by the alacrity of our pupils' obedience. In a home it might easily occur that the other children might not be aware of the one child's naughtiness. In school the naughty one is usually in the front seat. If he is not punished in the same manner, (children are not quick in the perception of equivalents, but demand the identical things) a strong sense of injustice rankles in the breast of a former misdoer. Moreover, our time is limited. The quickest way is the best way for us. Our lesson must proceed. There are forty-five to be led in the way of knowledge, while this one is demanding our attention in an altogether different line of thought. And, mother, did you ever think how you handicap us? Remember how difficult you find your task with no one to consider but yourself and your child. Teachers often remark that teaching would be a joy if that ever-present fear of parental criticism and displeasures were not always obtruding itself. I have composed myself to view the matter calmly and what I relate as to teachers' experiences is not magnified nor distorted by resentment. We find it a prevailing tendency among parents to suspect the teacher of harboring a dislike of their child, a half barbarous desire to torture him. We find we are regarded as a sort of stepmother, a class, I may say here, that have my deep sympathy.

I do not find that children voluntarily carry home a minute account of the affairs of the school. More often it is encouraged by parents' questions, not questions dealing with work, nor asked for the purpose of following the teacher's line of thought, but questions (I blush for the Canadian mother) put only to entrap the teacher in indifference, injustice and general misdoing. I feel myself contemptible in writing of such contemptible motives, but it is too true, and possibly this will cause those who have been actuated by any such motives to consider seriously what they are doing.

City teachers often board where there are children going to other teachers in the same school. A certain teacher boarding under these circumstances used to be regaled with conversations of which the following is an illustration: Mother—"Well, Vera, how did school go to-day? How did Charlie Haines act to-day? Did anybody get the strap?" Vera—No, Mamma, but two or three had to stand on the floor though." Mother—"Well, now, how long does she make you stand up? Poor little things!" Vera's intuition tells her that mother must be regaled with the worst and she draws on her imagination liberally. "Oh, Mamma, they were so tired! She makes them stand up an awful long time." "But, how long, Vera, an hour?" "Oh, I'm sure she does, mother; my legs ache so when I have to stand up!" Mother—"Now, John, did you ever hear of anything like it? Making little children like them stand up an hour! The poor little things! Now see here, John, you sit down and write her a good sharp note and tell her not to make Vera stand up again. I declare, it makes a mother dread to send her child to school." The distracted teacher the next day asks herself wildly, "Are parents possessed with a desire to torment a teacher, or are all children liars?"

How often I have been amazed to find people, sensible, kind-hearted, well-intentioned in other things, not only listen to, but encourage the child to repeat the day's misdemeanours and the teacher's reprimands.

If left to ourselves we would sufficiently comprehend how priceless is that with which we work, but when parents metaphorically shake their fists in our faces, and between clenched teeth dare us to lay harming hands upon their treasure, we certainly do not take their child to our heart as we would have done. Believe me, teachers are being forced out of the profession by the attitude of parents toward them. It is inexplicable to me, but there is no exaggeration or falsity in the assertion that parents regard teachers always suspiciously and often inimically.

But you say, "I do not believe that children of this age do anything really bad." I know mothers of to-day are prone to think so. Now I suppose by really bad you mean putting an inverted tack on his neighbor's chair, or throwing an ink-bottle at the teacher. Well, no, we stop him before he gets there, but in pinching legs, in putting cold things, crawling things and scratching things down backs, in shrinking his work, in beating a tattoo with his well-shod feet against the desk irons, he can equal, if not far exceed children of any other generation. But we will lay these tendencies aside, for, I believe, there is a fine class of disciplarian extant, and the above-mentioned tendencies lie dormant in the average pupil. But no age ever produced children noisier, more restless, or more resolute in following the gleam of their own happy imagination than does the present age. Had I Aladdin's lamp, I should wish every mother to be transported, in the capacity of teacher, to the school-room in early spring, when mud from the boots grinds under each step and makes the constant shuffling and scraping of feet a screeching, scratching, excruciating torture, when several pupils are in their most sullen moods, when others as their mothers say are, "All nerves, you know; Miss Brown"; when two or three have a racking and incessant cough, jarring every fibre of your body and effectually putting an end to instruction; when the incorrigible pupil in the reading-lesson is trving to discover how far he can keep from any sort of reasonable performance without endangering his corporal being; and when a determined knock is heard at the door acquainting you of the presence of an irate parent and suggestive of the pleasant purport of an interview with the same.

If I were a mother I should be jealous of the public school teacher, because to-day the Educational Department has annexed for the teacher the greater part of the mother's province. The home has been a failure, the Educational Department thinks; so the teacher must be given the most delicate and sacred of its duties. The teacher instead of the mother must teach the child the love of God, must lead the child to the perception of beauty in natural things, must lead the way through the enchanted dells of fairy-land, and old folk-lore, telling the bed-time story in school hours, and still further encroaching upon the mother's rightful province must entertain and instruct the child, teaching how to make doll-clothes, to sing, to draw, and even to play games. And now I understand that the duty of imparting to children the necessary knowledge regarding sex, is being laid by public opinion upon the teacher. The papers state that it might be considered by some to be the duty of the mother, but unquestionably(!) it is the duty of the public school teacher.

The Rosy-Cheeked Urchin

By MARGUERITE WOOD.

The rosy-cheeked urchin that swings on the gate
Is a right merry monarch in all but estate;
But treasure brings trouble, what title is free?
Thus better without one, thus happy is he;
For the ring of his laugh is a mirth-moving strain,
Which a choir of young creatures respond to again.
The birds are all singing, each heart is elate
With the rosy-cheeked urchin that swings on the gate.

The rosy-cheeked urchin that swings on the gate
Hath Nature's own pages upon him to wait;
His joyous companions—a cherubim crew,
With posies and daisies and buttercups, too.
He boasts not of jewels on forehead or breast,
But his heart is all gladness, his mind is at rest.
Oh! what are the honors, the glories of state,
To the rosy-cheeked urchin that swings on the gate.

The rosy-cheeked urchin that swings on the gate
Waves proudly above him his satchel and slate;
The sky is all brightness, the fields are all gay,
Green branches are waving, the lambs are at play;
And where is the bosom that pines not to be Thus bathed in the sunlight as happy as he?
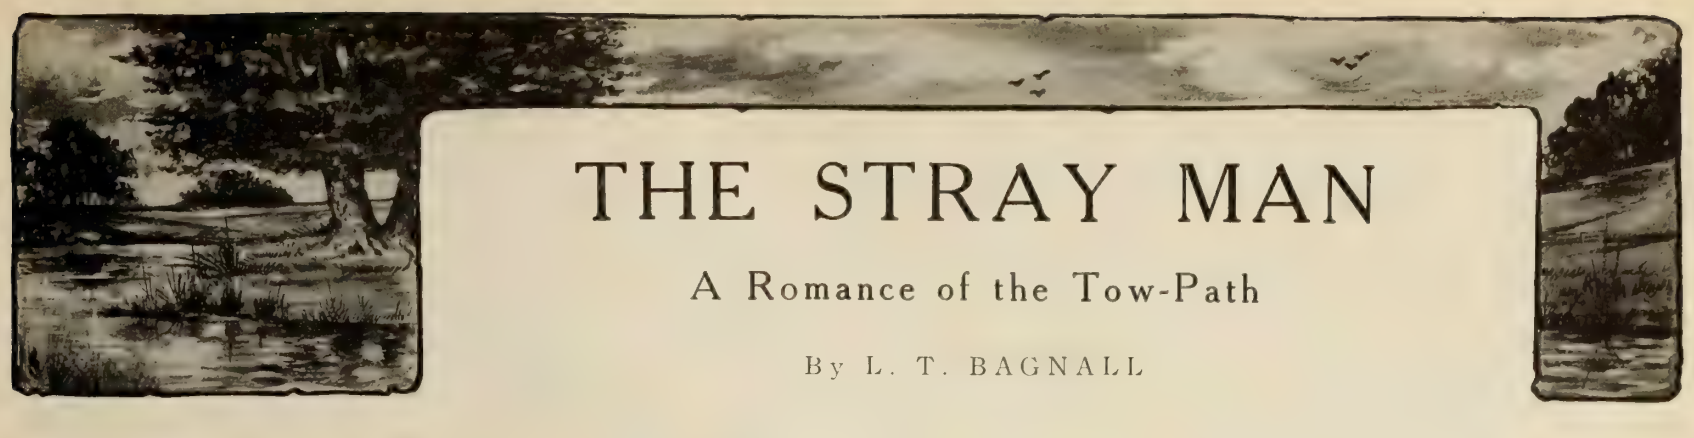
For the heart's purest pleasures (we find when too late)
Dwell within the bright urchin that swings on the gate.



THE STRAY MAN

A Romance of the Tow-Path

By L. T. BAGNALL

PHILIP WORCELEY-DANE, artist, stalked, pipe in mouth, along the tow-path one morning in early June. Some few paces behind him trotted his small henchman, the burden of the oil paraphernalia nicely adjusted to their respective powers. It was Philip's third sitting at that picture, but the work had been interrupted by a call to town which had entailed a four-days' absence, so that it was with relief that on turning a bend he found no one ensconced in his "claim." That particular view was the most picturable for a mile up and down stream; also the artist crowd had already invaded Wanbrook for the summer, and every lodging was let.

When Philip had arrived at his old place and dismissed his boy, he stared at the grass like Crusoe at the print of Man Friday's feet.

"Those aren't all my marks," he muttered. "What a wicked lot of color wasted; palette's been turned upside down and scrubbed on the grass. Nuisance! Hope he's finished, or only works in the afternoon. Thought I'd left for good, naturally, I suppose."

He settled his easel and stool, fixed his canvas more smartly than usual, and set to work with vigor; absence and London had given fresh impetus; and besides, the further his picture advanced the firmer would become his tenure.

But the distractions of the river-side are terribly beguiling, even for a man in love with his art; and this June morning it seemed that Nature had decreed coquettishly, "Thou shalt not paint!"

A water rat made excursions under his very nose to retrieve salvage floating down from the cottages behind the bend. A pair of kingfishers chased each other like flashes of blue flame, uttering their cries as of unoiled keys, or fished within sight. A bold heron settled in a tributary, preened himself, and then stood like a stuffed thing, deceitfully waiting for his prey. A heifer was stung by a bee, and her antics under the stimulus were highly entertaining. A weasel stalked a sparrow, and was within an ace of catching him too. Altogether, half-way through the morning Philip's painting had become spasmodic.

He had been observing nature and criticizing his canvas for the best part of an hour when he heard a faint rattle as of tubes, and turning, discovered a feminine figure busily painting some thirty yards behind him. He jumped to the conclusion that she must be the lavisher of paint; and, since he occupied her site, knew that he must be very much in the way. It was impossible to see her face, for she was sitting at her work, and her canvas entirely hid it. On turning again to his own he saw an effect of light on the distant hills which he hurriedly made a note of, and in the doing grew absorbed. The next thing he heard was the swirl and swish of an on-coming barge behind him, and the thump of the horse's feet on the tow-path. He stood up and stretched himself, welcoming the interruption as an excuse for lunch; glanced round, started at a run, but arrived—too late. The barge, timber-laden, coming rapidly downstream, was drawn by an energetic horse with no one at its head, the "Row-Barge" inn having deflected its leader from the path of duty. The horse, cunning from long usage, had charged the latchless hand-gate, the first attempt failed, and it swung back upon its broad chest, but the second succeeded. Somehow the rope wagged clear of the post and rails, and he came along at a brisk walk, pulling well away from the slacking line.

The girl had evidently known what to expect as soon as the gate clanged, and had plenty of time to remove her gear before the horse reached her. In one minute everything was put aside, as far from the water as possible; farther they could not go, because of a steep-sided ditch. All seemed safe, and the lady, on the ditch's brink, stood calmly waiting for the passing of the disturber. Suddenly the man in the barge, whether of necessity or of malice prepense, shifted the tiller; the rope slackened, and the unreasoning creature of habit, accustomed always to keep it taut, clumped on the outermost edge of the ditch, making with Juggernaut feet straight for the heap of painting materials.

It was at this tremendous moment that Philip faced about. In the twinkle of an eye the girl had seen what to do, and done it, but unfortunately not in the best possible way. She flew to the horse's head, on the river side, and led him safely past the threatened spot. In her excitement she increased his pace, let go, and in a flash remembered she was on the rope side. There was no time to dart round his head, the only thing to do was to duck. She hesitated for one second, the line caught her across the chest, felled her, and the horse clanked on immutably.

Philip came up swiftly, glaring across at the man on the barge, who was deeply interested in some water lilies, and reached the victim just as the breathless imbiber plunged through the gate. The girl was sitting up, rather white; but Philip had no time to speak before he tackled the bargee, who was going to pass them at a shambling run.

"D'you see what's happened to this lady through your dawdling at the 'Row-Boat'?" he demanded fiercely. "The horse nearly smashed her things, and she was knocked down by the rope! What's your name? Not going to give it? That doesn't matter—I've got the number and name of your barge! Stick to your horse another time, or you'll have a worse accident; I shall report you in any case——"

"Oi weren't dawdlin' at no—'Row-Boat,'" said the man scornfully. "An' woy didn't she move 'er traps? An' woy didn't she move erself? Oi aint rersponsible ef yer bloomin' artists go'n set in th' middle uv th' path—yer kin rerport me, guv'nor, an' a lot er good may it do yer!—an' Oi weren't 'dawdlin'' at no 'Row-Boat'——"

"Be off!" said Philip quietly, squaring his shoulders, and he went.

"It's the 'Row-Barge,'" said the girl, with a little laugh. "What an unnaturally accurate bargee!"

"Are you sure you're not hurt?"

"The student sat on her stool, and he on the grass."

"Not a bit, thanks. It was very stupid of me, I forgot about the rope."

"It's abominably dangerous, I shall write to the owner."

"Oh, please don't. It must be so dull on the tow-path! I'm sure I should drink ginger beer, or something, at every public!" with a swift smile. Philip laughed. That smile was very good; there were dimples.

"I'm afraid you must be angry with me," he said. "I believe I've got your painting place."

"But it was I who took yours! I thought you had left for good. One day when I came, meaning to do that bit, I saw from the road that someone was there, but after that, nobody came, so I made sure that you weren't coming back."

"I'm sorry I did—that is——"

The girl had rearranged her things, all but the canvas, which she seemed to have no intention of showing. Philip felt as though some brass instrument inside him forced him to say:

"Might—might I see your work?"

She flushed. He thought she thought he was presumptuous.

"Certainly," she said carelessly. "I haven't got very far."

She picked it up from the grass and fixed it on the easel. It was only at the second-day stage, but Philip liked the promise of it.

"If she doesn't spoil it later by niggling, it will be rather broad and nice," was his inward comment. Aloud:

"If I may say so, that's coming in the right way. I—I hope you don't mind my asking?"

"Mind! Everyone on the tow-path has a right to look at its pictures."

Philip felt diminutive.

"And now," with a shy smile. "Might I see yours?"

Eagerly—"I should be delighted, but look here, I'm sure you've had to alter your thing a lot because I'm in your place; I'm not going to stay, I was going in any case, honor bright; please, won't you go back to it?"

"Don't you paint in the afternoon?"

"Not in the same place."

By this time they were level with Philip's canvas. The girl stood silent. Then she turned, and for one brief moment looked the man full in the eyes. At length, with a little sigh——

"You have made Nature tell you things, you are near to her!"

"I love her," he said simply.

"So do I, but she stands away. I'm always trying to get closer, but I haven't found the secret yet. You seemed to me to have got something from the heart of her."

"Thank you."

"I must be going," she said, after a short pause, as if the unconventionality of the whole affair had that moment struck her. "Thank you so much for—for trying to help me."

"Please, won't you come to-morrow, here, I mean; I shan't be coming!" said Philip.

"But how will you manage? Your picture isn't finished either!"

"No, but it's more advanced than yours, and I can easily wait; it's such a pity you should have to finish from a different point. And it was all my fault for going away in the middle!"

The girl laughed.

"I don't suppose that was your fault," she said. "When you can paint like that."

"I tell you what," said Philip. "Would you—would you object if I—a little way behind you—or to one side?—so that I didn't get in your way?" He collapsed feebly, for the ready flush had risen again, and in the pause he was sure he had gone too far.

"I don't know. You were there first. I think perhaps, especially as you're farther advanced, that we'd better go on as we are," she replied a little stiffly.

Philip looked at her like a nice, chastised dog. It was a look hard to withstand, but with no visible sign of softening save a hurried little smile, the chastiser inclined her head in farewell, and vanished behind the may-trees. Philip rammed his hands into his pockets and strode down the path away from the village.

"'Oh, like a queen's her happy tread,'" he hummed.

"'And like a queen's her—' That won't do—it's brown—dark brown.

> "'Her dark brown head!
> But oh, at last, when all is said,
> Her woman's heart for me!—'
> 'We wandered where the river gleamed.'

—(how appropriate, only we haven't—yet!)

> "'Neath oaks that mused and pines that dreamed,
> A wild thing of the woods she seemed,
> So proud, and pure, and free.'

"Her woman's heart. Her—oh, hang it all!—Wonder where she's staying? Doesn't look like the ordinary student—hair done nicely, all ripples, and tidy. As to dress, plain green linen frock, or overall? That was studenty. Wonder if she'll come back to-morrow. What a fool to say that, about painting together; I was possessed, I couldn't help it. She'll think me a first-class bounder. She won't come. 'We wandered where the river—' Two o'clock! And the Thatching train goes at a quarter past—dash it, shall have to wheel all the way."

The next day, by dint of superhuman strength, Philip kept away from the tow-path. On his arrival in the morning he saw from the road a light green, shady-hatted figure at work on the may-tree bend, but not in his place.

"Perhaps she'll go to it if I keep away long enough," he thought. He looked steadily at the back of the green blot, until it showed signs of turning round, when he hurriedly fixed up his things and started a picture near a spy-hole in the hedge. Half way through the morning he was rewarded by witnessing the removal of the green blot to the original place.

About half-past one he missed the blot. Immediately afterwards he heard steps, which stopped behind him, a delightful voice say: "Good morning!" and he was face to face with the green overall.

"So you've changed your mind, and begun a new picture after all," she said. "It's—do you think it's pretty here?"

"No, I don't," said Philip, almost crossly.

"I'm going to get some ginger beer. They keep the stone-bottle sort at Hobbs'," said the student.

"May I carry it for you?" asked Philip. His voice sounded to him as if it was another person's. He certainly had no control over it.

"Thank you. Perhaps you'd like to get some too, if you ever drink it?" (Dimples).

They strolled to Hobbs', and bought two bottles apiece. The student had a string bag, and Philip put them in, and retained it. When they came to Philip's gap in the hedge she held out her hand for the bag.

"Please, mayn't I carry it all the way?" he pleaded, with the doggy look. This time it succeeded. When they reached her painting claim Philip produced sandwiches, saying he had brought lunch with him, "for a change," he usually went home for it. The student sat on her stool, and he sat on the grass, facing her. She had tomatoes, and he had apples, and they made exchanges, and were mirthful over next-to-nothings. When they had emptied the last bottle and thrown the last apple core to the river rats, the girl flashed round upon the man.

"Has it struck you that we don't know each other's names?"

"It hasn't worried me. It didn't seem to matter!"

"Mine is Enid Hill."

"And mine"—with a sigh—"is Philip Worceley-Dane."

A slight pause.

"If you still liked, you might come and paint in your first place," she said carelessly.

Philip sat a little in front of Enid, her own arrangement. She said she couldn't bear anyone to see her working, which led to a conversation on the schools. She studied at the Slade. "Is she going to get her living by it or not?" thought Philip. How he hoped she was! He checked himself with a jerk; what business was that of his? All of a sudden a backwash of memory stirred forgotten things. He turned, and looked at her serene face with a thoughtful scrutiny; then went back to his canvas with an odd little laugh. The name was Hill, too, that confirmed it.

"And do you work very hard?" said the grave, yet sunny voice behind him.

"Um, have to, you see. More or less a case of bread-and-butter."

He blushed at the lie, which he remembered ought to be the blacker for its tincture of truth. He was very well endowed with this world's goods, but only allowed himself a slender income, to keep himself from "getting fat."

"We're both real workers, then," said the student pensively. "It's curious to think we've both been in London for several years, and never met till we came down here."

"I hope we shan't go on not meeting, though, in town!"

"I'm not there all the summer."

"But sometimes we get a winter! Are you staying down here?"

"Yes. Not in Wanbrook, though," she added hastily.

Gradually they drifted to bigger themes; until, the warp and woof of things discovered to be viewed from much the same standpoint, they slid into that intimacy which is often not born of years and closest propinquity. When it was time to pack up he helped her to load her bicycle, which reposed on a couch of meadowsweet in a ditch; and was then forgetting his and escorting her on her way, but this she would not hear of. He thought she was quite curiously decisive, with yet a hint of mischief about the corners of her mouth; even the dear dog look failed.

By half-past ten, for the next three days they were established in their joint stronghold. Philip's picture should by rights have been finished, but he continually found new things to do to it, which yet failed to improve the general effect. Enid's was three parts done, and somehow hers also was not living up to its early promise.

On the third morning of the partnership Enid asked Philip if he would mind coming and giving his "candid advice." He leaned over her shoulder as she did not offer to move, and with a few sure touches took out a prospective tangle, and suggested a broader effect here and there, lost through over-elaboration. The twelve-fifteen from Pinkton was due in five minutes, and vehicles of every description rattled along the road and stumped and rumbled over the swing bridge; but the pair had their backs to the world, and nothing short of an earthquake would have made them face about.

One individual who got off the train and drove away in a high dog-cart, happened to look over the hedge and up the tow-path to the bend by the hawthorns, and horse and groom were astonished by a disagreeably sudden pull-up.

The driver, a handsome old man with suggestions of the soldier in bearing and moustache, backed the cart until the two figures were again in view, and had another good look. They were a long way off, but he had keen eyesight, and the green overall was unique in that part of the world. With an expression of mingled wrath and bewilderment he cut the blood chestnut absent-mindedly, and was fairly run away with for the best part of a mile, which temporarily relieved his feelings.

Half an hour later Enid announced that necessity compelled her to go; someone was expecting her, she said. Again the doggy look was futile, and Philip was left in a world full of emptiness.

II.

THE Slade student, leaving her unwieldy canvas in the village, pedaled briskly along a dusty, two-mile stretch of road. Mounting a slight hill between picturesque cottages, she wheeled her machine through wrought iron gates, and so, past shrubberies and a lake, to a red Elizabethan house, standing terrace-girdled, in a park.

By a table in the hall stood he of the dog-cart, choosing flies out of a book.

Enid slipped in by a side entrance, tidied herself, and came downstairs just as the gong announced lunch.

"Hullo, dad!" she hailed, kissing him. His face was totally unresponsive.

"Well, Enid?"

"So you're back all right; did you happen to remember my paints, and Jones's collar?"

"I did."

"I guessed you'd go fishing the instant you got back; I nearly wired to you yesterday, when I saw the fly was on the river." Silence and absorption in the fly book. She looked at him with heightened color.

"The gong has sounded, father; I came back on purpose to have lunch with you."

"You did, Enid? That was very good of you, when your work was as engrossing as it must have been to-day."

They were near the open dining-room door, and servants made a reply impossible. Conversation during the meal was not of an easy character. Directly it was over Enid rose to go, humming a little air, her slender figure very erect.

"Enid."

"Yes, father?"

"I want you in the library a moment."

"Certainly."

He opened the door with punctilious courtesy.

"Who was giving you a—lesson on the tow-path this morning? I didn't recognize him."

"A Mr. Dane," with cold lightness.

"A friend of yours?"

"Yes."

"Since when?"

"Since—since Tuesday."

"Who introduced him?"

"The tow-path," with an airy little laugh.

"Might I ask if this delightful free-masonry is customary at the Slade school?"

"I'm afraid I don't know what you mean."

"I mean, would it be considered a matter of course, that on meeting a stray man, say in the National Gallery, the only excuse being your common art, you should allow him to speak to you—I presume he was the first?—and in four days call him your 'friend.' If this is so, I imagine you have no lack of 'friends!'"

Enid was angry, though not to the extent she would have been but for remembering the great excuse to be made. For a Bohemian artist in Rome her beautiful mother had forsaken her husband and three-year-old daughter, who became from henceforth the idol of the broken man's life.

"You are unjust, father," proudly.

"In what way?"

"You have judged beforehand, without knowing anything—anything about it, and you gave me no time to tell you——"

"It seems to me that all I know, except what I saw for myself—has been learned from your own lips."

"You have made up a great deal for yourself, or you wouldn't be speaking to me in this way. Is it like me to pick up people and make friends with them, without knowing anything about them?"

"What do you know about this man?"

"That he is a gentleman."

"Anything else?" cynically.

"I think that's enough."

"I do not think it's enough, or rather, I don't consider you a sufficient judge. Since when—I remember, since Tuesday—the day after I left. And you didn't wire to me that the fly was on the river."

His face, kept like a mask hitherto, began to work. He looked very old. Enid glanced at him.

"Father!" she said, a tremor in her voice, coming a step nearer. "If only you hadn't taken it like this——"

"Taken what?" sharply.

"Why didn't you know me better? Have you no faith?"

"She said that, too," he muttered. Enid winced.

"What do you want me to do? I will tell you all about it from the beginning." With a few quick sentences she filled in the incidents of the past four days. To her dismay it sounded odd in the telling, very odd. She blushed scarlet, and tripped over the words. Her father fixed his tragic eyes upon her.

"You invited him to come and paint with you?"

"I have told you so."

"But he proposed it first?"

"Yes."

"I knew the London life would change you!"

"It hasn't changed me! Oh, father, father, will you never understand?"

She turned to go, tears smarting under her lids, her eyes, gray-black like her father's, showing deep injury.

"Enid!"

"Well, father?"

"No gentleman would have proposed that!"

"Why don't you finish? Why don't you say no lady would have allowed it?"

He looked at her moodily.

"I don't see why you take this attitude; when you saw I was so put out, why couldn't you laugh it off, as you always do? Kiss me, and—and call me pet names—" His voice faltered. "Instead of which you take up the cudgels for this—this outsider—as if he were a friend of long standing. It's perfectly impossible to call a person 'friend' whom you've only known four—five—days! But why I'm arguing about it, heaven only knows."

A sudden blast of wrath seemed to rise.

"You don't see him again, do you hear?" He pulled himself out of the chair and stood gripping the edge of the table. She noticed the swelling veins in his hands and temples.

"We're not in the Middle Ages, father!"

"You don't see him again! We may be more degenerate than the Middle Ages, but there is parental authority left, here and there! And my daughter shall do as I say in this case, though she goes her own way in every other. I forbid you to see or to speak to the man again. He hasn't—— He didn't get beyond painting?"

"I don't know what you mean!"

Brutally: "Did he make love to you?"

It was the last straw. Her father's haunted eyes fell before her look of pure scorn; then, with a sob, she fled.

Colonel Hill sank back into the chair with a groan. The jealous fear tugging at his heart he would not formulate, but the grandfather clock ticked it out, monotonously, maddeningly.

Of course he was a cad; all these tow-path painter fellows were outsiders; presuming on having helped her, which he didn't! Depend upon it he knew who she was; he would have heard in the village.

At the end of a period of grim brooding he went to the dining-room, and with shaking fingers poured himself out a glass of brandy. It gave him outward self-possession; he collected his rod and tackle and drove off in the cart which had waited nearly an hour to take him to the river. He would not have thought of altering his plans had he suddenly found himself in the grip of a mortal malady.

All that endless afternoon Enid lay upon her bed; in her ears the drone of the bees in the clematis wreaths; in her heart the crying of a new-born love. About six o'clock she got up, bathed her face, and calling Jones, her Irish terrier, set off for the river.

"I shall say good-bye to the place," she said. "Father can't prevent me from doing that. And if we ever meet in London— But of course we shan't."

She came along the tow-path towards instead of from, the village, as heretofore. The June evening was very sweet and still, the scent of hawthorn heavy on the air.

A hedge ended inconsequently not far from the deserted trysting-place. She sat down under it, propping her white face with her hands.

She gazed at the paint-smeared grass, rainbow-hued in two distinct patches now. No visionary rainbow of promise bent a radiant halo above, bracketing the two patches into one. The tears of the sky and the dew of the night would wash out all trace of their joint occupation; in a week's time she would hardly be able to find the exact spot, because of the grown grass and footsteps of man and beast.

This little tow-path adventure would be rubbed out of his life as easily, as quickly, as the paint-smudges from the grass. She had hidden from him where she lived, of mischievous purpose; she could not imagine any possibility of communication. Her father would see to it that she painted no more until he had left; she had never yet felt directly the pressure of his iron will, but she knew its power.

Jones, in spite of intense preoccupation, became aware that something was wrong; these sounds were new to him. He left his little plays and pushed close to her, licking her hands; she seized and hugged him disagreeably tight. Once he gazed up at her sadly when she actually made his ribs give. The look was oddly reminiscent. She turned his face away, and two tears fell on his neck.

Jones struggled to be free. . . . .

"Would you rather I went away?" said Philip.

"It doesn't matter—because I'm going."

Jones exhaustively examined his legs, discovered he was a dog-freemason, and gave the countersign with his tail.

"I—I never thought of your being here," said the man, crimson with stooping to stroke Jones.

"Nor did I," distantly.

"Are you coming to paint to-morrow?"

"No."

"The day after?"

"Sunday?"

"Monday, then?"

"No."

"Won't you tell me why you're crying?" with intense concern.

"I'm not crying!" standing up. "Good-bye; I'm not coming again. My picture's f—finished."

"So is mine; but I thought we—you—I might begin another?"

"Good-bye!" She held out her hand, staring fixedly at Jones, who was excavating a water rat. It was not safe to look into the man's eyes, said a voice within, because then the last little remnant of control would depart. Just because of that voice, in a flash she looked; and lo, it was her turn for time and space to vanish like a parched scroll.

"Shall you mind being poor, Sweetheart?" Philip's voice was saying, as space and time swam into focus once more. "But I shall be rich! Was ever anyone so rich?"

Continued on page 54

SUSAN THE INDISPENSABLE

A Story of a Useless Sacrifice

By EVELYN SHARP

FOR the first time in fifteen years, Susan Wilbraham forgot she was indispensable. It was the hour of early dinner, and she knew it was her business, as it had been for fifteen years, to see the meal through. She did not for one moment minimize the importance of being present at early dinner, that most difficult of family meals, and the one at which domestic passions, always simmering under repression, reach their occasional grand moments. She had learned everything there was to know about early dinner from the experience of a youth spent in the service of her step-mother and of a large family of step-brothers and sisters. Yet, after fifteen years given with lavish devotion to the only cause she had ever known, Susan found herself, at one o'clock on a summer day, standing idly in the middle of her bedroom with a letter in her hand, just as if the bell had not rung twice, as if mutton broth and curried rabbit had never been, as if no family sat round the dining-room table waiting for her to come down and attend to them.

A thump on the door made her look round with a start. "No, I'm not ill. Of course I'm not ill! Why should I be ill?" was her reply to the rather scared enquiry of the youngest of the Wilbrahams, who, by virtue of her lowly position in the family, ran its errands under compulsion.

The little sister withdrew with the tact proper to the slave, and scurried downstairs, hoping to make a sensation by a highly colored account of the way Susan had snubbed her. Unfortunately, Susan followed too closely to give her time to work up this sensation; and Jenny subsided into unwilling retirement beside her mother, trying to convey the impression that she had been mainly instrumental in restoring early dinner to its normal condition.

Susan looked at the waiting family a little impatiently. She knew that Mrs. Wilbraham, a prey to delicate nerves, was incapable of dealing out portions of food with a due regard for individual appetites. She knew that she had taught the family to rely upon her absolutely. Yet, when she saw two dishes cooling at the end of the table, while five or six people sat looking at them, hungry but inactive, she was aware of a distinct feeling of impatience. She never remembered feeling like that before, and she conscientiously stifled the sensation, and offered a hurried explanation that had the merit of being true and the defect of being instantly discredited on that account.

"Sorry," she said, plunging a spoon into a congealing mass of pearl barley and chopped carrots. "I didn't hear the bell. Why didn't you begin?"

"My dear!" was Mrs. Wilbraham's sole comment upon this unprecedented suggestion: while the boys whistled to show the valuation they set upon her excuse for being late.

"Jack, take round the water, and don't spill it down people's necks," said Susan briskly. "Sit up, Mary, child, do! Why haven't you cut the bread, Billy? Prue, I do think you might have started them!"

Prue roused herself from an absorbing dream, and appeared as much outraged as her mother had been at the idea of organizing early dinner without Susan's leadership. At the age of twenty Prue was wrestling with a small crisis of her own; and, having confided it to Susan, she felt naturally hurt at being thought capable of taking a strong line over anything like mutton. Her brothers misconstrued her silence.

"Prue!" echoed Billy, who came next to her in age. "What's the good of Prue? She never thinks of anything now—never!"

"She's been getting worser and worser, ever since she went on that stupid visit to the Rackstraws," added Jack. "You shut up, Jen! I shall use what words I jolly well like—I'm eighteen months older'n you, anyhow!"

"You haven't spent the extra time in learning grammar, have you?" observed Jenny, scooping up the last grains of pearl barley on her plate before passing it up for a second helping. "Yes, I have finished what's on my plate, Susan. That isn't fat; it's bone. You can pinch it if you like."

"Oh, Jenny," murmured her mother. "It isn't pretty to talk like that about your food."

Jenny, unabashed, rubbed her cheek against her mother's sleeve. Like the rest of the family she looked upon mothers in the mass as pretty, gentle creatures, too fragile to deal with the serious things of life, such as punishments or clothes, but always responsive when caressed and loved within limitations. "You can't be pretty about mutton broth, mummy," she explained. "Pink jelly, p'raps; but not mutton broth, darling."

The first course was removed, and there was a brief and anxious pause while hopes that were centred upon pink jelly had not yet been dashed by the appearance of milk pudding and baked apples. Mary—who never spoke unless she had some fact to impart, a self-restraint that was shown by no one else in the family—took advantage of the temporary lull.

"Brian Grierson has come home at last," she announced. "I met Lady Grierson on my way back from school just now, and she sent her love to mother, and said Brian was coming up to call this afternoon. I did meet her, Jenny, so there! It was at the corner of High Street, just by Hangman's Lane; and if you'd waited to button your boots properly, instead of skipping every other button, you'd have met her too, and got a lift in the car, as I did!"

The dispute with Jenny was rightly regarded as a side issue. The news of the return of Sir John Grierson's second son from South Africa was so thrilling that the family broke out into clamorous commentary, and the entry of two unpopular puddings passed unnoticed.

"Why, it must be ten years since he went out to that mine," observed Mrs. Wilbraham, forgetting nerves and delicacy in a flutter of excitement.

"Fifteen," said Susan, speaking for the first time. Dispensing portions of pudding at lightning speed, she wondered how no one guessed from her manner that the news had been hers before Mary made a sensation with it—ever since, in fact, the second post had brought her the letter that made her late for lunch.

"Susan's arms were round her."

"Yes, fifteen," agreed Mary. "I was born the day he went away, wasn't I, Susan?"

It was always Susan, not Mrs. Wilbraham, who was appealed to for biographical details. Susan did not, however, corroborate this one. Having absently placed three baked apples on Billy's plate and presented Prue with an unsought helping of milk pudding, she found herself exposed to instant and uncompromising criticism; and conversation was suspended while she readjusted matters apologetically.

"You're making such a noise, I don't know what I'm doing," she said, an excuse that convinced nobody, since the conditions were never otherwise during early dinner. She followed it up with various scathing remarks about people who made a greedy fuss over their food; and in the universal anger thus aroused the subject of Brian's return was dropped, as she meant it to be.

"Getting what you didn't ask for, and then complaining, isn't fussin' about your food," objected Jack. "What's the use of two puddings, if you mayn't like one of 'em best?"

"Besides," added Jenny, "you can't call it greedy to want milk pudding. It's—it's noble."

Susan did not attempt to check the shout of laughter with which this sally was received. The conversation was changed, and her secret was her own still. Somebody opportunely looked at the clock, and after that tumult reigned until the boys had been despatched on their bicycles to the college on the hill, and the two younger girls to the high school in the town. The subject of Brian Grierson's return was not allowed to drop, however. Mrs. Wilbraham revived it as soon as Susan went into the drawing-room after lunch.

"I wonder if Brian will be much altered?" she began, with renewed interest. Fresh subjects of conversation were rare, and this one consequently ranked high. "He was always a nice lad, though unsuccessful—like your dear father."

She ended with a sigh that was only a habit. The failure of the late Mr. Wilbraham to sell his pictures had never really troubled her much. Susan had taken over the financial burden of making both ends meet, fifteen years ago, and neither then nor since her father's death had she allowed her stepmother to suffer any of the worry and anxiety of bringing up a family on narrow means. Susan herself would not have dreamed of sighing when her father's name was mentioned. His memory stood to her for nearly everything in her youth that spelt joy instead of self-sacrifice, and she would have scorned to think of him sentimentally. Mrs. Wilbraham did not know that she felt like this; she knew very little about Susan, though they had lived in the same house for twenty-one years. To her Susan always appeared a little heartless about her father, as she did now about Brian Grierson. Susan was rather a funny girl, she concluded, as she settled herself comfortably on the sofa and asked for another cushion. Susan was forty-one; but all unmarried women were "girls" to Mrs. Wilbraham, unless they had to leave home and earn their living, in which case they became "poor things."

"Fifteen years is a long time," said Susan conventionally, as she fetched the cushion from the window seat. The letter burned in her pocket as she stood there a moment and looked out into the garden, smiling to herself at the absurdity of her inadequate little remark. Outside, the sunshine blazed down on the sloping lawn, turning the long beds of perennial plants into blurred masses of color. Early that morning she had seen in the perennial beds nothing but overgrown plants that wanted tying up badly. Now, as she stood there with Brian's letter in her pocket, all the joy of the summer day had entered into her, and she saw a picture that she had not seen for fifteen years. Fifteen years ago she had to stifle her gift of seeing pictures; to-day, since the arrival of the second post, it had refused to be stifled.

Her step-mother spoke plaintively, and Susan remembered that it was not her business to be seeing pictures. Fifteen years, as she had said, was a long time. The remark was neither absurd nor inadequate. It was true.

"My dear, I am waiting for that cushion," said Mrs. Wilbraham. "Is anything wrong in the garden?"

Susan laughed, as she brought the cushion across the room through the sunlight. "Yes," she said; "there's a picture in it. Could anything be more wrong?"

Mrs. Wilbraham sighed again. "I don't know what you mean," she said. "Your father used to talk like that, but I never heard you do it before. And you seem to be very callous about Brian's return. You used to be such friends, too. Why, at one time your father and I almost thought there was something between you!"

Susan's laughter died away. She looked down curiously at the pretty soft face of the woman on the sofa. "Did you, mother?" she said. "I wonder how you would have got on all these years without me, if—if there had been something between us, as you put it?"

Mrs. Wilbraham managed to look hurt and dignified at the same moment. "Really, my dear, what a strange thing to say!" she remonstrated. "I hope that as a mother I should know how to get on without any one of my daughters, if her hand were asked in marriage."

Susan continued to look down at her. "Do you remember what was happening when Brian went away?" she continued slowly. "Prue and Billy were tumbling over one another in the nursery; Mary was just born; father wasn't making any money, and we had to send away the nurse and run the house with one maid. A little while after, I had a post offered me to teach drawing in a high school in London. I was mad to go to London and paint

Continued on page 49

AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

"A good-bye kiss is a little thing,
With your hand on the door to go;
But it takes the venom out of the sting
Of a thoughtless word, or a careless fling
That you made an hour ago."

AN EVENING WALK

MY friend and I were going to the railway depot. She had come off the boat in the early morning, and spent the day with me before resuming her journey westward. We were sauntering along slowly, still full of questions and answers that had been accumulating for five or more years. A man emerged from his gate, and started towards town. A little girl about four years of age came flying down the walk after him, calling wildly, "Papa, kiss me!" He walked steadily on, giving no heed to the tearful appeal. My heart ached; how could he? I thought of another little girl with brown eyes and curls, who used to race down the sidewalk with the same cry, and how thankful was I that the big father always turned, no matter how great his hurry, and held open arms for his little pet to bound into, and give him a good-bye hug! His would have been a life-long remorse had he ignored the pleading of his child's affection, as did this hard-hearted father who left his little one in tears, because he did not kiss her.

I thought, too, of Mr. Dombey, and his love for little Paul, and of poor unloved Florence, who went through childhood craving for the love that her father ever repulsed. The poor, hungry hearts of little children all around us, longing for natural affection that seems to be bottled up and labeled—"To be given in small doses at long intervals." I found the incident hurting me, and ever since I have a sense of inward pain when I recall it. Why did he not return and grant the baby's request? Was he ashamed to show such tenderness, and was he afraid we would regard him as being soft-hearted? It looked so heartless and cruel to turn a deaf ear to what would have made the little heart so happy. It was such a small favor, so easily granted, but refused, and apparently for no reason. "Papa, kiss me!" Some day his remorse may come for "offending one of these little ones."

If men but knew how much it means to wife and children to be remembered with a good-bye kiss, it would not often be omitted, or so grudgingly given. If they realized the song it leaves in the heart of the mother who faces a busy day with the work and the children, it would be tenderly given, and what woman is there with that impression of love and thoughtfulness in her mind, who could not endure the toil and weariness, and do her best in the home to make it restful and beautiful? Words are often spoken in haste; harshly, too, sometimes, in the rush of early departures, and if allowed to smoulder all day, by night a fire of unrest is burning, which would never have ignited, had the incipient flames been smothered by the good-bye kiss which meant that nothing was rankling, and the memory of that little act of tenderness would have burned out any bitterness, until

"A kiss of greeting is sweet and rare,
After the toil of the day;
But it smoothes the furrows out of the care
And lines on the forehead you once called fair,
In the years that have flown away."

"GRANDPA!"

The speaker was a little blue-eyed fairy, and the old man whom she addressed, paused in his walk and turned around.

"Hold your horses!" was her next remark, and she signified by a wave of her little hand that her mother had stopped to speak to a friend, and she wanted him to wait. He evidently understood the command, and rested on his cane, while we passed.

"What peculiar ways of expression we are allowing ourselves to drift into," I said.

"Yes," my companion answered, "I was amused at a boy, who was reading aloud to his mother. Elisha's name was mentioned, and thinking to test his knowledge of Scripture, she asked who was meant. "Oh, he was the old gink (g hard) that got the bears to eat up the bad kids that guyed him.'"

Some years ago that kind of talk was called slang, and people were admonished not to adopt that mode of expression if they desired to be proper speakers; now, we do not see so much advice about it, but we hear it on all sides. A call to meals is "Church is ready," or "The gong for hash." A letter is closed with "I must ring off," and "Well, so long."

"That doesn't cut any ice," and "Eating soup with a big spoon," convey meanings, no doubt, but when I opened wide eyes at the latter, and inquired what it meant, the bright little miss who used it informed me I was behind the times. I daresay; and yet a "mere man" reader of this page said slyly, "I hardly expected to find 'stunts' in 'Around the Hearth.'" (He was no relative understand). Well, you see, it is hard to resist, because some of those expressions cover so much ground, save words, as it were, and present day living leaves very little room for superfluities in speech or action, and so they creep in everywhere, even to the press and the pulpit.

AS the great engine turned the curve and its headlight advanced, people leaned forward to catch a glimpse. A young girl stood at the edge of the platform, as the powerful giant thundered towards us. "Do not stand so close to the edge, Hazel, or you may lose your balance, and fall over," cautioned a nervous mother. The girl turned a scornful face, and I wish I could give force to words on paper that she threw into "Don't alarm yourself; I'm not going to fall!" A woman of their party with a quiet, determined face and firm lips, gave her long braid of red hair a pull, whereupon the saucy maid stepped back, and defiantly faced her. Undismayed, the woman spoke in accents quite as forceful as hers had been—"If I had a girl of your age that would speak to me as you have spoken to your mother I would slap her well, and right here and now."

Isn't it a pity that children are permitted to speak to their parents as many of them do? It commences in babyhood, and grows with them, and it is no kindness to allow it. When they are little it may sound cute, but it is the trickling of a small stream that increases in volume and extent until parents are overwhelmed with a sea of shame and embarrassment, yet perfectly helpless in the matter, for the habit is so strong that it cannot be broken or cured. They have sowed the wind, and must reap the whirlwind. They must endure the mortification of feeling that there is no filial respect, of being contradicted, and dubbed "my old lady," and the "governor," and this, altogether aside from the too obvious fact that the child is unpopular with better trained companions.

"I never dared open my mouth when I was at home," said a woman, "and I resolved that my children should have more freedom of speech." That was her excuse for three very forward girls whom nobody could admire—a mistake built upon a mistake, which did not mend matters. A happy medium could have been struck, but there, the old world marches on with its history repeating itself. The long train stood still, the passengers got aboard, the signal was given, my friend was waving adieu as the line of cars pulled out, and my moralizing ended with the hope that the pert maiden had received a salutary lesson.

STANDING on the street corner were two women, talking. As I approached one called me by name, saying, "Come here, I want to introduce you to a stranger in our city. She attends your church, and I want you to know her, and to be good to her, for she had a lovely mother, one of the best mothers I ever knew." As I shook hands I remarked that she had been given a good recommendation, and, of course, that "reminded me" to tell them what I once heard an old grey-haired man say—"The older I grow, the more I realize the importance of being well-born." To meet people who say "I knew your father or mother, he was a good man, or she was a grand woman," is something of which to be proud. Better than gold is such a heritage.

Across the street a man dressed in Highland costume was distributing bills announcing the attractions of the theatre. A gay party of very young people, chattering and laughing entered the building, a theatre-party ,I suppose—and doesn't it seem a shame that such mere children frequent those places so much? It seems to me that our young people are blase with entertainments until nothing is left in anticipation; late parties and dancing, before they are out of public school, and so before they reach twenty they have tasted all sorts of pleasures, and are tired of it all, looking around, as it were, "for other worlds to conquer."

Turning down a quiet avenue, I see the lone man busy mowing his lawn. Only one open window upstairs tells the story of the family away camping, and the pater keeping house, that is, he sleeps there, getting his meals down town, and going to the camp or cottage for the week-end with his family. For the thousandth time I wonder why people delight in sand and woods, subject to all manner of inconveniences, food for bothersome flies and mosquitoes, and leave their homes when all is green and full of bloom .

People are passing in and out of an open church door with serious mien. They have had a busy day, and seek a little immunity from the stress of their lives in the peaceful sanctuary. If all the churches kept open doors what throngs would steal away for an hour's heart communion! Many who find it impossible to attend divine service on Sunday would quietly slip in at eventide, and come away refreshed, leaving their all upon the altar, fortified with fresh hope and courage in the sweet solemnity of the courts of the Lord.

STREET cars are unloading tired mothers with sleeping children, returning from the parks, where they have enjoyed an outing. Collapsible baby carriages are handed off and set in shape for the tired babies, and spaces filled in with lunch baskets and Teddy bears. They tell me that in the large cities women go around carrying Teddy bears in their arms. What next will not foolish womankind do? As if they haven't enough to look after with parasol, hand bag, and hobble skirts, but they must hug a toy bear to their hearts! That does seem the limit. Better the living breathing pug or poodle, that can respond in doggy fashion than the inanimate bundle of stuffed fur. When one thinks of the Infants' Homes, where poor, wan little humans are being systematically and theoretically handled, we would fain wish that the milk of human kindness would render it fashionable to adopt a deserted little waif, and accord it some of the sympathy that the dumb brute is better without.

Many couples drive by me in handsome turnouts, and it is exceptional to see a man without the inevitable pipe or cigar in his mouth. He is depriving wife and baby of the pure fresh air they might enjoy if that tobacco smoke were not blowing in their faces. 'Tis the same everywhere; take a trip on the water hoping to blow the cobwebs from your brain, and watch the dancing waves, the ubiquitous pipe is near you, offending your nostrils; attend a ball game, or watch a procession, and one is suffocated by the selfishness of men, who never stop to consider that smoke is extremely trying to many people; it is puffed in your face as you walk on the street; it spoils the atmosphere of the house, and yet we suffer it for the sake of peace—the pipe of peace, forsooth!

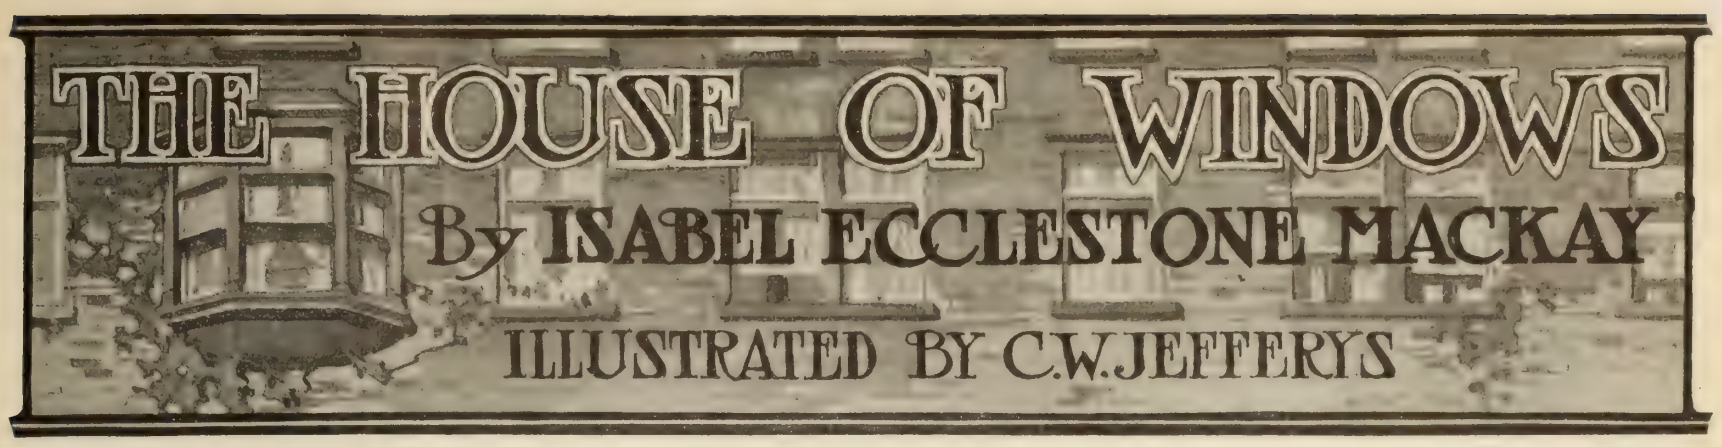
Let men smoke if they must, but they have no right to inflict it on others, to affect the throats and tender eyes of women and children, and of other men who object to the pungent and often vile odor from cheap cigars and ancient pipes. Men should smoke in private, and among themselves, and never be guilty of carrying a lighted pipe or cigar into a drawing-room; and women should frown upon the practice of men smoking when playing games across the table from them, obliging them to inhale the obnoxious stuff.

HERE is a woman among her flowers. Tenderly she sprinkles them after the heat and dust of the warm August day, handling them with loving touch. She, evidently is fond of her flowers, so am I, but I never have any luck, they simply refuse to grow for me. I have been told that we must love them in order to be successful. Perhaps that is where the secret lies—I love to see them, but begrudge the time to care for them, and caress them, noting every new bud and leaf, and so they give me meagre return.

Music flows out from an open door. The blinds are up, and I pause a second to look at the picture. A young girl is seated at an old organ, four or five standing around her singing an old, old hymn, "Homeward bound." Now, where am I? Away in the past, hands that are folded and laid away, playing the organ, voices that are silent ringing in sweet tones. "We're home at last, home at last." With those words still sounding in my ears, I open my own gate and as I rock gently in the verandah chair, quietly muse on my evening walk.

Across the square, where red-coated men are being drilled into military tactics, and discipline, come the words of command, Right! Left! Halt! Such is life. We advance, retreat, swerve to right and left, then halt. There is no shout of command, our orders come from unseen forces, but the discipline we receive keeps us in line, and Forward! March! is our motto, as we face each new day's battle.

Twilight is deepening into night, the stars come out, the shadows grow among the trees, the last twitter of birds has ceased, the day and the walk are ended.



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine, and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia. Christine secures a position in "the Stores."

"I DON'T see what my looks have to do with it." The dark girl, who had finished her work with quick, experienced hands, began to help Christine replace her ribbons. Their heads came very close together.

"I don't believe you do," she said in a lower voice. "But you will soon. Many unpleasant little experiences will teach you. Of course, a girl can always take care of herself, still it's annoying! Have you noticed that good-looking man who has been in several times to have you match ribbons for his sister?"

"Yes?"

"His sister doesn't send him to match any ribbons! That's Gilbert Van Slyke. Did you notice the way he looked at you?"

"No—why should I?"

"No reason at all. But I did. And last night he was hanging round outside the door as we came out. He got in the same car with you."

"I did not see him."

"Well, look out for him, that's all. Gracious! I don't believe you know how stunning you are You're not only pretty, you're different! A gentleman friend once said to me that after you knew a few girls all the rest were just as like as peas in a pod. But you're not. That's why folks stop and look after you in the street."

Christine looked startled and then she laughed.

"You're exaggerating!" she said. "But I do find the work much harder than I thought. If I could only sit down!"

The dark girl glanced toward the stools with a sarcastic smile. "There's a seat," she said. "Why don't you use it? You can't say that the management have not provided you with a stool."

Christine smiled faintly. She already knew that the stools with no time to sit upon them were a stock joke.

"Where are you going?" she asked the girl with the directness which close companionship brings.

"Me? Oh, I'm lucky. I'm going into a tea-room. One of the swell kind that serve light lunches and charge heavy prices. I'll be on my feet a lot, but not all day. I'm not on till nine, and I'm off at six. Better pay, too. Of course, it's not an ordinary restaurant—it's not as if I were an ordinary waitress!" she added quickly.

But Christine's aching back took no heed of the distinction. "It sounds easier than this," she said wistfully. "Do you think that I —"

The girl shook her head. "There was only one vacancy and they had 100 applicants. I got the chance through my cousin who used to be—well, my cousin knew Miss Rodgers who keeps the tea-room." So sharp is the caste line between shop-girl and servant that she could not bring herself to admit that the cousin had once been Miss Rodgers' maid.

"But I'll tell you," she went on kindly, "if there ever is another chance, I'll let you know in good time."

"Thank you, Miss Edwards," said Christine. She liked the dark girl. She had been uniformly kind to her, and kindness means more than faultless English in a hard place.

"I wish you would call me Molly," said Miss Edwards, "and say, how is your sister getting on?"

"No better," said Christine; "but no worse. The doctor prepared us for a long wait. She just lies there. She asks no questions. I don't believe she thinks at all. Ada says she does not move a finger for hours together. She knows me when I am with her, but as soon as I am gone she forgets about me. That's good, you know, for she must not be worried, and it would worry her to know that I am working."

The dark girl nodded. She planted a remaining bolt firmly on the finished pile and helped Christine to spread the dust cloth. "She used to be a good saleswoman," she said thoughtfully, "but—did you know that they were thinking of letting her go?"

"What?" asked Christine, in surprise.

"Or at least they were going to transfer her to the mantle department. She would not stand that two weeks, and they knew it."

"Who wouldn't stand what?" asked Miss Blake, who, having got rid of the yellow ribbon customer more quickly than she expected, was also spreading dust cloths.

"I don't believe it!" said Christine flatly.

"Oh, you mean about Celia Brown " said Miss Blake, comprehendingly. "My dear, you are very green. There isn't any old age pension in this store."

"Celia isn't old!"

"But she was breaking down. It's the same thing."

"It's horrible!" said Christine, flushing.

Miss Blake, a tall, cool-looking blonde, smiled. "Yes, isn't it?" she asked, but with the indifference of one to an accepted fact.

Before Christine could answer, another girl had joined the group. This clerk was older than either of the others. Her chest was hollow and her eyes unnaturally bright. Her hair was bleached and puffed and tortured into a weight that her weak-looking head seemed scarcely able to carry. Just now she was alive with the animation of a news-teller.

"Say," she began, "did you know we are to be inspected? Yes, we are! We are on the eve of a new era. The old order is going to give place to new with a vengeance. In other words, some folks are going to get it in the neck!"

She paused a moment to enjoy the mystification of her audience and then added in impish glee: "Mr. Torrance is home, and he's coming to inspect the Stores himself!"

"Gracious!" exclaimed Miss Edwards, pretending to faint against the case.

"When?" asked the more practical Miss Blake.

"To-morrow, so look your spryest. They say old Bunce is quaking in his boots. There's no telling what Mr. Torrance will do. But as he's going to take an 'active interest' in things, he's bound to do something. Somebody'll sure get fired."

Christine turned pale. "Any of us?" she asked fearfully.

"No, ninny. We're not important enough. He'll want to make a splurge. It will be a case of 'off with his head—so much for Buckingham'—(now where do you suppose I've heard that? It came pat, but I'm sure I don't know what it means!) Say, girls, did any of you ever see old Torrance?"

It appeared that none of them had, and the vivacious Miss Black rattled on ('rattled' is a good word, for her hand and jerky voice issuing from her little dried-up mouth put one irresistibly in mind of the rattling of dried peas in a withered pod). "They say he's a fine looking man. His nephew or adopted son or something, is too sweet for words. I've seen him with Miss Van Slyke. Say, he's a peach. Dark, with the loveliest eyes! They look at you so soft."

"You mean they look at Miss Van Slyke so soft?" suggested Miss Blake drily.

"Oh, I don't know," with a toss of her head. "I guess I ought to know what I mean. If a cat can look at a king, I guess—"

"A king can look at—a cat!" laughed Miss Blake, with pointed emphasis. She did not like Miss Black.

"Cat, yourself!" said the other angrily, "and if you know so much I shan't tell you any more." Her angry eyes fell on Christine, who happened to be smiling.

"Perhaps you could tell who he looks at!" snapped the girl. "You ought to know something about the connections of the Van Slyke family. Gilbert Van Slyke looks often enough at you. But you'd better tell him not to hang around the door so much. Lots of gorls have got sacked for less.'

Christine flushed crimson, but Miss Blake interrupted with easy insolence:

"Oh, drop it, Mary!" she said, and looking at Christine's crimson face she laughed. Don't you mind her," she added. And laughing with the rapid adjustment of those to whom such "scraps" were familiar, the three girls moved off to get their hats.

Christine followed more slowly. Her common sense echoed Miss Blake's advice not to mind, yet in spite of herself she did mind. The coarse words flung at her from a spiteful heart carried a sting. She felt as if she had been pelted with mud which she could not brush off. Who was this Gilbert Van Slyke, and what had the girls meant? She did remember the tall, good-looking man who had taken so long to match ribbons for his sister and had apologized so courteously for giving her so much trouble. She remembered wishing that all her customers were as considerate. And now the fellow clerks were insinuating—but no, the idea was too absurd! She thought of how Tommy Burns would look if he had heard Miss Black's remark, and the mental worry dissolved in an amused laugh.

The laugh cheered her and changed the direction of her thoughts. By the time she had patted her hair into shape and pinned on her hat she had forgotten about Mr. Van Slyke and was thinking instead about the letter in her handbag—the second letter from Mark. She had been able to give it only the briefest reading before hurrying off to work that morning—just a dip in here and there, for it was a long letter, but its presence in her bag had seemed to be a living thing all through the difficult day.

So full was her mind of the coming pleasure of re-reading it that she stumbled when getting on her car, and might have slipped badly, had not someone steadied her from behind. "Allow me," said an agreeable voice, and turning with brief thanks, she found herself looking into the handsome eyes of Gilbert Van Slyke! Yesterday she would have seen nothing strange in the incident, nor would she have thought of it again, but to-day she blushed hotly, and her ride home was made uncomfortable by the knowledge that Mr. Van Slyke, whom she had never met, and who was nothing to her, was seated, abstractedly, in the seat opposite.

CHAPTER XIV.

NOT until supper was over, and Christine was sitting alone by the sleeping Celia did the coveted opportunity come. Ada was knitting in the outer room, and even if Celia woke she would not notice.

My dear Miss Brown (the letter began), Do you know I am beginning to believe with those metaphysical fellows, that space is only an idea after all! I have shot across three-fourths of a continent since I saw you; through a mining country which is a world in itself, across prairies which one day will give space for millions of little people like you and me, over some of the most magnificent mountains on earth—yet I do not seem to be far away. The simplest solution seems to be that I have taken you with me. I am sure that I have never seen anything wonderful or beautiful in all this journey that I have not pointed it out to you and enjoyed your pleasure in it. You will be glad to know that you grew rather weary of the prairie and that the sight which you enjoyed most of all was the first glimpse of the mountains—far off, ethereal, rising, mirage-like, out of the blue distance, like white summits of eternity. You were quite silent when you saw them, and would not let me look into your eyes. When you did speak, all that you said was that you "had never seen mountains before," but that commonplace remark meant more than all the volleys of Ohs and Ahs, and picturesque choruses of admiration with which the party of amiable tourists behind us made the air thick.

How we longed, you and I, to commit assault and battery upon the bodies of those tourists! If an amiable tourist is a brother, and if to look upon a brother with a wish to kill is as bad as murder, then you and I are twin homicides! Do you remember, how, in going through Roger's Pass, we were forced to hear the very best recipe for doing down (or up) apple butter? Have you managed to forget about the new waffle mixture which, in spite of cotton in our ears, we could not help but assimilate at the Great Divide? Do you still dream at night of a shrill scream, "Oh, Ma, come here, you're missin' somethin' sweet!" For my own part I shall never forget the still sweet peace which descended upon space when our brothers and sisters (saved from sudden death by the bonds of an over-merciful civilization) alighted at Mission Junction!

Well, I have come to one conclusion anyway, and that is that a man ought to know his own country. They say that St. Peter always asks a few geographical questions before opening a certain gate. Now, as a piano man travels a lot, I should be quite safe if he asked me about remote parts of China, and even of Africa. I am not altogether ignorant of Europe and India, and I know quite enough of Russia and Norway (to say nothing of the usual routes of foreign travel) to pass me up head; but if St. Peter were to ask me if I had visited Niagara Falls, I can see my finish!

Say, but we've got a great country, you and I. A colony, are we? It makes one rather laugh—and, mind you, I'm a loyal Britisher. But after what

I have seen upon this journey the attitude of the average Englishman to "our Canadian colony" seems truly funny. It isn't the bigness altogether, although that is stupendous, it is the atmosphere, the sense of beginnings, of boundlessness, of dormant power—whew! it's great. It has given an entirely new sense to the line, "What do they know of England who only England know?" For this is as much England (or more properly Britain) as the Old Land, only over there they do not realize it yet. All the same, there is a sense of detachment which the average Englishman, wrapped up in his tight little isle, rather resents. There was a party of young Englishmen on the train. It was amusing to see their wonder grow. At the end of the fourth day one of them turned to me and said, "By Jove, this is rather a big thing, don't you know." I remarked that it was "so-so." "And everyone so darned independent," he went on. "One would think that they owned the earth, you know."

I looked out of the window.

"They do own a good slice of it."

"And this C.P.R.!" he went on. "It's an octopus, don't you know. We ride in C.P.R. trains, we put up at C.P.R. hotels, we are conveyed in C.P.R. busses, and this morning when I asked the time of the porter, he had the impudence to say, 'What time, sir, C.P.R. time?' That's going rather far, don't you know, eh?"

It is amusing to think of the suprises these young fellows must have got at Vancouver. One gathered from their talk that they were expecting the mos tastonishing things. One of them read aloud an article from a paper called "John Bull," which seriously stated that the towns and cities of the Canadian West were no places for decent women. That most of the women here were half castes, and that the few decent Englishwomen "led a life surrounded by temptation!" I wonder what those misguided youths thought of the writer of that article when they saw Vancouver's pretty girls, charming women, and beautiful homes!

You liked Vancouver. You did not say much; it is not your way; but you drew a deep breath as you drank in the beauty of cloud-draped mountain and shining water. We did not listen very carefully to the man who was telling us how many war vessels could ride in safety in that wonderful harbor. I am going to send some P. C.'s so that you may see some of the views which you admired most.

I am awfully comfortable here. Macgregor, the man I am to do business with, would not hear of me staying at the hotel. Nothing would do but that I must come right down to stay with him and become quite one of the family. Macgregor is the sort of man that one instinctively calls by his name, omitting the "Mister," not from any want of respect, but simply because any prefix seems trivial. He is a rich man, as rich men go out here, and all his money came to him, as he himself tells you in an aggrieved way, "without his lifting a hand." Having a passion for ownership he bought land when land was going begging, and the almost incredible rise in value did the rest. He told me his story the other night. In the old days he followed the railroad over the mountains, a mere day laborer, living from hand to mouth. Then he fell in love with, and married the daughter of the woman at whose house he was "putting up." She frowned upon his wandering tendencies, and would not marry him until he had a regular trade. He learned carpentering, and being really inventive and handy with tools, quickly had all he could do. Soon he became a small contractor, with a flourishing business. His surplus he invested in land. "Those were the good old days," he told me. "You think this place a good looker now, but it isn't in it with what it was then. We had a nice little four-roomed house cut right out of the woods and facing the water just about where the new esplanade is now." He sighed as he spoke of it, and I ventured to ask him what it was that he missed. "I suspect it's just youth, my lad," he said. "The country was young, and I was young. I've got most things a man sets out for, but there are some things every man is bound to lose on the way." He was thinking, I suppose, of his lost youth and of his wife who died soon after they moved into the big new house. But he is far from being an unhappy man. His latest interest is timber, and his home life is made pleasant by two of the finest girls I have ever met. When I look at them and think of the man who wrote the article in "John Bull" about Western women, I alternately laugh and grow hot. As a matter of fact, either Jane or Maria could wear a coronet with distinction. Jane is the older, and the taller, and the fairer. She is built on big lines, and has a head and face that could give a Greek statue points. She is a University graduate, a linguist, and a first-class musician. Her conversation (I use the word advisedly) is a joy. Marian is smaller and darker than her sister. Her hair is brown, and crinkles over her little ears. Her laugh is her great charm. I wonder and admire every time I hear it. She is not as clever as Jane, but she is charming. If you remember, you were inclined to like Marian the better!"

Christine laid down the letter here and sighed dolefully. It was only too easy to visualize the two girls—Jane so tall and fair, a linguist, a musician. Marian with the merry laugh and hair that crinkled.

For the first time since entering the Stores she thought of a possible loss of her own beauty with a sharp pang. What if he came back from these lovely Western girls to find her, Christine, faded, ill, perhaps, tired, dull and uninteresting. In panic she flew to her mirror, and sighed with relief—she had not changed much—yet! It was strange, she thought, that he said nothing about pianos—except that Jane was a good musician. Was he a musician himself, she wondered, and then flushed with vexation to know how much her want of knowledge pained her. So often little things like this reminded her that she knew really nothing of this man. That he knew nothing of her! He might care enough to write—but perhaps it was only a passing attraction that she had for him. When he saw her again, when he knew her better, he might not like her at all. When she spoke of this to Tommy he always wisely added, "Or you may not even like him." But somehow she did not quite agree with Tommy in this. "Women are better judges of character than men," she informed him sagely—at which Tommy only laughed.

She returned to the letter in a despondent mood. There was, she knew, another page of description of Jane and Marian, but this time she skipped it deliberately. She felt that she did not want to know anything more about them, and besides the remainder of the letter, although not daring to be too outspoken, was in some subtle way comforting.

You will wonder, the letter continued, why I am not at work, but this is really part of my work. I am getting to know what my uncle calls the "conditions." In another week or so Macgregor and I are going up the Coast in a tug. It ought to be a trip for your life! We hope to get back before the rains, and then—then I am coming home! You know you did not promise to write to me, but you did promise not to forget me. Do promises really hold good in a case like that? I am such an easily-forgotten fellow. I haven't even a big nose. I know that Miss Jane Macgregor thinks that this fact alone is damning. All great men, she says, have big noses. It's very discouraging. My only comfort was that Miss Marian, whose nose is sweetly small and tip-tilted, made a face and said that in that case she trembled to think of the coming greatness of the washwoman's baby , who was simply all nose!

One's notions of caste get a sharp knock out here. My uncle, you know, is by way of being a bit proud of his family and so forth, but he isn't a bit prouder than folk out here who haven't an ancestor to their names. These girls, for instance, whose mother waited on table, and whose father worked as a navvy, would be quite undismayed in shaking hands with a princess. It would not occur to them that there was any reason for undue diffidence. But this attitude, undoubtedly genuine, is marred by a curious inconsistency, for once yesterday I heard Miss Jane excuse herself from calling upon a lady, newly come to town, on the ground that she did not know anything about her, and that "One simply can't call on just everybody." This attitude was also quite genuine—funny old world, isn't it?

Are you going to write to me at all? I think that the fact of your not having written means that you do not intend to do so. I had no reason to hope that you would. The privilege of writing to you and the memory of your other promise is surely as much as any man (with less nose than a washwoman's baby) has any right to expect. But surely if you were ill, or in trouble, you would let me know? Surely I may take your silence as a sign that all is well and happy with you? If I did not believe that I would throw up this business in spite of fate and come home.

Macgregor is calling me for a game of billiards (they have an elegant table). Good-bye, then—why has our English undefiled no word less formal than good-bye? Auf weidersehen,

Your friend,

MARK WAREHAM.

CHAPTER XV.

MISS TORRANCE leaned back in her invalid's chair, tapping its polished arm impatiently while Martha, with deliberate movements, dusted the books upon the round table. Presently her big voice boomed out:

"That will do, Martha! You have gone over that Tennyson three times. He hasn't been dead long enough to need quite that much dusting. You may put on your bonnet and go for a walk. As you go down, tell Mary that when my brother, Mr. Torrance, calls, he is to come right up. Hand me my salts."

Martha fetched the salts sulkily. Her heavy face showed plainly that she had no desire to take a walk. Martha was a born spy, though rather a stupid one, and a visit from Mr. Torrance was an unusual happening.

"You're very kind, m'am," she said, "but having had a raging toothache all night—"

"Take a walk to the dentist," said the mistress promptly. "Go at once."

Martha, having placed the salts in the least accessible place, went out slowly.

"I declare her temper gets worse and worse," mused Miss Torrance. "What I stand it for heaven only knows. She was as curious as I am to know what Adam wants."

To conceal her impatience, she picked up the much-dusted Tennyson, and when later, Mr. Torrance was announced, she was still reading or thinking.

"Well, Adam," she remarked, austerely, "sit down. No, not there. Gracious! a man of your age ought to know enough not to sit in a strong light. You're not looking well. What's the matter?"

Mr. Torrance indeed was not looking well. His was one of those faces, more commonly seen in women than in men, which show unerringly a state of mental perturbation. Usually serene, the slightest break-up of fair weather conditions was especially noticeable; but with the usual instinctive revolt from too plain speaking he remarked that he had not said that anything was the matter.

His sister waved this feebleness away with a strong gesture. "Obvious," she declared, "or else why a tie which does not match and why a visit to me? It is Mark, I suppose. Has he come back from that Thingumey place? I told you—"

"It is not Mark. He is still in Vancouver, or thereabouts. I took your advice, as you know—wisely or unwisely. And now I want a little more definite information. This Miss Brown—"

The invalid waved her hand determinedly. "I have nothing whatever to tell you about Miss Brown."

"Now, Miriam, I know your stubbornness. In this case I appreciate its cause. Miss Brown's concerns are no affair of ours. This I admit. I am not prying. I wish merely to ask you a simple question."

"U-um!" said Miss Torrance. "What is the simple question?"

"Is this—er—Miss Brown a clerk in a store?"

Miss Torrance took a long whiff at her salts. She was enjoying herself immensely.

"A leading question," she decided, after a moment's pause. "But I don't say that I will not answer it, provided you, on your part, tell me why you want to know."

Mr Torrance permitted himself to smile.

"My dear Miriam," he said, "I fully intend to tell you—otherwise I should not have been so foolish as to come. Besides, I want to tell some one—a sign of old age, eh?"

"Undoubtedly," agreed the invalid promptly.

"Yet at forty-five one is not so very old."

Miss Torrance pursed her lips judicially. "It depends upon the person."

"Well, we won't quarrel. You know that for many years I have taken a great interest in the conduct of the Stores, an interest which I have not been able to render as—er—practical as I could wish. But lately, when I found myself at home again, and with no pressing business to distract me I decided to look into things practically, personally, you know."

The invalid closed her eyes and sniffed at her salts.

"Yesterday I went down to the Stores and had an extended interview with the manager."

"Really?" said Miss Torrance, opening her eyes.

"Naturally, it was the best way to begin."

"Naturally," agreed the other, "for of course if anything is wrong, the manager, who is responsible, would hasten at once to show you exactly where the trouble was and implore you to dismiss him and provide someone more competent."

"U-um—I had thought of that. But there seemed no other course to take. A person in my position could hardly act the spy among the subordinates."

Miss Torrance sighed and closed her eyes again.

"Of course I walked through the Stores, myself, first. I noted everything. The ventilation (which shall certainly be improved), the measures taken for the comfort of the clerks, stools, you know. I particularly noticed that all the counters have stools."

"How nice for the counters!" murmured the invalid.

"An eminent doctor once told me that it is nothing less than barbarous to expect a woman to stand on her feet all day. I am not a barbarian."

"Do you make 'em sit down?"

"I give them the opportunity."

"Oh!

"I wonder," went on her visitor, with apparent irrelevance, "if you can tell me why so many of the girls—"

"Lady clerks," murmured the invalid.

"Why so many of the girls dress their hair in such an elaborate manner?"

"I am not a psychologist, my dear Adam."

"And why they have such—er—haughty manners?"

"Haughty! Oh, dear! Where are my salts?"

"I suppose it is the correct thing. They are all the same, nearly all. I noted some exceptions."

"Really!"

"Yes. You see, I went into it thoroughly."

"You would, naturally. But you were going to tell me about Miss Brown."

"Yes. I didn't know she was Miss Brown at first. I saw her almost as soon as I entered the Stores. She was at the ribbon counter, which is just at the entrance."

"What made you notice her?"

"Her hair, I think. Her back was turned to me at first. And I noticed her hair—wonderful hair! It was not dressed like the other girls', but gathered low just at her neck. Its color was—er—remarkable. I don't know that I can say just what color it was—a peculiar gold—"

"Like honey, perhaps?" suggested the invalid.

A wave of color suffused the man's face, leaving it very pale. "That was unkind," he said, simply. "But, nevertheless, the epithet is not misplaced. This young girl's hair is indeed of that indefinable shade which made Mona's so lovely. Her face is beautiful also. I even fancied—well, it doesn't matter! After I had walked through the Stores and inspected everything I had my talk with the manager. Mr. Bunce seems an able man, but I am afraid, I'm afraid he was not quite frank."

"You surprise me!"

"For instance, I asked him whether that old rule which I had made was still carefully enforced. I refer to the employing of only such girls as have homes and other means of support, so that the rate of wages which we are compelled to pay shall be quite—er—sufficient."

"Is that a rule? Do you tell me that the only girls who receive employment in the Stores are

Continued on page 42

THE COST OF A CRIME

A Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

CHAPTER I.

THE RENT VEIL.

THE two men eyed one another for a moment in a kind of dread silence. Up into the small, somewhat dingy room where they stood came the hum from the street below; London Wall at the busiest hour of the working day. A church clock in the near distance tolled the hour of three, and the languor and burden of a summer afternoon brooded over London, making labor a weariness and thought an exertion scarcely to be borne.

But strenuous thought, nay, a most unusual emotion, was written upon the faces of these two men; every faculty was alert; it was a moment of the most intense, almost unbearable strain.

"It's all up, John, you have said it!" said the one hoarsely, a slight, slim man with a keen clean-shaven face and dark penetrating eyes, "My God, that it should have come to this! Man alive, can't you speak and tell me what it means?"

Reedham did not speak for another moment, his face seemed to remain impassive, though a tremor just stirred his lips.

It was a good, attractive, handsome face; indeed, John Reedham was known familiarly in the city as Beau Reedham. He was of tall, fine figure, fair complexion, with an abundance of fair hair, and, contrary to the growing habit among city men, he wore a moustache and a short pointed beard. His eyes were blue and extraordinarily winning, though at the moment they were clouded by the passion and misery in his soul.

"Have you nothing to say for yourself, John?" asked his friend Lidgate desperately, the silence becoming momentarily more unendurable.

"Nothing whatever to say," Reedham answered at last in an even calm voice that had, however, a hollow ring.

"There must be some explanation," pursued the other as he ran his fingers through his grey hair. Lidgate had become early grey and he had that old-young look you see in men who have been cheated of the fulness of life. Reedham, on the other hand, looked like a man who had lived and loved, and tasted most of the good gifts of life.

"Thirteen thousand pounds cannot be disposed of in a day, and you can't lay it at the door of home extravagance. What in God's name have you done with it?"

Reedham shrugged his shoulders.

"I can't explain. I speculated foolishly, madly, if you like, and it's gone, that's the beginning, middle, and end."

"But gone where? Have you been living a double life, John?" ,

The question arose out of the desperate hour. It touched Reedham to the quick, and the color flushed his face. "In the sense in which you mean it, no. My life is as clean as yours, Lidgate, and you know it."

"But you'll have to own up. If anything is to be done to help you we must know what has actually been done with the money."

Once more Reedham shrugged his shoulders.

"I have nothing more to say. Now, what are you going to do?"

Lidgate regarded him wonderingly, unable to believe that this hunted, desperate man could be his partner and his friend, the sunny-hearted, lovable personality that had made his own business life not only tolerable, but more than usually pleasant. The pity and the horror of it seemed for the moment to lie more heavily on Lidgate than on the culprit himself.

"Will you wait till Sir Philip and James Currie come back?" he inquired dully, more to gain time perhaps than anything else.

"No, I am going now, that is if I am allowed by you. Sir Philip and James Currie! The first is getting into his dotage, the second would turn and rend me and be glad of the chance. I did not mean you to know, George. Bad luck has put me in your power. Am I to go or stay? You know without my telling what staying will mean, not only to me, but—but to Bessie and the boy."

"I am trying to think," said Lidgate, and his face grew even more ashen-hued. He was an upright man, and the pride of the old firm had been in its past record. Lowther, Currie and Co. were names synonymous with the best traditions of business life, but the Co. had failed. As one of the younger partners, he resented the fact that the first stain should have come from those who had been brought in from without. He could sympathise with the attitude James Currie would adopt, though personally he did not like the man. "What have you in your mind?" he asked after a futile attempt to follow the catastrophe to its probable conclusion.

"I must leave London to-night, I suppose, to-morrow it will be too late. But I can only go if you let me. I realize that. How long shall I have to wait for your decision?"

It was not one to be lightly taken, for Lidgate had a duty to others besides himself. But the memory of a woman's face rose up before him, and enabled him to speak immediately and in no uncertain terms.

"I will give you the remainder of the day, Reedham. You had better go now." Reedham bowed his head.

"It is not long, but the longest I can give. James Currie will be back to-morrow, and everything must come out. There will be no mercy shown, John. You can understand that. It is ten minutes past three now," he said, taking out his watch. "Twelve hours till three to-morrow morning, six more till nine, when he will be here. Eighteen hours! Well, many a man has saved his life in less. You had better go."

He slipped his watch into his pocket, and turned away, unable to contemplate longer the face of the man who had wrought such woe.

Reedham looked round the room, with which many years of business life had familiarized him, with a vague, unseeing stare. Each day for five and twenty years with very few breaks, for he had been, and was, a very strong man, he had spent so many hours within these walls, how strange to know them no more for ever!

"Eighteen hours! thank you, George," he said with a little start, becoming conscious of some impatience in his friend. "As you say, many a life has been saved in less. I don't exactly know how I am going to use them, but it is kindly done. I might have done as much for you, who knows, but you will never need it. Try not to think too hardly of me after I am gone. It is possible that one day the tale may be told, and that it may prove to be not altogether to my discredit. Will you—will you give an eye to them at home?"

His voice faltered, and Lidgate turned suddenly and let a heavy hand fall on his shoulder.

"John, I would give ten years of my life to have prevented this; nay, I believe I would have given my life itself. It's awful. Remember, I only allow you to go on the one condition, that you don't take your own life."

"I won't do that, I'll see the thing through," said the other quietly. "I don't care about that sort of thing. It has never interested me in the least."

The tone was slightly flippant, but Lidgate could read between the lines.

"I will say one thing before I avail myself of your kindness; it is this: I will go in a direction whence you will hear of me again, and not to my discredit."

"You will be careful to-day, John, for the sake of Bessie and the boy."

Reedham turned away suddenly, reached the door, and then looked back.

"Good-bye, I'm outside the pale. Look after them, Bessie trusts you; I have sometimes thought she would have been happier with you, George. I've been a bad card all through."

He went out suddenly as if he had reached the limit where endurance and outward courage could be maintained. Lidgate made as if to follow him, but drew back. He was suffering intensely, more intensely at the moment than the man who had wrought all the woe. That was simply because Reedham had not yet realized the extent of the consequences. Lidgate, a solitary man, and by nature thoughtful, seemed to have grasped them in a moment. He knew that in suffering Reedham to depart unscathed he had been guilty of treachery to a great body of persons, who would call for his just punishment. But he did not care. In this case, punishment, while it might meet and partly satisfy indignation, could not undo the misery and ruin that had been wrought. Lidgate loved John Reedham; for nearly twenty years they had been as brothers; they had loved the same woman, the woman who was now Reedham's wife, and for whose sake Lidgate had remained unmarried. There never had been a cloud between them, and this blow was wholly unexpected. It had wholly unmanned Lidgate. He locked the door after Reedham left the room, then, with a sudden impulse, he walked to the window where he stood until he had the poor satisfaction of seeing Reedham cross the street, making his way with quite a jaunty step through its throng and press. There was no slouch nor hesitation about his step or bearing; he certainly did not look like a man who was down.

The glossy silk hat caught the sun's sheen, and Lidgate saw that he had not even forgotten to put on his gloves. The very embodiment of success and prosperity did John Reedham look as he passed for the last time through the busy haunts of men in the market places of the world.

Lidgate carried that picture with him for many days, it unconsciously helped him through the trying and appalling hours to come.

He felt glad, yes, secretly and undeniably glad, that Reedham did not go forth like a beaten hound.

But these thoughts had to be put on one side. The day had to be faced. There was no particular matter pressing. Of the four partners concerned in the business, he was the sole representative left in London at the moment. Reedham did not now count. Probably in an hour's time he would be out of England. Lidgate casually remembered that the boat train for Calais left Charing Cross at five o'clock.

Lidgate lived in town, in a suite of bachelor chambers in the Albany. He was the only unmarried partner. Sir Philip Lowther, the head of the concern, lived on his estate in Herts, James Currie in a mansion almost equally valuable on Hampstead Heath, Reedham's home was at Norwood. It had been his custom to leave the city about six o'clock, getting to his home before seven Lidgate was haunted during the early hours of the evening by the vision of Reedham's wife waiting at home, her anxiety growing more keen every moment. At eight o'clock, just as he rose from his own dinner, he was not surprised when the telephone bell rang, and Mrs. Reedham asked for him. He went to it with great unwillingness, wondering what he should say.

Reedham was very exact and punctual in his habits, so seldom late that his non-appearance was certain to cause uneasiness at home.

In answer to her anxious inquiries he could only say that Reedham had left the office at three o'clock in the afternoon, and that he had heard nothing of him since. He had supposed, more than once, that he would go home then, perhaps to see his wife for the last time.

That he had not done so was evinced by the anxiety in her tone.

"Eat your own dinner," said Lidgate, " and I will come out to you. There is something to explain."

He realised that there was no escape, and that it would fall to his lot to tell Bessie Reedham what had occurred. For the first time his bitterness against Reedham became insistent, he even felt that he had behaved like a coward, leaving others to face the music.

The ordeal of the next hour would require all his powers of endurance and courage; he began insensibly to prepare himself for it. He had not dressed for dinner, partly because he felt himself so utterly out of sorts, and partly because at the back of his mind there had lurked the expectation that he would be summoned to Norwood. He took a hansom to Victoria, and a train which brought him very near Reedham's home about nine o'clock.

It was by no means a pretentious abode, the income he had drawn in the firm for the last ten years might easily have justified one more pretentious. But it was very beautiful and homelike, chiefly because its mistress belonged to the great body of homemakers who help to build the national life. Wherever Bessie Reedham dwelt there came that subtle aroma, that delightful atmosphere of home which cannot be bought or acquired. Like all the heavenly gifts it is inborn.

The modest garden before the door was wholly laid down in soft green turf, a marvel of softness and beauty, because it was continually cared for. The exterior of the house was dainty and inviting, the interior a harmony of soft colors and simple things chosen with an exquisite taste. Mrs. Reedham opened the door to Lidgate herself; as a matter of fact she had been waiting in the hall. She wore a white gown. Lidgate always remembered how she looked just then, where the soft light from the hall lamp fell upon her. She was ten years younger than Reedham, and was now in her thirty-fourth year. She had a graceful figure, about middle height, and a very sweet face, with a good deal of character in it. Her eyes were the most beautiful feature of her face, large, grey, expressive, with a singular clearness of depth and expression. Lidgate thought he had seldom seen her look more attractive, as she came forward, offering a frank hand of welcome.

"How good of you to come out all this way, George! but it is just like you. What on earth has happened to John?"

Lidgate hung up his hat without immediately answering.

"I suppose he has been called away on important business," she continued, suspecting nothing. "But it is so unlike him to treat me like this, and we had arranged to meet some friends at the Crystal Palace to-night. I have been obliged to telephone to them. What has happened, anyway?"

Lidgate turned to face her, rubbing his hands nervously together. His tongue seemed to cleave to the roof of his mouth.

"Is Leslie quite well?" he asked vaguely.

"Leslie? Yes, quite, we had a letter from him this morning," she said in surprise. "Why, something has happened, George, I know it has. You are looking so ill."

"Where can we talk undisturbed?" he asked desperately. "Yes, something has happened. I don't like my errand, Bessie, but it has to be got through."

Her startled eyes seemed to leap upon his face. At sight of him the natural anxiety over her long waiting had flown. It sprang into new and painful being again at his words.

She opened the door of the little library they used as a breakfast-room and passed in, he following with his eyes fixed on the floor. When he had closed the door he faced her with a kind of borrowed courage.

"There is no use beating about the bush, Bessie, an awful thing has happened."

"To John!" she cried, and the anguish in her voice went to Lidgate's heart like a knife.

"Yes and no. Physically, John is all right, nothing has happened to him, but it is an awful thing all the same."

"Tell me quickly," she panted, "I am no fool, remember, who must have things glossed over. Tell me the worst."

"I will indeed. I have no choice. John has made away with thirteen thousand pounds of trust money, and and has had to run away."

The baldness of the words was more convincing than the most elaborate statement.

Her face became white as the lace at her throat, she clasped her nervous hands together, her voice sank almost to a whisper.

"It cannot be truth you are telling me. Thirteen thousand pounds! What has he done with it?"

"If anybody could tell me that," replied Lidgate gloomily, "I should feel a little better in my mind."

"Where is he? How was it discovered? Why has he not come home to explain and clear up matters? Is there nothing more behind?"

"Nothing, the bare fact is enough. To-morrow Sir Philip and James Currie will be back at business. You know that they are men of iron. It was a happy thing for him that I was the first to discover it."

Her eyes seemed to cleave to his face, and some comprehension of the truth dawned upon her.

"You have helped him to get away," she said brokenly.

He answered with a nod.

"He has eighteen hours' start, or will have before the others can or need know. It ought to be enough."

"For him to get out of the country?"

"Yes."

There was a moment's strained silence, then she spoke again.

"Perhaps he will not go out of the country. He may—he may seek another way out."

"I have his word that he will not attempt his own life, and I don't think he will. He does not lack courage."

"It will have to be made public, will it, in all the newspapers?"

"That will depend on Lowther and Currie, chiefly, I should say on Lowther. No, I don't think it will be made public. It would be too damaging to our business."

"And the poor people who have been robbed, robbed, my God, by my husband! What will become of them?"

"They will probably never know; we shall each bear our share. But I can say nothing until after the meeting to-morrow."

He spoke purposely in curt, brief sentences, restraining the intense sympathy he felt, because he feared the scene that might follow.

It was a mighty blow for any woman. On Bessie Reedham it seemed to fall with special keenness. He saw her sensitive face change from youth to middle age in that moment of supreme anguish, and realised that hope was quenched for ever in her heart. Her idol had been thrown down, and to some women that means the end of all things.

He spoke to her again, and very gently.

"You have taken it very bravely, but not more bravely than I, knowing what you are, expected. It is a mystery. Perhaps if we wait a little longer it will be solved."

She shook her head.

"Something tells me my life is over, that I shall never see my husband again. And we were so happy! I suppose that is it, we were too happy for this life. We are told so often that perfect happiness is not here, but I could wish mine had been marred in a different way. Dishonor, treachery, these are words I could never have associated with him! Can't you explain things to me, George, where the money has gone; what he wanted with such a large sum? I am filled with a thousand forebodings."

"You need not add to the burden my—my dear," he said with difficulty. "I do not think that so far as he was concerned there has been any mystery. Indeed, I put it to him. The money has been lost in idle and foolish speculation undertaken for some end we don't know. I suppose it was to benefit you and the boy."

The mention of the boy seemed to awaken a new chord of anguish in Bessie Reedham's heart.

"The boy! I have been so proud of him, George, and now he will have a heritage of shame. I have prayed that he might grow up good and kind and noble like his father. What must I pray now? How am I to explain it to the child when he never comes home! It is cruel; it is horrible! No woman ought to be called to such suffering. I have not deserved it."

"No, by Heaven you haven't. But that is the misery of the world," Lidgate reminded her. "It is the innocent who suffer most and longest. I am deeply sorry for you."

"And you think he has gone out of London like a thief in the night; that I shall never see him again, even to say good-bye."

"It would not be safe. To-morrow, perhaps, Currie will put the police on his track. One never knows what he will do, and his idol has been the integrity of his firm. Besides, Reedham and he have been antagonistic to one another for some time, which would make him less inclined to be lenient to him. I hope, for Reedham's sake, but still more for yours, that he has actually left London. I think he must have done, or he would have come home."

Bessie Reedham walked to and fro the narrow room wringing her hands. To Lidgate it was almost an intolerable sight, and he cursed the man who had wrought such woe.

"I fear I can do little good by staying, though I could wish you had someone with you. Is there no one for whom I could send before I leave you? I cannot bear the thought of leaving you alone in your present state of mind."

"There is no one. To whom could I tell this terrible thing? We have never had many intimate friends; somehow we have not seemed to feel the need for them. I shall be all right, I assure you. No, nothing will happen to me. By the morning I shall have become calmer and will know how to act."

"The greatest wrong of all is the position in which you will be left," said Lidgate hardly. "Of course, there will be, there can be nothing for you. But believe me, I will do my utmost to see that some provision is made for you; at least, until the boy is of age to help you—"

She held up a quick, deprecating finger.

"I beg—nay, I insist—that you will do nothing of the kind. How could I touch such money? No, no; my effort will be to do something that can help to wipe this terrible stain from my husband's memory and name. But I will try not to give up hope yet; I will keep on expecting that he will come back to explain everything. I believe he will."

The compassion deepened in Lidgate's eyes, but he could have ground his teeth. In what base coin had Reedham repaid the pure gold of this woman's love and faith!

"Promise me you will try to be brave, and to believe that I at least will do everything to shield you," he said, as he turned to go.

"Oh, yes, I can believe that. Do not I know it? Never, surely, had man or woman such a friend as you," she said, with all her heart in her eyes. "May God bless you; and I will teach my boy to reverence you as one of the very best of men."

Lidgate faintly smiled at the form of the words.

"I hate to leave you like this," he said, as he moved towards the door. "You ought to have someone with you."

She shook her head.

"No, no. Don't you see that there are sorrows with which no stranger may intermeddle? I am quite strong; you need not fear for me. The worst is over, and God will help me for the rest."

She held out her hand; he pressed it in both his own.

Their eyes met in a long, deep look, and a slow flush rose to Bessie Reedham's face and dyed it red; even her throat was tinged.

For the first time in her life she understood and knew what had been in this man's mind and heart concerning her all these years.

The veil was rent betwixt these two, and could never more be pieced together.

"I beg your pardon," he said thickly. "I did not mean—I hoped that you would never know. But there are things beyond a man's power to help or hide. Yes, I have always loved you; but, before God, that love will be devoted now to your service as a friend's love. You will try to believe that, so that we may sometimes meet? You will not banish me from your presence for this?"

"Oh, no," she said faintly. "How could I? There is nobody else, but go now—I—I cannot bear much more."

He went out softly, and closed the door. His heart was heavy as he turned away from the desolate house.

If only he could have remained under her roof, unseen and unobtruding, to comfort and protect her! But it was less than ever possible now.

He had no alternative but to go.

Meanwhile, he of whom they had talked was not so very far away, only separated from them by the breadth of London.

The offices of Lowther, Currie and Co., in London-wall, occupied the whole of one of the older houses, and were in charge of a caretaker, who lived in the basement, an old man, nicknamed Tony, but whose real name was Charles Barrett. He had been in the employment of the firm for the long period of forty years, and had so grown to the place that he was verily a part of it. He had very snug rooms in the basement, and was as handy and tidy as any woman in all his household ways. Many envied the firm the possession of Tony. About nine o'clock that evening he was smoking a pipe at the open door, when someone came along the deserted street, and paused in front of him. It seemed a tall figure in the distance, with a stoop in the shoulders, and a certain slouching gait. Tony did not like stragglers after dark. He was on the alert at once.

"Evening'," said the man as he came up under the gas lamp before the door; but he kept his back to it so that the light did not fall full upon his face. It was a clean-shaven face, somewhat heavily-featured. Tony decided that it was a suspicious face.

"Evenin' too, mister! Whatcher want?" he asked, in his gruffest voice.

"I suppose Mr. John Reedham, one of your partners has gone home?"

"I should 'ope 'e 'as, at this time o' nite. 'E wouldn't want to see the likes ov you, anyway."

"I mite have done a bit of profitable business with him, governor, for all that," replied the other. "What hours does he keep? When does he come to business in the morning?"

"When he's ready. P'raps you'd like to ask me anuvver one, afore I shoves yer on, matey," said Tony facetiously.

"You're not very free, certainly," returned his questioner. "Have a smoke, they're good.

He turned deliberately round as he opened his cigar case, and Tony saw his face in the full light. But it was still to him a strange face, in which there was not a suggestion of familiarity. A pair of blue spectacles hid the soul-revealing eyes.

"Drugged, may be; no thank you, sir. I'll be bidding yer good night," said Tony drily, and he went in banging the strong door behind him.

"Don't like the looks ov that bloke. 'e's flash," he muttered to himself as he proceeded along the passage to the basement stair.

The bloke in question, retracing his steps the way he had come, laughed silently to himself, and rubbed his hands together in supreme satisfaction. For the disguise which had taken in the astute and watchful Tony would surely pass muster in the hurrying world of men.

CHAPTER II.

THE AFTERMATH.

LESLIE REEDHAM, the defaulting speculator's only son, was at a preparatory school at Reigate, in Surrey, his name having been down for Winchester for two years. He was now fourteen and expected to pass on to the public school at the beginning of another term. It was a very good school, with a high reputation, and the wife of the principal had been a school friend of Bessie Reedham's in her girlhood. She had been very happy in sending him to the Luttrells, and the boy himself had been happy there.

A few days after the discovery of Reedham's defalcation Luttrell received a letter from Mrs. Reedham, asking if he could come up to Norwood at once and see her.

"Tell Evelyn I am in great trouble, about which I cannot write, and that for the moment there seems nothing before me but despair. Please say nothing to Leslie as yet. I will tell him myself a little later on. The end of the term will soon be here, and by that time, perhaps, things will seem less dreadful than they do now. Forgive me for writing so vaguely, and please come when you receive this if possible. It will be only another added to the long list of kindnesses I have received from you both."

The husband and his wife stared at one another blankly.

"She doesn't say one single word about John, dear," said Mrs. Luttrell, in a troubled voice. "Therefore it isn't illness, or sudden death. What can it be?"

"Financial, I should say," replied Luttrell, "I'll go up at twelve-forty."

"And I, too. If Bessie is in any trouble I must be near her; she has not a sister, and she isn't one of those women who have innumerable intimate friends."

Luttrell made no demur. His thoughts were naturally pre-occupied during the morning hours in school, and he could not help furtively watching the lad whose future life and career would probably be affected by what they had heard. His parents had built high hopes on him, and were ambitious for his future; he being intended for the bar. He was a handsome lad, very like his mother, and a general favorite, and in his fourteen years of life he had lived in an atmosphere of happiness and love.

The Luttrells arrived at Norwood early in the afternoon. Mrs. Reedham expected them, having been apprised by wire of their coming. They found her quite alone, apparently calm and self-possessed, though her pale face and heavy eyes spoke of troubled days and sleepless nights.

"It was very good of you both to come," she said, as she kissed her friend. "I would have come down, only I should have had to face Leslie, and I am not ready for that."

"What has happened?" asked Mrs. Luttrell bluntly. It was hard to associate the idea of trouble with that beautiful and luxurious home where she had often spent restful days.

"Sit down and I will try to tell you as much as I know myself. It is not a thing one can easily realise or grasp."

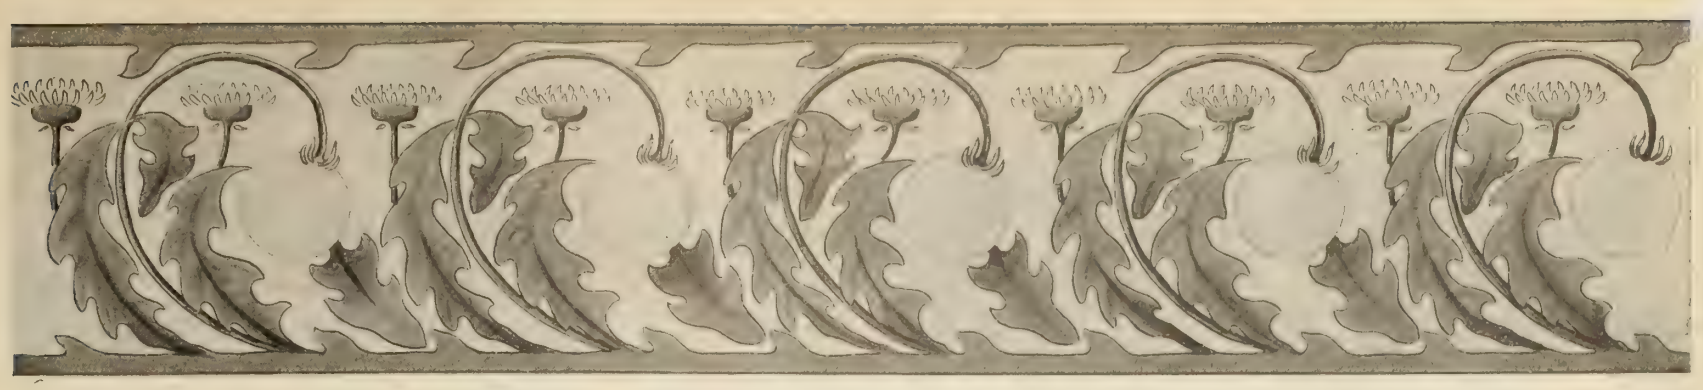
"John is quite well?" said Evelyn at hazard, and by the immediate contraction of Mrs. Reedham's brows she gathered where the trouble lay.

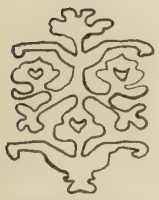
"John has gone away and left us."

"Impossible! Bessie! Why he loved you to distraction."

A melancholy smile flitted across Mrs. Reedham's face.

Continued on page 18





PERSIAN ROSE

THE MAKING OF ORIENTAL RUGS

An Account of How These Highly Valued Fabrics are Wrought

By DORA S. RIDOUT

THE growing appreciation of Oriental rugs seems to point to the fact that people are once more demanding handiwork in the decoration of their houses. Not only are rugs from Persia, Turkey and India infinitely more beautiful and durable than the factory-made articles of our own country, but there is mystery and romance about them that is irresistible to those who practice the delightful occupation of collecting.

The rug-making industry of the Orient is carried on almost entirely by the women of the community. At a very tender age the girls begin their instruction in the art, and this is frequently the only education they are given.

The looms are very simple in construction, and are generally found in groups, outside the rough village dwellings. Two perpendicular poles are driven into the ground; horizontal rollers are fixed at the top and bottom, and the threads of the warp are stretched between. Great tufts of the worsted hang over the workers, who tie knots of it onto the warp and clip them to the required length. The quality of the rug is determined by the number of knots to the square inch.

Children of six begin tying the knots where a field of one color is required, and when they become proficient in this, simple designs are given them. As they grow older the young girls' interest is stimulated by being allowed to begin their dower rugs, into which the more sentimental of them weave locks of their hair. These dower rugs seldom leave their native country, for when the young woman has thus shown herself thoroughly versed in her work, a prospective husband appears, pays a sum of money to her father, and carries off his bride, together with the proof of her usefulness.

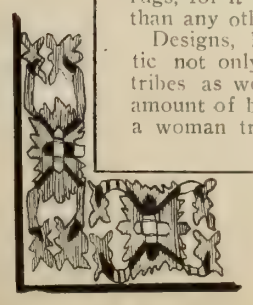
Infinite patience is required in the work, but this characteristic is very pronounced in the East. One square foot of the best rugs takes a woman twenty-three days to make, and for this she or her lord and master only receives ten dollars, out of which must come the wool and the cost of dyeing.

Meanwhile the men of the tribe take care of the sheep, camels and Angora goats from which the wool or hair for the rugs is obtained. If camel's hair is used, very great care must be taken in the feeding and daily washing of the animals to ensure the best results.

The dyeing of the wool is generally undertaken by one family in the village, and it is a most delicate operation. Recipes for vegetable dyes are handed down from father to son and guarded very jealously. The difference in the shading, so often seen in Oriental rugs, is due to the difficulty in dyeing the worsted always the exact shade.

It is interesting to note the various meanings attached to the colors by the Oriental. For instance, Babylon scarlet indicates fire; blue, air; purple, water; black, error; white, innocence of soul, and red, zeal of truth. Green is not used by the Mohammedans, as in their eyes it is a sacred color, and must not be trodden upon.

FORTUNATELY the Eastern mind has a great distrust of everything Western, or else the pernicious use of aniline dyes would be much more general than it is. The Shah, too, has helped greatly in this direction by forbidding the importation of chemical dyes. The great objection, of course, to its use is that the colors are not nearly so rich, and when they fade, which they do very quickly, they become dead-looking and ugly. Black is a color to be avoided in Oriental rugs, for it loses its beauty more quickly than any other, and rots the wool.



CRAB BORDER

Designs, like colors, are characteristic not only of countries, but also of tribes as well, though there is a certain amount of borrowing. In some districts a woman travels about from village to village teaching the young girls the tribal patterns. Sometimes she draws them upon the sand, but again she merely chants them in weird songs, and the workers make notes in the earth beside their looms. They are wonderfully quick to learn, and yet do not necessarily adhere strictly to the patterns with regard to color and minor details. Passing phaises in a girl's life may be depicted in the rug, by the introduction of a certain tree, a lock of hair, or a figure.

There is an immense amount of wear in Oriental rugs, especially when they are left in their native land; for the Persian or Turk never enters his dwelling without first removing his shoes or sandals. From this constant rubbing of bare feet upon them the rugs acquire that wonderful silkiness of sheen so much admired by connoisseurs. Age, too, tones down the colors, blending and harmonizing the various shades. It is generally admitted that no rug is at its best until it is at least ten years old.

Only study and observation can teach the would-be rug fancier the many varieties of Oriental rugs. But a few main characteristics of the principal makes may be a help to the beginner.

Roughly, they may be divided into Persian, Caucasian, Turkish and Indian.

The Persians are the finest in texture, having more knots to the square inch, and being of more conscientious workmanship than the others. Some of the more familiar devices used are the lion and sun, which are the national symbols; then the rose of Persia is much used; in the borders the crab, fish bone, palm leaf, and turtle patterns are often found. The palm leaf has many names; some call it the pear design, while others aver that it represents the loop made by the River Indus as seen from the mosque at Cashmere. This design is, of course, common to many makers of rugs.

It is well to remember in classifying rugs by their designs that those worshippers of Mohammet, who are known by the name of Lunna, and are really the orthodox sect, do not allow the likeness of any bird, animal or man to be made. These believers are usually in Turkey, while those in Persia are not so strict, and are known by the name of Shutes.

The centre, or field, of Persian rugs is often in the form of a diamond, with the tree of life, or a vase of flowers, in the middle.

A few well-known and representative Persian rugs are: Kermans, Fereghans and Kurdistans.

The first are very popular rugs, having a floriated panel and corners; sometimes the tree of life is used, with birds in its branches, and it may be with or without leaves. Its very popularity, however makes it more apt to be imitated.

Feraghans are smooth and firm, while their borders are not easily recognized, they have a very marked and distinctive pattern in the field. It has the appearance of a segment of a melon or a toothed crescent, but in reality it is taken from some thing much more poetic—a curled rose leaf.

The Kurdistan rugs are very handsome and durable. They are made by a nomadic tribe of by no means good repute, who are nevertheless endowed with much artistic talent. Their rugs follow the Persian patterns, only in a bolder treatment in form and coloring. They have been called "the best rugs of Persia, if not of the East."

Caucasian rugs are made in southern Russia, but their patterns show that at one period Persian influence was great in that region. They are noted for their exquisite borders, which resemble jeweled work or mosaic. Caucasians are very fond of geometrical designs, and prove in their rugs the possibilities of the use of stars, angles, squares and trellisings. The borders are usually made up of a number of narrow stripes of small figures. Daghestans belong to this country, as also do Kabistans. These are both true to their type, and present fine borders and bold geometrical designs in the fields. Their dyes are always bright and durable, and there is no shading from one color to another.

The Turks were quick and clever to take up the art of rug weaving, and they now stand very high in this industry. Turkish rugs are of a coarser weave than Persian, but their pile is deep and velvety. Another peculiarity of Turkish Mohammedan rug makers is that no rug is made without some defect, either in pattern or shape, because of the accepted faith that only Allah is perfect. No two rugs are made exactly after the same pattern.

TURKISH rugs are very rich in coloring, and as someone has said, are like the stained glass windows of some grand cathedral. Antique Ghcordez prayer rugs are very beautiful, being in the mosque design, and having panels on either side of a solid blue or red field.

Although there are numerous handsome Indian rugs, their appeal is not so universal as those of Persia and Turkey. The texture is generally coarse and color startling and not so broken as in the others. The designs are inclined to be crude. The Maharajah Goolab Singh sent a very elaborate silk carpet to the Exhibition of 1851. The pile was nearly an inch thick, and it was said there were 10,000 knots in every square foot of it.

The oldest and most beautiful Oriental rugs and carpets are to be found in the temples of the East. Very few indeed of these find their way westward.

In the sixteenth century what was known as Hunting Rugs were made for the Shahs. These were beautifully made, and depicted scenes of the chase, in which appeared elephants, lions, phoenix and other animals, real or imaginary. These are now exceedingly rare, indeed, and it is said there are only twelve in existence. One belongs to the Imperial House of Austria; one to Baron Adolphe Rothschild; a third is in the Berlin Museum, and a fourth may be seen in the Boston Museum.

The well-known Prayer Rug is, of course, made and used by the Mohammedan. It represents the triangular niche in the wall of the mosque, facing towards Mecca. Here the devout worshipper prostrates himself, his forehead on the apex of the triangle, and his hands upon the spaces on either side. In his own house the rug is placed over the spot where the piece of earth from Mecca is deposited A small embroidered bit in the triangle shows the exact spot. A rough representation of a comb is found very often in one corner, to remind the prayer that he must first comb his beard. These prayer rugs are usually very beautiful and come in many makes.

The long strips, or runners, as they are called commercially, are really used in Eastern houses on either side of the central rug or carpet. Another shorter one is placed at the end of the room, on which sits the head of the family.

It is acknowledged to be difficult at first to detect a cleverly made and touched-up imitation Oriental rug. However, a prospective buyer may always discover whether at least aniline dyes have been used by moistening a handkerchief with the tongue and applying it to the rug. If the color comes off, beware of chemical dyes!

There are a few very interesting books on the subject, although it is an acknowledged fact that the origin of many rugs will forever be wrapped in mystery. With china, silver and old furniture, some clue of their age and maker may be found, but the rug maker either sends his beautiful work of art into the world unsigned, or else his signature is lost in the innumerable emblematical devices which in the words of the poet "Doth tease us out of thought as doth eternity."

Art in the Home

THE subject of art in the house is worthy of attention, and we look to our artists to help us; but they seem too often inclined to treat the matter with indifference. The old masters, however, were truer to the spirit within them. As Woltman says, "These were not merely architects or sculptors or painters . . . . they were artists generally." Holbein in England and Jan Van Eyck at the Court of Burgundy worked at arts that were useful as well as decorative. They not only painted pictures, but designed dresses, title pages, furniture—even saddles and dagger sheaths. But it must be admitted that in recent years there have been a few bright exceptions. Fuseli worked with Wedgwood; Lord Leighton (Disraeli's "Mr. Phoebus") built himself a house beautiful; and such men as Whistler and Burne-Jones sometimes devoted their rare but eccentric genius to the subject of house decoration. A word of tribute should be paid to Whistler's Peacock Room, with it wondrous effects of black and gold, dark blue and bronzed leather, and the shutters painted with peacocks.

CAUCASIAN BORDER

Silverware of Unrivalled Reputation
The durability of 1847 ROGERS BROS. silverware is beyond question. For 64 years it has been proving its wearing qualities. To-day it is the standard in silver plate.
1847
ROGERS BROS. XS TRIPLE
is guaranteed by the largest makers of silverware in the world. Local dealers everywhere sell this famous "Silver Plate that Wears"
Send for catalogue "E 48" illustrating the most popular patterns.
MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
(International Silver Co. Successor)
MERIDEN, CONN.
New York Chicago
San Francisco
Hamilton, Canada

ELECTRIFIED HOUSEKEEPING

Illustrations by courtesy of Canadian General Electric Company.

SOME years ago a novel was written describing an ideal community of about a century hence. In this book, "Looking Backward," we were given an alluring picture of a civilization where everyone was healthy and happy, and where labor was so simplified that no one suffered from over-exertion. Music and art were within the reach of the multitude, and there was no destitution, as there was no great wealth.

In this community electricity played a great part, and contributed materially to the industry and welfare of the people. Every mechanical household arrangement and contrivance seemed under the control of the electric force. Even the musical entertainment might be switched on or off at pleasure. We have not yet reached the Utopian ideal, or even the comfort of "Looking Backward." Yet, in the modern household, electricity is working wonders.

The electric iron, for instance, is a veritable boon to the modern housekeeper. The old-time ironing day, with its many trips to the stove, was a dreaded necessity, and meant at its conclusion tired feet and an aching back. Think of what it was on a July day, with the thermometer at ninety in the shade! The full clothes-horse, at the end of the day, meant a wearied woman. Now, by a moment of screwing and a turning of the electric button, we have an electric iron in full force, always heated, and always in good order, with no wearisome trips to the stove, to keep up the fire or to get another iron.

But, if the electric iron has meant much, the electric sewing machine means even more, in the simplifying of women's toil. The constant movement of the feet, in the manipulation of the old-fashioned sewing machine, disappears entirely, and a slight touch, which starts the machine, is all that is needed to set the electric apparatus in motion. Consequently, the energies of the operator can be concentrated on watching the material, as it is sewn, and guiding the construction. We no longer wonder at the cheapness of the modern blouse or shirt waist when we see the way in which a multitude of machines worked by electricity turn out a pile of garments.

In a recent article, Mr. H. W. Hillman tells of a residence without a kitchen chimney, cooking, lighting and heating being done by electricity.

Housekeeping has been a practical experience with me for nearly seventeen years. During the first half of the experience, coal, used in both furnace and kitchen stove, disclosed many of the disadvantages of the old system, while a gas range and a mantel log, during a couple of years' trial, showed a good many advantages which those devices afforded.

In the midst of these experiences, the introduction of electrical implements for cooking and baking, as well as many auxiliary heating devices, offered ample opportunity for making comparative tests of the three systems. Indeed it was an exceptional opportunity to make comparisons of the initial cost of the articles, the operating cost, their practical everyday value, appearance, convenience of handling, etc.

After two years' experience with the electrical devices, the cost of operation proved to be so reasonable, and the plan so satisfactory, that in building a new house no consideration was given to the use of a kitchen coal stove or a gas stove: and we were so bold as to make no preparations for a kitchen chimney. No room was required in the cellar for kitchen coal and kindling wood, and an economy in cellar space was therefore secured.

To such an extent was this idea of economy carried out that sufficient money was saved in house construction to pay for all the extra wiring expense for special lighting and heating devices.

An electrical table replaced the coal and gas stove. To one who has never used the electric range, the question would first arise regarding the size of it and the room available. While the argument might be admitted that it would be excellent for a small family, and just cosy for a newly-married couple, yet it might be altogether too small for regular everyday use, with occasional visitors enlarging the size of the family.

To meet such a question, the experience in connection with our Christmas dinner, a few mnoths after we moved into the new house, should be sufficient. Sixteen persons sat down to the table, and the dinner complete was cooked upon the electric range.

Another feature would quite naturally interest those who have used the older methods, namely: Does it require constant attention, and would it interfere with the retention of a kitchen servant? This question is one of great interest, and I've always been thankful that our experience covered so many years, because it offers opportunity for a more intelligent answer.

The girl in our kitchen who handled all the cooking and baking was a Polish girl, who came with us when about sixteen years of age. She could speak only a few words of English, and possessed the most ordinary intelligence. For four years she used the devices, and when she left us it was to visit her mother in the old country.

In connection with the wiring of the house, a switch was located in the girl's bedroom at the head of her bed. When she first awoke in the morning she could turn this switch and start the coffee and cereals before getting out of bed. As is often the case, she would get these dishes ready before retiring the night before, and then simply insert the plugs in the electric dishes ready for turning the switch the next morning.

In this respect she was always sure of avoiding delay, which is not always true in connection with a coal range. At the best, the fire in a coal stove would be just about "coming up" by the time the girl was dressed and in the kitchen. With the electric outfit, the coffee and the cereal were practically ready to serve.

Then, in the preparation of the balance of the breakfast, the utensils would please the most particular cook. If bacon and eggs were on the menu, the electric frying-pan was hot enough to use a half minute after the switch was turned.

But the housewife of long experience, who perhaps is reading this story, would take issue with the writer at this point and say, "But we most always have boiled eggs, and there's nothing quicker or nicer than to boil eggs upon a gas stove! Why make comparison with a coal range?"

It is a fair question. The gas stove is convenient and it is quick. Therefore, comparison will be made between the electric egg boiler and the gas stove for boiling eggs.

With the gas range you place your eggs in a pint of water. First, it takes two or three minutes for the water to come to a boil; then, three or three and a half minutes for the cooking operation.

With the electric egg boiler only a spoonful of water is required, and the first operation of heating the water is accomplished in forty seconds, about one quarter of the time required by the gas stove. At the end of forty seconds the three or three and a half minute operation commences, and is the same as with gas.

Thus the boiling of eggs by electricity is quicker and cheaper than by gas.

You ask, "Why not do the same thing with gas?"

Answer: Because the intense heat of the flame would burn out the ordinary cooking utensil used with a gas range if a spoonful of water only were used. On the contrary, the electric egg boiler is designed especially for such use.

The electric griddle cake cooker is quick and convenient. The meat broiler furnishes at the table the very best cooked steak. The large vegetable cookers, with their combination steaming compartments, are economical both in operation and in the initial cost of the devices.

The oven is large and roomy, accommodating as many dishes as the regular size of gas or coal stove. It is superior to both, however, because it can be regulated so nicely. It is connected with a three-heat switch, and, after being heated satisfactorily at the maximum temperature, the medium point can be used with only half the electricity consumed. At the medium point an excellent supply of heat is furnished because the oven retains the heat so capably. Where cooking operations are long, the lowest heat is often the most satisfactory as well as the most economical

Every woman requires the use of a flatiron, either for the hurried pressing of a bit of lingerie or the ironing of the wash. The electric flatiron appeals to all because of its remarkable convenience and cleanliness. It permits of rapid work for it heats quickly, stays hot and, therefore, requires no changing. Furthermore, the electric iron requires little strength to operate and may be used in any room in which there is a lighting outlet—boudoir, sewing room, kitchen or laundry.

The toaster is a culinary convenience, which every housewife appreciates.

A rack placed above the coils keeps the toasted slices warm and prevents them becoming cold and clammy while others are being prepared.

A BOON IN THE SICK ROOM

THE NECESSARY ELECTRIC IRON

MOTOR CONNECTED AND OPERATING

THE GIRL'S ROOM

By PAUL FITZPATRICK

I AM a mere man. Less mere than before I had a girl of my own—but still mere enough to approach this sacred subject of "The Girl's Room" with less intrepidity than hesitation.

But always as a mere man, remember, I find so much to criticize, so many opportunities lost or wasted in the girls' rooms I know, that perhaps a "rank outsider's" ideas may help the girls of the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL to a better understanding of what their rooms may mean in pleasure and beauty.

Most girls are ambitious, and all are acquisitive. Their rooms prove it. For most of them show a Queen Anne intent at decoration, and a distinctly Mary Anne collection of useless and almost meaningless knick-knacks, clutterbucks, favors, photos, gew-gaws and gimcracks.

No doubt a very pretty sentiment attaches to some of the prized possessions—but assuredly far more dust. And dust is to decorations what weeds are to a garden.

The average picture of a girl's room is something like this: Right centre foreground, a bed of uncertain design and haphazard dress, covering and encircling a motley collection of boxes on the floor. Hat boxes full of heaven knows what—I never looked—suit boxes, band-boxes, boxes big and boxes small.

Upper left corner: Dresses, tasselated with age-yellowed dance cards, uncertain ribbons and hanging ornaments (?), mirror, fringed with curling kodak prints, calling cards of bygone loves, and "by George!" nearly everything else that the mind of man can compass.

Upper right corner: Hanging Japanese umbrella, from the rib ends of which pendulously dangle what of the dance cards are not fringing the mirror. Couch, with three times too many pillows, variously, if not artistically colored by hand or fabricated from silk cigar bands. Parenthesis—I believe this is usually a box-couch, probably because more boxes are secreted behind its sheltering cover.

Lower left corner: Work table, so called because of the work it would take to find the table under its burden of magazines, boxes, more boxes!—smaller boxes here! baskets, letters, darning accessories, and odds and ends into whose real nature no mere man may enquire too closely.

The walls are beyond my poor pen. Must needs there be, however, a fish or tennis net fantastically draped and embellished with more photographs and cigarette boxes.

The frieze will be Gibson prints (or mayhap near-Gibson renderings therefrom, perpetrated by the artist of her acquaintance) varied with posters and magazine covers that have caught her vagrant fancy and been impaled among the swan-necked "ladyes faire" and swallow-tailed knights that stretch their seven feet six of manly beauty toward the ceiling line.

Restless, cheap, dusty disturbers of anything like artistic unity—away with them all, girls! and let us look at your "palace of dreams" as it should be.

Let us find a set of bedroom furniture that is really meant for a girl. Oak won't do, as it's too heavy. White enamel is too glossy, and rather less exclusive than we will want. Pearwood is ideal, but expensive, so we'll compromise with a soft grey finished suite of simple design. The bed will be of wood also—the popularity of metal to the contrary, notwithstanding. We want your room to be a pleasant chamber with harmonious furniture—not a brass bedstead surrounded by articles that must apologize to the glories of burnished brightness.

Then we'll select a wall paper that provides the right background—a dove grey chambray with faint self-tone stripes, with a cut-out frieze of rose baskets and dainty ribbon design.

For curtains, couch cover and the bed's overdress, we'll find a cretonne with roses and ribbons that will harmonize with the wall paper frieze and lend the required color and brightness. Sash curtains of muslin or light net will be hung close to the window, and the cretonne will be cut out along the lines of the design rather than hemmed to a straight edge, and used as an overcurtain to the outside of the frame. A simple ruffled valance will span the window top. Covers for a couple of the couch pillows can be made of the cretonne, while tan crash or rep with old rose-colored stencil or embroidery will be just right for the other one or two, at most.

The dresser top cover will also be of the crash or rough embroidery linen, stenciled or worked with the pillow design.

If we can't have a couple of attractive little water colors or worthy prints—why, we won't have anything on the walls but the charmingly clean and artistic paper.

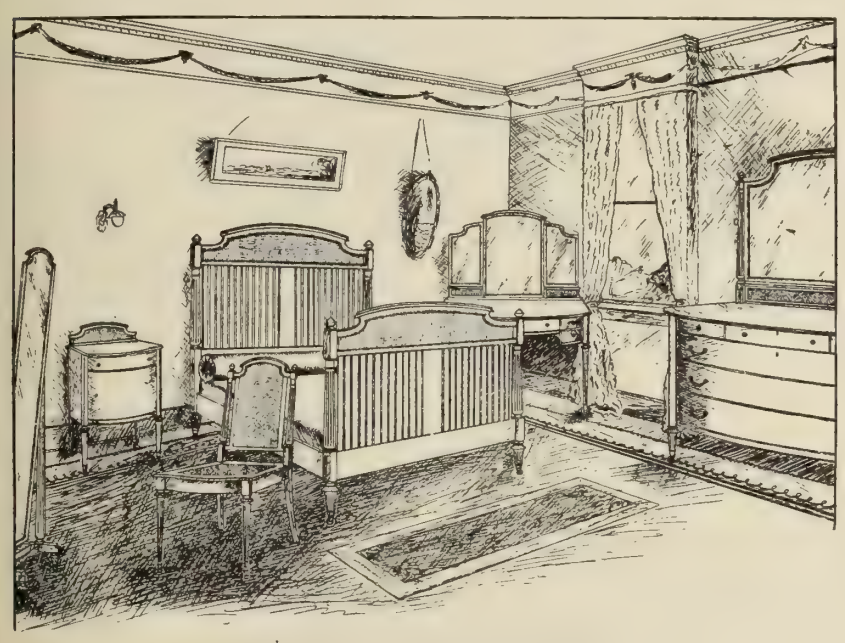
Now, I could write learnedly (or what would sound learned, at any rate) of the psychology or mental effect of living in such a room instead of the old dust-trap museum of domestic horrors we pictured a while back—but I'm not going to.

You'll find it all out for yourselves if you follow my advice and make the change—and if you won't do this, what is the use of preaching about something with which you have no sympathy?

Suffice it that if you do turn over a new leaf and make your sanctum into a room of beauty and peace and natural brightness—you will gain something more of each of these very qualities—beauty, poise and brightness.

* * *

The cut showing furnished girls' room is by courtesy of Toronto Furniture Company.



A GIRL'S ROOM IN LOUIS XVI. FURNISHING

CEETEE
UNDERWEAR

DO YOU VALUE GOOD HEALTH?

People careful of their health realize that it is most important that they should be more particular about their underclothing than their outer clothing for many reasons.

In the first place, it is worn next the skin, and must be as soft and smooth as possible so as not to irritate the skin; secondly, it must absorb all the impurities that exude from the body; thirdly, it has to act as an "insulator" from both heat and cold.

Medical men and health authorities all agree that pure, clean wool is the most satisfactory and healthiest material, meeting all these requirements.

It is warmest in winter and coolest in summer, keeping the body at a more even temperature all the time.

The best of all woollen underwear is

"CEETEE"

Every garment of "CEETEE" underclothing is fashioned to fit the form in the actual process of knitting.

It is all made with selvedge edges—the edges are all carefully knitted (not sewn) together.

Only the very finest of Australian Merino wool is used, making it so soft and clean that a baby could wear it without injury to its tender skin.

Worn by the Best People—Sold by the Best Dealers.

Made in all sizes and weights for Ladies, Gentlemen and Children. We guarantee every "CEETEE" garment to be absolutely unshrinkable.

Always ask for "CEETEE."

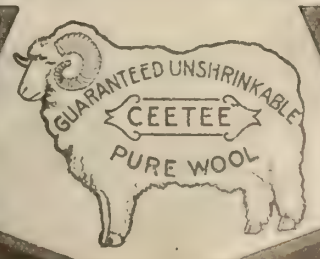
Manufactured by

THE C. TURNBULL CO. OF GALT, LIMITED

GALT - - - ONTARIO

102

LOOK FOR THE SHEEP ON EVERY GARMENT



Adams

Specialists in Home Furnishing

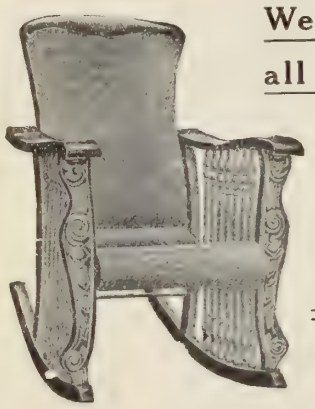
Every Homelover

who is interested in having things nice and cozy about the house, and having it at moderate cost, should write for

Our large illustrated Furniture Catalogue "H"

This catalogue—which contains 500 photographic illustrations of the best selected furniture, priced at 15 to 30 per cent. below regular prices—will be sent free to any address upon request.

It enables home providers everywhere to purchase furniture and other homefurnishings with the same advantage that is afforded those who live in the City. Write today for it.



We send Furniture all over Canada

The ADAMS FURNITURE COMPANY LIMITED

TORONTO ONTARIO

How to Care for Silverware

Is your silverware tarnished? Do you dread the task of cleaning it? Do you need a real modern way that will change the hard silver cleaning day into a half hour of pleasure? If so, try WONDER-SHINE Silver Cleaner, which does away with all the rubbing and scrubbing, and the fuss and muss.

Will not only save your silverware, but will save you much time and trouble, and produce better results.

It is now used by thousands of ladies with perfect satisfaction.

Let us send you our booklet telling you how to do it, or better still, ask your dealer. A 25-cent package contains everything complete, and with it you can clean all your silverware many times.

If you use WONDER-SHINE Silver Cleaner you will save hours of toilsome labor and your silver will be the envy of your friends.

In Packages, 25 and 50 cents. All dealers

WONDER-SHINE SILVER CLEANER

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

A Treatise on Wall Paper

By PAUL FITZPATRICK

CHAPTER I.

THE HISTORY OF WALL PAPER

LIKE many of the Western world's most prized possessions, we owe wall paper to China, where it was in quite universal use almost as early as the discovery of America. And, like most decorative forms of Egyptian, Greek, Oriental, or Roman derivation, its first use was constructional. In other words, the Celestials built of paper, using strips of it on bamboo framework for walls and the partition-like screens that served to make their domestic architecture so fantastically interesting.

Then, one fine day, one of the famous designers of royal textile, with an idle hour on his yellow hands, amused himself by sketching dragons, parrots, and wondrous Chinese flowers on the tempting expanse of the nearest wall—and lo! decorative wall paper was born.

Spreading generally through many of the provinces of the empire, it was only a matter of time before some of the early French explorers discovered and brought it back as a curiosity from the far-off Orient. The French, however, found no practical use for similar decorative material, and while some of their tapestries of the time show evidence of the influence of Oriental design, it was left to the English and Germans of a later century to adopt the idea and develop a more modern method of manufacture and application.

When the French finally discovered the utility of wall paper as an inexpensive substitute for the silk and tapestry hangings of the wealthy, they made it their own, and with all the versatility and skill they possessed in decorative designs, soon became famed for the beauty of their product.

It is a matter of fact and a satisfaction to patriotism, however, to record that English goods of to-day are as pre-eminent as they were earlier in the history of wall paper, and that the papers that most seriously threaten that pre-eminence are made in Canada.

CHAPTER II.

THE MANUFACTURE OF WALL PAPER

THE making of wall paper is curious in manufacturing annals. A time ago, it was all hand work, laborious, exacting, and ofttimes crude, of course. Now it is almost all machine work. The curiosity lies here: That there was no gradual transition from one to the other. In most manufacturing, first one machine was invented and used to perform only one portion of the process; then another to eliminate a still further part of hand labor: and so on until the final development made men necessary practically only to tend the machines.

The wall paper printing machine was not invented until comparatively recently, but when it came, it came full-fledged—and revolutionized the trade at one blow.

Perhaps the most interesting way to become familiar with the evolution of a roll of wall paper is to follow it chronologically from the forest to your wall. For you know, of course, that all wall paper "stock," as the imprinted paper is called, is the product of our wonderful Canadian spruce. This is made in the great mills where newspaper stock is manufactured, and the process of making it is much the same.

The spruce logs are shredded, soaked in water until the consistency of a mushy pulp, treated with sulphide to bleach and disintegrate the fibres, then passed through a machine almost as long as a city block, where the water is pressed out, the fibre worked into a closer consistency, the remaining water evaporated, and the now dry and roughly calendared paper reeled into great spools weighing about 150 pounds each. One of these reels is known as an "elephant," and it is in this form that the wall paper printing factory first has anything to do with it.

But while all this has been going on in the pulp mills, the wall paper factory has been selecting designs and preparing the printing rolls. These rolls are a little over eighteen inches wide and from fifteen to twenty-one inches in circumference, which naturally controls the frequency of "repeat in a pattern." For instance, in a small tile pattern, often used in bath-room or kitchen, the rolls are made quite small, while in a big flowing design, they will measure the maximum.

The "cutting" of the rolls is all done by hand, though "cutting" does not describe the actual process, the word being inherited from the time when the blocks used in hand-printing were actually cut, or carved. Now the rolls are made by inlaying brass tape, edgewise, along the lines of the design. Of course, there is a different roll for each color in a pattern, and as some patterns go through the machines twice, sometimes as many as twenty rolls are necessary for the wall and as many more for the border and ceiling.

While stock and rollers are being made, the wall paper manufacturer has been gathering printing materials from the four corners of the earth, pulp colors from South America and Europe, China clay from Cornwall, England, gums from Araby, dextrine (which is our old friend the Irish potato in still another form) moss from Iceland (which is used in making a certain glue), mica from Tennessee, gold and aluminum.

All these and more are rendered up to the making of a roll of wall paper—and must be on hand before the printer may turn a wheel.

The printing machine itself (a dozen of which, more or less, are to be found in a successful plant) is a large cylinder running vertically, as does a wheel suspended on a horizontal axle. At intervals of about a foot, around the base-supports of this great wheel, are contrivances for holding the printing rolls. There is a shallow box for the liquid color, a roller revolving therein, an endless felt belt which conveys the color from the box to the printing roller, and the printing roller itself. Minute adjustments make it possible to "register" these rollers, so that each color fits perfectly into its appointed place in the design, though in very cheap paper you will sometimes find one color overlapping another.

The samples one sees in the wall paper stores are not, by any means, the result of slapping the rolls into the machine, filling the color boxes, and "letting her go, Gallagher." Far from it! For they represent much careful experiment, considerable genius in selection, and a skilled and scientific knowledge of the harmonic properties of color. It is quite usual for a manufacturer to make as many as thirty trials, combinations of different sets of colors, in order to secure five or six attractive arrangements that he is willing to offer the public.

RUSCORDO DECORATION FOR HALL

However, when all these preliminary experiments have been completed, and stock, rollers, colors and machine made ready, we can see in wall paper printing one of the most interesting manufacturing processes there is. Interesting, not only because "watching the wheels go 'round" is always fascinating to a normal man or woman, but because all the colors are printed at once. In the color work you occasionally see in the HOME JOURNAL, for instance, the paper must go through the presses three and sometimes four or more times. While in the lithograph posters that are meant to decorate our rural scenery and vacant city lots, and that do advertise in a somewhat offensive manner the appetizing qualities of sauce and soup and the detergent and emollient qualities of So-and-So's soap, thirteen, fourteen, or even more impressions are required to give that startling effect, which is the "sine qua non" of poster pulchritude.

After going through the printing machines the paper is caught into great loops by an automatic machine and carried several hundred feet through a drying room, superheated by steam coils. At the far end of the drying room the paper is calendered, which really amounts to "ironing" it between smooth steel rollers arranged like a clothes wringer.

Then girls, operating a saw-tooth lever knife and power spindle, cut the paper into strips of sixteen yards, which, when rolled and marked, are ready for shipment to the dealer from whom you make your annual spring selections for your home's new dress.

CHAPTER III.

THE INFLUENCE OF DESIGN AND COLOR

WHY do you like or dislike a certain paper in a given room? Taste, of course. But what is taste? Why do you want a green for this room, and nothing but a green? How comes it that a stripe will do there, but a floral pattern, never! Taste again. But why does your taste search for a predetermined effect, and revolt against many designs admittedly beautiful in themselves, but, to your way of thinking, wholly unsuitable for the room you have in mind to redecorate?

Because Art is not a Thing, but a Way. Beauty is not a paper, but an effect. A beautiful paper in the wrong room is not artistic. A plain or even somewhat unattractive paper becomes almost beautiful when it "fits" as though it were one of the essentials of that room's existence, like the floor, or window openings. In other words, the right paper is always beautiful, even though it suffers in comparison with others in the sample book.

LORAINE DECORATION FOR DINING ROOM

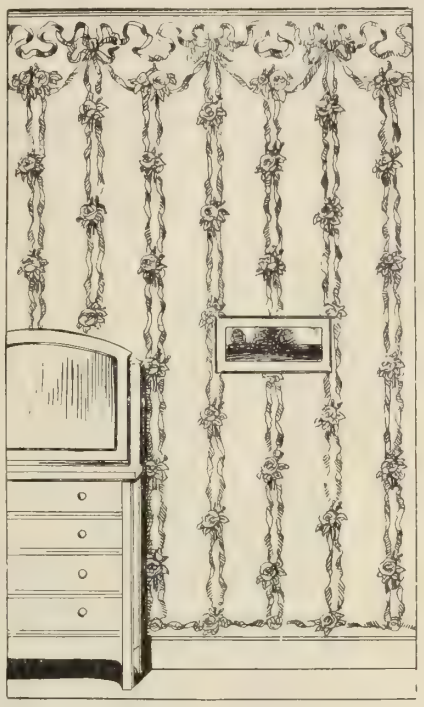
This is the result of the influence of design and color—which is unconsciously felt by everyone, but understood by few. And it is because of this lack of understanding that we find so many rooms which jangle our nerves like a quarrelsome couple who advertise their mismating by public bickering.

With due warning to remember that no set rule can be laid down which will cover the variations that occur in every room, we may agree that the following are basic "Do's and Don't," which will help any woman to find the beautiful way in decorating her home's walls:—

Law I.—Treat no room as a separate entity. Remember that it is a part of a house, and keep it wholly in tune with the rest. In this day of broad arches and square plan construction many rooms are visible from one point, and their decoration must be harmonious if it is to be successful.

Law II.—Make no compromise with good taste for the sake of a few cents difference in cost. Even the best paper costs very little, considered by the room. And paper, not quite right, but on which you have saved a few cents per roll, is the most extravagant investment you can make in purchasing decorations.



BEAUCRON DECORATION FOR BEDROOM.

Law III.—Remember that color's influence is stronger than that of design and pattern. Test this by your memory. Isn't it easier to remember that Mrs. Brown's living-room is green than it is to recall the pattern?

Law IV.—Broad effects in design tend to bring the ceiling down, as does also "dropping" the ceiling paper for eighteen inches or more on the wall. Stripe effects, of whatsoever nature, whether vines, floral treatments, or plain everyday stripes, tend to elevate the ceiling.

Law V.—Strong colors and contrasts bring the walls forward, due to false foreshortening, and make a room seem smaller. Neutral shades and quiet patterns tend to set the walls back, increasing the apparent size of a room.

Law VI.—Color harmony is not a matter of chance or luck. It is the result of calculation, and the laws of color are as definite as the laws of algebra. Give a color expert a certain shade of blue, for instance, and he can tell you without hesitation just what other shades and colors will harmonize or contrast attractively.

Law VII.—Remember that to handle closely similar shades of one color, like peacock or turquoise blue, is more difficult than to manage the simpler contrasts, like red and green.

Law VIII.—Above all things consider the furniture and furnishings of a room in the selection of its wall paper. Many rooms, admirably decorated if they were to be empty, are abominable as living apartments, because the walls do not furnish the proper background for the appointments: for instance, the use of a floral design with heavy mission oak furniture, that requires broad, plain effects in a cork velour paper or conventional pattern.

Law IX.—The lighting of a room, both natural and artificial, should control the selection of paper. North light requires the counteracting effect of warm colors, like yellow and orange, while a room facing south may have walls of a cool or neutral color without becoming dull. Remember, also, that gaslight is red and yellow in its effect, that electricity is similar in a lesser degree, and that acetylene light has nearly the same white quality as sunlight

Law X.—Buy no paper by mail or from small samples. See at least a yard or so of sample, preferably a roll of the goods itself, before purchasing.

This is a LIQUID VENEER Home

Make YOURS a LIQUID VENEER Home

Cheer Up

If your home looks dull and shabby, Liquid Veneer will make it bright and cheerful. If it is immaculately new, Liquid Veneer will keep it so. Simply

DUST EVERYTHING WITH

LIQUID VENEER

Dust everything—from the kitchen chairs to the piano—from brass beds to the very chandeliers. Just moisten an ordinary cheese-cloth duster with Liquid Veneer and dust in the usual way. That's all you have to do. What a vast difference it does make. Instantly restores the original factory finish to everything on which it is used. Prove it for yourself—

TRIAL BOTTLE FREE

Simply fill in and mail the attached coupon today and so take the first step toward making yours a Liquid Veneer Home.

Buffalo Specialty Co.
24 Liquid Veneer Bldg. BUFFALO. N.Y.

BUFFALO SPECIALTY CO.
24 Liquid Veneer Bldg., BUFFALO, N.Y.
Please send me, duty free, prepaid and without any obligation or charge to me, a sample bottle of LIQUID VENEER.
NAME. . . . . .
STREET & NO . . . . . .
CITY & STATE . . . . . .

Are You the Woman?

¶ Who has tried and found it difficult to get "out-of-the-ordinary" wall papers in her local store?

¶ Who wants her home to reflect an individuality distinct from that of her neighbors—her individuality?

Boxer English Made Papers are now procurable most every place in Canada. Where they are not yet shown we shall be glad, on request, to make arrangements for you to see these beautiful and exclusive decorations—without obligation of course.

are now to be had from only one dealer in a town. Write for his name—he is a good man to know and will gladly help with your decorating problem—whether it is one small room, or the whole house.

We Would Like to Send You Pictures of Our Famous Scenic Friezes—FREE

Sold under our own name and guarantee

Look for brown sample cover and silver lettering

Boxer Wall Paper
"THE UNIQUE LINE"

The Reg. N. Boxer Co., Ltd., Toronto, Ont.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

A Touch of Paint

By H. E. MIHELL

COLOR, applied to both the interior and exterior architectural features of the home, assists in the development of their form, and gives emphasis to the beauty of the structure. Touches of color, executed judiciously, in wall treatment, fabric decoration and furniture finishing, add to the dignity, beauty and proportions of every room. Color can be regarded as an educative power and a necessity of cultured life. It can be so applied to the material home environment as to influence the mind and temperament for better and higher things.

A touch of paint, used in beautifying the home, has characterized every nation that has made any decided advance in civilization. The excellent decorative specimens taken from the ruins of villas and courts of ancient Egypt, Pompeii and Greece show very clearly that when correctly used it withstands the ravages of time and the elements. Probably no other covering medium has found more common use than paint.

Paint in all its forms is the most versatile covering medium; and at the same time the one which any housewife can apply with the greatest ease, and from which she may obtain the most pleasing, artistic results. The amateur home decorator in selecting a covering medium which she can apply, demands that it shall be easy and rapid in application. It must be durable, it must not require frequent renewal. It is required to be pleasing to the eye, and it must lend itself to use in any artistic effect. It must always be ready to suit itself to the prevailing fashion. Lastly, and of the greatest importance in this age of hygienic precautions, it must be perfectly sanitary. The embodiment of all these features is found only in oil or enamel paint. The use of paint in interior treatments is the ideal solution in the carrying out of every decorative problem.

The essential sanitary features of paint looms largest in its economic value as a wall covering. In this age when governments and medical associations are striving by legislation and education to promote ideal conditions of living, paint is rapidly taking its place as an agent for the promotion of these ideal conditions. Public buildings of all classes, as well as private homes, are overwhelming in their demand for sanitary and durable wall coverings. Paint is practically the only wall covering which forms a glaze impervious to dirt and germs, and yet does not have to be removed to be renewed.

Up-to-date paint and varnish manufacturers realize that their wares are no longer at the service of the painter and decorator alone. Expert chemists and paint makers have brought paint and varnish to such perfection that when placed in the hands of the amateur, she can produce the most satisfactory results. Stencil designs, applied color schemes, and expert advice in their literature have been put before the public in such practical form that it enables any lady to decorate her home in a manner that will accord with the highest decorative standards.

A DAINTY STENCIL

Flat wall color paint treatment for walls and ceilings has recently grown very much in popular favor. The treatment is simple, and in its simplicity lies its richness and value. The massive plain flat areas bordered by well-chosen stencil designs enhance the dignity and richness of any interior wall. The novice who carefully follows instructions on the paint can, or in the numerous booklets of instruction, will find no difficulty in making successful application of these colors. They give to plain wall spaces a soft, velvet-like richness of color.

Stenciling as a method of ornamentation has developed rapidly along with the use of paint for wall treatment. It was used extensively by the ancient Egyptians and Japanese, and to-day is recognized by the best decorators as an important brand of decorative art.

Stencil designs should correspond or harmonize with the general design scheme which may prevail in carpets, furniture coverings, curtains, or other ornaments found in the architectural features of the room. When choosing wall or ceiling areas for decoration keep them in good relative proportion to the size and character of the room. A room with low ceiling should not take a wide frieze. If the room has wainscoting there should be no borders or frieze. Libraries, dens, studies or churches require a rather serious treatment in design, straight lines or rather severe design will be appopriate for these. Parlors, sitting-rooms, reception rooms and rooms for entertainment require a cheerful treatment in curves, festoons, vines, collections of flowers and foliage to express joy and gladness.

AN EFFECTIVE DESIGN

The most refined and dignified effects are not always obtained by the most elaborate design. Single figures or groups in harmonizing color, placed at convenient intervals in panels, borders or bands with well-proportioned intervening space give an added degree of dignity to the room, and serves as good contrast to the wall color; continuous or repeat designs in borders, etc., are best when they have one-third to one-half of the area in plain surface.

Decorative design should follow, and be made to ornament the architectural features of the room. The lower portions should be of such a nature as to give the idea of a substantial supporting structure for the features above. The upper portions should be more delicate in form and color as in plant and tree forms. The frieze being the most distant portion of the side wall from the eye should have design giving a receding appearance. It should emphasize length, but not give the appearance of too great depth.

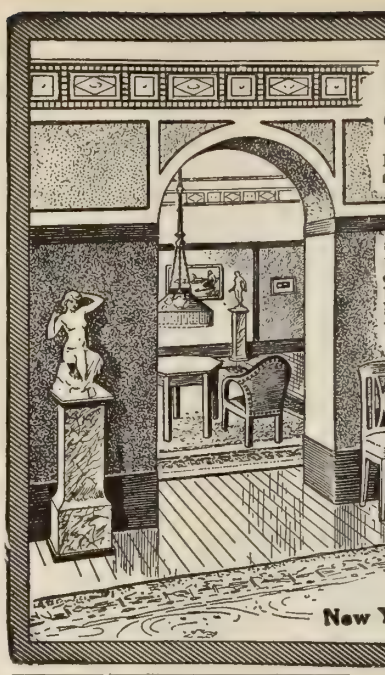
The amateur is specially advised to mix a very large degree of care and patience with taste and skill in applying paint and executing stencil design. Haste has spoiled many an otherwise beautiful effect. He should work always from left to right in every operation. Commence operations in the most obscure corner of the room so that any errors detected in the first application may be corrected and guarded against.

Stencil paint should be of a rather pasty nature, so that it will not flow freely, and can be applied through the perforations of the stencil plate with a stippling or hammer-like motion. Never brush paint on a stencil pattern, as it will run under the edges of the plate. Grasp the stencil brush firmly as you would a short pencil, allowing the end to rest firmly against the palm of the hand. Work the hand up and down entirely from the wrist, with a hammer-like motion. Always have a piece of board or cardboard convenient, on which to rub the brush, so as to insure an even distribution of the paint, and to flow out any superfluous oil or thinners. In large perforations begin at the edge and work towards the centre. Observe the same procedure in tinting or shading with one or more colors. A soft clean cloth, kept constantly at hand, will be found useful in cleaning off blurred spots or in removing errors in application.

When selecting the color scheme for any room study the arrangement of furniture, carpets and pictures, so as to give not only the best decorative effect, but also to enhance the proportions of the room, viz.:

(a) Smaller pictures and furniture

Continued on page 52



MURESCO

Only One Coat Required. Easy to apply.

Muresco can be applied by anyone, to any kind of surface. It will not rub off or peel, shows no laps, spots or brush marks, and is the only material producing that flat, subdued, velvety effect, so much admired. It is made in a large variety of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be recoated any number of times and removed easily by washing when desired, thus insuring walls being kept in perfect condition. Beware of wall finishes containing lime or plaster that cannot be removed by washing when desired; they are neither practical nor sanitary, and will eventually peel off, leaving the walls in ruined condition.

Muresco is in use by the best decorators in the country, and sold by leading paint dealers everywhere.

Send for sample cards, descriptive matter and prices.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited

Sole Mfgs., Toronto, Canada

New York Chicago Carteret Cleveland

IT WILL BE JAEGER

United Garments

when the time comes to buy underwear—

If you have made a study of underwear.
If you are careful of your health.
If you look for comfort and fit.
If you want absolute guarantees of purity and quality.

DR. JAEGER'S SANITARY WOOLLEN SYSTEM CO., LIMITED

316 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal
231 Yonge St., Toronto
Steel Block, Portage Ave., Winnipeg

TRADE MARK

WOMEN folks who do their own washing are foolish. Washday is only another name for drudgery day—the one day every week that makes women old before their time. A washwoman costs $1.50 per day. In other words you can save the price of a New Century Washing Machine in less than six months—besides saving your health.

Wuk less and enjoy life moah by lettin the "New Century" wash for you.

The New Century is the "Top Notcher" of all hand-washing machines. Its design assures efficiency, simplicity and durability. A child can work the New Century—it's easy to work and cannot harm the most delicate fabrics.

CUMMER-DOWSWELL LIMITED
HAMILTON — ONTARIO

YOU KNOW FROM EXPERIENCE

When you get back from that vacation or summer residence it takes just a little while to settle down again, and cooking becomes a trifle wearisome, doesn't it?

Of course a certain amount of light cooking has to be done, but CLARK'S PERFECTLY PREPARED FOODS DO AWAY WITH THE NECESSITY FOR THAT HEAVY DRUDGING WORK THAT TAKES AWAY YOUR APPETITE.

CLARK'S did your cooking in the summer and you felt better for it; make a test over the other seasons and YOU'LL FEEL BETTER STILL. CLARK'S DELICACIES are put up in such great variety that you can change every day.

INSIST ON CLARK'S AND NOTICE THE NAME ON ALL YOUR PURCHASES OF PREPARED MEATS.

W. Clark, Montreal

MANUFACTURER OF THE CELEBRATED "CHATEAU" BRAND CONCENTRATED SOUPS

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Holiday Letters

Owen Sound, Aug. 31, 1911.

Dear Mr. Editor:

Of all my summer holidays I enjoyed one day out at Matthew's Park best of all. A number of us girls walked about half a mile with mother and father. We all got in a boat. It wasn't long before we were at the park and had our shoes and stockings off, and into the water we went. Talk about pollywoggs, my, there were swarms of them. That tickled mother when we caught about twenty in a parasol. So we brought some home for our goldfish. We had eleven last year from Ohio, but they all died.

One girl had her bathing suit and was in swimming, so made a lot of fun for us the way she kicked and splashed. She had a life preserver on. Another girl gave me a ride on her bicycle; then we had supper—that meant everything good.

Another afternoon a number of us went down to Balmy Beach. It is a lovely spot for a picnic. There are tables and seats and a lot of swings. We had big fun throwing stones into the water.

HANLAN'S SUCCESSOR.

We went down to one of my chums, who was staying at their cottage for the summer; but she had gone to town, so we came home and had supper, after which we came back by the steamer Emma.

I know you will have lots of little letters to read, so I will close.

Yours sincerely,

ANITA STEPHENS.

I hereby certify this is my daughter Anita's own work, and she was nine years of age last June.

W. L. STEPHENS.

* * *

Dear Anita:

Your letter tells of a very jolly kind of holiday. Catching pollywogs is an amusement worth while, and I dare say you had ever so much fun. You live in such a picturesque city. I think Owen Sound is one of our finest ports, and Georgian Bay is an ideal summer camping-place.

Victoria, B. C., Aug. 19, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

I am going to write about a picnic to a park, "The Gorge Park." This park is just outside the city of Victoria, B. C.

We started at two o'clock and it took quite a while to get there. When we arrived, which was just half-past two, where the water was, we were all tired and sat still. After a little time we got restless, and my sisters went in the horrid salt water. I had forgotten my bathing suit, so I could not go in with them—of which I was glad. My father and mother took a book and I was left to my own devices. Soon my attention was drawn by a few men and boys in the water. Everything went along well enough till a boy came out of the water and began shoving everybody that was on the plank for diving. One of these was a big man, who was to dive next, and this boy did not want him to do it or something and he shoved him in, and the boy jumped or fell off at the side. My mother brought my sisters from the water and began wiping their feet and putting on shoes and stockings, as Father said he would take us out in a boat when we were ready. As soon as we were started we noticed some men playing water-polo, and it looked awfully funny. We went on and got to the boat houses and got a rowboat and went for about a mile on the water and back. We went to the Japanese tea gardens to get a pot of lovely tea, and as many cups and saucers, sugar and cream as we needed. The Japanese are very accommodating and will do almost anything for you. They run a great many things at the Gorge, which was so called because of a narrow passage through which the water rushes rapidly, and where many people have been drowned.

In the evening we stayed to see the moving pictures till we got sleepy and went home at about ten o'clock. So you see what a nice time you can have in just eight hours.

Well, I guess this is all of our picnic.

Your loving friend,

ELSIE MACGIBBON.

This is the letter of my daughter, aged thirteen, with no help from anyone.

GRACE MACGIBBON.

* * *

My Dear Elsie:

It is very good of you to send such a nice letter all the way from British Columbia. The Gorge must be an impressive spot—but you have so many wonders in your great Pacific Province! I should so much like to see the Japanese tea gardens, as we have nothing like them in Ontario. Perhaps you could send us a picture of them. Write to us again, Cousin Elsie.

How to Order

Choose your color, grade and size from the list below and state clearly just what you wish. One size and one grade in each box. Colors only may be assorted as desired. Six pairs are guaranteed six months except when stated otherwise.

The Original Guaranteed Hose

Look for This Trade-mark and Signature

Men's Socks—Sizes 9½ to 12. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, navy blue, gun-metal, mulberry. In light weight, 6 pairs $1.50 (same in medium weight in above colors and in black with white feet, 6 pairs $1.50). Light and extra light weight (mercerized), 6 pairs $2.00. Light and extra light weight LUSTRE SOX, 6 pairs $3.00. Pure thread-silk sox, 3 pairs (guaranteed three months) $2.00. Medium worsted merino in black, tan, pearl, navy and natural, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in finer grade, 6 pairs $3.00.

Women's—Sizes 8½ to 11. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, and black with white feet. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00. Same colors (except black with white feet) in light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Light weights in black, tan and gun-metal, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Same in pure thread-silk, $3.00 for 3 pairs (guaranteed three months). Outsizes in black, medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00, and in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00.

Children's—Sizes 5½ to 10½ for boys, 5 to 9½ for girls. Colors: black and tan. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00.

Infants' Sox—Colors: tan, baby blue, white and pink. Sizes 4 to 7. Four pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00. Ribbed-leg stockings, in same colors and black, sizes 4 to 6½, 4 pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00.

Hose That Wear Six Months at Common Cost

You get this guarantee if you buy six pairs of famous Holeproof Hose for men, women or children—"If these hose do not wear without holes, rips or any necessity of darning for six full months from the day you buy them we will replace them free."

That means six months that you don't have to think about darning.

It means six months of comfort, for "Holeproof" are soft and lightweight.

It means six months of style, for "Holeproof" hold their shape and their color. There are no other hose to compare with them.

We pay an average of seventy cents per pound for our yarn, yet yarn is sold for as low as 30 cents. We spend $55,000 a year merely for inspection. Yet with all these advantages "Holeproof" sell at the cost of common hose.

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

Try "Holeproof" today. But get the genuine. For the genuine only are soft and light. No common hose were ever more comfortable.

If your dealer hasn't them, send the money to us in any convenient way and we'll ship direct, charges prepaid.

Don't wait. Save the next six months of darning. Send in your order now while you think of it.

TO DEALERS: Write for our agency proposition. Excellent opportunity. Thousands of dealers in U. S. making big hosiery sales with "Holeproof."

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY CO. OF CANADA, LTD.
54 Bond Street, London, Canada

Are Your Hose Insured?

(221)

ML FLOORGLAZE

Wonderfully Economical and Durable

A gallon covers 500 square feet with a permanent and beautiful enamel-like coating. But that coating is far more serviceable than the usual enamel paint, because it will not chip, nor flake, nor crack, but withstands wear in just those places where the most wearing comes.

For sale by most Paint and Hardware Dealers in Canada.

DON'T ACCEPT A SUBSTITUTE.

If you want to learn about the cleanest, best wearing and cheapest floor covering in existence, send to us for our new booklet, printed in colors. It contains a color card, and is FREE, if you mention this paper. Send a card for it to-day.

MADE IN CANADA BY THE

Imperial Varnish & Color Co., Limited

WINNIPEG TORONTO VANCOUVER

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

You are trying to decide even now which piano to buy. Little wonder you are confused, for the best of claims can so easily be made for the worst of instruments—the English language is free to all.

The guide which has for more than a generation led buyers who have been puzzled like yourself has been the reputation of the

Gerhard Heintzman

Canada's Greatest Piano

A reputation that has been earned, not purchased.

The definite, persistent impression back in your mind, behind all your indecision, that the Gerhard Heintzman is really the best of the good pianos, is right

If you will call or write us before making your decisions we will be very glad to talk the problem over with you.

Our reputation is your protection and our knowledge and experience is at your service.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited

New Salesroom

41-43 Queen St. W., Opp. City Hall, : TORONTO

Hamilton Salesrooms: 127 King St. East

ELLIMAN'S

Embrocation

FOR USE ON ANIMALS.

Sprains, Rheumatism, Curbs, Splints when forming, Spring Sinews, Capped Hocks, Overreaches, Bruises, Cuts and Wounds, Broken Knees, Sore Throat, Sore Shoulder, Sore Udders of Cows not in Milk, For Sore Mouths in Sheep and Lambs, For Foot Rot in Sheep, Sprains in Dogs, Cramp in Birds.

Elliman's Royal Embrocation.

FOR HUMAN USE.

Rheumatism, Lumbago, Sore Throat from Cold, Cold at the Chest, Neuralgia from Cold, Chronic Bronchitis, Sprains, Backache, Bruises, Slight Cuts, Cramp, Soreness of the limbs after exercise. Elliman's added to the Bath is Beneficial

Elliman's Universal Embrocation.

ELLIMAN, SONS & CO., SLOUGH, ENGLAND.

TO BE OBTAINED OF ALL DRUGGISTS THROUGHOUT CANADA.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Household Decoration

Home Furnishing on a Moderate Income

By JESSIE E. RORKE

THE DRAWING-ROOM

THE first room to be considered in the furnishing of our homes is the drawing-room—a room planned and set apart for the more or less formal receiving of our guests. The designing of one particular room for this purpose dates from the Elizabethan period. It was known then as the "great chamber," and was always on the second floor, being reached by a stairway from the great hall below. These reception rooms were only in the homes of the large land-owners, but their successor, the drawing-room, is to be found in almost every modern home. However plain and unpretentious this drawing-room may be, it is usually our best room, if not always the cosiest and most attractive, but the room where we place our costliest furniture and daintiest ornament for the pleasure of our guest.

As there is always a certain amount of formality in the use for which the drawing-room is destined the furnishings should tend rather to dignity than to the cosy comfort of the living-room or library. Usually the cool light colors are to be preferred, as these give a room the effect of being large and airy. Color is one of the most important factors in making a room beautiful, and it is worth while to spend both time and thought in selecting a suitable color scheme. The proportions and lighting of the room itself, as well as the colors to be used, in the adjoining rooms, must all be factors that will influence our decision. The general tone should have an equally pleasing effect, both by daylight and when the room is artificially lighted. Tan, grey, a soft green, ivory, or a dull cream are all satisfactory colors for the walls. It is in the drawing-room that our choicest pictures will be hung and only colors that form a good background for these could be pleasing; but this limits the color that may be used in the other furnishings of the room to only a very limited extent, as a color sufficiently neutral to form a background for pictures will combine with almost any other shade. A harmonious arrangement of different colors is usually to be preferred in a drawing-room rather than the simple harmony of varying tints and shades of one color alone as the latter lacks character when chiefly confined to the lighter tones. The contrasting color may be used only in slight quantity and in that case may be quite bright. It is a mistake to suppose that the clear, strong colors are inartistic—they are decidedly beautiful when used in correct proportions and combinations. If a room is decorated in varying shades of green the use of a little gold may be sufficient to give the needed touch of character—a brass jardiniere, the use of gold among the cushions or yellow flowers in the room will be enough to break the monotony of slightly differing shades of green by giving the needed touch of contrast. A neutral cream with grey-green and violet, the first two being used in much larger proportions, makes a very attractive color scheme for a bright, cheerful drawing-room, though one must be guarded in the use of the violet as it fades so readily. Blues may only be used in a bright room or where their dull effect is counteracted by a plentiful use of yellow—the sunlight color. Just as a wash of grey or brown will draw together and soften the colors in a painting, and the haze of distance soften the incongruities in a landscape, the introduction of a neutral tint into contrasting colors will aid in securing harmony. A clear green and blue may give only a crude effect of color, but grey-greens and grey-blues against a grey background will be charming in a sunny room.

CURTAINS SHOULD NOT EXCLUDE VIEW

The best effect is always obtained by using the same wood for the trim of the room and in the furniture, but if this is not possible, it should harmonize in color at least. A wood that takes a dark finish has the richest appearance, but tends to make a room look smaller, so that in most small houses a medium or lighter tone is most satisfactory. The floor, if not finished in the same tone, should always be darker.

The question of whether we shall use a carpet or a rug must sometimes be decided by the condition of the floor, but the rugs are in much the greater favor, as they are more sanitary as well as more beautiful than the carpet, besides making less work. There are no rugs that compare with the Orientals in beauty, both of color and design, and in their unsurpassed durability, while their colors only mellow and grow richer with wear. In every way they are the most desirable drawing-room rugs, but the price puts them beyond the reach of many of us, and we must turn to the Wiltons, Axminsters, Brussels, and Smyrnas. The Wilton and Axminster rugs are often disappointing in color, the combinations being crude and bright; but this is not so noticeable in the carpet of these makes that comes by the yard, and these, made up with the borders, will sometimes make very beautiful rugs. The Brussels rugs are much more satisfactory in color, but have not the depth of pile.

IN some rooms the plain rugs without any design are very pleasing. One of the first necessities of a satisfactory floor covering is that it should be quiet and unobtrusive—as the floor forms a part of the background for the furnishing and ornament. The weight of color in the room should be found here, not the brightest or even the darkest colors necessarily, but the greatest quantity of color in the low tones.

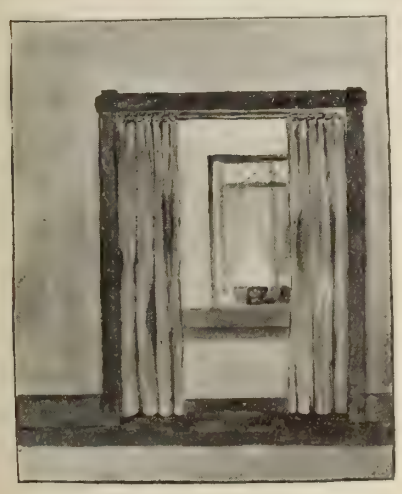
The walls, too, make up a part of this background, and plain or almost plain papers will be most pleasing where pictures are to be hung. Soft-toned papers with a small figure, quite inconspicuous in itself, but giving depth of color and texture to the paper, are very satisfactory and may be used in either large or small rooms. The ceiling color should be a lighter tint of that used on the side wall.

When it comes to selecting curtains, a love of color may quite safely be indulged; the brightest tints in your color scheme may be introduced here. Even the crude, bright colors grow soft and rich by the effect of the light falling through them. Curtains and portieres of the same color as the walls will make the room appear larger if this is desirable.

The simplest arrangement of the curtains is always the best. Either one set or two may be used. If the material of the curtains is transparent only one set is necessary, but if it is heavy and opaque, inconspicuous curtains or some sheer material may be hung next the glass. The best arrangement is to let the curtains fall straight from the rod to just below the sill, unless the casement extends to the floor when the curtain would be of the same length.

No curtains, however exquisite, will compensate for the exclusion of a good view. It is of more value in the decoration of a room than the costliest draperies could be, and the curtains should be so arranged that they can not only be drawn back, but that the view from the window may be seen at all times, and is as much a feature of the room as any of the pictures.

The lace curtains which have been so long in use are rapidly disappearing and are being replaced by the more simple plain nets, plain and figured muslins, or madras, if only one set of curtains are to be used. If casement hangings are used they are made of net or muslin, and the inner curtains of heavier materials. The reps and tapestries both hang in soft graceful folds. Velvets and silks, while very beautiful, are too expensive to be used in a home that must be furnished from a moderate income—with the exception of the liberty and raw silk. These are soft and transparent and will give some very charming effects.



SIMPLEST ARRANGEMENT THE BEST

It is not difficult to find furniture for the drawing-room that is both artistic and comfortable, at very reasonable prices, if we have learned that beauty depends much more upon simple, graceful outlines and harmonious coloring than on any carving or ornament. The best oak, mahogany or walnut is very desirable, but on account of their expense will probably have to be bought slowly—a piece at a time; however, with a little care and planning these may be made to harmonize with the poorer pieces, until others come to keep them company. An imitation is always to be avoided. Some of the furniture that is made up from birch is very pretty and attractive, but it loses all its charm when it begins to masquerade as mahogany.

Somewhat lighter pieces of furniture are usually selected for the drawing-room than for the living-room and library, the large easy chairs and couches being reserved for the easy indolence of the quiet home evenings. Upholstered furniture, though very pleasing when the color is quiet and in good taste, always proves expensive, as the cheaper grades usually have poorer workmanship and poorer materials in the springs and stuffing. Only one figured material should be used in a room; if the upholstery is figured the curtains and pictures should be plain. Such elaborate furniture as the Louis XV. and XVI. designs, and those of the Empire period, are out of place in the drawing-room of a small home, but many of the Sheraton and Heppelwhite models are very appropriate.

AN ATTRACTIVE FIREPLACE

A fireplace adds greatly to the attractiveness of a drawing-room.

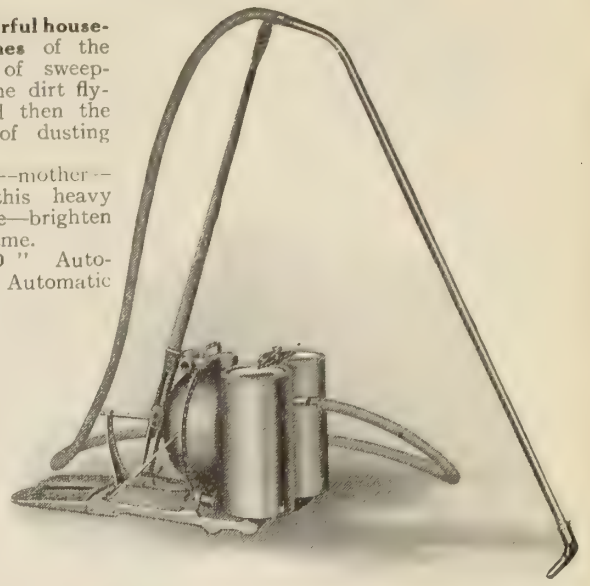
Much of the attractiveness of a room depends upon its lighting. During the day this has been planned for by the architect, and the most we can do is to arrange the curtains in the best way to temper the light or to give it free access according to the number and position of the windows. But the artificial lights may be placed to suit our pleasure and a slight change in their position will often greatly improve the appearance of the room. A light placed directly above is never pleasing, though this deficiency is not felt in a room that is used for entertaining, but even then the room would be better with side lights that would attract the attention rather than direct it to the ceiling, which is usually the least interesting part of the room.

IT is something of a problem to achieve harmony between utility and beauty, and secure atmosphere and color without subduing the light to too great an extent. In the drawing-room a more or less even light is required, and the lights should be placed and shaded with this in view. Lights hung low from the ceiling or placed on very tall stands will give this effect. Shades may be tinted enough to soften the light, but never enough to give it an unnatural appearance.

In country homes the oil lamp is still in general use and it has a peculiarly beautiful radiance, which is more pleasing to some than any other light. Some of the lamps that are shown in the shops are very artistic, and certainly none of us need use the type familiar to us all with large floral designs in crude colorings, as a simple metal lamp with a base that is dark in color and absolutely without ornament, and a plain porcelain share are not more expensive. Among the most attractive designs shown are those with dull green bronze standards and leaded shades, but there are many pretty lamps with pottery bases, showing graceful lines, and subdued quiet colors.

MADE IN BERLIN

The "Onward" Automatic Vacuum Cleaner



Even the most cheerful housewife wearies at times of the labor and drudge of sweep-sweep-sweep, with the dirt flying all around, and then the monotonous round of dusting to follow.

Save your wife—mother—sister or friend this heavy work and dull routine—brighten the house-keeping game.

The "ONWARD" Automatic is a real Automatic Cleaner at a price that brings it within the reach of every overworked housewife.

The One Hand-Power Cleaner that blows as well as sucks.

It sucks all the dust and grit out of carpets, rugs, upholstered furniture, curtains, mattresses and clothes. Cleans fabrics through and through, inside and out, and holds all the dust in the tank.

Easiest to empty, because our exclusive double tank device for separating the dust from the air catches 95 per cent. of the dust in the bottom of the tank, without screens or water. Only 5 per cent. is screened, and that on the outside of one canvas-covered cylinder. Other makes of Vacuum Cleaners have only one tank and screen 100 per cent. of the dust in complicated screens, bags, etc.

May be operated by one or two persons. Fully guaranteed or money refunded.
Freight prepaid to your nearest railroad station.

PRICE $25.00

Send for our Circular.—It's free.

ONWARD MANUFACTURING CO.

BERLIN, - - ONTARIO

Largest Builders of Hand and Electric Power Vacuum Cleaners in Canada

New Books issued and in Press

Parents get this Book for Your Boys

From Tenderfoot to Scout

By Anna C. Ruddy

A Story of a Boys' Camp in Northern Ontario.

The first book issued which deals with Boys' Camp-Life. Intensely interesting. Every healthy boy will want a copy of this book and every Boy Scout will revel in it. It is a dandy. A great book for parents to read also, gives them some idea of the natural boy in natural surroundings

Cloth, well illustrated and attractive cover design - - $1.25 postpaid

The Story of Tecumseth

By Norman Gurd

Companion Volume to "Story of Isaac Brock" in Canadian Heroes Series

Cloth, with illustrations in colors and in black and white . . $1.00 net
Postpaid

Prairie Born

BY

Robert J. C. Stead

Cloth . . . $1.00 net

Through Five Republics on Horseback

BY

G. Whitfield Ray, F.R.G.S.

Profusely Illustrated

Cloth, ink . . . $1.00 net
Cloth, gold . . . $1.25 net
Postpaid

Day Dreams of a Pioneer

BY

John Mortimer

Cloth . . . . 75c net
Postpaid

Our Western Trails in the Early Seventies

Frontier Pioneer Life in the Canadian North-West

BY

John McDougall

Cloth, with Frontispiece . $1.25 net

East and West

Essays and Sketches

BY

Adelaide P. Fitch

Cloth, with Frontispiece . $1.00 net

Songs of the Prairies

BY

Robert J. C. Stead

Limp Lambskin . $1.00 net
Limp Ooze Leather . $1.25 net

The Diary of Mrs. John Graves Simcoe

Wife of the First Lieut.-Governor of Upper Canada

With 236 illustrations, many of which are from original drawings by Mrs. Simcoe. With notes and a biography

BY

John Ross Roberston

Cloth . . . . . $3.00 net

Wm. Briggs, Publisher, 29-37 Richmond St. W., Toronto
AT ALL BOOKSELLERS

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

YOUR SECURITY

Back of every deposit in this Bank there is an organization of careful and experienced men, who watch the investment of the depositor's money. This care, taken into consideration with a capital and surplus fund of over six and one half millions, makes our Savings Department a safe place for your money.

Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$49,000,000

The Traders Bank
of Canada
INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

Good-Bye, Corns No Wait–No Pain

Just listen to this. There is a little plaster which holds a bit of soft wax—a wondrous invention called B & B wax. This little plaster is applied in a jiffy, and the pain of the corn stops instantly.

But that isn't all. That bit of soft B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In two days the corn comes out. No pain, no soreness, no inconvenience—no feeling whatever. The callous simply separates itself from the toe, and the trouble ends.

Five million corns annually are removed in this way—removed by Blue-jay plasters. Get a package—end yours, too. Don't temporize with corns.

A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters 15c and 25c per package

(8) Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters. All Druggists Sell and Guarantee Them.

Sample Mailed Free
Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York, Makers of Surgical Dressings, etc.

Brigger's Orange Marmalade

There is no question about the superiority of this brand—contains only the highest grade ingredients procurable—made from specially selected, luscious Seville oranges, and pure granulated sugar.

Sold in vase-shaped 1 pound jars and five pound gold-lined pails.

Ask your grocer for Brigger's Brand. G68

—PERFECT— Willow Plumes

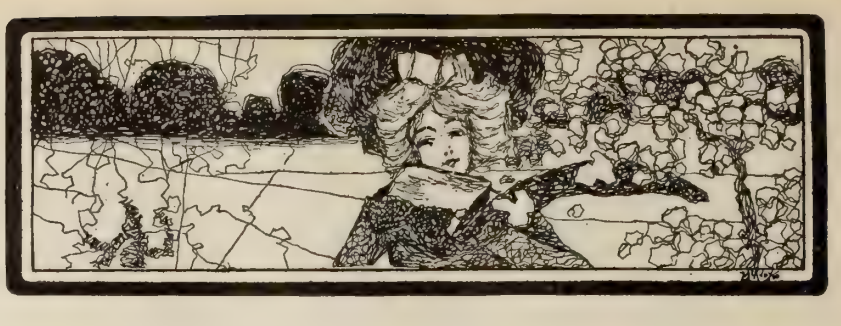
IN any color, from your old ostrich feathers. Money saved and more lasting than new "factory" plumes.

SPECIAL processes for cleaning and dyeing evening gowns and street dresses. The lustre and softness of new goods retained. Feathers, silks and laces given special attention.

EXPRESS paid both ways on orders amounting to $5.00. Ask for our advice and prices. Quarter century reputation.

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS
656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.



CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB

FOR CHRISTMAS

"CHRISTMAS!! Why, it's ages to Christmas!" I can almost hear everyone of you saying. But just think back a bit Remember the last-minute hustle and bustle of other Christmases. Do you remember the presents you forgot to send and other presents that arrived late, and so missed some part of their value?

Then I am going to tell all our new readers and many of our old ones about a way to earn those clothes and presents and flowers and perhaps a trip home. Earning will take some time, and spending will take some, so there is need to start early. When you think of the things you must buy, and the very little money to stretch over them, don't you sometimes wish there was no Christmas? But last year, and the year before, the Girls' Club came to the rescue of all those who prepared to earn money rather than do without.

This year, with our old members busy getting renewals and adding to their lists, and many new members sending in their applications, we hope to pay out thousands of dollars as our share of the festivities of Canadian girls—girls in villages, towns and cities, girl of all ages, single girls and married girls, home girls and business girls.

What are the requirements? Just that you will use your spare time, however small it may be, in working for us. Of course, the more time, the more money you can earn, though many a girl's quick wits and enthusiasm have made up for the lack of time. Some are satisfied with five or ten dollars to buy some special thing, others are working every spare moment piling up the dollars for some special object. Wouldn't it surprise you busy housekeepers to earn $75.00 in a month without neglecting any of your household duties, or $250.00 in a few months, as another member has done?

Isn't the best proof of the possibility of your earning money, the fact that other people just like you have succeeded. I want to quote from letters from another Christmas season, and hope that I may have one from you this Christmas, telling of just as much good fortune.

Dear Secretary:

The club has certainly turned a very dismal looking Christmas time into a most festive one. It is amazing what a cheerful comfortable feeling is radiated from a little "filthy lucre" in one's purse. The $28 paid me by the Club during these last two months has been a perfect godsend. It was so easily earned, too, when once I really started, and it opens the door to a new field of work and interests, with half-dollars just hanging around ready to be plucked.

Very sincerely,
J. L. A.

I am glad to say that many more half dollars were paid to this enthusiastic member, and she has so well cultivated her field that it not only yields her excellent money returns, but a great deal of pleasure.

Dear Secretary:

This is only a small place, so I am very well satisfied to have earned so much ($16.00). You call it work, but really, there has been no real work. Of course, I know every one around here very well indeed, and that has probably made a lot of difference.

Yours,
GRACE ——.

This was a town so small that the only way we could make the Journal known was through some resident, with splendid results for both her and us. Do you wonder we want a Girls' Club member in every village?

Every once in a while we are delightfully surprised to hear from some member who had apparently resigned from the Club. Here's one that came in the other day:

Dear Miss E.:

Are you still the keeper of the Girls' Club? If so, I know you'd be glad to welcome a prodigal back to the fold. Last season I followed many wandering lights that promised well, but now you can count on my best endeavors. I must earn $50 by Xmas, and for a start, here's $5.50. This is just a peace offering I did not like to come back empty handed.

Sincerely,
Prodigal J. S.

This letter is typical of many members—we wish we had thousands more like them.

Dear Secretary:

Will you please send me supplies and tell me what your rates are this year. I haven't opportunity to get a large list, but I have a small circle of friends and relatives, and neighbors who renew each year. It saves them trouble to send through me. It has been very little work since the start, and means several dollars each year. It has been good experience, too, which I probably should not have obtained in any other way.

Wishing you and the Journal all success, I am,
Very sincerely,

And here is another from an intermittent member:

Secretary of the Club:

I need a sample copy, for I think I can add a few new people to my list while getting in my renewals. They often direct me to friends and neighbors. Of course, I do not earn a great deal by this little bit of work, but last year it bought me a new suit, and that's a lot to me. Best of all, it grows every year.

Wishing the Club and you, personally, every success,
HELEN R.

One, two, three, go! Isn't that the way you accomplished many a new feat when you were a kiddie? And if it hadn't been for that "Go," so closely associated in your mind with immediate action, how long might your hesitation not have lasted? Many letters come to me saying, "I have read about the Girls' Club, and been intending to write you for a long time." I know there must be hundreds of other girls who have been interested in the Club who haven't yet written. To all of you, will you let this be your "Go." Will you write to me, to-day, at once, that you want to know all about the Club?

Very sincerely,
SECRETARY, CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB, 59 John Street.

PRETTY GIRLISH GOWNS

No. 7089—Fancy Blouse, 34 to 44 Bust. No. 6989—Six-Gored Skirt, 22 to 32 Waist. 2⅛ yds. of material 27 in wide 1⅛ yds. 36 or 44 with ⅞ yd. of all-over lace 18 in. wide for blouse; 6¾ yds. 27, 4½ yds. 36, 4¼ yds. 44 for skirt when material has figure or nap, 6 yds. 27, 4 yds. 36, 3½ yds. 44 when material has neither figure nor nap; 1 yd. of satin for trimming of gown, for medium size.

No. 7122—Fancy Peasant Blouse, 34 to 42 Bust. No. 7072—Six-Gored Skirt, 22 to 32 Waist. 2¼ yds. of material 27 in. wide, 1⅝ yds. 36, 1¼ yds. 44, with 1 yd. of all-over lace 18 in. wide for blouse; 5 yds. 27, 3¾ yds. 36 or 44 for skirt; 2 yds. of satin 27 in. wide for trimming of gown, for medium size.

No. 7092—Peasant Blouse for Misses and Small Women, 14, 16 and 18 years. No. 7058—Six-Gored Skirt for Misses and Small Women, 14, 16 and 18 years. 2⅛ yds. of material 27 or 36 in. wide, 1⅛ yds. 44 for blouse: with ¾ yd. of all-over lace 18 in. wide for chemisette and undersleeves: 4¼ yds. 27, 2⅝ yds. 36 or 44 for skirt for 16 year size.

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Smart Suits and Coats

THE tailored suits of the season are showing every possible variety of short coat. In addition there will be worn a great many separate coats of three-quarter and of full length. For the tailored costumes is offered a really wonderful variety of materials, and for the coats will be used silk, satin, cloth, tweed, and indeed all similar fabrics; the silks and the like for dressy occasions, the more durable ones for every-day use.

The coat suit shown at the extreme left combines a striped wool novelty material with silk, and one of the latest features of fashion is found in the cloth for the tunic and silk for the under portion. The same model can be used for cloth and velvet, or for serge with trimmings of broadcloth, or for plain material combined with ratine, or, indeed, for any two fabrics that can be put together successfully, or the entire suit can be made of one fabric with the collar and sleeves trimmed with braid or with other banding. The tunic is made in two pieces, and the foundation is four-gored, being attached to the tunic on the line of stitching, for in spite of the double effect the skirt is all in one. It can be finished with a belt or cut to the high waist line, as liked. The coat is made with the big shawl collar that is such a favorite, and closed to the left of the front. It is half fitting, and the sleeves are trimmed to simulate cuffs. For the medium size the coat will require 4 yards of material 27, 2½ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with ⅞ yard of satin for collar and sleeve trimming; for the tunic will be needed 3⅜ yards 27, 2½ yard 36 or 44, and for the foundation of the skirt will be needed 1¾ yards 27 inches wide. The pattern of the coat, 7146, is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 inches bust measure, of the skirt, 7153, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

The young girl's suit is as smart as it is simple. It is made of wide wale diagonal cloth, and is finished with stitching only. The coat is half-fitting, with a big collar and is held by only three buttons. These buttons make a feature, and can well be made as handsome as circumstances allow. The skirt is cut in two pieces, but these pieces are lapped onto side panels, and there are separate panels at the front and back. These last can be cut on either a square or round outline at their lower edges. For the 16-year size the coat will require 3⅜ yards of material 27, 2⅛ yards 44 or 52 inches wide; for the skirt will be needed 5⅜ yards 27, 4 yards 44 or 52 inches wide, the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¼ yards. The pattern of the coat, 7100, and of the skirt, 7134, are cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age, and are well adapted to small women.

The long coat shown on the last figure is exceedingly handsome. It is shapely, it takes the long lines, and is perfectly simple withal. The sleeves can be made in three-quarter and bell shape, or long and plain, but in either case they are sewed to the armholes. The back can be made with or without the seam, and the collar can be square or round. The variations practically mean several coats, and one or the other is sure to meet every need. This coat is made of one of the new double-faced silk serges, and the under side makes the trimming, but for dressy coats are shown velvets, silks, satins and wool materials, while for the coat of every-day wear serge, broadcloth, cheviot and materials of the kind are appropriate. The coat can be made in the length illustrated, or it can be made to cover the gown. Made of long serge with collar and trimming of ratine, it would be quite as smart as is this one, yet absolutely different in effect and adapted to every usage. For the medium size will be required 8 yards of material 27, 4⅝ yards 44 or 52 inches wide for three-quarter length, 7¾ yards 27, 5 yards 44 or 52 for full length. The pattern, 7057, is cut in sizes from 34 to 44 inches bust measure.

Coat Pattern No. 7146
Skirt Pattern No. 7153

Coat Pattern No. 7100
Skirt Pattern No. 7134

Coat Pattern No. 7057

Fashion Notes

THE small hat, known as the "Napoleon," is still a favorite, though large hats are necessary and becoming at times. Brims are nearly all turned up, preferably sweeping upwards much more at the back than the front. The "floppy" river hat has been to a large extent replaced by shapes covered with stretched tussore, linen, or broderie anglaise.

White flowers, especially wheat-ears and roses, are much used as a trimming.

Marquisette and net with darning and bead embroideries will be used for slips; and unlined corsages, and fabrics upon which bead effects are woven, are justifying the introduction made of them this season.

The beads are milk-white, black, steel, and of the Eastern orange and green shades, as a rule, and this coloring is intensified by a belt to match, rendered in satin dexterously folded.

A fichu made of filet lace, added to or taken away from a day dress gives it quite a different appearance for the evening. The new fichus are made of a broad, flat piece of lace, hemmed with brocade or ruched with silk to match the sash worn with the dress. There are no ends to it, but the crossover part is tucked into the waistbelt.

It is not considered quite correct now to have the cords of our bags slung over the shoulder; they should be held, by a shorter length, in the hand. A novel idea is to have a bag to match either the sunshade or the dress. Many smart women are wearing long chains set with jewels at intervals, and on these a little purse or a small watch is hung.

Dame Fashion has quite made up her mind that for the present our gowns are to boast an extreme simplicity of line, but they must be made of some beautiful material in an equally lovely shade.

Tunics in practically every shape and style are to be seen on the smartest gowns, and the dainty little "apron" panels and smart coatees with tiny basque frills promise to be great favorites. The frilled frock is likely to come into its own again, and very pretty it looks carried out in muslin or in a shot silk, while other "old-world" styles to be introduced are quaint ruchings, fichus, and what are known as "crinoline" sleeves—that is, with a fulness at the elbow.

Foulard, taffetas, and poplin are all favorite materials of the moment, while wide-striped fabrics will be worn right on into the autumn. Some of the bows adorning the backs of gowns have attained very much larger proportions than was formerly the case. Russian blouses are making an appearance again, and prove becoming to those who are tall and slim.

Pattern No. 7156

The Useful Tunic

FOR home dress the combination of cerise and violet is not only effective but becoming to most women. The cerise forms the underskirt in satin, veiled with violet mousseline de soie, edged with a fringe or a beaded galon in the same tone. The practical Parisian has imagined a scale of mousseline de soie tunics that she wears with the same skirt and bodice. I will try and explain this happy idea. Let us take a bright blue satin foundation that we nearly all have; the blue skirt just touches the ground or trails a little at the back, not at the sides. The bodice is attached to the skirt, the opening at the neck, cut round, is inserted with white Chantilly net plain or figured, as are the new nets with the design regular and close like a honeycomb. The sleeves are short in the same satin as that of the bodice and skirt, edged with a narrow fringe in silk or beads. The tunics are varied and made quite independently. One is in black mousseline de soie with a black silk fringe, the bodice cut round, showing the white net opening; another is in blue net with a beaded trimming instead of a fringe; a third is in blue and black foulard in the thin check lines that are so pretty, and a fourth is in grey and white striped mousseline de soie finished with a broad hem and a black tassel to weight it on one side. Around the waist is a cord with tassels that fall on the same side as the big tassel. In this way, with a little taste in the choice of color, an infinite variety can be made at small expense. For there is nothing simpler than a tunic with the low bodice and sleeves in one, and one pattern serves for all. The chief outlay is in the satin foundation, but one skirt in a good color makes a very pretty scale of shades under transparent tunics.

A Fashionable Street Gown

STREET gowns will be much worn throughout the autumn, and this one is exceptionally smart. In the illustration it is made of serge with trimming of broadcloth, and the color of the serge is a warm nut brown and the broadcloth is a deep cream in tone. The chemisette is of all-over lace, and, altogether, the costume is chic in the extreme.

Taffeta with trimming of broadcloth would be handsome and fashionable, serge could be trimmed with ratine to be most effective, or satin or silk could be trimmed with ratine to be really beautiful. Stripes and mixtures both are shown, as well as plain colors, and either one could be trimmed with silk or with cloth to be in every way attractive. The skirt is six gored and the box plaits at front and back can be stitched to any desired depth. The blouse is made all in one piece and the closing of the costume is made at the left of the front. This skirt is trimmed with rows of braid and small white pearl buttons, and these buttons are extremely new and smart.

For the medium size the dress will require 7½ yards of material 27, 6¾ yards 36, 4¾ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of broadcloth for the collar and sleeve trimming, 1 yard of all-over lace 18 inches wide for chemisette and under-sleeves.

The pattern, 7156, is in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust measure.

About Cloaks

THIS being an age when all sorts and descriptions of materials are being used, it is not so remarkable that what was once considered only suitable for furniture covering should be utilized. Long evening coats of brocade and tapestry, recalling priests' robes, are exhibited as among the very latest fashions, and there could not be anything more beautiful in coloring, design and texture. The great danger is in the choice of color and weight of material. If the too heavy and stiff is selected then the garment looks heavy and lacks the smart appearance demanded.

All white or all black evening cloaks are not so fashionable as the colored, and there is a wide range of choice, from the vivid shades to the soft pastel colorings. The latter are most charming and generally becoming, but the bright blue, yellow, cerise, green and mauve are extremely effective, while for those who prefer sharp contrasts in color the combining of two colors can be well worked out. One model, a black liberty satin, lined with an exquisite and see our handsome

BE UP-TO-DATE

FASHION CATALOGUE

for this season

IT IS NOW READY FOR MAILING—and, if you are not already on our Mailing List, send in your name and address by return.

It is FREE for the asking

We are the people who make your clothes to measure. Guarantee a fit, or refund your money

WE ARE LEADERS IN THE ART OF MAKING LADIES' WEAR

Do not miss this great Fashion Catalogue. It will be a revelation to you

EVERYTHING we sell is sent PREPAID

MONTGOMERY ROSS & CO.

(The Mail Order House de Luxe of Canada)

MONTREAL

The Hues of Autumn

are rivalled in their brilliancy and beauty by the shades that you get in cotton, wool, silk or mixtures when you use

MAYPOLE SOAP

The Clean, Easy Home Dye

Maypole colors are clearest and freshest because the dye contains soap, and cleans and dyes at one operation. Colors are even, free from streaks and fadeless in sun or rain. The one home dye that does not stain hands or kettles.

24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10c. Black 15c.—at your dealer's or postpaid with free Booklet "How to Dye," from

FRANK L. BENEDICT & CO. - MONTREAL

"SWAN" FOUNT PEN.

Always Ready. Never fails.

Fitted with gold iridium tipped nib and perfect feed.

Prices from $2.50

Sold by leading stationers and jewellers. CATALOGUE FREE.

MABIE TODD & Co., 124 York St., Toronto

London, New York, Chicago

83 CALLS

Were received last month for office help—37 were left unfilled. Demands for trained help are so great that we can afford to "guarantee a position to every graduate or refund tuition money." If you are anxious to succeed write for our beautiful catalogue to-day.

CENTRAL BUSINESS COLLEGE

Toronto, W. H. Shaw, Principal

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

H.P. SAUCE

The Ingredients

Choicest Oriental Fruits and Spices—Pure Malt Vinegar.

The Making

A Secret.

The Result

A delicious, thick, fruity sauce, quite distinctive.

There is none just like it, in fact, nothing nearly so nice.

Home Dressmaking

is simplified by using the celebrated

Hall-Borchert Adjustable Forms

Adjustable to every size from 32 to 44 bust measure and can be raised to suit length of skirt.

Write to-day for our New Catalog. It shows a full line of Dressmakers' Forms.

CLATWORTHY & SON, Ltd.

Display Fixture Manufacturers

161 King St. West, TORONTO

Canadian Home Journal Patterns are used by thousands of the best dressed women in Canada.

Post paid, 12 cents each

Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

The Harry Webb Co. Ltd.

TORONTO, CAN.

shade of cerise, is popular, while a pale blue with a pale yellow is also attractive. Grey with cerise is a dangerous combination unless just the right shades are selected, but none the less it is fashionable, while two shades of purple are most effectively combined. An em-

7141 Tucked Blouse for Misses and Small Women, 14, 16 and 18 years.

broidered crepe in dull yellow is lined throughout with yellow one tone lighter in color, and this latter is the smartest of all. Black and white are combined cleverly and effectively in a loose coat or mantle of black satin, trimmed with bands of black velvet ribbon. The velvet ribbon is put on in rows around the foot, while on the wide revers that cross in front there are two rows, the outer edged with a narrow white satin. This one note of white against the black is almost too abrupt in contrast, but it is immensely becoming and very smart, and furthermore has the immense advantage of being appropriate both as an afternoon and an evening wrap, so that it will be copied in black velvet for the winter.

7138 Four Gored Skirt, 22 to 32 waist.

Fringes and Brocades

FRINGES, whether they be made of beads and bugles, or of chenille and silk, will be useful in any length. When the time has passed for edging scarves and trains with fringe it will be useful for the trimming of muffs and bags. It is scarcely necessary to mention that small pieces of brocade will make the smartest reticules it is possible to buy, especially if macarons of gold or silver are added—easily made, by the way, if bullion braid be brought into requisition. Tassels may trim the said reticules, and may also weigh the hem of a wisplike evening-dress train or the end of a cloak for gala wear.

Try the effect upon a linen dress of a collar-band edged with white satin ribbon. It is infinitely softening to the throat. And if for the early autumn there should be needed a general refreshing of neckwear, be sure to replace the white satin by a band of black tulle set on flat, or of black velvet ribbon. And should there be threadings required for the lingerie frock, try the effect of black velvet ribbon here too.

Many an autumn frock will owe its distinction to the buttons by which it is embellished, so by no means pass the button counters without a thought for the future. There are bargains frequently in that way, and the chance of securing even one or two really very splendid specimens should not be lost. One will centre a belt-bow with charming effect, and two will add splendor to a bolero.

7137 Child's French Dress, 2, 4 and 6 years.

The Popular Color

THE feature in the skirt situation is the increasing favor of grey, and black and white effects. Everything of this nature is selling exceptionally well, no doubt in sympathy with the general tendency towards this class of material in other garments.

Skirts are usually plain, though some 7143 Child's Apron, 2 to 8 years.

FIT-ANY-FORM IMPROVED MATERNITY SKIRT

Patented, May 9th-11

A boon to prospective Mothers Prof. Fowler said in his works Tight lacing is the second chief cause, of infantile mortality Fit-any-Form Skirt has no lacing nor draw-strings is a scientific garment endorsed by Maternity Hospitals and pronounced by leading physicians as a relief to women in delicate condition and a revelation to mother-hood. Can be worn at all times at home, the street, and theatre. Simple to adjust from 24 to 36 waist, drapes evenly in front as waist increases, and grants freedom to the abdomen because the new improvements the Elastic belt relieves the pressure on waist band and Eliminates the weight of Skirt. Made in several styles at prices of ordinary skirt. Send for our Illustrated book Fit-any-Form Maternity Skirt tells all about the skirt and valuable information to Expectant mother. Free to any woman writing for it. In order to advertise our improved Maternity Skirt we make a special offer of a $10.00 skirt in panama and serge black or navy at $7.50. All we require is the front length of skirt and we will Express prepaid skirt ordered. After a trial of 5 days and you find skirt not as represented, we will cheerfully refund every cent, paid.

REMEMBER that the improved Fit-any-Form Maternity skirt is without question the very best skirt on market in Canada and U.S. at 25% less than substitutes offered. Fit-any Form Skirt Mfg Co.

DEPT. B, 507 ST. PAUL ST., MONTREAL

ONLY 25 CENTS

For this Exquisite Corset Cover.

Send only 25c. and we will mail you, postage prepaid by us, this exquisite Corset cover, the finest quality Cambric, front yoke, three rows 1-inch Torchon lace, trimmed with ribbon beading and bow, edged around neck with 1-inch lace to match. Beautifully made. All sizes, 34 to 44. Surely a wonderful bargain. If you do not consider this exquisite cover worth 50 cts. when you receive it, mail it right back and we will promptly refund your money, also postage.

FREE with EVERY ORDER

With every order for corset cover we will include absolutely free of charge one year's subscription to "Art Needlework Magazine." Don't fail to send in your order while we have these beautiful corset covers still in stock.

AVALONE & COMPANY, Dept. L
49 Colborne St., Toronto, Ont.

BUST and HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms" do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co., of Canada, Limited.

70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

Well, Well!

THIS is a HOME DYE that ANYONE can use

I dyed ALL these DIFFERENT KINDS of Goods with the SAME Dye.

I used

DY-O-LA

ONE DYE FOR ALL KINDS OF GOODS

CLEAN and SIMPLE to Use.

No chance of using the Wrong Dye for the Goods one has to color. All colors from your Druggist or Dealer. FREE Color Card and STORY Booklet 10, from

The Johnson-Richardson Co., Limited
Montreal, Can.

JAP-A-LAC

The Great Home Beautifier

¶ This wonderful material has probably done more to beautify homes in all parts of the whole continent of America than any other one preparation; yet, it is easier to tell what it is NOT than to tell what it is. It is NOT a varnish, it is NOT a stain, it is NOT a paint, it is NOT an enamel; yet it combines the uses of a varnish, a stain, a paint and an enamel all in one.

¶ Thousands and thousands of thrifty housekeepers and lovers of beautiful homes have attested to its value each year.

¶ It is so easy to apply that one needs no special skill to produce really beautiful results with Jap-a-lac. Even amateurs who have never been able to do good work with paints, enamels, stains or varnishes can obtain a finish worthy of an expert.

¶ Our book of directions and suggestions is so complete and explicit that it is almost impossible to go wrong.

¶ Be sure to write to us for it. IT'S FREE FOR THE ASKING. Jap-a-lac is made in 21 colors and Natural (clear). There is nothing in the world like Jap-a-lac for renewing the youth, beauty and strength of woodwork of all kinds—stairways, doors, baseboards, window frames, cupboards, floors, furniture, wickerwork, registers, iron pipes, chandeliers, lamps, baby carriages, picture frames, candlesticks, andirons and a thousand and one other household articles. It is poor economy to try to get along without Jap-a-lac. IT IS PENNY WISE AND POUND FOOLISH. Jap-a-lac COSTS NO MORE than any high grade paint, varnish, stain or enamel AND IS VASTLY SUPERIOR.

JAP-A-LAC COLORS

Oak
Gold
Ground
Natural
Mahogany
Flat White
Dead Black
Malachite Green
Enamel Green
Apple Green Enamel
Enamel Blue (Pale)

JAP-A-LAC COLORS

Blue
Cherry
Walnut
Dark Oak
Aluminum
Gloss White
Ox-Blood Red
Enamel Red
Brilliant Black
Enamel Pink (Pale)
Enamel Green (Pale)

The Glidden Varnish Co.

FACTORIES

Cleveland, U.S.A. Toronto, Canada

Dry Cleaning will Remove the Spot

Perhaps you have always thought it impossible to clean fine Silks, Satins, Opera Cloaks, Suits, Laces, Feathers, etc. so they would look new.

Our special Dry Cleaning Process and years of experience, enable us to do work that your local cleaner knows nothing about.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.
14

The CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL makes a desirable Christmas present to send to a distant friend. We will send copies for one year, anywhere in Canada, for $1.00.

are being shown with plain paneled front and back, with an inverted box pleat on each side gore. With these pleats the wearer is afforded more freedom of movement, and they will no doubt become popular in view of this fact. Skirts with the higher waistline and Empire effect are increasingly in demand. This is taken to mean that blouses will again come into their own, and that in the not distant future.

7140 Breakfast Jacket, Small 34 or 36, Medium 38 or 40, Large 42 or 44 bust.

The panama is of course the utility skirt, still voiles are always selling well. There is a demand for greater variety of materials, following the increased call for separate skirts. This, of course, is the natural tendency in the development of trade in this garment. Whereas in the early stages of the separate skirt business, staple colors and fabrics have the call, novelties are now being introduced in great numbers, and the tendency will be in this direction.

So far as can be judged at present, there is every likelihood of tweeds and serges being particularly strong for fall. The tendency is towards a skirt, with back and front panels, and box pleats predominating.

Where trimmings are employed, these will be principally in braids of self colors.

Repp and duck are the favored fabrics in separate wash skirts, which are in excellent demand from all quarters. Linen has not yet replaced repp as the most called-for material for these garments. They are, generally speaking, quite plain, few having trimming of any kind.

Packing the Trunk

PACKING the trunk is an easy matter, provided one owns a wardrobe trunk or a bureau trunk. The wardrobe trunk is long and narrow, which answers every purpose of a wardrobe, and is fitted with one compartment which has a number of hangers for gowns with and without trains, and another place with hangers for waists. It has a tiny drawer for various articles, with one deep one at the bottom for shoes, and one for hats. There is also a linen bag arrangement with several pockets which hold soiled clothes.

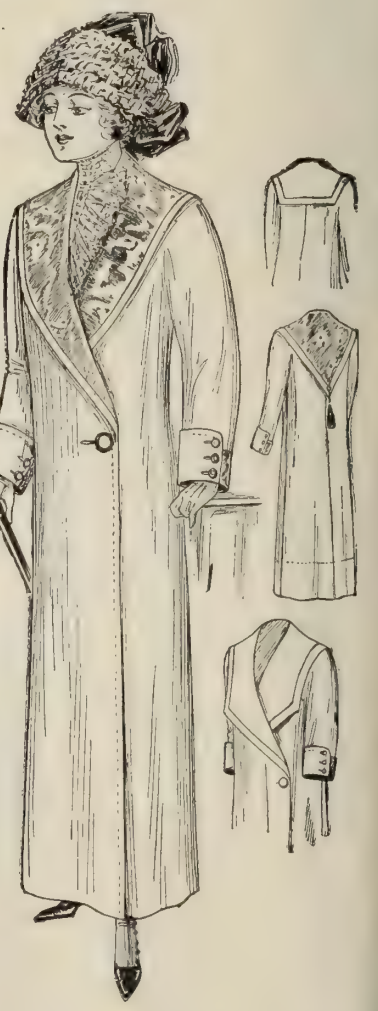
7136 Boy's Sailor Suit, 4, 6 and 8 years.

7133 Peasant Blouse, 34 to 44 bust.

The bureau trunk simply has different sized drawers and a deep one for hats. Both these trunks stand upright, so that you would not have to bend over when packing.

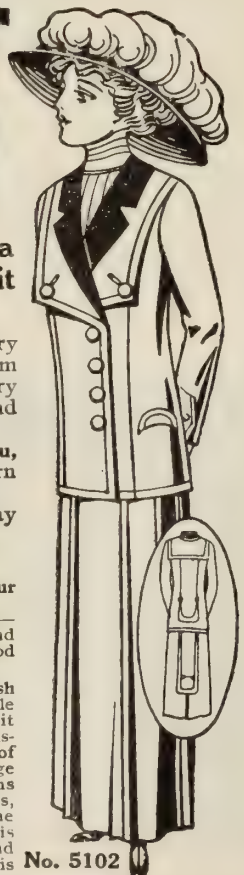
It is the ordinary trunk with trays that requires thought when packing. In the first place, be sure and have it placed on some elevation, so that you can stand up to do the work. Twice as much can be put in a trunk without crushing as most people put in. It is better for things to be tightly packed than to have them rattling round loose.

If going on a long journey, wrap each garment separately in white tissue paper after folding it along its natural creases or where folds will be least noticeable. Stuff the sleeves of waists, jackets, and gowns with tissue paper to hold them in shape.



7109 Long or Three-Quarter Length Coat for Misses and Small Women, 14, 16 and 18 years.

BON-TON



The 1911-12 Bon-Ton Fall & Winter Catalogue is a Model for Style and a Revelation in Value—and it is your interest madam, to have a copy.

We manufacture all our output in a large, modern, hygienic factory in the most economical manner—buying our dress goods etc. direct from the mills in the world's best markets and avoiding all unnecessary expenses of high rents and so forth, and sell direct to you madam, and this is the secret of our excellent values.

Controlling every point of our product we know we can please you, so we renew our guarantee to cheerfully and unquestionably return the money for any article which does not please.

Though our prices are so low, we will continue this season to pay delivery on all orders large or small.

BON-TON STYLES ARE RIGHT.

Our designers are proud of their foresight in hitting off the change of style and our skirts are models of the latest fashion.

Every page of our catalogue is of interest. We illustrate two attractive models—but send for the book. In it you will find hundreds of real bargains in underwear and overwear—bargains which will make you friends of ours by their good style, good material, excellent value.

No. 592

592.—Misses' Cloak, in good quality iron grey cheviot,—fancy weaves, and in plain black, in navy blue, or bronze, in diagonal texture. 48 inches in length, this coat is semi-fitted. The collar is sailor fashion in the back, and with the velvet trimmings give it a very stylish finish; little buttons and silk soutache loops complete its appearance. The back opens into a pleat on either side, below the hips. The lining mid-back of same material, add still more to its value.... $8.75

No. 5102

5102.—Tailored Suit of good quality, English Cheviot in black or navy blue. The individual style of this model, which is not dear, assures us that it will be in great demand. The goods will give satisfaction and the workmanship is characteristic of "Bon-Ton". The Coat, 30 inches long has a large sailor collar, pretty black velvet trimming, buttons and little silk soutache loops; pockets on the sides, and buttons with soutache loops on the sleeves; the lining is of good diagonal mercerized. The Skirt is of the latest style with plain panel in front, and trimmed panel in the back. The panel in the back is cut several inches from the ground, and trimmed with buttons and soutache loops. This skirt will be appreciated by ladies seeking the very latest models. A really valuable suit at..... $10.25

Direct from the Factory.

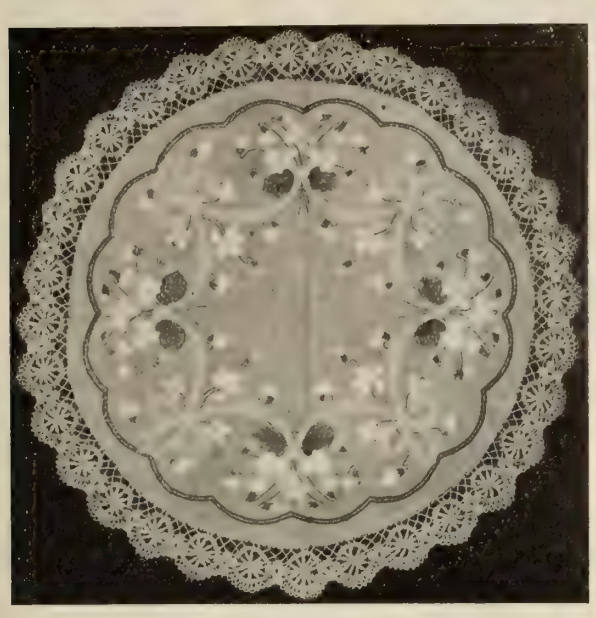
Saving intermediate profits.

THE BON-TON CO., 439 St. Joseph Street
QUEBEC.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

EMBROIDERED CENTREPIECES

LARGE centrepieces are capable of a variety of decoration, and beautiful effects have been obtained on the various centres pictured on this page which are all exquisite and yet very different in material, color and style of embroidery.



No. 2100—Tinted, 36-inch, $1 00

Any of these may be carried out by the woman who is interested in art needlework, and where is the one who does not find some time to devote to such charming work? Centrepieces are indispensable adjuncts to the furnishing of the home, and are often needed to give the necessary touch of color to the decorative scheme of a room as well as the "all white" centre, which adds to the handsome table linen which decks the attractive table over which every true home-maker loves to preside.

The first centre shown has a beautiful arrange

No. 5645—27-inch, 55 cents

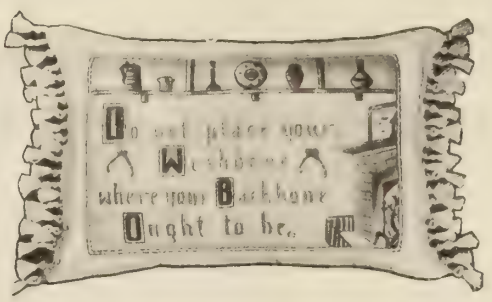
ments of violets, tinted on a dark linen background and embroidered with shades of violet and greens, and the wide ribbon is effectively treated by darning the centre space with rope silk and couching with three strands of the same silk, using a darker shade for the outer edges. The border of this centrepiece consists of rows of couching. Green rope silks with Japanese gold thread sewn between form an effective edge, and the centrepiece has a handsome Cluny lace finish.

The 2153 centrepiece has a handsomely tinted design of yellow tulips on a dark tan linen background. This centrepiece, which is gorgeous in coloring, is embroidered in shades of golden yellow, reddish browns and greens, and would look very handsome in a room where the color scheme is brown or green. This design may be embroidered either in solid padded satin stitch or heavily tipped long and short, and the border is finished as described above on the violet centrepiece.

A very beautiful centrepiece is No. 5345, which has a design for Hedebo embroidery which is always beautiful, and one of the embroideries never commonplace or overdone. Every portion of the design which holds the lace or filling stitches must be solidly and evenly button-holed, using letter D lustred cotton for this and the stitches, of which there are an endless variety known to workers who have been familiar with Battenberg or other lace work are woven into the spaces prepared by the buttonholed edges, the linen afterwards being carefully cut away with very sharp scissors. Other portions of the design are embroidered in padded satin stitch, and the finished result will repay any worker who will spend the time necessary to embroider this centrepiece.

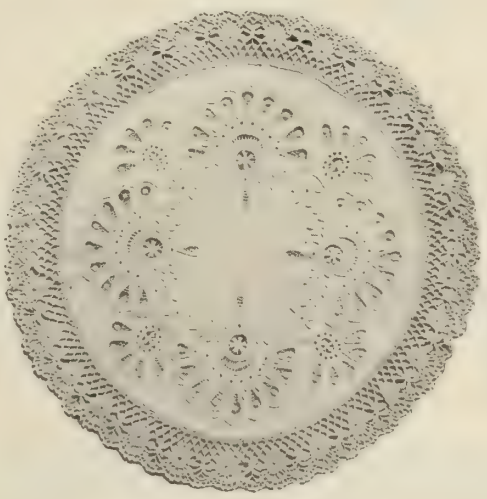
Two other varieties of centrepieces will appeal to those who wish to produce effective designs without expending very much time upon these, and the first, No. 5455, which has a graceful arrangement of daisies and bow knots is very handsome when completed. The daisies are formed from Coronation braid, the centres are filled with French knots and the dots and bow knots are embroidered in solid padded satin stitch. Plain buttonholed border finishes this design, which has an edge of handsome Cluny lace.

No. 5645 has a most unusual arrangement of Coronation braid or rat-tail cord. Before sewing on the Coronation cord which edges the clover leaves, the latter are tipped long and short with pale green silk, shading into white. The Coronation cord is sewn into place forming the edge of these, and the rat-tail cord is used for the background filling.



No. 5105—50 cents; fringe for edging, $1 50

No. 5455—27-inch, 55 cents



No. 5345—Complete Cluny, edged, 30-inch, $1 25

An effective cushion for a den is the motto, No. 5105, which is tinted on a greyish linen background embroidered in reds, browns, greens and black.

If these articles cannot be supplied from your dealer, write to Belding, Paul & Co., Limited, Dept. L., Montreal, also for any other information you may require.

No. 2153—Tinted, 27-inch, 75 cents.

SEND AT ONCE

— 35 CENTS —

For eight skeins of ART EMBROIDERY SILK which is sufficient to embroider a 15 inch CREAM LINEN CENTRE PIECE, stamped for the fashionable Mille Fleur or Thousand Flower Embroidery which we will give you FREE and sufficient Cream Lace to edge this beautiful Centre Piece; ALSO A DIAGRAM LESSON which will enable any woman to do this embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send to-day, as this generous offer is good for a short time only.

This offer is made to convince every woman that BELDING'S ART EMBROIDERY SILKS are the best made.

Send 10c for a copy of Belding's Needle & Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for art embroidery.

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI CO'Y.
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

Pen Angle Hosiery

Only SEAMLESS Hosiery Fits Right!

You should wear Pen-Angle Hosiery, and no other kind. For this is the only Canadian-made hosiery that is seamless AND priced moderately AND guaranteed. All three merits ought to be in your hosiery. Because no hosiery that is not SEAMLESS can be comfortable—and Pen-Angle machines are the only ones in Canada able to knit such hosiery, form-shaped to the leg and foot, instead of merely water-shrunk into shape. Thus, though priced reasonably, Pen-Angle Hosiery holds its shape indefinitely. And it is reinforced wherever wear falls.

To these merits add the GUARANTEE you read here—two pairs for one if Pen-Angle Hosiery disappoints. Note next the modest price you need pay to get all this—and then remember name and trademark when next you need hosiery.

PEN-ANGLE HOSIERY

Pen Angle — WARRANTED HIGH PENMAN'S GRADE HOSIERY

FOR LADIES

No. 1760—"Lady Fair" Black Cashmere hose. Medium weight. Made of fine, soft cashmere yarns, 2-ply leg. 5-ply foot, heel, toe and high splice, giving strength where needed. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1020—Same quality as 1760, but heavier. Black only. Box of 3 pairs $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1150—Very fine Cashmere hose. Medium weight. 2-ply leg. 4-ply foot, heel and toe. Black, light and dark tan, leather, champagne, myrtle, pearl gray, oxblood, helio, cardinal. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1720—Fine quality Cotton Hose. Made of 2-ply Egyptian yarn, with 3-ply heels and toes. Black, light and dark tan, champagne, myrtle, pearl gray, oxblood, helio, sky, pink, bisque. Box of 4 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $1.50.

No. 1175—Mercerized. Same colors as 1720. Box of 3 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $2.00.

FOR MEN

No. 2404—Medium weight Cashmere. 2-ply Botany yarn with special "Everlast" heels and toes. Black, light and dark tan, leather, champagne, navy, myrtle, pearl gray, slate, oxblood, helio, cadet blue and bisque. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 500—"Black Knight" winter weight black Cashmere half-hose. 5-ply body, spun from pure Australian wool. 9-ply silk splice heels and toes. Box of 3 pairs, $1.50; 6 pairs, $3.00.

No. 1090 — Cashmere half-hose. Same quality as 500, but lighter weight. Black only. Box of 3 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $2.00.

No. 330—"Everlast' Cotton socks. Medium weight. Made from four-ply long staple combed Egyptian cotton yarn, with six-ply heels and toes. Black, light and dark tan. Put up in boxes. Box of 3 pairs, $1.00; 6 pairs, $2.00.

READ THIS REMARKABLE GUARANTEE

We guarantee the following lines of Pen-Angle Hosiery to fit you perfectly, not to shrink or stretch and the dyes to be absolutely fast. We guarantee them to wear longer than any other cashmere or cotton hosiery sold at the same prices. If, after wearing Pen-Angle Guaranteed Hosiery any length of time, you should ever find a pair that fails to fulfill this guarantee in any particular, return the same to us and we will replace them with TWO new pairs free of charge.

ORDER THIS WAY

Ask at the store first. If they cannot supply you, state number, size of shoe or stocking and color of hosiery desired and enclose price, and we will fill your order postpaid. Remember we will fill no order for less than one box and only one size in a box. BE SURE TO MENTION SIZE. 57

ADDRESS AS BELOW:

PENMANS, LIMITED

Dept. 39

PARIS, CANADA

WARRANTED HIGH PENMAN'S GRADE HOSIERY

For a Christmas Gift to a Girl Friend nothing would be more acceptable than a year's subscription to the

Canadian Home Journal

Write us for particulars

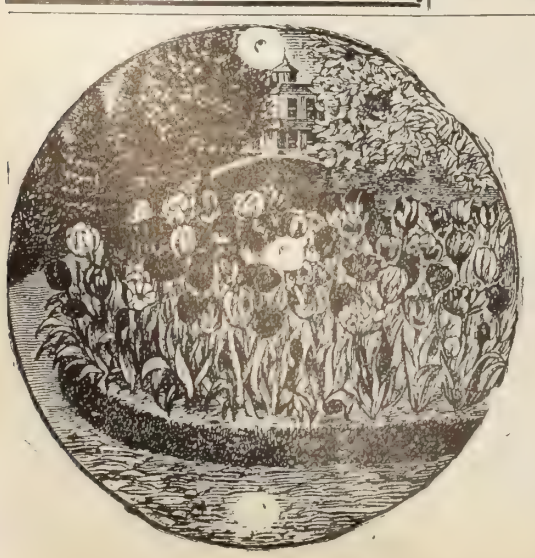
Stammerers and Stutterers are cured at the Arnott Institute, to stay cured. We show you why you stammered, and how to speak naturally, without any marking time with hands or feet or head. Our methods are scientific, sensible, and therefore successful. Write for information and proofs of success to 8

ARNOTT INSTITUTE

Berlin, Ont., Canada.



PLANT NOW TULIPS For Next Spring's Flowering

There is nothing to equal a bed or border of Tulips in bloom in the spring. The colors are exquisite; they are hardy and inexpensive, besides being good for 3 or 4 years. Bulbs must be planted in October. We offer, prices postpaid:

	Doz.	100
Tulips, single, named, 6 colors	30c	$2.00
Tulips, single, best mixed, all colors	25c	1.50
Tulips, single, good mixed, all colors	20c	1.25
Tulips, double, named, 6 colors	35c	2.25
Tulips, double, best mixed, all colors	30c	1.75
Tulips, double, good mixed, all colors	25c	1.50
Tulips, Parrot, mixed, all colors, late	25c	1.50
Tulips, Darwin, mixed, all colors, late	30c	2.00

Also a full assortment of Bulbs for winter blooming in the house and spring blooming in the garden, such as Crocus, Freezias, Hyacinths, Lilies, Narcissus, Snowdrops, Scillas, etc.

Also Bird Seed and Supplies, Poultry Supplies, Flower Pots and Fancy Vases, Lawn Seed, Popcorn, Lawn Cleaners, Plants and Flower Seeds of all kinds.

Write for our 28-page Illustrated Fall Catalogue. Free.

JOHN A. BRUCE & CO. Limited, Hamilton, Ontario

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

ALREADY the light and filmy summer goods have vanished from the scene, leaving in their place the sober colors and heavier weaves of autumn. Veranda rugs and porch curtains have been put away for the winter, and the prospect for winter furnishings is warm and inviting. Once more we turn where rugs are spread, to survey the floor coverings which invite the housewife to invest in that new rug for the dining-room or "a lovely square in browns" which she must have for one of the upstairs rooms.

There was a time when the wool carpet spoke only of cheapness, with the most "common" designs in flowers or blocks. However, a change has come over the designers and weavers of these floor coverings, and at Eaton's some of the wool rugs show a delicacy and softness of coloring which afford artistic delight. There is one design in a dull shade of green with old rose which is dainty enough for a boudoir and yet which is within the reach of a moderate purse. Then there are squares of brown and forest green—woodland shades which take one away in fancy to the depths of a northland grove, and are a cheering sight for the gaze of tired eyes. Whatever you do, refrain from buying an ugly carpet because it is cheap. However, it is not hard, in this enlightened age, to find either rug or carpet of which one will not tire, and which has all the "wearing" qualities which one might desire.

Linoleum, which is so often used for a border, comes in designs which sometimes make it very difficult to distinguish it from the actual hardwood finish. The styles in block, tile, matting and oak plank effects are all suitable for use in any room, and are well worth inspection.

Then there are the Wilton squares in patterns of small Persian, large blue Oriental, rich medallion and green chintz. Some of these, nine by ten and a-half feet, were sold as low as nineteen dollars. The hearth rugs present almost a bewildering variety, but most of us will prefer the Smyrna specimens, with their glowing and durable patterns.

The "real" Oriental rug is the desire of every feminine heart. Yet it is comforting to see how closely it is imitated by the modern manufacturer, who will persuade all but the initiated that the rug in question came from the bazaars of Teheran, or, like Thackeray's famous praying-rug, "came from a Turcoman's camp."

There are enamels and polishes in abundance—enough to put a shine on every Canadian household. It is curious to reflect that many women who would not allow the kitchen to be anything but immaculate, will let picture frames become dingy and soiled until they are an eyesore on the walls.

In wall-papering and decoration, as we may have remarked before, it is remarkable how French grey has become very fashionable. This is a tint, however, which is unsuited to the ordinary living room. For drawing-room or a dainty bedroom, it is entirely to be desired, and is exceedingly effective with mauve, shell pink or a rich crimson. There is a Toronto drawing-room paneled in pearl and French grey, with crimson brocaded satin, which is one of the most delightful and picturesque apartments imaginable.

The high-grade art stencil hand-colored designs on brown ground make a very attractive and serviceable paper for halls or dining-rooms. There is also a charming German hand-made wall paper, with moire background and primrose, blue and pink designs. In the Canadian products, there is a glimmer wall paper for attic rooms, halls and bedrooms. In buying for bedrooms, it is always well to bear in mind that light is the great consideration, and that a paper should be chosen which will give the most sunshiny effect.

For the bath room, the varnished tile paper is greatly preferred. A very pleasing effect has been obtained by having the Dutch effect in bath room decoration, with frieze of genuine Holland design of canals and windmills. A most artistic-looking bath room was "done" in white and pale green, with frieze of water lilies.

WRINKLES are among those attentions of Father Time which every woman dreads. Yet, one can do a great deal to ward off such attentions by avoiding forming the habit of scowling, which is largely nervous. Sometimes it is the consequence of defective eyesight, and, in such a case, attention to the eyes will do away with the settled frown. However, no one may hope to escape altogether the affliction of wrinkles.

The thin, dry skin is most prone to show these marks of time and worry. If any of the wrinkles are perchance due to a habit of drawing up the forehead, squinting, frowning, etc., it is well to look to the habit and, possibly even back of that, to the condition of the eyes and to the habits of the mind and disposition. The woman with a fretful, worried, disagreeable, or unhappy expression constantly on her face is never beautiful, and she will soon find, as she looks in the glass, that her features have "frozen in place," as we are told when we are children. The corners of the mouth will droop even when she is not consciously unhappy, the frown will grow into place, and she will find that her forehead runs up to her hair in horizontal wrinkles without evident effort. The conquest of self which she has before her if she is to save her beauty is even more difficult than that of the woman who must reduce or gain flesh. Wrinkles may be helped by feeding the skin with cold cream, by using massage of the proper kind, even by resorting to plasters, tight bands, etc., to counteract the tendencies of the relaxed skin.

AN Englishwoman, walking down a street in a Canadian city, suddenly paused, and, clutching her companion's arm, said: "Oh! Doesn't that smell like home?" A man was standing on the corner, holding a basket filled with envelopes of sweet lavender. It was a hot and dusty day, the passers-by looked tired and toilworn, but more than one turned at the exclamation and smiled in recognition of "a fragrance from home." The poignant perfume carried one away across the sea to acres and acres in English counties where sweet lavender is shedding its fragrance.

"I have a new idea for my clothes closet," said a girl, who is always on the alert for the latest fancies in setting or adornment. "You know I have been visiting Violet Gordon, and Vi always has such pretty things. Her room is white with violet, to match her name, she says. Her clothes closet is the daintiest you ever saw, and on each shelf is a sachet, which gives just a suggestion of perfume to the whole wardrobe. I have discovered an ancient recipe for a mixture which my grandmother used, and have used it for two 'shelf sachets.'"

WE are frequently told that the modern girl is not as careful about standing erect as were the women of the last generation. There is no beauty or grace of the body that an erect posture cannot heighten, nor is there a single bodily attraction that will not be marred or obscured by an ugly stoop. Yet thousands of boys and girls, especially those of rapid growth, are every year acquiring the disfiguring and pernicious habit of round shoulders.

The truth is, standing erect is not a matter of the shoulders alone, nor even of the trunk, but of the whole body, from the feet upward. An erect posture does not mean that a person standing back to a wall shall touch it all the way up and down. The lines of the body are curves. Some backs approximate a straight line more closely than others, but a really straight back would be a deformity. The set of the neck also varies.

If you would know your own natural posture when erect, stand up, and, without raising your heels from the floor, make the effort of rising to look over some obstacle, allowing the shoulders to droop naturally, and keeping the chin at an easy level. When you have risen to your full statue hold the position and notice what it is. You have not consciously posed the different parts of your body, yet your chest is finely rounded, your shoulders are thrown back, your abdomen is drawn in, and your back and neck are as straight as you can set them, all the parts of the body falling without effort into their proper positions now that the whole has been correctly poised. You have a strange feeling of separation in every joint, while an astonishing distance has sprung up between your breastbone and your hips. To the eye you are at least an inch taller. If you have any doubt on this last point stand before a mirror in your former posture, and note how high the reflection of your head comes on the wall behind you, or, if the mirror is low, at what point your image is cut off. Then take the upright position as before, and notice the difference in the mirror.

"But," you say, "this position tires me; I cannot hold it." Very likely; but you can maintain it much better than you can hold your chin drawn in, or your chest inflated, for your shoulders squared back, without a proper foundation for an erect posture in the altered carriage of your whole body.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

ELSIE M.—The bitter almond soap you inquire about is excellent. I shall send you directions as to where it may be obtained if you will send stamped and addressed envelope. The use of soap does no harm to a delicate skin, if the soap is of good quality, and if you are careful to rinse the face well after using it. A "cheap" soap is entirely false economy and means trouble with the skin. I do not mean to advise the most expensive French soap. By the way, I saw a three-dollar cake the other day in a wrapper of yellow satin. That is what our grandmothers might justly call "wicked extravagance." But, when I see women rushing for soap bargains—three cakes for ten cents—and then observe the quality of the scented pink and green cakes, I wonder at their folly in supposing such material can be healthfully cleansing.

MARGARET S.—I should not care to recommend the preparation you mention, as I have no personal knowledge of it. However, I know several authorities who speak well of it. I am forwarding a pamphlet which will give you some information on the subject. Certainly, I think it is every woman's duty to look as well as she can. You say that you have been ridiculed for taking care of your hands and for wearing gloves when sweeping. Only stupid or vulgar people would make fun of such sensible care. Look and dress as well as you can—and then forget all about yourself.

E. R. C.—The recipe for a good lotion for blackheads I am sending you by mail. It is also a good plan to wash the face thoroughly with liquid green soap and warm water, leaving the lather on the face for some time. It is well to be careful about not getting the soap into the eyes, but it is very good for the complexion. After allowing the lather to remain on for fifteen or twenty minutes, wash it off with warm water and apply the lotion I have given you.

If you have a rash it is really better to go to a physician concerning it. One should seek the cause of anything of that kind, and it is apt to be internal.

After you have disposed of the blackheads and got your skin in fairly good condition, it will undoubtedly be wise to use an astringent lotion as the pores of your skin are probably too large and should be contracted. A good astringent wash is made up of one and one-half ounces of cucumber juice placed in a half-pint bottle half filled with elder-flower water. To this should be added one ounce of eau-de-cologne and one-half ounce of tincture of benzoin. This should be shaken well, and the bottle filled with elder-flower water. The lotion should be applied with a sponge night and morning.

ROYAL VINOLIA

TOILET PREPARATIONS

TOOTH PASTE
TOOTH POWDER
VANISHING CREAM
TALCUM POWDER
FLUID DENTIFRICE
SHAVING STICK
SHAVING POWDER

25 CENTS EACH
At all Druggists.

THE ROYAL VINOLIA TOILET PREPARATIONS present a new and still higher standard of quality, the highest attainable standard of purity and the best resources in the world in the production of the Finest Soaps, Perfumes and Toilet Preparations that the world has known.

ROYAL VINOLIA SOAP
A Pure White Soap
120 15 cents a cake or 35 cents per box of 3 tablets

HOW TO IMPROVE YOUR COMPLEXION
BEETHAM'S
La-rola
Entirely Removes and Prevents all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, HEAT, IRRITATION. Etc., and renders THE SKIN DELICATELY SOFT and VELVETY

It is the most perfect Emollient Milk for the Skin ever produced, and for the Toilet and Nursey is Invaluable. It is delightfully Refreshing and Soothing if applied after Motoring, Cycling, Tennis, Golfing, Boating, etc. It is neither sticky nor greasy, and can be used at any time during the day.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.

Baby's Own Soap

unequalled for toilet and nursery use.
"Best for baby—best for you."
Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited
Mfrs., Montreal.
E511

THE COAST LINE TO MACKINAC

DETROIT CLEVELAND BUFFALO NIAGARA FALLS

TOLEDO PT. HURON GODERICH ALPENA ST. IGNACE

THE LUXURY OF A LAKE TRIP

Where will you spend your summer vacation? Why not enjoy the charms of our Inland Seas, the most pleasant and economical outing in America?

Where You Can Go

Daily service is operated between Detroit and Cleveland, Detroit and Buffalo; four trips weekly between Toledo, Detroit, Mackinac Island and way ports; three trips weekly between Toledo, Cleveland and Put-in-Bay.

A Cleveland to Mackinac special steamer will be operated two trips weekly from June 15th to September 10th, stopping only at Detroit every trip and Goderich, Ont., every other trip.

Special Day Trips Between Detroit and Cleveland, During July and August

Send 2 cent stamp for Illustrated Pamphlet and Great Lakes Map.

Address: L. G. Lewis, G. P. A.
Detroit, Michigan
Philip H. McMillan, President
A. A. Schantz, General Manager
Detroit & Cleveland Nav. Co.

HEADACHE?

Stop it in 30 minutes, without any harm to any part of your system, by taking

"NA-DRU-CO" Headache Wafers

25c. a box, at all druggists'.

NATIONAL DRUG and CHEMICAL CO. of Canada, Limited, Montreal. 27A

OUR PATTERNS are always the favorites.
TWELVE CENTS EACH

Don't Throw it Away

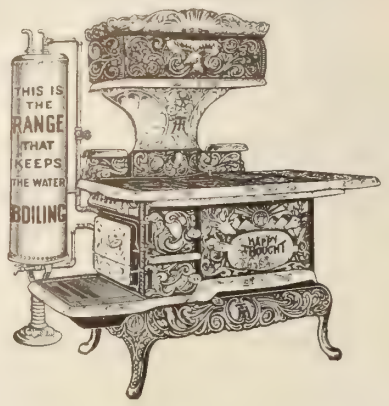
"Does Your Granite Dish or Hot Water Bag Leak?"

USE MENDETS
A PATENT PATCH

They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. D Collingwood, Ont.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

The Least Fuel, The Most Satisfaction



Another Range May be Good—A "Happy Thought" is Good

When a range combines all the most modern conveniences and when the makers insist that only the best materials should be used, and that every range that leaves their factory should be perfect in every detail of workmanship—why, it stands to reason that the product, the

HAPPY THOUGHT

Range should be a good range, a perfectly reliable range.

Take your time in buying a new range. It is the most important of your household furnishings. On it depends whether your housework is going to be a drudgery or a pleasant task, with sure results.

When you have seen the many special features of the Happy Thought, have heard the enthusiastic praise of the thousands of Canadian housewives who use it and see what a strong, serviceable, fine-looking range it is, we have no doubt it will surely be your final selection for use in your home.

More than a quarter of a million "Happy Thoughts" are in daily use in Canada.

See the "Happy Thought" at your Local Dealers

The William Buck Stove Co. Limited
BRANTFORD, ONT.

MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

Is The Most Satisfactory Washer Ever Placed On The Canadian Market

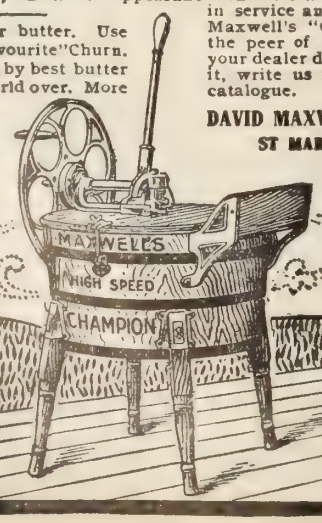
Last year, Maxwell's "Champion" was the recognized leader of all high speed washing machines. This year, we have put the final touch to it, and offer you the ideal machine, that includes every important improvement known to modern washers.

Maxwell's "Champion" has the largest opening of any washing machine. As you can see, the Wringer attachment is at the side, and practically the whole top of the washer opens up. This makes it easy to put in and take out clothes.

No other washer has this feature. No other washer can be worked with crank handle as well as top lever

In design, finish and appearance—in ease and quickness— in service and durability—Maxwell's "Champion" is the peer of them all. If your dealer does not handle it, write us for illustrated catalogue.

Have better butter. Use Maxwell's "Favourite" Churn. Recommended by best butter makers the world over. More of them used in Canada than any other. All sizes from ½ to 30 gallons.



DAVID MAXWELL & SONS,
ST MARY'S, ONT.

95

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

SOME STENCILING

IN this interesting decorative art, one may find much that is pleasing in result and not too tedious in effort.

The materials necessary for stenciling are oil paints, bristle brushes (one brush for each color used), a large clean blotter thumb-tacks and gasoline, naphtha or turpentine. Gasoline and naphtha are a little easier to handle than turpentine, because they dry more quickly.

In the beginning always mix enough paint to stencil the entire design, because, if the color runs out, it is not always a simple matter to mix it again in exactly the same tone. It is also advisable to try out the design in the color chosen on a bit of the material left from cutting before proceeding to work on the pillow or runner. A little experimenting will soon enable you to tell just how much paint and how much gasoline will be required for the best work on the particular material used. Another thing that is essential to nice work is to measure the material, and either crease it or mark by a thread of contrasting color to indicate just where the design is to appear when finished. Do not trust to your eye, but take every care to have the divisions perfectly equal, as stenciling loses its real and lasting charm if the work is not accurately and very neatly done.

Having measured and marked the material, place a large blotter on the table, then over this stretch the material as smoothly as possible. On this material fasten the cut-out pattern with thumb-tacks in the place where it is to appear when finished. Next paint in the design, and it will be found a great help if, with the left hand, you press down that section of the cut-out pattern where you are now working. This will keep the paint from running under the pattern. Always finish each section of the design before proceeding to the next space, also finish with one color before starting the next. For instance, in these designs the flowers were scarlet, centres green, leaves green, stems brown, and the flowers were painted in each section before the leaves or stems were started. Rub the color in well, go right up to the edges, and be sure that the color is perfectly flat and even in tone. When the entire design is filled in, take out the thumb-tacks and lift up the pattern from the material. Then clean up the stencil-board pattern before placing it on the material again. The pattern is then tacked in the next position and the process repeated. When the whole design is completed, the paint should be allowed to dry, then the entire pillow-top dressed with a hot iron. This ironing will set the colors.

Russian crash meets all the requirements from the standpoint of utility, with the added advantage that it is soft in coloring, has a nice texture, and takes stenciling beautifully in almost any color. This crash is about sixteen inches wide, and may be purchased in most department stores at the towel counter. Burlap, monks' cloth, rough pongee, linen or unbleached sheeting, will answer the same needs.

The square pillows pictured here are made of the Russian crash, stenciled in bright red, dark brown and green. The design used is a conventionalized bunch of flowers. One pattern only is used, but by placing the design in various ways a variety of effects may be obtained.

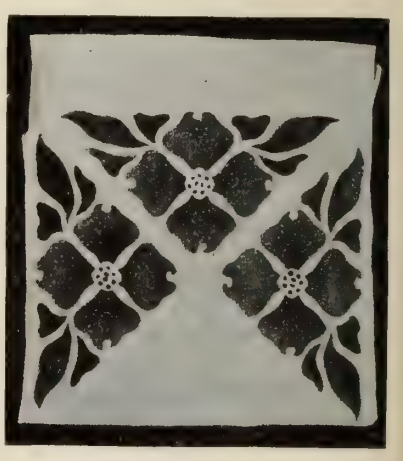
STENCILING ON SQUARE CUSHIONS

One square pillow has for decoration the design repeated at regular intervals, forming an all-over pattern. The other one has an attractive large ornament in the centre of the pillow, made by placing the pattern in opposite directions to each other and joining in the centre.

CONVENTIONAL DESIGN

THE curtain designs here shown were developed on the popular cotton crepe, which may be purchased from twelve and a-half cents a yard up to more expensive weave.

The material is particularly suitable for this purpose, as its soft wrinkled surface takes the paint beautifully; and as it requires no starch or ironing, it is only the work of a few minutes to rinse them out as often as is necessary, for perfect freshness is essential. They would be equally pleasing developed on scrim, cheese-cloth, or unbleached muslin—the last named is effective and hangs well, but is more difficult to launder.



DOGWOOD ON SCARF

The principle of the work is so simple that everyone knows it. Simply apply the color through the holes in the cardboard; but there are a few practical suggestions which will save the beginner some annoyance.

The principal dry goods stores are now selling charming stencil outfits in boxes containing all the paraphernalia—but if these are not obtainable, all that is essential is the oil paint—get the standard tube colors—a little turpentine, two or more brushes, the stencil pattern, and, if one wishes to learn to cut her own patterns, a sharp penknife. The cutting is a little difficult at first.

A BEGINNER naturally puts on about three times too much paint. A little color thoroughly rubbed in will do away with any danger from spreading and insure tidy work, besides producing a result which will bear washing—not boiling—beautifully. Flat irons used as weights will be found very helpful to prevent the stencils from slipping while rubbing the paint through.

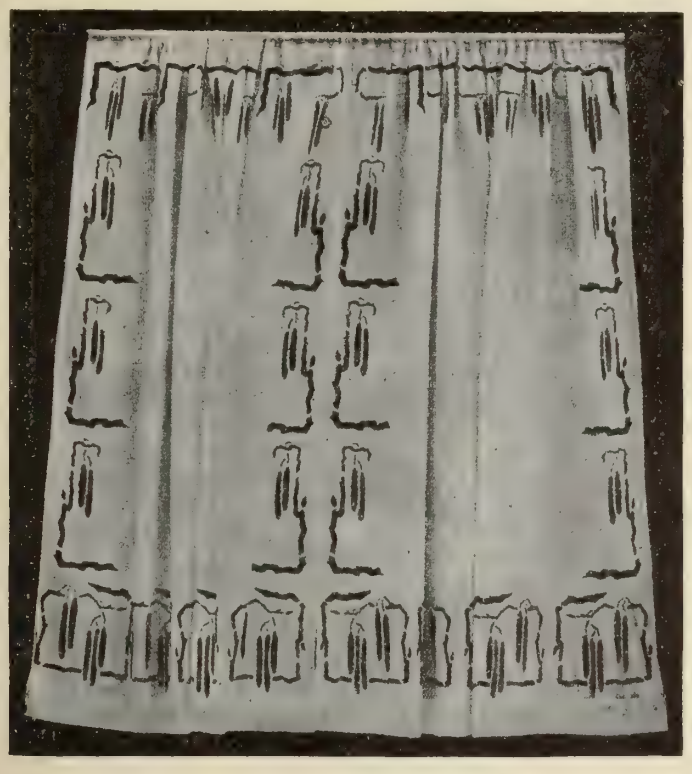
Two shades of blue are chosen for the pillow, the central fleur-de-lis form being tinted quite dark, the rest lighter. Shade the little spears with the dark blue. Fold the material in quarters and crease, stick a pin through the centre of the stencil marker into the centre of the goods, and repeat four times at right angles, as shown, arranging the border separately according to the size desired. Tint some bits of the same material in the prevailing color and cover four big button moulds as a finish for the corners. Arrange the back in two parts with buttons and buttonholes so that the pillow may readily be removed for laundering; sew up and turn; push the four corners in, draw the edges together, and sew the buttons in place.

The dogwood design is a very effective one, and extremely adaptable, as the triangular blocks may be fitted together in an infinite variety of ways.

The dogwood design is shown on a scarf, the ends finished with a wide hem instead of the fringe. In the example shown the flowers were tinted in a very dull light catawba and the leaves in olive green. Another pretty combination would be a more conventional one, dull yellow flowers and brown leaves, touched with green at the tips, if desired. The centre of the flower may be made a third color or the same tone as the leaves.

To avoid any danger of smearing one part of the design with the color of another, have several pieces of smooth cardboard on hand to lay over the unused openings, holding it in place with the irons or the fingers while tinting.

Always remember, in fitting up a porch with pillows, runners, and other accessories, that you can afford to use brighter, stronger colors than you would if you were furnishing a room indoors. Another thing to bear in mind is that no matter what material you select, it is best always to choose a light color (such as the natural linen color) as a background for your stenciling. If you wish a dark note, depend upon your paint for it, rather than on your material. The dark materials require a great deal of white paint to bring out the design, and much white paint is never attractive in stencil work.



DAINTY STENCILED CURTAINS

Entertaining Notes

TRUE hospitality is in the practice of receiving and entertaining guests with heartfelt kindness, not with the expectation of reward, but with the intention of giving pleasure and being sociable and neighborly.

A good hostess receives her guests with a cordial, welcoming manner, showing that she is truly glad to see them. A good hostess provides her best, but her best may be very simple. She does not make the mistake of striving to have novel entertainments, or something better than her neighbor, who entertained last week. She is content to do things moderately, and it is the manner rather than the matter that counts. If she is gracious, winning in manner, if she makes her friends feel that she is compensated for any trouble she has taken by the pleasure of having them under her roof, they will enter into her spirit of cheerfulness, and will be happy and at ease. She may give a simple luncheon, or a card party with inexpensive prizes, or she may invite friends to have a cup of tea in the afternoon, and brew and serve the tea herself. If she has any talent for being a hostess, or if she tries to cultivate what little talent she possesses, she will gradually make friends feel that nothing is more delightful than to be invited to her house. She will spare no effort to please, and she will please.

If inviting a friend for a visit, a hostess follows the accepted rule of mentioning the definite period for the visit, giving the exact date, from Saturday to Monday, or for the "week-end," as the phrase is, or from Saturday to Wednesday, or for a week, according to preference and convenience.

A guest should be met on the arrival of train or boat. All arrangements should be made for the conveyance of guests and luggage to the house.

A careful hostess sees that nothing is lacking by way of convenience and comfort in a guest's room. There should be plenty of towels and fresh water, new soap, a candlestick and matches. On a desk, or table, there should be writing materials. A few books and magazines add to a guest's pleasure. Fresh flowers in a vase offer an agreeable welcome. A lounge for resting, a light blanket or coverlet, an easy chair, a clock, should be in a guest's room.

A mistake made by some hostesses is to weary guests with attentions. A hostess should never give the impression that a guest is on her mind. She should arrange for her pleasure, secure invitations to any entertainments of a general nature in the neighborhood; she should mention to friends that she expects a guest, so that they may call, if they wish.

A thoughtful hostess remembers that a guest likes to have some time in the day to be alone, to go to her room, rest, write or read.

Amusements depend on local advantages. There may be tennis, croquet, driving, boating or walking. In the evening there may be cards, music or games. The hour for retiring is proposed by the hostess. Early hours are often the rule in quiet households. Moderate means and a simple home-life should never deter anyone from inviting a friend for a visit. Country diversions are frequently a great boon to one who is weary of life in a city. Very little effort in the right direction of hospitality is well worth while. It goes far toward strengthening the ties of friendship and making life more pleasurable to the one who opens her home and the one who partakes of the hospitality.

Do Pianists Suffer in Comparison with the Player Piano of Today

Opinions differ on this subject, and many arguments both pro and con are thrashed out daily. We do know, however, that the old saying, "Oh, the Player Piano is purely mechanical," has been shelved, and exclamations of surprise greet the performer of the up-to-date instrument.

With the Special Features Embodied in the

NEW SCALE WILLIAMS PLAYER PIANO

you are able to produce all that is possible in music, and whether you are playing a Liszt Concerto or a simple melody, or an accompaniment to an accomplished singer, the work is above criticism.

We will be pleased to give you full particulars about the New Scale Williams Player Piano, and if there is no dealer in your locality will arrange to supply you direct from the factory. Ask about our extended payment plan.

THE WILLIAMS PIANO CO., LIMITED

OSHAWA 241 ONTARIO

The Guest Room

should be a "rest" room. Often it's quite the reverse. Memory recalls the old-fashioned room reserved for stay-over visitors, which was anything but restful. Cold, draughty, musty-smelling and cheerless, it was usually effective in putting a damper on the visitor's enjoyment. Nowadays in homes heated with a the guest-room shares equally with every other room in the pure, clean, invigorating warmth evenly diffused throughout the house. A turn of the valve regulates the temperature to any desired degree. Can be placed in any building, old or new, city or country. No need to pull up floors or tear down walls. No dust, or fuss to cause inconvenience or expense. King Radiators are decorated to match walls, furniture, etc., and are made to fit anywhere.

King Boiler and Radiators

Write for your copy of "Comfortable Homes."

Please send me your book.

Name.....

Address.....

STEEL AND RADIATION LIMITED

Head Office: Fraser Ave. Showrooms: 78-82 Adelaide St. East, TORONTO

Branches in all the principal cities

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

Autumn Thoughts

By MRS. REED, Grass Hill

AUTUMN is the third season in the year, generally thought to be the months of August, September and October. The word means to increase, to produce.

Our first thought is, Why is autumn so beautiful? It is not only because the woods take on their beautiful tints, but because the trees, grains and plants have fulfilled the purpose for which they were created. If the grain had failed to produce grain, the trees to bear fruit, and the plants to give us the beautiful flowers, then autumn, with its beautiful tints and hazy days would not satisfy us. And so with our lives. If they are to be beautiful, there must be fruit. Our next thought is, How were they able to produce this fruit? We must answer, By making use of the things God and man had provided—the rain, dew and sunshine, and the prepared soil. And we feel that we, too, have been provided with many things that will help to make the autumn of our lives beautiful.

Autumn is preceded by two seasons, spring and summer, and so we think that in our lives spring and summer represent childhood and youth. In childhood, life is given, and if the autumn is to be fruitful with us, as with plants, that life must be carefully guarded and nurtured, physically, intellectually and morally. As the strong plants bring forth the best grain and flowers, so we believe that a life well developed in those three ways will help to make the autumn beautiful.

What kind of fruit and grain does autumn bring? We answer, the kind we have sown. It is a law of nature that each grain produces its own kind, and each tree its own fruit, and every flower has its own form and beauty; and so with our lives. The Bible says, "Whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap." What a responsibility this places on us and how careful we should be what kind of seed we are sowing, and ask ourselves what kind of seed would I like to gather fruit from. God's Word says, "The fruits of the Spirit are these: love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." And we believe these are the only kinds we would wish to gather when autumn comes to us.

What has God given us to make the autumn beautiful? Our first thought is homes. And what a possibility there is in home! If in that home we have been able to train boys and girls to be strong men and women, and as they have left that home and gone out into the world, if they have filled our places better than we have I feel that this will help to make autumn beautiful.

Then another thing that will make autumn beautiful will be friends. The wisest man who ever lived said that he who had friends must show himself friendly. If we hope to have friends we must be worthy of friendship, we must be true, unselfish, thoughtful, and kind. Then another thing will be to know all we can. Let us take advantage of everything that will make us strong intellectually. Then, as we find in the spring and summer, there are weeds to be rooted up, if we wish our plants to do their best, and branches to be pruned out if our trees are to produce perfect fruit; so in our lives there are many things that we will need to watch and cast out if our lives are to be what our Father planned.

Then we remember that, when the sun, rain and dew have done their work, there are times when we hear men say the grain is growing too rank, and often comes a time when the rain does not fall and the roots go deeper into the soil and the plants grow stronger, and so in our lives many times things come that we do not understand; but if they help us to understand our own weakness and wherein our strength lies, they, too, will help to make autumn beautiful. Spring comes to us full of promise, summer full of labor, and autumn should be beautiful because of days well spent and hopes realized.

Longfellow has beautifully expressed it in these words:

"Oh, what a glory doth this world put on
For him who, with a fervent heart, goes forth
Under the bright and glorious sky, and looks
On duties well performed, and days well spent;
For him the wind, ay, and the yellow leaves
Shall have a voice, and give him eloquent teachings.
He shall so hear the solemn hymn, that death
Has lifted up for all, that he shall go
To his long resting place without a tear."

Recreation in the Home

By MRS. B. McDOUGALL, Woodville

WE women of to-day are so full of ambition and are so anxious to attain to something, that we are apt to overdo it, and forget that before we can have true success we must keep ourselves rested, refreshed, and prepared for work. The outside world is a busy one, and the woman in the home has caught the fever. But we must not let this fever make headway, for if we do, we are going to lose our health and beauty and rob our homes of their homeliness, and society of all that makes it a blessing. The majority of our ills can be traced to overwork, or, at least, work uninterrupted by some distracting pleasure or relaxation. We sometimes spend almost a small fortune on vainly trying to regain our health, when we might have prevented all this by daily making a practice of taking some form of recreation.

One woman, on going to her doctor for her nerves, was told that she did not need any medicine. His advice was: Don't hurry, don't worry—and take plenty of rest. Now, of course, there are some women to whom this would be comparatively easy. But for the most of us it is extremely hard to follow. It is much easier to take medicine—that requires no thought. But it does require thought and planning and determination for the woman with an ever-increasing amount of work to be done to arrange for a little while of relaxation each day. A great help in this direction is to plan as far as possible each morning for the day's work. We may not be able to carry out all our plans in detail, but they serve as a guide and stimulus. Another habit to form is that of saving steps. We will never regret it. It banks up time and strength for future use.

I wonder if we ever think how unhappy we make the whole atmosphere of the home when we are tired and exhausted, after a big day's work, and are consequently in not any too amiable a mood. It affects everything—even the cat and dog feel the depressing atmosphere. The older children, if there are any of them in the home, make some excuse to go out for the night, and the younger ones, who have to stay in, hurry off to bed, and thus it is that the home life is spoiled. The making or marring of the home lies almost wholly with us, and while it is certainly necessary to instil in children the value of labor, don't let us go so far as to make our homes factories for working to accumulate wealth. Let us rather do our utmost to make them places of joy, and pleasure. Don't look on the gloomy side of things and be continually worrying about some unfinished work, when we should be resting. Train ourselves to forget for the time being all about our work. Laugh and enjoy life and make it enjoyable for those about us—a real, hearty laugh; not that incessant giggle which is so annoying, but a laugh from the heart, overflowing with merriment and joy, does more than anything I know to rest one self and make life a pleasant thing for those about us. Don't let us get our minds so steeped in worry and work that this wholesome laugh is no more a possibility with us.

Besides seeking recreation and rest for ourselves, we should think of those working with and for us. We should enter sympathetically into the amusements of those younger than ourselves, and we too will begin to feel younger in heart. Let us not be like a father I heard of. The lad asked if he might go to the circus. Immediately the parent thought of the potatoes, but not wishing to be too unreasonable, told the boy to plant the potatoes then, and perhaps there would be a funeral the next week and he could go to that. Just imagine the damper this would put on the boy's spirit and energy. Some women have a mistaken idea of how to rest. They leave their regular work fatigued in body and mind, and think that while resting they will do some sewing, letter writing, or fancy work. I won't say that the change does no good at all, but certainly they are not gaining what they should from this period of rest. We neither rest right nor do the work right. Have some nook or corner as far removed as possible from your work, some place that soothes and quiets the nerves, and makes you feel for a time at least that to live is bliss. Some prettily written story which requires no effort to read will often help to draw one away from the hurry and rush of the world, and to relax the worked-up energy. In summer throw your hammock out among the trees and let the birds sing you to sleep. Music hath charms, let us not leave it out of our lives. Music in the home will make music in the heart. Let us have plenty of it. Every woman is supposed to have her hobby, and it is to be hoped the supposition is a fact. It is well for a woman to have something to take her thoughts away from the daily routine of work. Perhaps it is flowers, or sewing, or painting, or carving, or many of the other delightful arts. Let us have our hobbies and take pleasure in them, but let us be careful not to become selfish in them and bore our friends.

So far I have been referring entirely to the daily rest. We need more than that. Few women can stand the constant strain of housekeeping without occasional change or a little outing, for who has not felt:

"Oh for the gift of a pair of wings,
To bear me out of the reach of things;
Things to boil and things to bake,
Things to mend and things to make!"

Unless by habitually staying at home we have got ourselves into a rut, we all desire now and then to go away and see life as it is lived somewhere else. It is an unquestionable treat for a woman who prepares the meals all the year round to board for a week or so where she has nothing to do with the meals but to eat them. How delightful it is to have all the responsibility of planning and arranging for the household freed from our shoulders if it be only for one week! And then this mingling with strangers and new surroundings gives life a certain spice, creates in you new interests, broadens your ideas, and gives you food for thought, even after you have returned!

Let us then strive not to allow our work to overcome us, and prevent us from taking recreation and rest. But, instead, let us overcome it, and become mistress of the situation, or, rather, of our work. Habitually take some form of relaxation and rest. It is only then that we can do justice to our work or fill the place of home maker.

HOMESTEAD OF MR. CHARLES LOWE, KENVILLE, MANITOBA
Photograph by courtesy C.N.R.

Bee Keeping for Women

By MRS. ETHEL ROBSON, Ilderton

THE Women's Institute stands primarily for progress among women, and is making a definite effort to improve conditions in the country. One effectual way to do this is to increase the opportunities for the home-staying girl for making an independent livelihood. So long as she is denied the chance which the girl who leaves home enjoys, of making her own living, so long will there be more or less dissatisfaction and discontent, and it is because bee-keeping offers such promise for health and independence in the country, that it affords me great pleasure to tell the Women's Institute about it. For it is not theoretical bee-keeping that I am discussing. I have kept bees now for five years and have at present about eighty colonies, and know from experience most of the practical difficulties to be encountered, and am in a position to say with authority that bee-keeping does offer an excellent opening to the woman with small means who wishes to make a living in the country. The great wonder is that more have not taken advantage of it. But the difficulty seems to be the little general knowledge of bees and their ways; a menace of stings and swarms hangs like a cloud over the industry.

Some sort of necromancy is supposed to be necessary for success, whereas the chief requisites are common sense, perseverance, and a willingness to work, common enough qualifications and necessary for success along any line. Although the traditions of the old box hive still linger in many parts of the country, bee-keeping has, in the last fifty years, been placed on as scientific a basis as any other rural occupation. We have now an apicultural branch in connection with the Department of Agriculture, lectures are given on the subject at the O. A. C., and this year a short course was held. Practical demonstration work is being done in various parts of the country, abundant literature is available, and in every way the path of the beginner is made easy to travel; the pioneer work has been well done, success is no longer problematical.

Now, just what are the advantages of bee-keeping for women? In the first place, unlike poultry raising, the work can all be done in the fine weather, indeed, it has to be done then; in all, save the busiest seasons, it leaves a fair margin of time for other pursuits, and all the winters are free. The work is sufficiently light for a woman in ordinary good health to be able to manage; it is healthful, taking her out into the open air, and keeping her in touch with the great world of nature; it is interesting, even to fascination, and it is remunerative. These last two factors are the most important, as far as women are concerned. First, as to interest. It is well known that anyone who has ever had anything to do with bees always retains his interest in them, in fact, is never quite satisfied without them; they have a holding power quite out of proportion to their size, and seem to cast a spell over all who come in contact with them.

Indeed, so great is this, that bee-keepers are inclined to become a little queer, not disagreeably so, but in a comfortable attractive way, life is just a little better for them than for other people. Now this matter of interest is of prime importance in a women's work. Her happiness in life is largely dependent on her having some occupation capable of absorbing her best energies; in fact, it is almost imperative that she have it, otherwise her powers will rust out in discontent or atrophy for want of use. As for the remunerative side of bee-keeping, that was pointed out in a paper in last year's report. There is no reason why, when a woman has gained the necessary experience, she should not be able to care for one hundred colonies for extracted honey, and it would be a poor neighborhood when these would not average her from four to five hundred dollars a year, and in many parts of the country they ought to do more. This is not opulence, but it is a very fair living, especially when you consider that not nearly all of her time will have to be devoted to it.

The greatest difficulty to my mind lies in the heavy lifting, and, unless a woman is fairly strong, she could hardly hope to go into bee-keeping on a large scale unless help was easily available. Our provincial apiarist suggests hiring for this, but in the present condition of the labor market, with help almost unobtainable, it is doubtful if many women would find this satisfactory. As far as possible, it would doubtless be better to utilize the various labor-saving devices, but here again we are met by the difficulty that many women are, like myself, somewhat lacking in mechanical skill. However, where there's a will there's a way. Where two girls are able to work together, the matter of the heavy lifting can be overcome very nicely.

Now, all this would seem to point to bee-keeping as a wonderful field of opportunity for women, yet, in spite of my own interest and some small measure of success, I am in nowise sanguine about many women taking it up for some time to come. The first introduction to the apiary usually overwhelms the inquirer with all that is to be learned. Then, if she should enter upon it, a long apprenticeship has to be served before she acquires an instinct for the work, and, until that is attained, the responsibility, the constant watchfulness and attention to details prove more or less irksome. Of course, if a girl simply has to make a living, she will likely have the necessary grit to overcome all this. However, most girls remaining at home expect to get their living from the family purse, and find it easier to work along lines already established, even if they are not so remunerative, than to strike out on their own initiative. The attitude of the majority of girls inquiring as to the possibilities of bee-keeping is not such as to inspire faith in their ultimate success. Yet there are scattered over the country many earnest girls who feel compelled to do something useful, and whose education has not fitted them for a professional career. I have no doubt that among these there are many who, like myself, would find bee-keeping a source both of satisfaction and profit.

The Murillo Programme

July—Warm Weather Dessert, Mrs. C. Gorton. Canadian Women of Note, Mrs. H. Moffat. Question drawer.

August—Methods of Canning and Preserving, Mrs. A. Reid. Ways of Cooking Poultry, Mrs. R. B. Martyn. Discussion of Saving Steps, members.

September—Pickling and Canning of Vegetables, Mrs. A. Gorton. Prevention and Cure of Colds, Mrs. R. Larabee. Music, Miss L. Smith.

October—The Value of Courtesy, Mrs. J. M. Sherk. Are Plants Injurious in the Sleeping Room, Mrs. A. McGillivray. Question drawer.

November—Dollars and Sense in the Household, Mrs. J. Hahn. Fall Work In and About the House, Mrs. G. Munroe. Song, Miss W. McKenzie.

December—The Value of Punctuality, Mrs. R. McKenzie. Our Year's Work, Miss S. J. McNally. What Christmas Means to Us, Mrs. J. McDonald.

January—Different Ways of Cooking Meats, Mrs. J. Stevenson. Value and Uses of Olive Oil, Mrs. E. Lynn. Selected readings, members.

February—Every Day Helps for the Housewife, Mrs. J. Oster. Question drawer. Music, Mrs. A. Felker.

March—What Benefit do We Derive by Meeting Together, Mrs. A. Boulter. Different Preparation of Eggs, Mrs. R. Nicholett. Essay on Easter, Mrs. Norman.

April—Compare Seed Sown in the Ground to Seed Sown in the Heart, Mrs Grant. Spring Flower Garden, Mrs. T. Downs. Music, Mrs. H. Yelland.

Hoodless Memorial Fund

IT was decided by the committee of the "Hoodless Memorial Fund," at a June meeting, to ask any of the Branches wishing to assist toward the fund to do so by September, as it was decided to close it in the fall. The committee are interviewing some of the best artists in the meantime. The amount up to April 1st for the memorial fund was $421.76.

The April, May, and June contributions were: Chesterville, $2.50; Thornhill, $5.00; Rodney, $1.45; Hannon, $1.30; Chatsworth, $2.00; Westneath, $1.00; Durham, $1.00; Paisley, 75c.; Warsaw, $1.30; Quaker Road, 38c.; Hampton, $2.00; Lobo, $2.00; Sandhurst, $1.00; Dundalk, $2.00; Parkhill, $2.00; Mrs. Boyle, Stony Creek, $2.00; Everton, 75c.; Lambton & Islington, $1.30; Tehkummah, 25c.; Essex, 50c.; Avening, 30c.; Silver Water, $1.00; St. George, $2.00; Wellesley, $1.25; Thorndale, 60c.; Tweed, $2.00; Ailsa Craig, 80c.; Laurel, $1.20; Grand Valley, $1.00; Clifford, $1.40 Clinton, $1.25; Caledon, $1.00; Goodwood, 75c.; Winona, $4.00; Newbro, $1.45; Moyles & Tranquility, $2.00; Springfield, $1.00; Orillia, $2.20; James Mills, 60c.; Beechwood, 70c.; West Lake, $1.70; Maple, $2.00; Queenston, $2.60; Woodbridge, $1.00; Cayuga, 70c.; Maxville, $1.50; Winterbourne, $1.00; Maple Leaf, 45c.; Ancaster, $1.40; Stittsville, $1.00; Embro, 50c.; Marsville, $1.00; Adolphustown, $1.00; Trafalgar, $2.00; Honeywood, $1.00; Molesworth, $1.00; Mt. Elgin, $1.70; Slate River, $1.00; Tilsonburg, $1.00; Oldcastle, $2.20; Wallbridge, $2.00. Total, $506.49. The following were sent but not received: Paris, $2.00; Barrie Island, $1.20; Brougham, 65c.

CLARA M. WALKER,
Stony Creek (Treas.).

A Pleasant Gathering

A VERY enjoyable social event was the gathering of the members of the Dryden Women's Institute, together with a number of invited guests, during the month of August. The ladies met on the spacious grounds of Mrs. Golden and, after enjoying a couple of hours of social intercourse, tables were spread on the lawn, when upwards of fifty women sat down to a sumptuous repast. After the tea Mrs. A. L. Orvis addressed the company, speaking on the work, aim and object of the Women's Institute, and gave all present an urgent and hearty invitation to become members, or visit the order at all or any of the monthly meetings. A hearty vote of thanks was then ten-

A Block Head

Never appreciates solid facts. But with you, the superiority of the

DE LAVAL CREAM SEPARATOR

Must stand unquestioned because 98% of the professional buttermakers of the world use and endorse it. Over 1,300,000 sold to date.

Send for list of prominent users and handsome catalog.

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

The Air's Natural Humidity

on a balmy spring day is from 60% to 70% but in the average stove or furnace heated house in winter, the moisture in the air drops as low as 25% or even less.

Such dried out, parched air seriously affects the throat and lungs and general vitality of the whole family, as well as being destructive to furniture, books and woodwork. But the homes that rejoice in a "Good Cheer"

Circle Waterpan Furnace

have nature's moist balmy air warming—not parching—throughout the entire house. They have a healthy heat because of the construction of the big circle waterpan.

This encircles the furnace—it is big — commodious — sensible — it holds several times as much water as the makeshift pan in the average Furnace—it is placed just at the proper position to catch the incoming air, to give it extra moisture before it gets to the heating surface and thus the air supplied to every room is almost as humid as the outside atmosphere.

You will benefit in Health and save in Pocket by installing the Good Cheer. We will gladly send you our literature fully explaining all about it.

10

The James Stewart Mfg. Co., Limited
Woodstock, Ont. — Winnipeg, Man.

Common Sense Exterminator
KILLS RATS AND MICE

We guarantee that you can rid your premises anywhere, anytime of rats by the proper use of Common Sense Exterminator. For 10 years we have sold it "money back if not satisfied". A single nibble will kill a rat, they leave every food for it, no odor, it dries up the carcass. Safe and convenient to use, economical, for a 25c. size will kill 50 rats. Also put up for roaches and bed bugs, same guarantee. Sold by dealers everywhere. If not at yours we will supply you, write—
COMMON SENSE MFG. CO.
16 381 Queen St. W., - Toronto.

The Original and Best Scotch Wincey. In range of beautiful colourings, stripes or in white. Ideal for LADIES' BLOUSES, CHILDRENS' DRESSES BABIES' FROCKS, and all underwear—Gents.' Shirts, Pyjamas, etc.

Washes perfectly, and is UNSHRINKABLE.

From 8½d. per yard to 4/6.

Patterns Post Free.

FOR BABY.

Copy of UNSOLICITED testimonial.

"St. Jude's Vicarage, South Shields, 31 Oct., 1910. Mrs. De la Hey will be obliged if Messrs. Spence will send 12 yards of enclosed Wincey, for which cheque is enclosed. Mrs. de la Hey has NEVER used ANY OTHER Wincey which gave the PERFECT satisfaction of Messrs. JAS. SPENCE & CO.'s MAKE."

JAS. SPENCE & CO., GLASGOW, N.B.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

THE FAVORITE IN A MILLION HOMES

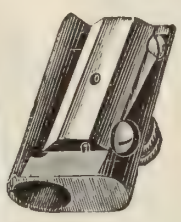
Seal Brand Coffee

Packed in cans

1 and 2 pound only.

125

WATERPROOF SCHOOL BAG



and a Large Solid Brass Pencil Sharpener

FREE

This large size 14x10 Collegiate Style School Bag is made from fine weave, fancy pattern, Indestructo Waterproof Cloth. It has strong, wide gussets all round, also handy outside gusset pocket, size 8x5½, suitable for keeping small articles in, such as Pencils, Penholders, Pencil Sharpener, etc. The edges of Bag and Outer Pocket are all strongly bound, thus making it very handsome in appearance, also extra strong and durable. With each Bag, we will give as an extra present, one of Faber's best quality brass, double-edged blade Pencil Sharpeners. This splendid outfit will be given absolutely free to every Boy and Girl who will sell only 20 of our fast selling size 16x20 multi-color Oleograph Pictures. These are all reproductions of Famous Paintings, the originals of which cost hundreds of dollars. They are all suitable for framing, and well worthy of a place on the walls of any home. These pictures sell in Art Stores regularly at 50 cents each, so that at our wholesale price of 15 cents each, you can sell the whole lot in an hour. Especially as we will send you a Prize Coupon to give with every Picture you sell, which will entitle your customer to receive an extra present from us absolutely free. Order right now. We will send the Pictures by return mail postpaid. When sold return us our money $3.00, and both Bag and Sharpener will be sent postpaid at once. Address:

COLONIAL ART CO., Desk 03, TORONTO, ONT.

103

"KODAK"

Is our registered and common-law Trade-Mark and cannot be rightfully applied except to goods of our manufacture.

If a dealer tries to sell you a camera or films, or other goods not of our manufacture, under the Kodak name, you can be sure that he has an inferior article that he is trying to market on the Kodak reputation.

If it isn't an Eastman it isn't a Kodak.

CANADIAN KODAK COMPANY, LIMITED
TORONTO - CANADA

DOMINION EXPRESS Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They should be sent in payment of produce, gas, water, electric light, and other bills; Insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers, magazines, etc.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mail, we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge,

On Sale in
Canadian Pacific Railway Stations

Also in numerous Drug Stores conveniently located in residential districts.

20

Travellers' Cheques Issued.
Money sent by Telegraph and Cable

TELL OUR ADVERTISERS WHERE YOU SAW THEIR ADVERTISEMENT

Representative wanted at once for work in your locality. Will guarantee $2.00 to $3.00 per day. Opportunity to advance rapidly. Will pay liberally for spare time. Work not difficult. Experience not required.

INTERNATIONAL BIBLE PRESS
TORONTO

ALMA Ladies' COLLEGE St. Thomas, Ont.

ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE ON REQUEST

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

dered to Mr. and Mrs. Golden for their kind hospitality and also to Mr. Hutchison for the use of tables and chairs from his hall.

Before dispersing all joined in singing "The Maple Leaf Forever" and the National Anthem.

Institute Convention

THE above convention will be held in Toronto on November 15th and 16th, the week of the Provincial Horticultural Exhibition. It is not expected that each of the six hundred and fifty-five branches, with a membership of over nineteen thousand, will be represented. We trust, however, that every district will see to it that representatives are in attendance. Where the individual branch cannot send delegates several can unite in sending a delegate who will undertake to give a report of the proceedings to the organizations interested.

Arrangements are being made for a session of special interest to Institute officers, when business methods, programmes and methods of extending the work will be considered. Among the topics to be dealt with are the following: The School Community Improvement; Young Women of the Twentieth Century; Reports from Institutes Which Have Been Markedly Successful During the Past Year; What We Can Do for the Boys and Girls; Moral Reform; Training of the Child; Women and Finances; Our Dumb Animals.

Arrangements have been made for speakers of well-known ability to address the convention, and it is confidently expected that the gathering of 1911 will be even more successful than that of last year. Some of the sessions will likely be held in the University Convocation Hall, and a smaller hall will be secured for the sessions at which discussions and addresses on the part of the delegates will form an important feature.

Other provinces of the Dominion are imitating Ontario in her Women's Institute work. During the past year, New Brunswick, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia have emphasized this feature of work. Future Canada will owe much to Women's Institutes, which stand for efficiency in home-making and home-keeping, healthful and sound sociability, a stronger and purer community life, and all that tends to the uplift and happiness of the women and girls in the home. Such activity cannot but have a beneficial influence upon the life of the present as well as the coming generations.

Caricaturing the Farmer

A READER who is an Institute member, interested in the subject of why boys and girls leave the farm, has asked us to republish this letter, signed "Farmer's Boy," which originally appeared in the Toronto Globe. We do so gladly, as it protests in a manner of which every thinking citizen must approve. There is no human being who fulfills the appearance and language of the farmer, as depicted and represented in the comic sheets. In fact, so far as language is concerned, one seldom hears in the farm household such vulgar slang as is all too common on the city streets. The following is the communication, which protests most vigorously and conclusively against this aspect of caricature:

"Much is being written these days to explain why the boy leaves the farm.

I would like to draw your attention to one cause which as yet I have never known to be considered. Whenever a newspaper or magazine writer discusses this or any other subject relating to rural life, he invariably makes the farmer speak in the most vile English. This gives the impression to boys on the farm, and also in the town, that farmers are a distinct class by themselves, speaking a different language and having a different standard of living from their fellow-citizens.

Why this should be is hard to say. A farmer will sometimes speak a complete sentence without a grammatical error, while other people sometimes use carelessly-formed sentences.

Is it any wonder that the farmer's boy, who sees the members of his calling habitually caricatured as heathen, feels sensitive on the matter, and thinks that he will add to his dignity by moving to town, although it may be at the sacrifice of many real advantages? Mr. Bengough's cartoon of the 19th would be just as effective if the farmer were allowed to say that tariff relief was going to ruin him instead of "agoin' to." Mr. John Hamm's story of New Ontario in The Globe of the 10th would lose nothing of beauty or forcefulness if the settler were allowed to speak the language of his race.

There is a more serious side of this subject. All are agreed that the new blood from the country is essential to the professions and to city life in general. This drain on rural life must be compensated for by a return movement, rather than prevented. There is no doubt that any such return movement is discouraged by the habit of looking upon the farmer as a barbarian speaking a gibberish of his own.

I cannot remember when as a farmer's son I have not resented this habit. Even as a schoolboy I burned Sunday school papers which contained, as I thought, too much of it. The effect of seeing the farmer portrayed in this fashion year after year and generation after generation seems so obvious to me that when I read some of the philosophical treatises by the wise heads on "why the boy leaves the farm" I am simply amazed that they do not do a little thinking on this subject and write on some other, if it is impossible for them to combine thought and expression."

Invalid Diet

By MRS. F. R. EDWARDS

THE diet, as we all know, bears a very important relation to health. During the process of acute disease the appetite is generally much impaired, if not entirely absent. On this account we should study to plan such dishes as will be pleasing to the invalid and suitable to the condition, always remembering the food should be light, nutritious, and easy of digestion.

Study your invalid, for each ailment requires a specific diet; for instance, an inflammatory character of disease requires an unstimulating diet, as gruel, barley water, toast, etc. Diseases of a wasting nature call for beef, fatty materials, rich milk, cream, and other up-building articles of diet. But in all chronic ailments the diet, we may observe, varies according to the nature of the disease and the peculiarities of the patient. The appearance of food and the manner in which it is served have much to do with its acceptance or rejection by the sick person. It is needless to say all trays, china, silver and glassware, used in serving food for the capricious appetite, should be of the finest and best quality the housewife possesses, and should sparkle in their cleanliness and polish, and let us also bear in mind that cress, lettuce and parsley garnish go far toward redeeming an indifferent but nutritious dish.

Learn a patient's likes and dislikes, but never directly consult a sick person concerning the coming meal, but let each appear as a tempting surprise. In invalid diet the first article of diet one thinks of is milk, and it is one of the most important foods in fevers and many acute diseases in which the digestive powers are weakened. Milk contains within itself all the elements of nutrition and nothing is more easily digested. Eggs, fish and raw oysters also come under the same head; also soups. As Miss Campbell told us at our June meeting, there are but two ways necessary to prepare an egg. Other forms may entail more work but are no more beneficial.

To boil eggs—Have water at boiling point, drop in your eggs, remove dish from stove, allowing eggs to remain in the water for eight minutes. Done in this manner, an egg should be uniformly cooked from shell to centre.

For Egg Nog—Beat an egg until light, flavor with sugar and vanilla, fill up glass with rich milk and serve. Baked or boiled custard could also be served under milk and egg dishes.

Egg Gruel (corrective for nausea)—Boil eggs one hour, until right to grate up fine. Then boil new milk and thicken with the egg and add a little salt.

Toast is very familiar to all sick persons and should be served dry, for physicians tell us buttered toast is not so easily assimilated.

Toast Water—Slices of toast nicely browned; enough boiling water to cover them. Cover closely and let them steep until cold. Strain the water, sweeten to taste, and put a piece of ice in each glassful.

Beef Tea—There are many ways of making this well known dish, but the consensus of opinion seems to favor the following: One pound of lean beef, cut into small pieces. Put into a jar without a drop of water, cover tightly and set in a pot of cold water. Heat gradually to a boil, and continue this steadily for three or four hours, until the meat is white and in strips and the juice extracted. Season with salt to taste, and when cold skim.

Arrowroot—This is very light and nourishing. Make it with milk or water. Put a pint of either into a stew pan, make it boiling hot, add a saltspoon of salt, put a heaped teaspoonful of ground Bermuda arrowroot into a cup, make it smooth with cold milk, stir into the stew pan, let simmer for two or three minutes, turn into a bowl, sweeten and, if liked, grate nutmeg or sprinkle cinnamon over it. Only prepare as much as is needed, since it becomes thin as water if re-heated.

Barley Water—Put a large tablespoonful of well washed pearl barley into a pitcher, pour over it boiling water, cover and let remain till cold, then drain off the water, sweeten to taste, add juice of a lemon and nutmeg if desired.

Chicken and Mutton Broth—Either of these is frequently ordered for patients and must be made as plainly as possible. If chicken, cut fowl at the joints (only the more inferior ones need to be used), and if mutton secure a couple of pounds of lean meat. Boil either slowly a couple of hours (use cold water), skim very carefully, and do not use much salt. When done, strain and put in a cool place till wanted. Then take off all the fat from top of dish, and warm up as much as may be required. For some broths a little fine barley or rice is added. Chicken prepared in many forms is relished by invalids, and the following recipe is only one of many ways. Jellied Chicken—Separate fowl at joints, cook in water until meat will part from bones easily. When cold enough to handle remove bones and skin, cut meat into small pieces, and place in a mold. Season water left in the kettle with salt, pepper, and bay leaf, add a dessert spoonful of gelatine (previously soaked in a little cold water). Boil all until the liquid is reduced to a sufficient quantity to pour over the chicken in the mold. When ready to serve, cut with a very sharp knife. If strong enough, beef may also be served, and the preferable form is the broiled tender steak, and with this one can serve a baked potato.

Fresh fruit is generally enjoyed and is of benefit, also baked apples and stewed prunes. As a light dessert here is an excellent way to serve the wholesome but despised prune. One pound prunes, boiled tender. Extract stones and chop fruit; beat the whites of four eggs and add gently; juice of one lemon; three-quarter cup of sugar (white) and one teaspoon of vanilla. Bake from twenty minutes to thirty minutes in a very moderate oven.

Serve white or whole wheat bread to sick persons, as graham or brown bread is not as nutritious, for it contains the hull of the wheat mixed with the kernel. For years brown bread has generally ranked first in many of our minds, but if we stop to think what nourishment does the husk or hull of the wheat contain? This bran acts as an irritant upon the bowels, and should not form an article of very steady diet.

In many cases of fevers and stomach disorders, doctors approve of frozen desserts as being light and nutritious and nearly always acceptable to the invalid. Ice cream and frozen sherbets are so easily prepared that it is to be regretted they are not more generally used where permissible.

Where a person is very ill with some form of disease it is often the case that a limited diet only is allowed, and in such cases we can only exercise our ingenuity to make what is allowed as palatable and varied as is possible, but for one such person we will find ten others often, the very young or elderly persons, or those who are not strong.

An Ideal Vacation

By "Institute."

WE had just said "Good-bye" to our last summer visitor, having entertained on an average of five or six a week since the first of May, when I had occasion to go to my cellar on an errand, and while down there I surveyed my winter stock of preserved fruit, jellies, and pickles, etc., done up between meals and under difficulties. The fact then and there was brought home to me that surely if anyone had earned a holiday I had. Many nights during the months gone by I hardly knew where I was to lay my head, our sleeping-rooms filled up and the tired housemother, who has to rise early (six a.m. being my usual hour), and many nights unable to retire till the wee sma' hours, it is to say the least very exhausting; and the strain had begun to tell on my general health. I was tired through and through. That day at dinner I mentioned the fact and my whole family saw the necessity of a vacation. I had "heaps" of invitations to friends' houses, but that would not be the rest I wanted. My husband planned a very pleasant outing, but it would cost in the neighborhood of fifty dollars. I had planned having a bathroom put in our house, and I felt I would rather spend money on that than on a trip, as we live in an inland town where there is no waterworks, and, although my home in every other particular was complete, that was a lack I wished to remedy, and I felt I'd rather utilize that money for that purpose.

My whole system clamored for rest. My hair, which I always take the greatest pride in, was neglected. It needed washing and singeing and treatment, which takes time. I never attempted to wash it unless I had a half-day at my disposal, for it was very heavy and took a long time to dry after being washed. My feet were so calloused that to see me walk you would think I was verging on seventy instead of forty-five, and my poor hands, with preserving, pickling, dish-washing, etc., were a fright, to say the least, and all just for a little time and attention.

After pondering the matter over, I bethought me of a scheme which has worked out so beautifully I thought I would give the Institute members the benefit of it, as I am sure there are many women just in the same position as I am. About forty miles from where I live is a city. I wrote there to the Y. W. C. A. and got them to engage me a room. The only stipulation I made was that it should be on a bathroom flat and that there should be hot and cold water. When I arrived in the city I went to the Y. W. C. A. They sent me to my room, which was all that was to be desired, large and airy, with every convenience, and for the small sum of $2.00 a week. I took a hot bath after lounging around a while and went to bed, slept soundly till six a.m., which was my usual hour for rising, and oh the luxury of knowing I could go to sleep again and get up when I liked, and to know no one was waiting breakfast for me. About eight o'clock I arose and took two hours and a half to make my toilet, dressed for the street, and went out to look for my breakfast. I forgot to mention that the one part of me that needed rest most was my stomach, and one thing I was determined that should be respected. I found a place where I got toasted corn flakes, toast and coffee or a fresh roll all for ten cents. It was all I needed. I had been eating at all hours and had got too fleshy. Ice cream every evening had been the usual thing and eating all hours of the day and night. Now I intended to have just two meals—breakfast about ten or eleven, dinner about four or half past. Then every day I planned for some visits about the city, ending up quite often with visiting the shops, where I picked up some splendid bargains. I got my hair back to its original state of cleanliness and health and my feet felt again as if they belonged to me, as also did my hands. My figure was improved, as every day I took long walks and saw everything of interest and took my time. My forenoons I devoted chiefly to my person, and my afternoons and evenings to sight-seeing. I came home looking and feeling like a new woman, and the cost—I am almost ashamed to tell the actual cost, it was so small: Seven breakfasts, seventy cents; seven dinners, one dollar and seventy-five cents; room, two dollars and a half; railway fare, two dollars. Total, six dollars and ninety-five cents. Now, is there any woman who could not spend that small sum for a vacation? Of course, a person could spend as much as she liked, but it was an experiment with me and one I thoroughly enjoyed. Let any tired mother try it.

Peep again in your oven.
See those loaves, those pleasing loaves you've made.
How fat—rounded—substantial.
No, they wont fall when colder.
Because the Manitoba strength that is in FIVE ROSES will hold them up till eaten.
This sturdy elastic gluten has kept them from dropping flat in the oven.
No unsightly holes 'twixt crust and crumb—never.
All risen evenly—to stay risen.
Never heavy—sodden—soggy—indigestible.
Yours are the FIVE ROSES loaves—
Crinkly and appetizing of crust.
Golden brown and tender.
Snowy of crumb—light as thistledown.
FIVE ROSES helps a lot.
Try it soon.

Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

BENGER'S FOOD

Wherever there is a case of enfeebled digestion, whether from advancing age, illness, or general debility, there is a case for Benger's Food.

When the stomach becomes weakened, the digestion of ordinary food becomes only partial, and at times is painful, little of the food is assimilated, and the body is consequently insufficiently nourished.

This is where Benger's Food helps. It contains in itself the natural digestive principles, and is quite different from any other food obtainable.

All doctors know and approve of its composition, and prescribe it freely.

For INFANTS, INVALIDS, AND THE AGED.

The "British Medical Journal" says: "Benger's Food has, by its excellence, established a reputation of its own."

BENGER'S NEW BOOKLET deals with the most common doubts and difficulties which mothers have to encounter. It is sent post free on application to Benger's Food Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, England.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere.

B19

HOUSE OF WINDOWS

Continued from page 12

"Because long ago I investigated and found out that as a matter of fact a girl entirely alone and dependent upon herself would find it hard to get along comfortably upon her wage. This, in the cases of some girls more fond of display, etc., etc., lead to a—ah—deplorable state of things. Things which I need not discuss."

"Because long ago I investigated and found out that as a matter of fact a girl entirely alone and dependent upon herself would find it hard to get along comfortably upon her wage. This, in the cases of some girls more fond of display, etc., etc., led to a—ah—deplorable state of things. Things which I need not discuss."

Miss Torrance laughed.

"Oh, you need not spare my blushes," she remarked. "I understand what you mean quite well. But did it ever occur to you that if these girls (fond of display, I think you said, and dependent upon their own efforts) cannot get along with a certain sum a week they will be still less likely to get along upon nothing at all."

"I do not feel myself responsible for such as I do not employ," he replied with dignity. "But I felt that in my stores such a state of things could not be allowed to exist."

"It never occurred to you, I suppose, to raise the wages?"

"On the contrary. I went most carefully into it with Davies, our then manager, and he proved to me most conclusively that the rate of wage could not be raised without impairing the profits of the business."

"It never occurred to you to—impair the profits?"

Mr. Torrance flushed. "I trust I am sufficiently a man of business," he said stiffly, "to see how fatal that would be."

"Ah, well, give me my salts. And go on with your story."

Mr. Bunce informed me that the rule was most carefully enforced, and showed me a list of employes which seemed to give most satisfying details. I then spoke to him about the inaugurating of a Saturday half-holiday. He opposed the idea, but I was determined. I told him that it is getting to be the invariable custom in many large cities, and that the results were beneficial—most beneficial. Finally he came over to my point of view."

"What did he say?"

"Oh, he said that if it was really going to be a fashionable fad it wouldn't do any harm to fall in line. Better to be the first to do it, than to be compelled to follow someone else's lead. In fact, everything was very satisfactory and my mind was becoming quite easy when an interruption occurred."

"Thank heaven!" said the invalid fervently.

"The interruption was unpleasant. A floor walker entered with a report. One of the clerks had fainted. Ordinary measures would not restore her. He wished to know what to do."

"How unfortunate for poor Mr. Bunce. What did the excellent man do?"

"I am sorry to say that he forgot himself. He swore. I do not permit such language from my managers. He told the clerk to call the am'bulance and intimated that he was several kinds of fool for not doing it without disturbing him. But I interfered. I requested that the clerk be brought into the room and laid upon the sofa, and that Dr. Carrington be sent for. I wished to know what had caused the faint. It did not look as if my rules in regard to the health of persons employed by me had been attended to. When the clerk was brought she proved to be—"

"Miss Brown, of course."

"Why 'of course'?"

"You started out to say something about Miss Brown, didn't you? Don't be stupid, Adam. My nerves cannot stand a stupid man."

"As it happened, the clerk was Miss Brown. She was still unconscious when Dr. Carrington arrived. But he restored her immediately. Her distress upon recovering was—er—pathetic. She seemed afraid of being discharged at once—"

"In accordance with the rules—naturally."

"All rules have exceptions, Miriam. Would any employer discharge a girl, evidently in great need and sickness also, for no fault of her own—"

Miss Torrance's laughter interrupted him. She laughed until the tears came into her shrewd old eyes. "Spare me, my dear Adam!" she gasped. "Surely you see how enormously funny you are? You won't have a girl who is really needy in the Stores; you won't have a girl who is delicate on any account; both of these rules you have justified to yourself over and over and yet at the mere idea of discharging a girl who is both needy and ill you fly into an admirable rage. Admit that you are amusingly inconsistent?"

"Not at all. This girl—"

"Don't argue, Adam, you know my nerves! Tell me what you did. It will be instructive."

"I wished to send Miss Brown (I learned that her name was Christine Brown) to a private hospital, at my expense, of course. But she pleaded most pitifully against it. Said she had two sisters at home who would care for her. The record showed that she spoke the truth, so I sent her home in a cab."

"Good."

"Then I had a talk with Dr. Carrington. He said her collapse was the natural result of a delicate and growing girl standing on her feet too long. I mentioned the stools. The manager, Mr. Bunce, mentioned the stools, and the floorwalker was able to give us the exact number of stools per counter. But the doctor said he didn't care how many stools there were; it was certain that Miss Brown had not sat upon them. He said that dozens of shop-girls collapse in the same way. Mr. Bunce admitted that he had known it to happen, but that they always got used to it after a while. Dr. Carrington said that that did not affect the subject in the least. They had no business to get used to it. He said some very strong things."

"Carrington, did you say? I think I'll have him in to prescribe for me. The man I have now is a fool. Well, go on."

"That is really all. The girl went home. I ordered her to take a few days' holiday. I assured her that her position would be kept for her. She seemed grateful. Afterwards the similarity of her name and the name of the lady you mentioned in your letter occurred to me. I asked myself, 'Can it be the same'? Needless to say I am going to personally investigate this case. I shall find out about her home, and whether this young girl really has sisters and is in circumstances which render her eligible for employment in the Stores, or whether Mr. Bunce has misled me in saying that these things are always looked into. I confess that the young girl's fear of being discharged has filled me with grave doubts."

"I don't wonder," dryly.

"And now I ask you the question I came to ask. Was the lady mentioned in your letter employed in the Stores?"

Miss Torrance took a long whiff of her salts and closed her eyes. When she opened them they were bright with a resolution made.

"Adam," she said briskly, "I see no impropriety in answering your question. The Miss Brown I referred to in my letter was not employed in the Stores."

"You relieve me. You relieve me very much," said Mr. Torrance, rising to go. "I shall investigate this case without any leanings of—of any kind."

A new idea for a fascinating dish!

Ice Cream and Kellogg's TOASTED CORN FLAKES

Place a cone of ice cream in the dish, and smother with CornFlakes at serving. You will find this delightfully refreshing.

10c. per pkg.

Made in Canada, at London, Ontario 27

PEASE FURNACE

QUALITY IS ECONOMY.

Which is the sole reason for the unparalleled success of "PEASE" Furnaces and Boilers. All the materials are carefully and accurately tested before being used—also during each process through which the materials are put until they are turned out as finished products, the same care and accurateness obtains. The result is that the "PEASE" Furnaces and Boilers have earned a reputation for wear, durability and economy, which is unequalled.

Write for our books, "The Question of Heating," or "Boiler Information," sent free on request.

"Ask the man who has one."

PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY, LIMITED
TORONTO 39 WINNIPEG

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this Issue.

There can be as much style to your hair-dress as there is to the clothes you wear.

Dorenwend's Hair Goods

Are of the finest quality hair, worked into refined, attractive and becoming styles. The experience, care and study, does not show but when you find out their wonderful wearing abilities you will appreciate these hidden qualities which are given you when you purchase.

Let Us Show You Through the Mail

how we can improve your appearance. OUR BIG FREE ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE will be sent you on request, and will aid you in the dressing of your hair.

Our hair creations such as Transformations, Pompadours, Coils, Switches, Etc., are all illustrated.

The Newest European and American Fashions. Write Now.

THE DORENWEND CO'Y OF TORONTO, LIMITED
(The House of Quality Hair-Goods)
103-105 Yonge St., Toronto, Ont.

BLACK KNIGHT
STOVE POLISH

is not a little, messy box of powder that has to be mixed with water, nor a hard cake that has to be scraped. It is a generous can of paste, easily applied and magical in its results. For stoves, pipes, grates and iron-work.

If your dealer does not carry "Black Knight" Stove Polish in stock, send us his name and 10c, and we will send a full size tin by return mail.

THE F. F. DALLEY CO., LIMITED
HAMILTON, ONT. 28
Makers of the famous "2 in 1" Shoe Polish.

Modern Business Courses

The courses in commercial subjects offered by this school are strictly up-to-date and practical and produce the very best results All instruction individual. A copy of our handsomely illustrated catalogue sent on request.

British American Business College
Y. M. C. A. Building
Yonge and McGill Streets - Toronto

"The only way," agreed his sister, "in which any case can be properly investigated."

CHAPTER XVI.

IT is perhaps hardly necessary to say that Christine did not go home in the cab so kindly provided by Mr. Torrance. The arrival of a cab at the House of Windows would have interfered with the legitimate occupation of its tenants to an alarming degree, besides conferring undesired fame upon the cab's occupant. So it was quite three blocks from home that Christine overcame the cabman's scruples and induced him to let her proceed on foot.

"I am feeling quite well now," she told him, "and the little walk will do me good; besides, my sister at home is ill and it would needlessly alarm her to have me brought home in a cab."

The man, who had been generously paid by Mr. Torrance, and who had of his own accord taken an interest in his pretty fare, was loath to depart from his original instructions, but it was a hard man who could resist Christine when she smiled.

With a sigh of relief she watched him drive away and turned, walking rather slowly, in the direction of home. She did not feel ill now, only dizzy—tired—unable to focus her thoughts. How would she explain to Ada? If she told the truth it would be one more burden for Ada, if she did not tell the truth, what story could she invent which would explain her early home-coming and the fact that she had a few days' holiday? How kind Mr. Torrance had been! She felt a great rush of gratitude to him for promising that her position should be kept for her. How handsome he was, she thought, how courteous! Beside him, the hitherto omnipotent Mr. Bunce had appeared small and insignificant. But in spite of all that kindness could do, the fact remained that she had fainted and had been sent home with orders to consider herself upon the sick list. How would she tell Ada?

So absorbed was she in this problem that she did not notice the old woman whose tottering steps followed her down the street. At the touch of a hand upon her arm she turned abstractedly, and started to find herself looking into a pair of very ugly red-rimmed eyes. It was the same old woman of whom she had spoken to Tommy on the night of Mark's departure. Seen closely, and in broad daylight, the creature was even more repulsive than she had thought. Red eyes, loose mouth, draggled grey hair, and a temporarily swollen nose made up an ensemble at which the girl shuddered involuntarily.

"You're Miss Brown, aren't you?" asked the woman in a whining voice. "Can't you help a poor widow that once had a darter as pretty as you?"

Christine flushed. "I am sorry," she said. "I would give you something if I had it. But I haven't a cent of money with me. Only some car tickets."

The old woman grinned maliciously, drawing still nearer to the tired and half-frightened girl. "Only car tickets is it," she began, but before she could finish her sentence someone jerked her, not too gently, away.

"Here—get out," said Mr. Gilbert Van Slyke. He could hardly believe his own good luck in stumbling upon such a good excuse for speaking to Christine, but fortune sometimes favors the indolent as well as the brave. "Shouldn't let these beggars annoy you," he said with an affable smile. "Here, you!" He flung the old woman a coin and with lordly gesture motioned her off the earth.

Christine, unprepared for this new annoyance, walked rapidly on. This, she thought with tingling cheeks, was what the dark girl had warned her of—how dared he! Oh, if she had only gone home in the cab.

"Awful rotters, these beggars!" said Mr. Van Slyke, nonchalantly. "Oughtn't to be allowed, don't you know."

Christine said nothing and walked faster.

"Lucky I happened to be passing," he began again, but the badgered girl, taking a sudden resolve, slackened her pace, and, turning, looked him straight in the face.

"I do not know you," she said quietly, "but if you are a gentleman you will annoy me no further. I do not wish to appeal to the police."

This was something of a facer.

"Oh—er, certainly, excuse me, a mistake," spluttered the amazed Van Slyke. He had expected coyness or perhaps an affectation of haughtiness, but this simple and quiet directness took him by surprise.

(To be continued)

OSTRICH PLUMES

SHOULD BE PURCHASED BY CANADIANS IN CANADA
YOU WILL HAVE NO DUTY TO PAY

"LONDON" PLUMES

Are the highest quality Plumes in the world and are recognized as the most perfectly made.

FROM MAKER TO WEARER

We manufacture every Plume we sell from the finest imported South African raw Ostrich Feathers. These are for sale only in our own Retail Stores. In this way you save all the middleman's profit.

"LONDON" PLUMES GUARANTEED

Any article purchased from us may be returned within seven days and we will return purchase price.

NEW CATALOGUE

will be sent free to any address in Canada. You will find the prices quoted for every Plume exceptionally low. We can also make your old Feathers into Willow Plumes. Write To-Day for Catalogue and full particulars to

DEPARTMENT A

LONDON FEATHER CO., Limited
144 YONGE STREET TORONTO, ONT.
LONDON, ENG. PARIS NEW YORK MONTREAL TORONTO

Have you read our guarantee on page three? If not, read it and buy from Canadian Home Journal advertisers.

GRANULATED PACKAGE
KNOX
SPARKLING
No 1
GELATINE
HIGHEST MEDAL WORLD'S FAIR
PACKED BY CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
JOHNSTOWN, N.Y., U.S.A.
The Handy Package
Each package of KNOX
PURE · PLAIN
SPARKLING
GELATINE
is divided into two envelopes, and makes two full quarts.
Also contains an envelope of Pink Color for making fancy desserts.
Knox Gelatine is the world's pure, uncolored, unsweetened gelatine—in convenient, granulated form.
Send for FREE Recipe Book containing recipes for Desserts, Salads, Puddings, Ices, Ice Cream and Candies—FREE for your grocer's name. Pint sample for 2c. stamp and grocer's name
CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
501 Knox Ave., Johnstown, N.Y.
Branch Factory Montreal Canada
DAINTY DESSERTS FOR DAINTY PEOPLE

Mentholated
Vaseline

Allays Neuralgic Pains, Nervous Headache, Cold in Head.

12 Vaseline Remedies in Tubes.
Camphor Ice, Borated, Carbolated, Camphorated, White, Oxide of Zinc, etc.
Each for special purposes.
Write for Free Vaseline Book to
CHESEBROUGH MFG. CO (Consd.) 1880 Chabot Ave. MONTREAL

PEACH'S TABLE DAMASK

From Looms Direct. Money Saving. Wonderful Offerings. GIVEN AWAY. Lace Cover with Catalogue & Buyer's Guide of Curtains, Window Draperies and Furniture compact for shipping. Household Linens, Ladies' and Gents' Tailoring, Underwear, Shoes, &c. 54 Years known Reputation. Send a trial order to actual makers in the old country.

$6.25 Damask Parcel Postage & Duty Paid.

2 White Damask Table Cloths, 2½ yds. by 2 yds. and 2 White Damask Table Cloths, 60 by 58 ins., all rich Scroll and Floral Designs, hemmed. 2 Half Bleached Table Cloths, hard wearing. 2 Irish Cambric Tea Cloths. 2 Handsome Tray Covers, all Irish Hand Embroidered and drawn thread.
Postage & Duty Paid $6.25
Marvellous Value. Try One. Write to-day.

SAML. PEACH & SONS, The Looms,
Box NOTTINGHAM, England.

W. H. SHAW, President

Every Home A College

Under our original method of correspondence instruction EVERY HOME BECOMES A COLLEGE. We go right to your home with the most practical courses under the supervision of expert tutors. STUDENTS DELIGHTED GRADUATES SUCCESSFUL

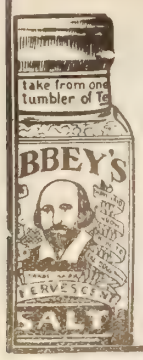
Here are a few of our courses—make your selection—underline it—fill in name and address—cut out this ad. and send to-day for full particulars.

Illustrating, Commercial, Accountancy, Journalism, Story Writing, Show Card Writing, Photography, Penmanship

NAME . . . . . .
ADDRESS . . . . . .

Shaw Correspondence School
H. J. 393 Yonge St., Toronto

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.



A bottle of prevention is better than a deranged stomach.

Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

25c and 60c bottle.

Sold everywhere.

83

THE COST OF A CRIME

Continued from page 11

"Oh, he has not gone away with anyone—simply alone. He has absconded."

"Business troubles," put in Luttrell quickly.

"He is a defaulter, and he had no other choice," she replied in a dry, tense voice. "I have never understood business much, he has kept it all from me. And all I understand is that he has made away with large sums of money not his own, and that unable to account for it or meet the investigation he has run away."

Mrs. Luttrell grew suddenly as pale as her friend. She had not anticipated disgrace, and she had been sincerely attached to John Reedham, and could hardly believe the story to be true.

"It sounds too dreadful!" she murmured. "Can you believe it, Teddy?"

Luttrell slightly shook his head. He could see the strain under which Mrs. Reedham was laboring, and his heart was full of compassion for her.

"It is not necessary to go into any painful details," he said gently. "What does Mr. Lidgate say. He would be the best judge I should say."

"Lidgate says it could not be worse, but he has been very kind," she said dully. "He—he gave him time to get away. To-morrow everything will be known. Some firms will be shaken by it, and the other partners are furious, Mr. Currie especially so. You have met him here, you know what a hard man he is, and he feels acutely the stigma which will attach to the firm over it."

"But what did he do with the money?" asked Mrs. Luttrell perplexedly.

Bessie shook her head.

"I don't understand it. Lidgate says it is very easy to squander large sums in a short time, but what perplexes me is that it should be possible for one member of a firm to do it unknown and unsuspected by his fellow partners. But, anyhow, it is done, and my husband has disappeared."

"Do you have any idea where he has gone?" asked Mrs. Luttrell. Bessie Reedham shook her head.

"None, and at the present moment I do not wish to know. Lidgate, however, assures me he is still in life."

There was a moment's silence, the trio regarding one another with expressions indicating unspeakable thoughts.

Commonplace sympathy seemed wholly out of place in face of such a tragedy, they did not attempt a single utterance of it. What amazed them was the calmness of the woman who sat in front of them telling them what had happened.

"About Leslie," she said, with a sudden break in her voice. "You know how fond he was of his father. Do you think it would be possible to keep the newspapers from him to-morrow?"

"Certainly, I shall make it my business. Fortunately, our boys don't take much interest in newspapers," replied Luttrell quickly.

"And don't say a word to him now, unless it becomes necessary. If he should hear anything, will you promise to wire to me, and I will come myself and tell him everything, or send him up to me."

"We will do everything to help and shield you," said Luttrell in a full voice, for indeed he was deeply moved. "And whatever happens, Leslie remains with us. He will come back after the holidays. Another year at Sunbury will not hurt him."

Bessie Reedham's eyes filled with sudden blistering tears.

They were brought partly by the offered kindness, partly by the quenching of the hope concerning her boy. For she had been proud of the fact that the autumn would see him started on the next stage of his career.

"Thank you! thank you! I can say no more. Everything must be left. Meanwhile Mr. Lidgate will advise me what is to be done about Leslie. But, I fear, it is certain that he will have to leave school."

"Not yet," said Luttrell firmly. "If I have any say in the matter. He is too young to turn to anything. In another year, perhaps, we could speak about it. And perhaps by that time things will have smoothed themselves out."

Bessie Reedham shook her head.

"He can never come back to the world of men," she said in a hollow voice. "Don't you see that the only thing that awaits him there would be a felon's cell?"

Evelyn Luttrell gave a little cry.

"Oh, Bessie, it is too dreadful! John Reedham, whom we all loved so much! I can't believe it. I will go on hoping that it will be proved to be some terrible mistake. He will—he must—come back to clear himself."

"If there were any hope of such a thing, Evelyn, Lidgate would have told me. He was most kind, but he has never buoyed me up with any false hopes. He simply says everything is over for my husband."

"And you will have to leave your beautiful home," said Mrs. Luttrell, with an involuntary glance round the dainty, home-like room. She had sometimes grown weary with the stress of her own cares at Sunbury, and envied the woman who lived a life of sheltered ease. Yet how terrible was the sequel to that ease now!

"At once—next week, probably. I have not seen Mr. Currie yet, but he is coming to-day at five o'clock."

"We will go before that, Teddy," said Mrs. Luttrell quickly. "Unless you will let me stay for a few days. I might be of some real use then, and they will be quite all right at the school."

(To be continued)

I'm the Cream of the West Miller, and I'll tell you what I'll do—I'll guarantee your next batch of bread

I WILL guarantee it to rise away up out of the pans, and make as delicious bread as you ever tasted. The loaves will be the biggest and most wholesome you ever baked with the same amount of flour. I'll guarantee it or you get back the money you paid for the flour! Now see:

Just go to your grocer and buy a bag of Cream of the West Flour. Take it home and bake it up.

Give it a trial.

Give it a couple of trials. Your oven or yeast might not be just right the first time.

Now when you give it a fair trial, if you honestly feel that you have not had splendid satisfaction with Cream of the West Flour, return the unused portion of the bag and get your money back.

Just tell the store man your bread didn't come out right and you want your money back as guaranteed.

It's not the grocery man who loses. It doesn't come out of his pocket. It is the Campbell Milling Company, Limited, of Toronto, who pay, and they are satisfied to pay if you'll be satisfied to try Cream of the West Flour.

Ask your store-keeper about this guarantee. He knows. He will tell you. Try a bag next baking day.

Cream of the West Flour

The hard wheat flour that is guaranteed for bread

Guarantee

WE hereby affirm and declare that Cream of the West Flour is a superior bread flour, and as such is subject to our absolute guarantee of money back if not satisfactory after a fair trial. Any dealer is hereby authorized to return price paid by customer on return of unused portion of bag if the flour is not as represented.

The Campbell Milling Company, Limited, Toronto.

ARCHIBALD CAMPBELL, PRESIDENT

CREAM OF THE WEST

100

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Susan the Indispensable

Continued from page 9

—and you said it was impossible: I couldn't be spared; it was my plain duty to stay at home and help you. I thought you were right. I—I still think you were right, and I made the sacrifice willingly. But how can you say you would have been able to manage without me if I had gone away as —as Brian's wife?"

"My dear," said Mrs. Wilbraham, bewildered, not to say a little shocked. "My dear, going away to be married is not the same thing as going away to be a painter in London, just as if you were a man! What extraordinary things you do say! And I don't think it is quite nice of you to put it so plainly about Brian. It is not as though he had really asked you to be his wife. I only meant that we sometimes wondered, your father and I——"

"Yes, I understand," said Susan. She spread an embroidered wrap over her mother's knees and drew down the blind, shutting out both the picture and the sunlight. At the door she promised to order scones for tea, as well as cress sandwiches, and to put on her best frock, so that Brian should not think he was unwelcome after fifteen years.

Prue was waiting for her in the hall. Susan suppressed a sigh. She would have dearly liked to forget she was indispensable just then, to be able to go away and be alone for ten minutes, just to realize the existence of the letter in her pocket, that had turned an untidy garden into a picture, and made her late for early dinner. But she gathered from Prue's face that she was not going to be allowed her ten minutes, and she gave them up unresistingly, as she had once given up the man who wanted to marry her. It was part of the price she had paid, fifteen years ago, for being indispensable to her family to-day.

"Come and help me pick roses for the big bowl," she said, and pulled Prue out into the sunshine. Prue went unwillingly. Full of her own affairs, she saw no pictures anywhere, and roses bored her.

"Have you said anything to mother?" she burst out, as soon as they were at a safe distance from the open drawing-room window.

Susan shook her head. "There wasn't a chance," she answered. "After tea is the best time, as a rule. I'll try to do it after tea."

Prue plucked at a dead rose and pulled it to pieces. "I can't endure waiting," she grumbled. "I'd sooner have a row at once and get it over."

"Child! child!" said Susan, snipping off roses rapidly with her gardening scissors. "Can't you wait a few hours? Most of us have to wait years for anything that we want."

Prue turned scornful. "I don't mean to wait," she cried. "If mother won't let me take the chance of a lifetime when it's offered to me I shall—I shall run away."

Susan received this threat with great calmness. It was not the first time she had dealt with rebellion. "Of course you can do that," she agreed, still impassively cutting roses; "but Mrs. Rackstraw's offer only includes your training in medical gymnastics, not your board and lodging for the two years you will have to live in London. So I don't quite see how——"

"Suke!" interrupted a penitent voice. "You're not turning against me, are you? Yesterday, you were as keen as I was that I should go away and make something of my life. What's come over you to-day? I can't bear it if you turn against me!"

It was true, and Susan knew it. Until this afternoon she had been entirely on Prue's side. The letter that lay in her pocket was responsible in some subtle way for changing her point of view, even for making it approximate to that of her step-mother. And her step-mother's point of view regarding Prue was limited entirely to dreams of marriage and wealth. Prue was the beauty of the family; and seeing how exceedingly pretty she looked, as she stood there against the background of riotous color, Susan's courage failed her at the thought of suggesting to Mrs. Wilbraham that medical gymnastics (of which she would surely never have heard), and not marriage, were to fill the future of her brilliant daughter.

"Darling," she said persuasively, "don't be in too great a hurry to accept this offer. It is so easy to make a mistake at twenty. There are all sorts of things in life besides work and fame. Why shouldn't some of them be waiting for you? I'm not turning against you. Of course I'm not! But do think it over before I speak to mother."

She was prepared for disappointment, even for fury and contumely. She was not in the least prepared for mocking laughter.

"Dear old Suke, how delightfully funny you are!" cried Prue, bubbling over with amusement. "Saying all those stuffy, conventional things as if you really believed them—like mother! You know you don't believe them one bit. You know you would give anything to be twenty again yourself, so that you could make the very mistake you pretend you don't want me to make. And you know you're going to persuade mother to give in about me. Aren't you, dear, funny, old Suke?"

She gave her sister a hug and went off, impudently humming a tune. She did not know she had been cruel. She was all aglow with the modern spirit, and it tempered her natural discernment. The waste of Susan's existence was glaringly apparent to her; but she did not grasp that it was also apparent to Susan—Susan, whose relapse into her step-mother's attitude of mind was largely due to the brief and unemotional letter that lay in her pocket, announcing Brian Grierson's intention of coming up to see her after fifteen years.

Susan went on filling her basket with roses. Those fifteen years of renunciation were rolling by her in the sunshine. Her step-mother, in one careless sentence, had stripped her sacrifice of the seriousness that alone makes sacrifice worth while. At the age of forty-one, she thought she had made herself indispensable to a number of people, and now it appeared to be possible for

YOU CAN HAVE THE SAME GARMENTS THAT THE BEST DRESSED LADIES IN TORONTO ARE WEARING AT ABOUT HALF THE PRICE THEY PAY!

We base our success on the quick and intelligent appreciation of Canadian women of the true economy offered in "Economist Service." By dealing direct with the makers you save from 25 % to 50 % on every garment you purchase, besides getting a choice of over one hundred styles designed anl tailored by experts on all matters of dress.

Convince Yourself at our Risk.

Deal Direct with the Makers.

Write To-day.

Catalogue FREE on request.

C133. A Becoming "Economist" Favorite. Rarely do we use the term "favorite" in describing a garment, but this handsome coat, which conforms with every style requirement, is of such exceptional value both in design and material as to warrant special mention. Made in all wool diagonal cloth with attractive plaid collar, cuffs, pockets and back tabs, it gives an unusually smart and captivating effect. Colors: Grey, Tan, Green, Navy and Black. The regular value of this coat is at least $20.00. Our special price...$15.48

READ THIS!

One Lady Writes:

Gentlemen:—Your new catalogue at hand and find it more up-to-date in style than any other Canadian firm whose catalogue I have seen.

(The original of this letter is on file in our office.)

C123. New Polo Cloth Coat of Charming Style, which will delight any girl or woman seeing it. This coat is of fine extra heavy all wool English diagonal Polo Cloth, and is particularly attractive in shades of Grey and Tan, with military plaid collar, cuffs and belt. It is yoke lined and French faced. A coat which you will be proud to own and wear. Price (Ladies' sizes, $1.00 extra) $12.95

C124. We Picture Here the Most Handsome Misses' Coat of the Season, suitable for every occasion, and with an individuality all its own. Note the stylish effect of the back with hood and belt also the wide becoming collar with inlaid velvet and heavy patch pockets. This coat is yoke lined and comes in heavy diagonal. Shades: Dark and Light Grey and Moss Green. Superior designing and workmanship stand out prominently in every line of this garment. Suitable also in Ladies' size. Price..... $11.50

We pay all mail or express charges to your town—no matter where you live.

Economist Cloak & Suit Co.

Canada's Outer Garment House

TORONTO

This Washer Must Pay For Itself

A MAN tried to sell me a horse once. He said it was a fine horse and had nothing the matter with it. I wanted a fine horse. But, I didn't know anything about horses much. And I didn't know the man very well either.

So I told him I wanted to try the horse for a month. He said, "All right, but pay me first, and I'll give you back your money, if the horse isn't all right."

Well, I didn't like that. I was afraid the horse wasn't "all right" and that I might have to whistle for my money if I once parted with it. So I didn't buy the horse, although I wanted it badly. Now this set me thinking.

You see, I make Washing Machines—the "1900 Gravity" Washer.

And I said to myself, lots of people may think about my Washing Machine as I thought about the horse, and about the man who owned it.

But I'd never know, because they wouldn't write and tell me. You see, I sell my Washing Machines by mail. I have sold over half a million that way.

So, thought I, it is only fair enough to let people try my Washing Machines for a month, before they pay for them, just as I wanted to try the horse.

Now, I know what our "1900 Gravity" Washer will do. I know it will wash the clothes, without wearing or tearing them, in less than half the time they can be washed by hand or by any other machine.

I know it will wash a tub full of very dirty clothes in Six minutes. I know no other machine ever invented can do that, without wearing out the clothes.

Our "1900 Gravity" Washer does the work so easy that a child can run it almost as well as a strong woman, and it don't wear the clothes, fray the edges nor break buttons the way all other machines do.

It just drives soapy water clear through the fibres of the clothes like a force pump might.

So, said I to myself, I will do with my "1900 Gravity" Washer what I wanted the man to do with the horse. Only I won't wait for people to ask me. I'll offer first, and I'll make good the offer every time.

Let me send you a "1900 Gravity" Washer on a month's free trial. I'll pay the freight out of my own pocket, and if you don't want the machine after you've used it a month, I'll take it back and pay the freight too. Surely that is fair enough, isn't it?

Doesn't it prove that the "1900 Gravity" Washer must be all that I say it is?

And you can pay me out of what it saves for you. It will save its whole cost in a few months, in wear and tear on the clothes alone. And then it will save 50 cents to 75 cents a week over that in washwoman's wages. If you keep the machine after the month's trial, I'll let you pay for it out of what it saves you. If it saves you 60 cents a week, send me 50 cents a week 'till paid for. I'll take that cheerfully, and I'll wait for my money until the machine itself earns the balance.

Drop me a line to-day, and let me send you a book about the "1900 Gravity" Washer that washes clothes in 6 minutes.

Address me this way—H. J. A. Bach, The 1900 Washer Co., 357 Yonge St., Toronto, Ont. G65

We Are All Liable to Colds and Their Train of Evils

A cold is invariably caused by exposure when vitality is low.

The regular use of BOVRIL will give strength and vigor and enable you to resist colds and chills.

BOVRIL

is concentrated beef

Banish Grey Hair

The Princess Hair Rejuvenator

restores to natural color in a few days grey or faded hair that is not more than half grey. Best for brown or black hair. One bottle is sufficient. Will not rub off and does not have that dead effect. Makes the hair glossy, pretty and natural. Price $1, of your dealer, or will be sent direct, in plain package, by prepaid express upon receipt of price. Hair Rejuvenator is clear as water, and is not sticky or greasy, and has no bad odor; is absolutely harmless, easily applied, and gives perfect results. Send a small lock of your hair, or state natural color before your hair turned grey, and we will send you a liberal sample, free, with full directions for permanently keeping the grey hairs away.

Let Us Send You Free

our instructive booklet "H" on the complexion and scalp, together with free sample of Princess Skin Food (and free sample of Hair Rejuvenator, if you need it).

Superfluous Hair

Moles, Warts, Red Veins, Powder Marks, Cowlicks, Etc.,

etc., permanently eradicated by our reliable method of anti-septic electrolysis. Come any time for treatment if you live out of town. Depilatories or applications to remove hair increase the growth and burn the skin. We assure satisfaction in each case.

Hiscott Dermatological Institute
61 College Street, - Toronto

Established 1892

27 for $1.00

Yes, 27 issues of The Canadian Horticulturist, the attractive Canadian magazine for fruit, flower and vegetable growers, for only $1. Beginning with our October number (which contains an article by Wm. Hunt, telling you just what to do in your garden during October, also an interesting article on B.C. fruit growing), we will send you The Canadian Horticulturist till December, 1913—27 issues—for only $1.

Write for free sample. Better still, simply write "Home Journal ad." on a sheet of paper, sign your name and address, and mail it to us with a one-dollar bill. Your money back if you are not satisfied when you receive your first copy. We guarantee this.

THE CANADIAN HORTICULTURIST
PETERBORO - ONTARIO

any one of them to turn round and tell her she need not have done it. She wondered if one had to go on paying a high price to the end of life for one's failures.

A step on the gravel path did not make her look round, though it came to a standstill close behind her. Prue had behaved abominably, and until she apologized Susan did not mean to meet her half-way.

"I suppose you've come back to ask me to reconsider what I said," observed Susan, when the silence began to be tiresome.

"Yes, I have," said a man's voice.

Susan dropped the scissors.

"I got your letter," she said.

She was finding it difficult to open a conversation with a complete stranger. She wished she had not turned round. Until she turned round and looked at him, the owner of the man's voice had not been a stranger to her.

"You didn't answer it," said Brian Grierson. He, too, rather wished she had not turned round. There had been something so familiar in the way she stood with her back to him, picking roses rapidly and methodically, as though the man who once wanted to marry her were not on his way to meet her after fifteen years. It was very like the old Susan, too, not to have bothered to tidy herself up in his honor. But there was nothing familiar about the woman, who turned round to look at him. She was a stranger to him, and a queer shyness seized them both.

"Mary brought a message from your mother to say you were coming; that's why I didn't answer it," said Susan. "You don't know Mary, do you? She was born the day you went away. There are Jack and Jenny, too—quite a lot of us for you to learn up!"

She was glad to have something definite to say. He seemed to feel the same need of conversational bridges; for he told her, with great solemnity, how many passengers had been on board the boat, and the exact hour at which he reached Plymouth and despatched his letter to her. The absurdity of this sort of intercourse struck them both after a moment or two.

"We never used to talk like this," he said, smiling through the beard that helped to disguise the old Brian. "Do you remember how angry you used to be with me if I said conventional things for the sake of saying something? 'Be rude, if you like; but do be a real person,' you once said. Do you remember?"

"We're not being real now," she answered abruptly. She hated him for sending that letter from Plymouth, as though he were the same old Brian as of old. He must have known he was no longer the man who had asked her to marry him.

"It's because you never wrote to me all those years," he said. "We should have kept in touch if you had written to me." He would have given worlds to recall the letter he had written from Plymouth. It was not written to her at all. It was meant for the old Susan, who was gone. She had no business to open it.

"That isn't the reason," answered Susan. "We've both grown fifteen years older—and we've done it in different places. If we had done it in the same place we should not have noticed we were doing it."

It was an intimate remark to make to one who was a complete stranger. She felt sure, however, that she would not have made it had she not realized that they were going to be strangers for the rest of their lives. He realized the same thing at the same moment, and the strain produced by their former intimacy was slightly relieved. Chatting almost as easily as any two chance acquaintances might have done, they went indoors, and Susan left him with Mrs. Wilbraham while she went upstairs to take off her gardening pinafore. Before she came down again, she tore up the letter that had come by the second post and made her late for lunch.

The young Wilbrahams insisted on walking home with Brian in the cool of the evening. He was no stranger to them, though two of them had only a hazy recollection of what he was like before he left England, and the other three had never seen him at all. Within five minutes of their meeting over scones and cress sandwiches they knew that he belonged to the minority of great people who can be made friends with at sight; and they straightway made friends with him. Only Susan held aloof. She did remember what he was like before he left England; and the man with a beard, who called himself Brian Grierson, was a stranger whose acquaintance required to be made afresh. Susan was never quick at making acquaintances.

Her isolation in the middle of the noisy tea party attracted no attention. It was always Susan's business to preside over the distribution of food, and that never left her any leisure for the more human amenities of meal time. Prue was probably the only one who noticed that, when Brian departed with his chattering escort, Susan stayed behind with their mother; and Prue knew, or thought she did, why Susan chose to do this. Prue, indeed, being far more interested at the moment in her own destines than in the adventures of the fascinating stranger from South Africa, soon detached herself from the others and returned home again. She found Susan in the garden, once more shrouded in her pinafore, busily weeding the perennial beds.

"Suke!!" she began anxiously. "Have you——? Did she——?"

"Oh, I've made it all right for you," answered Susan, tugging away at groundsel and nettles. The sting of the nettles gave her a vicious pleasure. "She was dreadfully upset at first, and declared she could not do without you. I pointed out that, if you wanted to leave home in order to be married, she would have no diffiuclty in sparing you."

"You dear!" exclaimed Prue, rapturously. "No wonder that clinched her. What made you think of saying that, Suke?"

Susan, wondering bitterly why no one had said it on her behalf fifteen years ago, did not explain. "Well, I did think of it," she answered; "and it clinched her, as you say, though I don't think that is the proper way for a daughter to speak of her mother. You'd better come and help with this weeding, instead of standing there idle."

Prue showed no inclination to adopt this suggestion. "What made you change about me, Suke?" she asked, curiously. "This afternoon you talked all kinds of stuff about there being other things in life besides work and——"

"So there are—for some people," answered Susan. She stood up to stretch her back, and Prue wondered at the sternness that came into her face as she said this. "I hoped, as mother hoped, that perhaps the other things would be there for you, instead of the harder life you have chosen. Yes, child, I agree that you are right to do what you've decided to do, and that it may be necessary for the sake of future women that the women of this generation should be sacrificed; but it's no use pretending that there is no greater happiness for any woman than to scrape a bare living in a labor market where everything is against her from the start."

"I don't pretend anything so absurd!" cried Prue indignantly. Susan swept aside her protest and went on:

"It is only natural," she continued, "that we should prefer to see you a happy wife and mother than——"

Prue declined to be swept aside when it came to this. "Who says I'm not going to be a happy wife some day?" she demanded.

"I beg your pardon?" said Susan, looking at her. To her suprise, Prue blushed.

"There's one thing I didn't tell you," she confessed.

"Oh!" said Susan.

"I don't know whether you and mother assume that I am never going to marry just because I mean to enter a profession. Why should marriage be out of the question for a woman because she can earn an income of her own? It ought to make her more eligible, if anything!"

She thought she was suceeeding magnificently in conducting the discussion on general lines. Susan's next remark, therefore, disconcerted her considerably.

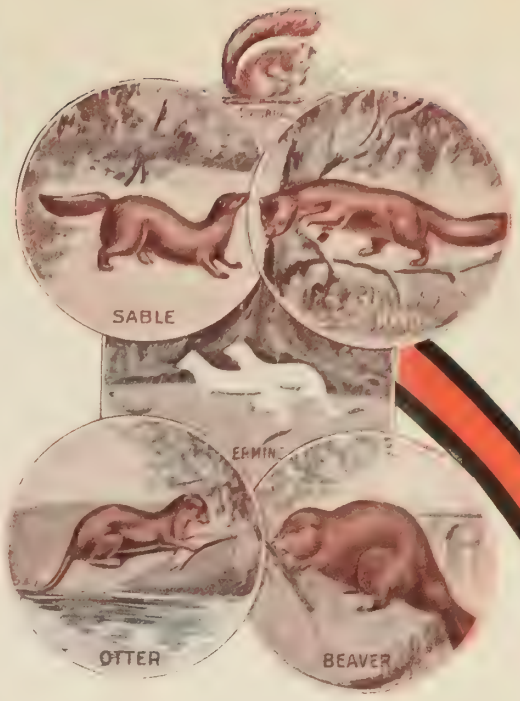
"Who is he, Prue?" she asked. "And why wasn't I told?"

"There you go!" cried Prue, hotly. "You sentimentalize no end about love and marriage and all the rest of it; and directly you suspect that I'm going to take you at your word you look as though I'd done something underhand and wrong. I'm engaged to Bobby Rackstraw, if you want to know; and I didn't tell you or anyone, because of the horrible way love and marriage are vulgarized in this family. Oh, Suke, Suke!"

Susan's arms were round her. " Yes, darling, I know," she said. "I beg your pardon. I've lived in the atmosphere so long that I'm beginning to vulgarize these things too. But I thought of them, just as you do, when I was fifteen years younger; and when they tried to cure me by vulgarizing them, and I wanted to escape from the atmosphere and make

PAQUET FURS

Through This Factory From Trapper To YOU



From The Wild and Lonely Places Of The World which advancing civilization has as yet left untouched, the fearless, rugged trappers obtain the peerless pelts which eventually find their way to the shoulders of Canada's beautiful women and alert, successful men.

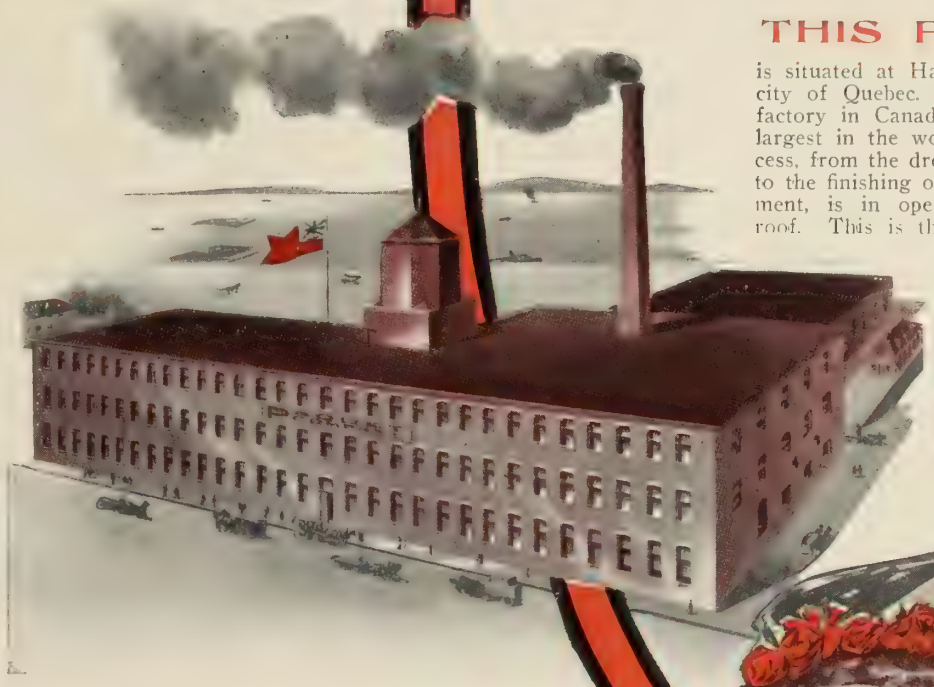
In the wilds of Canada, the United States, Alaska, Russia, and Australia, these pelts are gathered and forwarded to Quebec in the raw state, saving the high duty on the dressed skins imported from foreign countries.

The dressing, dyeing and finishing are done in the immense Paquet Fur Factory, in Quebec—the centre of the great Canadian fur industry—by highly-trained specialists, employing the exclusive, secret PAQUET processes in every stage of manufacture.

PAQUET FURS have come to be recognized as the highest standard of quality from Coast to Coast.



THIS FACTORY

is situated at Hare Point, close to the city of Quebec. It is the largest fur factory in Canada and one of the largest in the world. Here every process, from the dressing of the raw skins to the finishing of the fur piece or garment, is in operation under the one roof. This is the only fur factory in America where this is done.

That's why PAQUET FURS are the best and least expensive furs you can buy.

EIGHT MILLION DOLLARS' WORTH SOLD

PAQUET dyeing cannot be surpassed anywhere in the world. PAQUET finishing is the climax of perfection. PAQUET FURS are uniformly satisfactory.

Because, in the great Paquet Fur Factory these five rules are strictly enforced and invariably lived up to:

1st—The skin must be taken from the animal at the proper season, when the fur is thickest.
2nd—The animal must be trapped to avoid yielding a skin full of shot holes.
3rd—The raw skins must be properly cured, evenly stretched, and carefully cut.
4th—They must be dyed properly to retain their color and gloss.
5th—The seams must be wide enough to hold without tearing.

And that's why more than eight million dollars' worth of PAQUET FURS have been sold to the people of Canada since the establishment of this factory.

You take no chances in buying PAQUET FURS. You may choose from our fur catalogue and we will send the furs prepaid to any express office in Canada for free examination. If you are not satisfied that the value cannot be matched, return them at our expense, and you will not be out one cent on the transaction. If you are pleased—and we know you will be—pay the express agent our catalogue price and the furs are yours. Could anything be fairer?

THIS ISABELLA FOX SET $99

No. 5990—Lady's "Fedora" stole, as illustrated here, in fine, silky Isabella fox, trimmed with heads, tails and paws, lining of pure silk satin. Special.....$60.00

No. 1940—Lady's "Sybil" muff to match, fine Isabella fox, as illustrated. Special $39.00

THIS FUR CATALOGUE

containing 80 pages of fine half-tone illustrations and thousands of descriptions and prices of PAQUET FURS, will be sent you on request. Write to-day for a copy—don't put it off and forget. A postcard request will bring it. Write now.

THE PAQUET COMPANY LIMITED.

QUEBEC – CANADA

Mother knows

Old Dutch Cleanser

takes half the hard work out of her housework

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

November

1911

THANKSGIVING NUMBER

PRICE

10 cents

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

Made in Canada

The public—especially the woman at home—is being educated to demand purity in food products. To avoid the use of adulterated and injurious food products care should be taken to examine the package and see that the ingredients are plainly stated on the label. Baking Powder that contains alum should not be used, as it slowly, but surely, hardens the tissues of the mucus membranes. Magic Baking Powder has a food value, and is guaranteed to be pure and wholesome. It costs no more than the ordinary adulterated kinds.

MAGIC BAKING POWDER

Contains no Alum, and conforms to the high standard of Gillett's Goods

E. W. GILLETT COMPANY LIMITED

Winnipeg TORONTO, ONT. Montreal

EDITORIAL CHAT

THE SUBJECT of Mormon settlement is by no means insignificant in this country. Thousands of these people are already settled in the Canadian West and their missionaries are slowly but surely working eastward. In the course of a recent lecture in Toronto, Mr. H. T. Freece declared: "Christianity and Mormonism cannot exist in the same place, because they are opposed to each other. Two thousand young men are scouring this world to-day for converts to Mormonism. They have to go or they would be kicked out of their church. Some of them are here in Toronto, carrying around their literature. They don't admit they are Mormons until they are taxed with it, and then they deny that polygamy is now practised. I say that is an untruth, and that it is still practised by the leaders of the church themselves."

Mr. Freece said he was prepared to prove that thousands of Mormon converts, principally young unmarried women, were being brought into Canada and into the United States by way of Canada, and that they were being conveyed by a steamship line at special cut rates. He referred to the growth of Mormonism in Alberta, and said the propagandists would soon have their representatives at Ottawa, as they had in Congress, and would use their power politically to prevent legislation against their religion.

THE ARTICLE in this month's issue, "Children of the Mormons, by One Who Has Taught Them," is contributed, not as an attack upon those people, but as a statement by a teacher, of the general aspect and influence of a Mormon community in Canada. The system, as promulgated from Salt Lake City, appears to be entirely antagonistic to Canadian ideals of home life and civic progress. "For Home and Country" is the motto of our Women's Institutes, and the members of that organization will hardly fail to recognize the nature of the Mormon peril.

THE AMUSING or unusual incidents associated with the wedding ceremony as solemnized in the home of the pastor are dealt with in the article, "Produce the Ring," a contribution from a Western reader. Our fiction this month, "The Touchstone," and "Miss Marion's

November CONTENTS 1911

FICTION

MISS MARION'S THANKSGIVING PIES - 7
THE TOUCHSTONE - - - - - - 9
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - 11
THE COST OF A CRIME - - 13

SPECIAL FEATURES

CHILDREN OF THE MORMONS - - 6
"PRODUCE THE RING" - - - 8
CHRISTMAS STENCILING - - - 20
THE MONTH BEFORE CHRISTMAS - - 24

FASHION DEPARTMENT

FEATHER FABRICATION - - 25
EMBROIDERED APRONS - - - - 27
PRETTY FROCKS FOR WINTER WEAR - 28
MOURNING ACCESSORIES - - - - 28
FASHIONABLE WINTER COSTUMES 29
GOWNS FOR AFTERNOON WEAR - - 29
SMART AND PRACTICAL GOWNS - 32
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - 34

MATTERS OF MENU

A NOVEMBER LUNCHEON - - 17
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - 49

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

FLOWERS FOR CHRISTMAS - - 22
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - 48

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 15
THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - 16
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - 26
THE DRESSING TABLE - 35
FROM THE PUBLISHERS - 36
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES 38
MY LADY'S GARDEN - - 44
BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY 50

MISCELLANEOUS

EDITORIAL CHAT - - - - - - - 2
EDITORIALS - 5
OUR MUSIC PAGE - - - - - - 18
MATTERS MUSICAL - - - - - 19

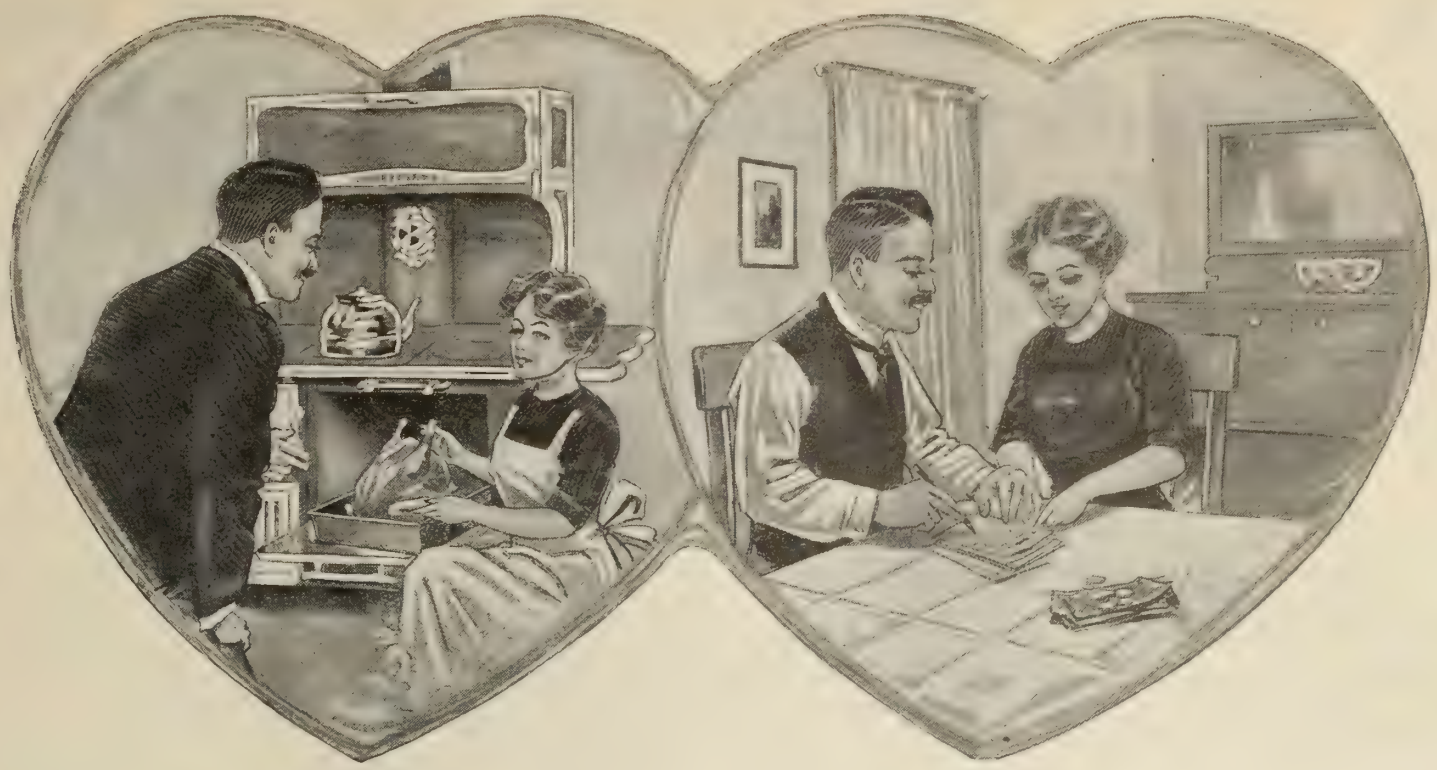
EDITORIAL CHAT

Thanksgiving Pies," are quite worth while, as bright and wholesome stories. The former is an English tale of hospital life, with a revelation of that sympathy which makes the whole world kin. The latter is a Canadian contribution, introducing a scene which you will all recognize as typical and seasonable.

THE APPROACH OF CHRISTMAS is heralded already in our shops, and a few hints as to Christmas gifts will not be out of place to those industrious and far-sighted beings who are thinking of what will be suitable for their circle of friends.

FOR OUR CHRISTMAS NUMBER, the stories and articles will have the genuine Santa Claus flavor, with a brightness which belongs to the twenty-fifth of December and the season of good-will. Our small friends will be especially remembered, and we are sure that their interest in puzzle and story will be as keen as ever. Their attention is drawn to the new competition announced in this number. We have received many interesting letters during our holiday competition, and hope to have all of our young friends writing about the Winter Adventure. Christmas belongs especially to the children, and the spirit of that happy season ought to be abroad in the magazine world. So, you may look for a very "Christmassy" number next month.

Our correspondents frequently give us suggestions of ready and practical value. We published last month an article sent by one of them on "Public School Teachers versus Mothers," which has attracted general attention. Our teachers have been made the subject of much criticism during the last year and many authorities have taken the ground that teachers are ethical guardians, as well as instructors of the children in our public schools. The writer of the JOURNAL contribution considers that there is a lack of parental sympathy with the teachers. The subject is one of interest in nearly every home of the land, and we should be glad to hear from others in connection with this phase of our educational problems.



Two Ways to a Man's Heart

One Way

One way is through his stomach, a way that most women try three times every day in the year. And a good way, too, and an easy one if you have a Gurney-Oxford.

You don't watch anxiously every time John puts the carver into a fowl or joint. You know it is not only done brown, but the Gurney-Oxford heat is so controlled and steady that the flesh is tender and juicy, and the man at the platter beams with good humor.

The Other Way

The other way to his heart is through his pocketbook. Again a sure and easy road if you have a Gurney-Oxford.

The wonderful saving in fuel effected by the Oxford Economizer is guarantee of good nature, and when you go over the grocery accounts together it warms the cockles of his heart to see how much you have saved.

Besides fuel, nothing is burnt or wasted. A pot will simmer all day over the low fire, with a gain in food value, as well as health and pocket.

GURNEY-OXFORD STOVES AND RANGES

promote peace and quiet, not only because of well-cooked foods and reduced bills, but because of the added nerve strength and leisure afforded by its ease of operation and care. The Oxford Economizer holds the merest edge of draft, and with the check of this marvelous damper you can leave the fire for hours unreplenished.

The divided Flue-Strip radiates heat along the front as well as back of oven.

The Reversible Grate, with interlocking teeth that bite the clinkers fine —all these points secure cleanliness and simplify labor. These are all patent and patented advantages—ask your dealer. Or if he cannot supply you, write our nearest branch.

The Gurney Foundry Co.
LIMITED
Toronto, Canada
Montreal, Hamilton, Winnipeg, Calgary, Vancouver

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have an unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or the money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

Of course, Mr. Grocer, you are telling your customers about Heinz Mince Meat and Plum Pudding.

You are telling the housewife that the Heinz way is her own way of making mince meat.

We not only make it as good and clean as she makes it—but we have facilities—materials—that she cannot possess.

More than that, we have achieved a wonderful distinct flavor in Heinz Mince Meat.

Heinz Mince Meat is the very soul of good mince pies.

Every housewife knows how elusive a good mince meat flavor is. She may strike it one time and miss it the next. The delicious taste of Heinz Mince Meat is always the same.

And then, no home kitchen could be cleaner than the Heinz kitchens where it is made. The floors are clean. The walls are spotless. The workers are neatly uniformed.

Our apples are selected, pared, quartered and cored in the old-fashioned, housewifely way. Every bruised spot and blemish is rejected.

We send to Spain for raisins; the plump, full-flavored, four-crown Valencias. We wash and seed them carefully.

We use only the biggest and most luscious Grecian currants. They are inspected and given two washings.

We get our beef—choice cuts fresh every day—boil it ourselves. The white, rich, whole knob kidney suet is as good as it looks.

The candied fruits and peels are Leghorn importations. Our spices come from the Orient, whole. We grind them as we need them.

And everything in Heinz Mince Meat is so pure and so sound that Benzoate of Soda is not necessary to make it keep.

Explain that you can supply it in glass jars, in stone crocks or in Heinz Improved Tins—also by the pound from bulk packages.

You can also tell your customers that Heinz Plum Pudding is just as good as Heinz Mince Meat.

It, too, is made with finest raisins and currants and generously filled with candied fruit. Like Heinz Mince Meat, it also forms a splendid, satisfying finish to a perfect meal.

And when you are selling Heinz products, don't forget to tell your customers that you willingly pay a little more in order to give them more quality for their money. It's only just to you that those who buy of you should know this.

And don't forget, Mr. Grocer, other seasonable Heinz delicacies—Tomato Soup, Cranberry Sauce, Preserves, Jellies, Sweet Pickles, etc., etc. Also Heinz Pure Vinegars.

H. J. Heinz Company

Member Association for Promotion of Purity in Foods

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this sisue.

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.
Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00 (8s.) post paid.
We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

Women at the Ecumenical

ONE of the greatest conferences ever assembled in Toronto was the "Ecumenical" of the Methodist Church, which foregathered in Ontario's capital during the first fortnight of October. It was remarkable for its scope and enthusiasm, and one of its interesting features was the delegation of women. For the first time in its history, women were elected as representatives. A public meeting for women was addressed by speakers who told of the work done by women's organizations of the Methodist Church throughout the world. In honor of the official and visiting women delegates, the feminine societies of the Methodist Church in Toronto united to give a luncheon, at which distinguished delegates gave addresses. The luncheon was served in the new Deaconess Home, and was a revelation, both in the number of guests and the quality of the speakers of what the women of modern Methodism are accomplishing.

These occasions, on which the social and ethical purposes are happily united, cannot fail to be productive of the best results, as suggestions for the best methods of work and reform are given and taken under the happiest auspices. If one may judge from the success of this Conference, there is nothing to be feared and much to be gained from the admission of women as delegates to such assemblies. They are a material help in giving information and inspiration as to the most advanced work in feminine fields, and the best means of extending such endeavor.

* * *

The Premier's Wife

IT was a distinguished writer who declared that Canada has more politics to the square inch than any other civilized country. In spite of this fact, the Canadian woman is not nearly so well informed on political questions as her English sister, nor can she be said to take an active part in the sphere of politics. Wherefore, we can hardly be said to possess the political hostess, as the English public interprets that type. The wife of the Canadian public man, however, has a highly important part to play, and lends a social grace to scenes in which political strife is forgotten for the lighter gayeties of the Capital. An ungracious or stupid wife might easily mar the career of a prominent politician, and it says much for the tact and good sense of the Canadian woman that social life in Ottawa's political circles is seldom ruffled by blunder or discourtesy. The man who is at the head of national affairs has a great burden of care and responsibility, and his wife stands between him and the many petty trials which would prove too much for masculine patience and strength.

The sympathy and gentleness of the woman who understands are invaluable to the man who has to bear heavy public burdens, and who is necessarily exposed to constant criticism. Lady Macdonald's loyal help to her husband was appreciated by all. Lady Laurier's gracious tact has made the hospitality of the Premier's household delightful. A new hostess now assumes those onerous social responsibilities which are the lot of the wife of the First Minister. Mrs. R. L. Borden is not a stranger in Ottawa. She has been for some years a charming hostess in political circles, and everyone who knows her is convinced that she will prove in every quality a valuable helpmeet to the man who now stands at the head of the Government.

MRS. R. L. BORDEN
Photograph by Pittaway

* * *

More About Manners

DURING the last few months, there has been a great deal said about the "bad manners" of Canadians by the editors of the land. Perhaps it was the elections which set us reflecting on our occasional lack of politeness. On his departure from the Dominion, His Excellency, Earl Grey, congratulated the people of Canada on having so much of Gallic courtesy through the French strain in the nation. It is to be feared that the Anglo-Saxons of Ontario are not affected greatly by this French touch of gentler ways, and are too much given to bluntness and candid-speaking. A writer of plain tales has referred in admiration to "the pretty public and private lies that make life a little less nasty than it is." It is not necessary to tell lies in order to be decently agreeable, although some good people imagine that there is an essential relationship between courtesy and insincerity, and accordingly speak and act as if a hurtful bluntness were a virtue.

Effusiveness is offensive to persons of good taste, and we shrink instinctively from those who wish to become friends in a hurry. But courtesy is as far removed from undue familiarity as it is from boorishness and is one of the essentials to happy living or a refined social circle. It has little to do with rank or position, but is the natural outcome of a simple and unselfish attitude.

"For manners are not idle, but the fruit
Of loyal nature and of noble mind."

* * *

A Valuable Diary

A BOOK which it would be well for our Women's Institutes and other clubs to consider at their meetings is "The Diary of Mrs. John Graves Simcoe," which has been compiled by Mr. John Ross Robertson of Toronto. The husband of this notable lady was the first Governor of Upper Canada, and every Ontario woman should be interested in the story of the beginnings of the province. The diary of the years 1792-1796 gives one a glimpse of the early life of those days which is decidedly instructive. Mrs. Simcoe, herself, appears to have been a notable example of what we are too likely to call a "lady of the old school." She seems to have been a housewife of most practical order, rising at six o'clock every morning and looking after the affairs of the primitive vice-regal home.

The women's clubs of the United States have shown far more enterprise than those of Canada, in their study of local history and traditions. Such a book as this, which gives so intimate an account of the Ontario of long ago, should be welcomed and read by all who take a pride in "Home and Country."

Children of the Mormons

BY ONE WHO HAS TAUGHT THEM

THAT the child is father to the man is a favorite axiom of the educationist; but when the Mormon Church is stepmother to the child, the educationist may expect the man to resemble his stepmother rather than his childhood.

Mormon children are much like other children of poor and illiterate parents, living in semi-rural districts. They are easily controlled, being affectionate, amenable to kindness, and easily intimidated; they possess average intelligence, are very happy amongst themselves, and, usually, we found they increased in an inverse ratio to their fathers' incomes.

As the most of the fathers met with in six months had no income to speak of, it required comparatively few families to fill a school with three hundred pupils.

Whether this was due to the (in)dispensations of Providence concerning rain, or to the teachings of Joseph Smith concerning the Incarnation of Spirits, it is as well to leave to speculation.

Meanwhile, let us leave our prejudices in Lethbridge this New Year's Day and bump across the old sea-floor of a prairie through the most sparkling and alluring of atmospheres, into the Mormon district of Southern Alberta. The western horizon is banked with the snow-peaked Rockies, and ever and anon the cubical colossus known as Big Chief recalls scraps of bibliophile as to "the last local battle-stand of the Red Man."

When a half-dozen lady teachers of varying ages and temperaments, and from as many towns or cities of good old Ontario, meet and dwell together for six months in a foreign community of Western Canada, it is a foregone conclusion that at the end of that time their average estimation of the class and character of its people will be as suggestive as the whirling of a weather cock.

We lived under one roof, sharing the same sitting-room, receiving the same guests, and exchanging views on the same situations.

The town contained about four families of "Gentiles," mostly of American, and one man of French, descent, so that practically everything except the irrigation system, was controlled by Mormons.

The town was laid out in about one-eighth-mile-square blocks, and each block was sub-divided into four town lots, which, naturally spread the dwellings over a great area, not one foot of which boasted municipal sidewalks, lighting system, nor waterworks.

Thus the distance from place to place, the absence of walks, and the extremely sticky nature of the soil made regular attendance at school impossible during wet weather; but even in a year of prolonged drought the attendance was always deplorably irregular, a class of sixty-five averaging about forty, and dropping to twenty or twenty-five after the opening of labor in beet fields.

Now, why should a Mormon town be spread out in this way?

On the surface, it is an obvious benefit for a family to enjoy the comforts of a garden, a cow, a few chickens, and a sugar-beet patch; and, also, at the same time, the social and intellectual amenities of town life. Would that such benefits accrued to more townspeople!

Therefore the Mormon Church is very benign and provident of its people's well-being, and they smile happily when a stranger remarks it.

But, looking deeper, we learned that most of the townspeople worked farms in the outlying districts, to which they went as the season required, returning home nightly, or, at most, weekly.

We soon learned, also, that "one" for the people, means from "two" to "forty-eleven" for the hierarchy.

HOWEVER, should an exceptionally able man show a tendency to read at large, an ability to penetrate the teachings of the Church, and a desire to strike off into the world outside, he quickly is received within the higher Church circles, is given a substantial post, and can afford to bury his doubts beneath the foundations of a handsome home.

The amusements with which everybody is provided, take place in the church. Dances occur fortnightly, concerts, plays (presented by home talent), anniversary suppers, children's dances, patriotic concerts, and so forth, all occur at intervals in the large building which represents the heart of the community.

The Mormon is essentially a "social animal," open doors and equal rights being the Church's appeal to the proselyte.

We see the wholesomeness of such teaching among the children, (where, after all, it is unnecessary, being a normal instinct) in a form of beauty; the children seem the only phase of Mormon life possessing qualities kin to our own standards or ideals. They possess the free, open-eyed trustfulness of any other normal, contented animal cub, which is ever a thing of beauty. So they trip together to each other's "parties" (everybody has one), or to "Prim-ary" on Saturday afternoons (where they learn the most and the prettiest songs imaginable); or to their own dances (where the habit of sweethearting is early inculcated).

And between the regular habit of sweethearting and the irregular habit of schooling, Madame the Church, rears her loafing, flat-faced, polygamous youth, and his partner, the thriftless, empty-eyed, emotional maiden, the utter familiarity of whose manners and conversation could be neither looked upon nor listened to with impunity.

Where, when, and how the Church effects her most telling strokes, is not apparent to the passing observer; but to the dwellers in Gath it is known. The scene is the inmost sanctity of the home, the time is ever and always, the manner is through the district visitors, the representatives of Mother Church, who possess unlimited rights to question, influence, and dictate.

One needs to witness but once the mental anguish of a proselytized woman, weeping bitterly, and wringing her hands, "I can't do it! My God, I'm not good enough!" and to realize that this is Wife No. 1, struggling for the spiritual power to present her husband with Wife No. 2, that she may vindicate her own saintship and devotion to the will of Heaven. I say such revolting and unnatural torture need be witnessed but once to throw a flood of light on the sinister background, where the incubus of Mormorism, spinning its ever-strengthening and far-reaching web, crouches darkly, its tentacles alert, and its insatiate maw athirst for all that is sweetest and holiest in the life-blood of its victims.

But to return to the dancing. A Mormon dance is opened and closed with prayer, pronounced in tones of cheerfulest comradeship, somewhat as follows: "O Lord, we present ourselves before Thee this evening in the capacity of a dance. We trust that nothing may occur which will be displeasing in Thy sight, and that all may be to Thy glory forever. Amen." (The capitals may not be authentic.)

On several occasions the music was stopped, and a couple sent off the floor for unseemly conduct. We witnessed, moreover, the attendance at the dances of a young woman whose reputation and condition rendered her presence an outrage; but she seemed popular, and caused the Bishop no apparent anxiety.

When approached on the subject by one of the Gentiles, the reply was, "We care for our girls; you send them adrift."

Such lofty sentiment in such sordid conditions seemed ludicrous, until one remembers these people call themselves "The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints," and in the stern white light of the Character that Name suggests, such a scene grows blasphemous.

WE hear of the numberless army of missionaries always at work in every country, to gain converts for the Mormon Church, and, naturally, we feel curious as to the stamp of man these would-be gospel spreaders are.

A great many of the townsmen had been away on mission excursions, the Church holding every male liable for two years of work in the mission fields, and that at the expense of himself or his relatives.

Among those we met oftenest, the character we knew best is somewhat suggestive.

A certain household sent several children of two different surnames to school. One day we enjoyed a lengthy drive with the man of the family, and found him sociable and amusing.

He had spent some time in the mission field, had enjoyed it greatly, and hoped to go again. As a young man, he had begun a course in law, but, like many foolish youths, had wearied of the exacting study and had drifted here and there in business ever since.

A Mormon (in Canada) who has had any intellectual associations, is noteworthy, and later, when he remarked boldly that he had never done anything he was ashamed of, our sense of humor awoke, and we determined to find out why.

Here is his history as it was "town-talk."

In Utah he married a wife. His father, a man of some means, disliked her, and refused to give him the deed of a piece of property unless he divorced her. This was slightly provoking, but he persuaded her to consent to a divorce until such time as "the old man" should hand over the deed and his blessing; then they would be joyfully rewed, and spend the balance of their days in conjugal comfort. Needless to say, the divorce and the deed were a matter of course.

When, however, the accommodating wife began to lift up her eyes for the joy, she discovered that her conscientious consort had repented him of such a Jacob's trick, and had taken to his bosom the wife of his father's choice (a divorcee, too). Moreover, he had taken also, and by stealth, her own two children, whom she loved devotedly, and with the lot was hastening away to greener fields and pastures new in the sunny plains of Alberta.

As soon as the first wife's finances permitted, she visited the new home in quest of her children. She obtained the little girl, after a great deal of commotion, and graciously withdrew, leaving her quondam spouse with nothing he was ashamed of.

Respecting the converts of these missionaries, they are generally Europeans of the immigrant type, with whom the social glad-hand quickly reaches the heart. There are Scandinavians, Danish especially, some low-class English, and a very few Scotch.

That the "glad-hand" is strictly non-financial is evident from the fact that during our stay, when the sower sowed, but the reaper reaped not even his seed-grain, the people petitioned the Church to loan them their own tithing wheat to seed the fields. They were practically bankrupt and destitute.

The Church called a meeting of her choicest saints (the property-holders) and finally proclaimed their invitation that whomsoever would might come and buy, yea, buy seed-wheat without limit—at eight per cent.

Even the Mormons rebelled abainst this injustice, and clamored for an account of their tithings, but so far without avail.

The vine of missionary enterprise towards ourselves put forth only a few tendrils, when one short-sighted zealot forgot the foreignness of the field, and, after a cosy evening in our sitting room, exposed his tender plant to a killing frost by saying:

"But, really, now, wouldn't you girls be far better living in polygamy than the way you do here?"

LONG but narrow were our conversations with the French Gentile. He had lived about twenty years amongst them, and they were his hobby. He was an irreligious man himself, which, we thought, might have discolored his views.

"Tell us what they are like—really," we would ask.

"Dees Mormon? Bah!"

"They are very kind to us. They give us drives, lend us their horses, and do far more for our pleasure than other townspeople."

He palmed out a shrug, eloquent to the eyebrows.

"Now, see here, these people are the bankrupts and ne'er-do-wells of Utah. They've had no crops for three years. They live from six to sixteen in a one-roomed house. I admit they are often dirty, lazy, and extravagant, but I've seen people on the prairies like that, often."

His beady eyes sparkled.

"It is you ladie', you t'ink you know dese peop'; I tole you you don't know nutting."

"We've lived here some time."

"No lady what is lady like you dey can't never know. Me, I can't tole you much 'bout some ting'. But I tole you dis. De Mormon she was train' up to act. Nobody ever know what de Mormon was t'ink' about. He swear on de Bible, on hees soul, on le Bon Dieu, all same. He lie like Diable."

"I'm sure they aren't all like that."

"Maybe—now—in Canadaw. Dey scared de police. Bimebye dey get reech. Dey get strong. Dey buy out all de Gentile'. Dey snap de finger—so—to Canadaw. Dey sing hurraw de Mormon Church, same like Utah."

"But if these people were trained to be decent, they would be all right, wouldn't they?"

"Course dey be—maybe—in hunderd year'. But de Mormon Church, she can't never make nudder t'ing—only Mormon."

* * *

And now, when Time has mellowed all the scene, fond Memory roves again those thousand rolling leagues of cattled hills; anon the vernal sunshine sparkles golden through the limpid-crystal air; anon the thousand glacier peaks hold high above the plains, their gem-bedizened coronets of purest, whitest snow. And in the towns and on the plains the laborers toil once more. The men have hoes, the wives have hoes, the maidens, too, have hoes; and there the little children come, and they are given hoes.

But they rake! they rake! they rake!

Miss Marion's Thanksgiving Pies

The Story of a Happy Meeting by Way of a Pumpkin Pie

By JEAN MURRAY

MISS MARION BARCLAY looked worried and somewhat out of sorts as she sat at breakfast in her pretty dining-room just one week before Thanksgiving.

She had been thinking of the Thanksgiving days long ago when she was a young girl—of the extensive preparations her Mother always made—and of how much she enjoyed the festivities of those happy days. She had just made up her mind not to celebrate Thanksgiving this year. What was the use, she thought, when she had not a relative in all the world whom she could invite to dinner? Of course, there were friends, but at Thanksgiving when other people were having family reunions, it seemed so lonely to have none of one's own kindred with whom to spend the holiday.

As she finished her coffee her faithful housekeeper, Martha Craig, came in to remove the breakfast things.

"This is a fine morning, Miss Marion," she remarked, "hope the weather keeps like this until Thanksgiving. I s'pose next time I go down street I'd better order our turkey. The grocer's boy wanted me to give him the order for the Thanksgiving groceries, but I told him you always 'tended to that yourself. Hadn't you better see about it right away, Miss Marion? We don't want to git behind with the work, and there's just one week left."

"I hope you won't be very disappointed, Martha," replied Miss Marion, "but I have decided not to keep Thanksgiving this year. I don't feel that I have anything particular to be thankful for. I'm fifty dollars short in my rent, and that is quite a loss. I think people make too much fuss about Thanksgiving, anyway, and I'm not going to celebrate this year."

Martha surveyed her mistress in amazement. "Not going to keep Thanksgiving!" she exclaimed. "Surely, Miss Marion, you don't mean what you're saying. Have you forgotten how your mother used to keep it? Have you forgotten how she used to take you to church when you were little, and what fine dinners you always had? Seems to me there's few that have more cause to keep it than you have. You'd ort to be thankful to think what a good mother you had; and you ort to be thankful for this comfortable home and good food every day, and all the clothes you need. Well, I 'spose you'll make the pumpkin pies for the church supper Thanksgiving night, anyway? I met the minister's wife at the store the other day, and she said she hadn't had time yet to call to see you about it, but she hoped it would be convenient for you to contribute pumpkin pies as usual. I told her she needn't have no fear about that, for your pies would be there all right."

"I'm afraid, Martha," replied Miss Marion, "that you took too much on yourself that time. I have no intention of making those pies. I'm not under any obligation to do it. I pay my subscription to the minister's salary regularly, and my pew rent, and five dollars a year to missions. I think that's enough, especially when I'm fifty dollars short in my income."

"It's too bad," said Martha, "for you to lose that fifty dollars, but if you feel the hard times, you may be sure there's lots o' people that feels 'em a good deal worse. The money they make at the church supper goes to help the poor. I ain't studied the Bible as much as I should, but there's something in it about considering the poor, and it seems to me this is the time o' year they'd ort to be considered. I know you'll think I'm a cross, meddlesome old woman, and it really ain't any of my business, but I do hate to see you going so contrary to the way you was brung up. I think it's downright sinful, and unchristian not to keep Thanksgiving, and if I could make pumpkin pies like yours I'd be ashamed not to make 'em for the church."

With this parting thrust Martha took up the breakfast tray and retired to the kitchen.

There she found the big grey cat impatiently waiting for her breakfast.

"Well, Tabby, I never did think you had much sense in your old head, but I believe you know enough to mind your own business, and I'm afraid I don't, so I guess you're wiser than I be." Then she continued, half aloud, "I meant it for the best, but I'm afraid I've just offended Miss Marion, after all. Poor girl, I can see she is lonesome. I'm not much company for her—wish I'd had more schoolin' when I was a girl; she might a' married three or four times since we came here to live. I 'most wish she would marry."

Miss Marion's childhood had been spent on a farm. Her father had been prosperous and well-to-do, and she, his only child, had been well brought up and well educated. At the age of eighteen she became engaged to young Robert Grantley, owner of the farm adjoining her father's. Her parents approved of the match, but being anxious to keep their daughter with them a few years longer, they advised her not to marry until she was at least twenty-two. In less than a year after this she lost both father and mother. The blow was a crushing one—it seemed as if all the brightness went out of her hitherto happy life.

Robert Grantley urged an immediate marriage, but Marion would not listen to him. She said she should act on the advice of her father and mother, and not marry for at least three years. Robert thought this most unreasonable, and doubted her love for him. The truth was, she really did love him, but his insistent way seemed to her like domineering. It irritated her, and finally led to a quarrel. Marion declared she would rather live single anyway and be her own mistress. Robert took her at her word—sold his farm and went to the far West. Marion rented her farm and moved into the little village of D——, taking with her Martha Craig, who for some years had been her mother's capable housekeeper.

"Not going to keep Thanksgiving!" she exclaimed.

Here the two women had lived for fifteen years, the elder woman being the almost devoted slave of the younger. If Miss Marion ever regretted the hasty step she had taken, no one was any the wiser. She was always well and becomingly dressed, and one would scarcely guess that she was nearing her thirty-fifth birthday, so young and even girlish did she appear.

But to return to the day on which our story opens. Miss Marion spent the morning tidying and rearranging her storeroom. Coming into the dining-room a little before noon, she found her morning paper, and sat down to look over it. Presently she heard voices in the kitchen, the door being ajar. A child was saying, "Mother didn't know where else to send for milk; there ain't anybody round here 'cept Miss Marion that keeps a cow. The baby's sick and the milkman says we'll get no more milk from him until we pay for the last."

"Of course Miss Marion will let you have it," said Martha, "I'll get it right away." When Martha returned from the cellar the child continued: "It must be nice to be rich like Miss Marion, and have three meals every day and plenty o' milk. It's awful expensive bringing up babies when you have to buy milk for 'em. Say, are youse keepin' Thanksgiving to-day?"

"Why, no," said Martha, "Thanksgiving won't be here for a week yet."

"I know, but it smells so good here I thought you must be keeping it ahead of time."

"Well, we're not," returned Martha, "I'm only broiling a bit of steak for Miss Marion's dinner. You'd better run along home, child."

"Yes, I must go; mother says we'll have a rice pudding Thanksgiving Day if she can afford it, but I don't s'pose there'll be milk enough. The baby takes all the milk we can get. When he gets a little bigger he can eat anything at all, or go without sometimes, the same as the rest of us do."

Mistress and maid always had the noonday meal together. After the conversation of the morning Miss Marion expected at least one of her favorite dishes for dinner, and in this she was not disappointed. Whenever Martha said anything that might give offence, she always tried to atone for it by preparing something particularly appetizing for the very next meal. To-day she had cream of tomato soup, baked potatoes, broiled steak, cabbage salad, and for dessert, apple pie with Devonshire cream. Nothing more was said about Thanksgiving, but Miss Marion found out from Martha that the child who came for the milk belonged to a family by the name of Slater—that they had recently moved into the village, and that they were extremely poor.

That night, when Miss Marion was preparing for bed, she was also doing some serious thinking. "What was it?" she asked herself, "that Martha said about considering the poor? There is something in the Bible about it," she said, half aloud. "Yes. I remember now—'Blessed is he that considereth the poor.' I'm afraid I've grown hard and selfish, but oh, I've been so lonely. It's true that I've tried to help the church along a little, but it's only been from a sense of duty—I've had no interest in it. I've been considering myself first and always. But it's not too late to change my mind about making those pies, and I could give that Slater family a good dinner. It's dreadful to think of little children not having enough to eat." The next morning Miss Marion and Martha held a short consultation, the result of which was that the latter had the pleasure of taking to the grocer that very day an order that indicated that whatever other people meant to do, Miss Barclay certainly meant to keep Thanksgiving in the good old-fashioned way.

The day before Thanksgiving found everything in readiness that could be prepared beforehand, except the twelve pumpkin pies that were to be made for the church supper, and the afternoon of that day was given up to the making of them. Miss Marion was a sort of specialist in the art of making pumpkin pie. She always followed closely an old recipe of her mother's, and on this occasion the pies were even more tempting to look at than usual. When cold, each pie received its finishing touch—a generous covering of whipped cream.

On the morning of Thanksgiving Day the two eldest Slater children came, according to instructions, for their turkey. Martha had it all ready for the oven. There was also a basket of potatoes and other vegetables, a basket of rosy-cheeked apples, and another large basket containing pound cake, nut cookies, mince pie, doughnuts, cranberry sauce, and two tumblers of apple jelly, also a large bottle of milk for the baby.

That evening when Miss Marion dressed for the church supper she put on a pretty foulard silk—Martha had always admired her in it. It was six o'clock, and she was just going to pin on her hat when she heard the door bell ring sharply, and Martha was asking some one to step into the parlor. She ran lightly down the stairs, and as she entered the room a tall, handsome man came forward with outstretched hand to meet her. "Marion, Marion!" he exclaimed, and she recognized at once her old friend, Robert Grantley.

"Why, Robert, when did you come back? How did you find me? I—I'm so surprised—I thought—"

"Forgive me," said Mr. Grantley, "I have appear-

Continued on page 10

"PRODUCE THE RING"

An Interesting Sketch of Some Eccentric Episodes During the Marriage Ceremony

By MURDOCH MacKINNON

THE marriage ceremony is one of the most interesting that a minister is called upon to perform. The institution itself is at the very basis of the home, which, in turn, is the foundation of organized and civilized human society. The character of the average home is the determining factor in our freedom, the mark of our moral progress and the test of our civilization. Anything that cheapens the marriage state or weakens the bonds by which two lives are bound together is a menace to the whole social fabric.

To say this in seriousness is not to close our eyes to some of the amusing incidents in connection with the ceremony, and those who have themselves gone through the ordeal are not averse to hearing the experiences of others.

Here, for example, is a young couple to whom every second seems like an hour in what taken altogether is a short service. At the close of the first prayer they half-thought the whole service was over. They found, however, that the most of it was still before them. They answered their "I will's," promptly joined hands, produced the ring, and gave their responses quite patiently, after which they surely thought the ceremony was at an end. A brief prayer followed, and then the proclamation of marriage was to be made. But the "Amen" at the close of the prayer was taken by the bride in this case as a signal to begin celebrating. She stood on tip-toes, took her husband-to-be by the neck and kissed him soundly there and then. There was nothing for me to do but to mark time. After the rather sudden manifestation of human nature I proceeded with the service as if nothing at all had happened. When the Benediction was pronounced they both seemed rather subdued. She was a stenographer.

It takes a marriage ceremony to show how many people there are outside the walls of ancient Nineveh who know not the right hand from the left. I have seen a man reach out his left hand to the bride standing beside him in the face of a definite request to join right hands. Recently the bride was kindly asked to remove the glove and then to join right hands. With great effort, tugging, pulling and unbuttoning, she removed the glove from her left, and then, feeling, I imagine, that things were curiously turned round, she reached out a gloved hand to her about-to-be husband.

Last winter I married a couple who did not seem to take the service seriously. They gave their responses, but they gave them too readily, they joined hands, but as if they didn't mean it; they produced the ring, but as if it were a part of a game. I hardly knew what to make of them until the marriage register was filled. "What is your occupation?" I asked. They were members of a theatrical troupe, filling a week's engagement in the city.

Members of every persuasion have come to me, and the ne temere decree has brought a larger number than usual of those who are both Roman Catholic. I asked a man recently, who had just been married, what his denomination was. "No denomination at present," he drawled. He was brought up in one of the Western States.

Much has been said of the marriage fee. For the most part young men are generous, and the surprises on the agreeable side are as numerous as those on the other side. A few years ago a man came to me who wanted to be married in the church. I admired his religious propensities. It was winter, and compliance with his request meant five or ten dollars' worth of coal to heat the place. He would like to have the organist and choir there and wished me to arrange with them, for they were unknown to him. He appeared on the stroke of the clock, frock coat, striped trousers and all, and he had a number of friends with him. We sang "The Voice That Breathed O'er Eden" with all our hearts; with sacred song vibrating in our ears we withdrew to the vestry to fill out the legal document, and when I handed a beautifully gotten up marriage certificate to his beautifully gotten up wife he whispered reverently (as was becoming in a church) that he would see me later about my fee. I saw him—but not the fee—and the janitor and organist saw the last of him that day as he and his bride walked down the aisle to the strains of the Wedding March, and passed out into the most expensive bridal carriage in town.

A NUMBER of instances like this leads me to the conclusion that the minister's fee is sometimes made to do service in paying for the cab or in decorating the church or drawing-room. These make a bigger impression upon the neighbors than would an honest fee to the one man in the community whose moral character and legal status alone give them public sanction to live together, and the blessing of religion in their new life. Some of these people would be more appropriately married by the florist or liveryman. It would be less trouble and more in keeping with their dimensions.

Here is another type. A man wrote me last December that he wanted to be married. He and she arrived. The latter wished to trim herself up a bit, and the freedom of the second storey was conferred upon her. She took general possession, and had more than one member of the house waiting on her. When she descended she wished to see "the ritual," as she termed it, and she scanned it with care. (Privately, I think she was on the war-path for the word "obey," which word, for the sake of consistency, should be put to the husband or not at all.) They were duly married, though she looked over my shoulder while I made out the certificate. He handed me a fat envelope as they left, and, as is the custom, I handed it to my wife, feeling that we had really earned the contents in this case. "Reverend and Dear Sir:" the letter began, "Please accept for your own personal use the enclosed amount." (Two one-dollar bills.) Elaborate statements followed, closing with the hope that they "would both be very happy." We all hope so! A well-worded announcement of the marriage appeared in the Saturday morning papers; Sunday night, after the service, they came to wish me goodbye, and on Monday I received from the bride's parents a printed announcement of the marriage, followed a few days later by a Christmas card from the same much be-married couple, with the following poetic gem upon it:

> I do not wish you pleasures,
> Nor yet a store of wealth;
> I wish you richer treasures,
> Contentment, peace, and health.

Mesmerism never appealed to me. The idea of one getting possession of another's will seems to rob man of his individuality and to degrade personality into a mere toy. But is there anything in this? In marrying people you ask: "Wilt thou have this woman," and with alacrity he answers, "I will." You ask them to join hands, which they gladly do. They willingly repeat, "I, John, take thee, Mary," or vice versa. You call for the ring and it is extricated with avidity. You request that it be placed on the third finger of the left hand. No sooner said than done. Until, by the time the service is through, you have those two people practically at your mercy and waiting your next move. What happens? In half a dozen instances lately, when I raised my hand to proclaim them husband and wife, up went two, four, and in one instance eight, obedient hands in harmony with my movement and in passive obedience to my volition.

The most sensational near-marriage that I ever bargained for was last year. Eight o'clock in the evening was the hour arranged for. A brother of the bride objected to the match, and, having got wind of what was about to take place, he came and lodged complaint. Two minutes after the party arrived he was on hand with a younger brother, and they both had fire in their eyes. They spoke little, but their attitude spelled "Ha, ha, we've got you now." The best man asked for my 'phone. The protesting brother did the same, and in five minutes a couple of much be-whiskered men walked in through the kitchen without a word, and at the same time two policemen stood at the front of the manse wondering what the urgent call was for, and there I was with ten of the maddest and most excited lot of people I ever laid eyes on. The conversation was getting louder and louder, until I reminded some of them that they were in my house and to speak quietly. What was a man to do? To begin the service meant to have objection made in the middle of it, and perhaps be unable to finish. I urged them to come to some understanding. The brother made the charge and the groom as flatly denied it. "If you can prove your innocence, she's yours," both brothers announced. "That's a fair proposition," I interjected, anxious to escape through the first door that opened. "You had better settle this matter between you peaceably and then be married with the good will of all." After considerable parleying they agreed and off they went to the bride's home. In the course of a week the groom proved his innocence, apparently, for I read of their marriage by a Methodist minister.

THE ring is the cause of much trouble. When it falls and rolls under the piano it is so awkward to search for it in the middle of the service. When two large the bride clinches her fist to keep it on. When too small, well, she puts her finger in her mouth and applies the necessary lubricant. Once the seriousness of the service was interfered with by a call from one of the witnesses on the side, "Do you want some soap?"

One young man suddenly bolted into the hall, while being married, and beckoned me to follow. He looked excited, and the bride almost wilted, finding herself left at such a time. What was the trouble? Had he changed his mind? Something very serious must have forced him even at the latest possible moment to take his stand. It was simply to say he had no ring, and he wondered if we could get on without it.

Perhaps the most amusing case of all was that of two young Germans, who wanted to become Herr and Frau. Their knowledge of English was limited. When we came to that part of the service where he was called upon to give his beloved the token of his constant faith, I said, "Produce the ring." They looked inquiringly. "Ring," I repeated. They faced each other, joined hands right and left, and for the next minute or so went through the most tortuous movement, rhythmical gymnastics and hand-wringing performance of anything I ever heard of in a marriage ceremony. They were school children again, and the only "ring" they could think of was the jolly old game of "Wring the Dishcloth," and they wrung it dry.

These are but incidents in what is in itself a beautiful service. For the most part, to officiate at a marriage is to have one's faith in humanity strengthened. In a world where there is much of suspicion it is reassuring to see two young lives absolutely trusting themselves the one to the other. They resolve to share life's joys and sorrows and the love light in the eye and the look of achievement when the service is over, all tell of a love which is human and a confidence which is not misplaced. The tens of thousands of happy homes all over this broad land speak of a faith that has stood the test and of a companionship which in its essential elements is divine. It was, therefore, no accident that the Blessed Nazarene should have made His first public appearance at a wedding. Even there one of those embarrassing situations arose which gave Him the opportunity to teach the world that every social function places upon each one the obligation to contribute his share toward the success of the occasion. And where His forbearance and charity and consideration for others is not found, there may be costly robes and outward display, but there is no marriage.

> "I lived with Love; all she possessed
> Was but a tent beside a stream.
> She warmed her cold hands in my breast;
> She wove around my sleep a dream.
> And One there was with face divine,
> Who softly came when day was spent
> And turned our water into wine,
> And made our life a sacrament."

THE TOUCHSTONE

The Story of a Sympathy Which Understood

By KATE SEATON

SISTER CLARE came briskly out of the matron's room, and crossing the wide hall, was turning along the silent corridor on the left, when the sound of voices reached her. Men's voices, one quietly reasoning, conciliation in its tones; the other rising from eager pleading to angry menace.

Swinging quickly round, she walked swifty towards the entrance, and as she did so, a door opened behind her, and Dr. Glynne, the chief surgeon, also attracted by the unusual sounds, stepped hurriedly out, but paused as he caught sight of the Sister.

"What is the matter, Evans?" she asked in a clear, imperious voice.

The porter gave a sigh of relief and answered jerkily:

"I told him, Sister; he was told before. He wants to see his wife."

Sister Clare turned her steady grey eyes on the pallid face of the intruder, who, now that someone in authority had appeared, had grown nervously silent; only his twitching face and wistful eyes voicing, in dumb agony, the anxiety which was well-nigh driving him frantic.

"Your wife?" questioned the Sister coldly.

"Yes—yes; Mary Boyers. She's been operated on to-day. I want to see 'er," pleaded the man hoarsely.

"Your wife is going on all right, but you can't see her to-night," replied the nurse firmly.

"They told me that three hours agone, as soon as it was over; but 'ow do I know yer ain't keeping somethin' back?" cried the man wildly. "'Ow do I know she's all right? She may be dyin', an yer a-keepin' of me from 'er!"

"We are not in the habit of deceiving the relatives of our patients," broke in the Sister angrily. "If she continues to do well, you may be allowed to see her to-morrow—as you were told before." And with an impatient frown she turned to go.

But the man clutched desperately at her stiff blue gown.

"Nurse, for the love of Heaven, 'ave pity. Let me see 'er just a minute. If I can only just see 'er, I'll promise not to speak. I'll ——"

"Certainly not! It's quite out of the question," interrupted the Sister sternly. "Release my dress; you are only hindering me from my duties."

With a despairing gesture, the man released his hold.

"My God!" he gasped; "a woman without pity! A mere machine!"

Sister Clare turned away, a slightly contemptuous expression in her eyes, and almost collided with Dr. Glynne, who, having been a silent spectator of the scene, was now coming forward, his strong face full of a great sympathy.

"Perhaps I can comfort him," he said quietly.

The Sister deigned him no reply, but, with an impatient ejaculation, jerked aside, and hastening across the hall, disappeared down a long corridor.

The man was now on the outer steps, his haggard face gleaming whitely in the glare of the electric light, as he turned for a last despairing glance behind him.

In a moment the young surgeon was at his side, his hand—the light, steady hand which wielded the surgical knife with a deftness and skill that won him the admiration of his colleagues—stretched out to touch the man's shoulder.

"My man," he said gently, "I think I can set your mind at rest. It was I who operated on your wife."

The man turned with a low, inarticulate cry, and passed his hand slowly across his eyes.

"She went through it splendidly," continued the surgeon cheerily. "She is a brave little woman—a wife to be proud of. She never flinched when the time came."

A sudden gleam lit up the man's troubled eyes, and a faint smile stole across the twitching lips.

"She were always that, were Mary," he said proudly. "But, eh, sir, to think of sich a bit of a girl 'avin' to go through that, and a big, strong chap like me, as 'ud gladly a died to save 'er, just 'ayin' to stand by 'elpless. An' now they'll not even let me see 'er!"

His voice broke pitifully, and the doctor's grip tightened on his shoulder svmpathetically.

"I know it seems hard to have to wait so long," he said; "but you are not going to prove yourself less brave and patient than your wife? It is quite against the rules to admit relatives so soon after an operation—both for their sake and the patients'. But I assure you she went through it well, and is going on all right."

The man's eager eyes devoured the surgeon's face; then, as if satisfied with what he saw, he drew a sharp breath of relief.

"Thank yer, sir. I believes yer. But that woman was 'ard—'ard an' pitiless. I couldn't trust 'er."

The surgeon winced, and his eyes suddenly clouded.

"Well, you may trust me," he said, a little wearily. "I'll go up and see your wife again before I leave, and make sure all is right."

The man nodded his thanks, and silently wringing the surgeon's hand, dropped down the steps.

For a moment Dr. Glynne watched the drooping figure looming darkly in the middle of the wide path; then, as the murk swallowed him up, turned with a tired gesture to fulfil his promise.

He had not gone many yards before he was accosted by one of his colleagues.

"That you, Glynne?" exclaimed the fresh young voice. "I thought you had gone some time since."

"No, I'm still here, Macdonald. I've just one more case to see; then I'm off."

"Lucky man!" returned Macdonald enviously. "I'd gladly forego a week of my leave to be free at this moment; but I've number five ward to do yet."

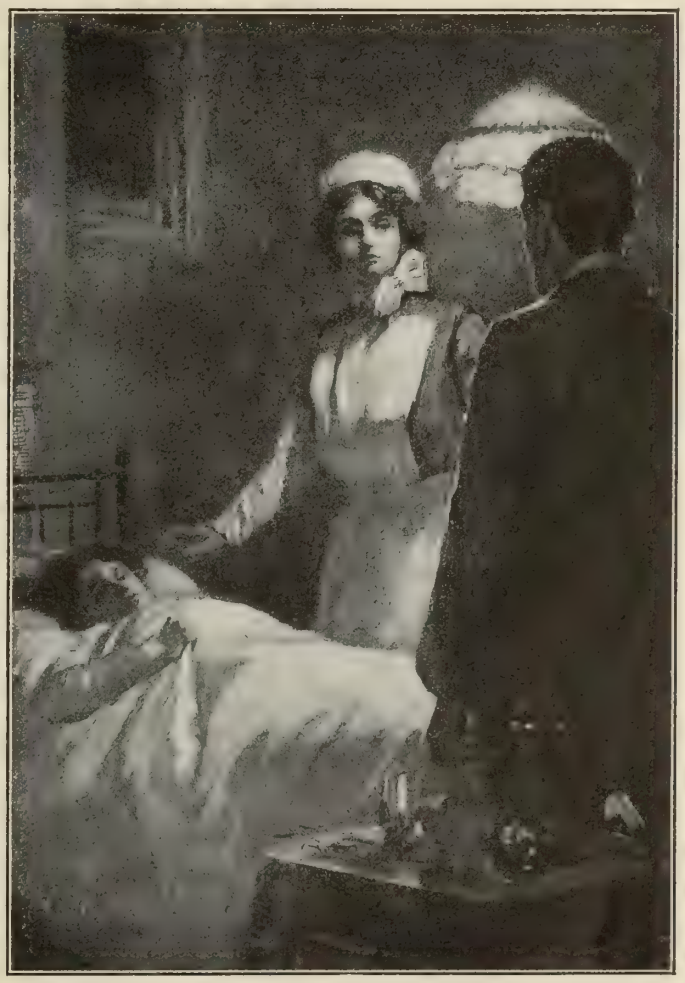
"That so, Mac? Something very special on?" asked Glynne, a kindly twinkle in his eyes.

"Rather!" Macdonald hesitated; then, after another glance into the face of the man who always inspired confidences, he added shamefacedly: "I'd an invite to the Forresters to-night; Evelyn was to be there, and—she's going away to-morrow for some months."

Glynne laughed understandingly, and took out his watch.

"Look alive, Mac; you'll just catch the six-thirty, if you do a sprint. I'll do number five for you."

"Glynne, you mean it?" cried Macdonald delightedly. "You're a trump!"



"With an effort, he pulled himself together."

"All right, old man. But you've no time to lose; off you go, and—good luck to your wooing!"

Macdonald needed no second bidding, and Glynne smiled involuntarily as his eager footsteps died quickly away.

As he approached ward five—the ward of which Sister Clare was in charge—Glynne's steps grew slower, and the smile died out of his eyes, leaving his face tired and sad.

Already most of the patients had been settled for the night, but Sister Clare still lingered with a few of the more serious cases.

Glynne paused by the open doorway, and watched her at her task—gently smoothing the pillow of one restless patient, deftly raising another into a more comfortable position, and all with the quietness and skill of the born nurse.

With his mind still lingering with Macdonald, Glynne suddenly frowned and uttered a short, impatient sigh. What a contrast Sister Clare was to the sweet, winsome girl Macdonald had gone to woo—a girl full of warm, generous impulses and tender womanhood.

What was it poor Boyers had called Sister Clare?—a hard woman, hard and pitiless?

The words echoed painfully in his ears—the more painfully in that he believed them to be true.

This splendid woman, with her wonderful genius for nursing, and her strenuous devotion to duty—never hesitating to spend her royal strength prodigally in the fight with fell disease or grim death—was yet somehow cold and aloof, as if her real nature were untouched by the suffering to which she so skilfully ministered.

Though nominally in charge of number five ward, she was often told off to attend special cases, where her cool nerve and steady hand proved of invaluable assistance. And so it came about that Dr. Glynne had seen more of Sister Clare than of any other nurse upon the staff.

At first his professional eyes had simply admired her unusual skill; it was only later that he had become conscious of the fact that this clever and reliable nurse was also a beautiful woman.

He began to watch eagerly for her coming, and was conscious of a keen sense of disappointment if some other nurse took her place.

But to-night, as he watched her moving noiselessly about the ward, he became possessed by a growing irritation against her. It was as if she both attracted and repelled him, fascinated and chilled him, at one and the same time.

With his mind full of these conflicting emotions, he drew back into the quiet corridor unperceived.

Simultaneously with the realization that he loved this woman, there flashed upon him a vivid recollection of the past, of his early boyhood's home. Memory conjured up, with unerring fidelity, the image of the father whom he worshipped—a man of large sympathies and tender heart. With cruel distinctness he saw also the cold, heartless woman towards whom, even as a boy, he had been conscious of strong antagonism and bitter anger, because of her hardness and coldness towards the man who had loved her so truly, and who had ever given her of his best.

With that keen, clear insight which had helped to raise him to his present responsible position, Glynne knew that if Sister Clare were persuaded to accept his love and unite her life with his own, it would be but to repeat once again the same heartbreaking tragedy which had crushed his father's life, and brought about the complete failure in which it had ended.

Sister Clare moved suddenly towards the doorway, and caught sight of him. There was something in his face that arrested her—the determined set of his firm jaws, such as she had seen when he had been fighting a more than usually hard case, and was determined not to be beaten.

She came towards him with a questioning air.

"Well," she asked lightly; "did you get rid of that tiresome man?"

"He has gone—yes," he responded gravely. Then, with a futile attempt to appeal to her sympathies: "Poor fellow, he was almost wild with anxiety for his wife."

"Um—yes; consumed with anxiety to know how soon she would be up, and able to attend to his wants again!" she said shortly, her full, red lips curling in a scornful little smile. "You see, when a man's wife is laid up his meals are apt to suffer," she added scathingly. "But—did you want me for something?"

"No, thank you. I've only come to do the ward for Macdonald, who has been called away," he explained coldly.

So coldly that Sister Clare looked at him with slightly raised brows; then, calling a nurse to accompany him round the ward, she abruptly left him.

When Glynne had finished his tour of inspection, he went slowly down a short corridor, and paused outside the door of a small, darkened room, from which could be heard the low, pitiful moans of someone in pain—moans which, as the doctor listened, broke into speech as pitiful and full of pain as the sobbing breath which a moment before had arrested his footsteps.

"Oh, the pain, the pain! . . . How it hurts!" the voice moaned feebly. Then, in the same breath, but clearer and more articulate: "No, no . . . it's not so bad. . . . Tell him the pain's not so bad. He's coming soon . . . he said he'd come soon. . . . Nurse, you'll tell him I'm doin' fine . . . that the pain isn't much. . . . That it's just nothin' at all."

Again the breath caught sobbingly, and in unconscious contradiction of her cheering assurance, the distressing wail began once more.

Softly Glynne pushed open the door and entered the darkened room, and as he did so was surprised when Sister Clare moved out from the shadows and stood on the other side of the bed, where the light from the shaded lamp fell full upon her face.

"I promised her husband I would look in on her again before I went," he explained.

He stood a moment looking down at the small, flushed face upon the pillow; then, as the pitiful babble of the poor woman just emerging from the effects of the anaesthetic began once again, he flashed a searching glance into the strong, beautiful face opposite him.

Was it only the effect of the subdued light that had produced that softened gleam in the usually cold grey eyes? he asked himself wonderingly; or was it——? With an effort he pulled himself together, the physician foremost once more.

"Ah—h!" Another moan broke from the helpless woman on the bed; then her eyes, dark with pain, suddenly opened wide.

"Tell—him—I'm—just—splendid," she whispered slowly, a gleam of consciousness once more shining in her eyes. "He—mustn't—know—it—hurts so. Ah!"

Again the weary eyes closed, as the pain grew more insistent.

The surgeon turned abruptly aside, and taking up the record sheet, made a pretence of examining it. Then, as the woman showed signs of returning consciousness, he strode back to the bed.

"The pain will be better soon,' he said soothingly.

The dark eyes opened at the sound of his voice and met his intelligently.

"Your husband has just been," he went on smilingly.

"And—you told him——?" She broke off, her eyes questioning his anxiously.

"I told him you were getting on fine, and what a brave little wife he had got."

A faint smile crossed the flushed face.

"I'm glad. I—don't—want—him—to—know—how—bad—it—is."

"Poor little woman!" he murmured, a world of sympathy in his tone.

Again that faint, fleeting smile crossed the woman's lips, and she lay still a moment, her eyes fixed wistfully on the surgeon's face.

"It's not the pain—I mind," she began slowly. "It's because it's so hard for Jim. It's worse for him, 'cause, you see"—a glow crept into the pain-darkened eyes—"you see, he loves me so much, an' we've never been separated before since we were married. If I could only ha' made it easier for him!" she finished longingly.

Again her eyes grew dim and wandering for a moment, lingering finally on the face of Sister Clare.

"I wish she could sleep," said the nurse, in a low voice. "She has talked on incessantly the last few hours."

"Nurse," the voice broke in with a new pleading note, "would you do something for me?"

"I will do anything I can, if you will only try and sleep," rejoined Sister Clare quickly, laying her cool hand gently on the hot forehead.

"Ah! I can ask you. You are so kind and—and good."

Sister Clare's face flushed, and her eyes flashed a sudden defiance into the keen ones opposite, as if resenting the expression she caught in them.

"You see, the childer will be in bed now, an' Jim—he'll just be sittin' alone, worritin' an' thinkin' about me."

A hot hand, roughened by toil, stole out to clasp the cool, shapely hand of Sister Clare, and the sick woman's voice sank to a coaxing whisper.

"Ah, nurse, if you only knew my Jim—how tenderly he's allus loved me, you'd know what a lot it 'ud mean to him if he could just have a message from me now."

Glynne waited in tense silence, certain of the curt refusal which would follow the pathetic request. But to his surprise, the straight figure opposite suddenly bent in a gracious curve over the bed.

"And—what message would you like to send?" asked Sister Clare softly.

"Just my love—and—not to worry." A spasm of pain checked her utterance for a moment. "Tell him," she resumed faintly, "I'll soon be sittin' again in the big chair he made fer me—and—a good-night kiss to him and—my babies."

The voice trailed off to the feeblest whisper, but her eyes still held the Sister's with a pleading insistence—held them until the heart of the Sister was drawn out, and bending tenderly over the bed, she gently stroked the flushed face, and, with an unsteady little laugh, said soothingly:

"Then you may rest happy, little woman—I'll take your message myself. I am just off duty."

Satisfied with her promise, the sick woman closed her eyes, and, as if by magic, the restless tossing of the brown head ceased.

As the nurse in charge of the case came in, Sister Clare slipped quietly from the room, leaving Dr. Glynne giving final instructions; and with a new warm glow at her heart, she set off a few minutes later for the dingy tenement where Jim Boyers lived—not, it must be confessed, without some secret misgivings as to the kind of reception she would meet with there.

But she need not have feared. For when, after some little difficulty, she at last discovered the right door, and in response to her knock, received a gloomy invitation to enter, she found Jim Boyers—as his wife had predicted—alone and in grief.

He looked up with a sudden anxiety at her entrance—all his late anger forgotten in the fear that she had brought him bad news.

"Don't be afraid," she said quickly. "All is going on well with your wife." And in a few simple words she hastened to give him his wife's tender message.

Then, to give the man time to recover from his emotion, she quietly crossed the room to where a small, low bedstead lay in one corner, and stood looking down at the two baby faces, rosy in sleep, nestling so closely together that the flaxen curls of the baby girl twined themselves lovingly about the boy's dark, tousled head.

When Sister Clare once more retraced her steps down the rickety stairs, there was a tender smile on her lips, and a softened, wistful look in her deep grey eyes. She had left Jim Boyers heartened and comforted by his wife's message, but also deeply ashamed of the hasty judgment he had pronounced on the woman who had now shown him such a depth of womanly tenderness and sympathy.

As she stepped out into the roadway, a man came hastily across to meet her, and she gave a sudden start at the sight of him.

"Dr. Glynne!" she exclaimed, her face flushing in surprise.

"You didn't think I should allow you to be in this district alone, did you?" he asked. "I meant to accompany you, but you had gone before I knew."

She smiled her thanks, and for a time they continued their walk in silence.

As they neared a better-lighted thoroughfare, Glynne glanced curiously at the face of the silent woman beside him, and what he saw there set his pulses suddenly throbbing with a new joy. Surely, the days of miracles were not past! It was as if an icebound but beautiful scene in raw December had suddenly thawed and blossomed out into the rosy, sun-kissed beauty of fragrant June!

He drew in his breath sharply, and as they turned into one of those quiet squares for which London is so famous, he paused and laid a restraining hand upon his companion's arm.

"Clare," he said simply, his voice trembling with the strength of his emotion. "Clare, I love you, and want you for my wife."

"You love me?" she asked slowly. Then, with a sudden passion: "Ah! how can you? I—I have been so hateful, hard, unwomanly."

"What about to-night?" he asked gently. "Do you think any other nurse on the staff—tired out as you were after a long, trying day—would have set off across the city on such an errand?"

He held out his hand to take hers, but she waved it off.

"Wait!" she whispered. "Let me first tell you something—something of my past life. Dr. Glynne, you think of me as an unmarried woman. I am——" She paused, and his face suddenly whitened as he waited for her next low words. "I am a widow. No, let me tell you all!" she entreated, as he would have interrupted her. "I was rich, full of warm, generous impulses, and possessed of an earnest desire to use my wealth in a right way—just a simple, trusting girl of twenty-one, when I met—him. He made passionate love to me; I believed him——" Again she paused, and the quivering, passionate voice grew weary. "I had only been married to him a few weeks when he told me—brutally—that he had no love for me, that my money was all that he had wanted. When he found that it was tied up in such a way as to be beyond his power, he made my life one long burden with his tyranny. Of his life—I cannot speak. For five, long weary years I bore it, then—I fled, took up the nursing profession and—a new name. Soon after, he was killed by a fall on the Alps." She paused a moment and caught her breath sobbingly.

"Don't tell me any more now, dearest," he said tenderly.

"Yes, yes; I must—you do not know me as I really am. My whole nature became hard and bitter; I lost all faith in human nature. I believe only the strenuousness of my nursing duties saved my reason, so possessed did I become with hatred of the man who had done me this wrong. Of God, and all I had believed in the happy past, I would not—dared not think. I thought I had ceased to believe in love, that I had schooled myself to indifference, to the denial of emotion and of all the best impulses of my nature." Again she paused, and raised her eyes, now wells of womanly sweetness beneath the mist of tears. "I thought I had succeeded—till to-night."

He looked at the softened, beautiful face pityingly.

"Poor child," he said gently. "But tell me, Clare; had you no suspicion of my love for you?"

"Ah, I dare not let myself believe it true. I told myself fiercely that all men's love was but selfishness, and defied my heart to respond. But—I have learned the truth to-night. A couple of poor, uneducated souls have taught me the error of my sweeping judgment; have shown me the reality and sacredness of human love."

With a sudden, swift movement and a boyish laugh, Glynne drew into the seclusion of a small opening, and, gathering her into his arms, kissed the proud, beautiful face, now lovelier than ever in its sweet yielding and new-found humility.

Sister Clare—now Sister Clare no longer, but the happy wife of the clever surgeon—was not quite lost to the nursing profession; for even after her marriage she would often accompany her husband on his errands of healing. Especially where poverty forbade the necessary help and comforts to a sick one was Clare Glynne to be found, pouring out generously both her skill and her money on behalf of the needy patient.

She never knew how near she had been to missing the crowning joy of her life; for her husband never told her of the vow he had registered in the doorway of number five ward that night—never to ask a woman to be his wife whose nature was so hard and cold as he believed hers to be!

Neither did Jim Boyers, now Dr. Glynne's right hand man, nor his wife Mary, installed in a cosy home of her own near by, ever understand that it was a deep and undying gratitude that prompted the generous treatment which had been meted out to them by the now famous surgeon and his beautiful wife.

MISS MARION'S THANKSGIVING PIES

Continued from page 7

ed too suddenly. I should have sent you word, but there's one thing I want to hear you say, and that is that you're glad to see me. Tell me, Marion, are you glad?"

And Marion answered simply, "Yes, Robert, very glad, indeed,"

Her answer seemed to satisfy him, for as he took one of her hands in his, he said, "This is more than I deserve." Then he went on, "Marion, dear, I shall never be able to tell you of the loneliness of my life in the West. I was farming in Saskatchewan, also buying and selling land. I have made money—plenty of it—but I have not been happy. How could I be, when I left the only girl I ever loved behind me? Hundreds of times have I blamed myself for the hasty words that parted us. But how about you, Marion? Have you missed me?"

"Yes," she answered, "I have missed you all the time. At first I rather enjoyed my independence, but the years have been lonely. During the last few months I have grown selfish and almost wicked. I didn't mean to keep Thanksgiving this year, and I was not even willing to contribute my share of the baking for the church supper. But Martha talked me out of my foolish notions. I don't know what I should have done all these years without her."

"She's a faithful soul," said Robert. "Wherever our future home may be, she must live with us, and we'll try to make her happy. I believe I'm the happiest man in Ontario to-night. To think that I've returned to find the woman I love grown sweeter and more beautiful than when I left her."

"Hush," interrupted Marion, "don't flatter me, but tell me how you found your way here to-night."

"Well, dear, I was on my way to Montreal; I expected to sail from there in a few days for Liverpool. I was seeking change, for I felt that I could not stand the monotony of another winter alone in the West. Just as our train reached your little town, something went wrong with the engine. The conductor said there would be a delay of an hour and a half. I got off, and was walking up street, not even dreaming of seeing you, for I heard t.. years ago that you were married, and living in New York. I noticed in a store window an announcement of your church tea, which was to be served from five to eight. I went into the hall, thinking I might enjoy an old-fashioned church supper. I was eating a piece of pumpkin pie that somehow or other carried my thoughts back to the old days. I wondered where I had eaten such pie before. Then I remembered—it was just like your mother's pie, Marion; no wonder it made me think of you, and of the old days. The plate was passed to me the second time, and I ventured to ask who made the pie.

"'There's only one person around here that can make such good pie,' said the girl who held the plate, 'and that's Miss Marion Barclay.'

"So I easily found out where you lived, and I lost no time in getting here. It's fortunate, dear, that you did make those pies; they helped me to find you. And it's lucky the engine broke down just when it did, instead of an hour later."

"I don't think we should say lucky," said Marion, "I call it providential."

"Yes, you're right," said Robert, "there's no luck about it. Trivial, commonplace events are often used by Providence to change the whole current of one's life. You and I were meant for each other, dear, things don't happen by chance. How true it is that 'There's a Divinity that shapes our ends, rough hew them how we may.'"

THE QUEEN OF BELGIUM

TO-DAY one of the most beautiful of the younger European Queens is the royal mistress of the Belgians, who before her marriage ten years ago to the present King Albert, was known as Elizabeth of Bavaria, daughter of the late Duke Charles Karl Theodore.

Queen Elizabeth is thirty-four years old. She is the mother of two sons and a daughter, her eldest boy, heir to the throne, being nine years old.

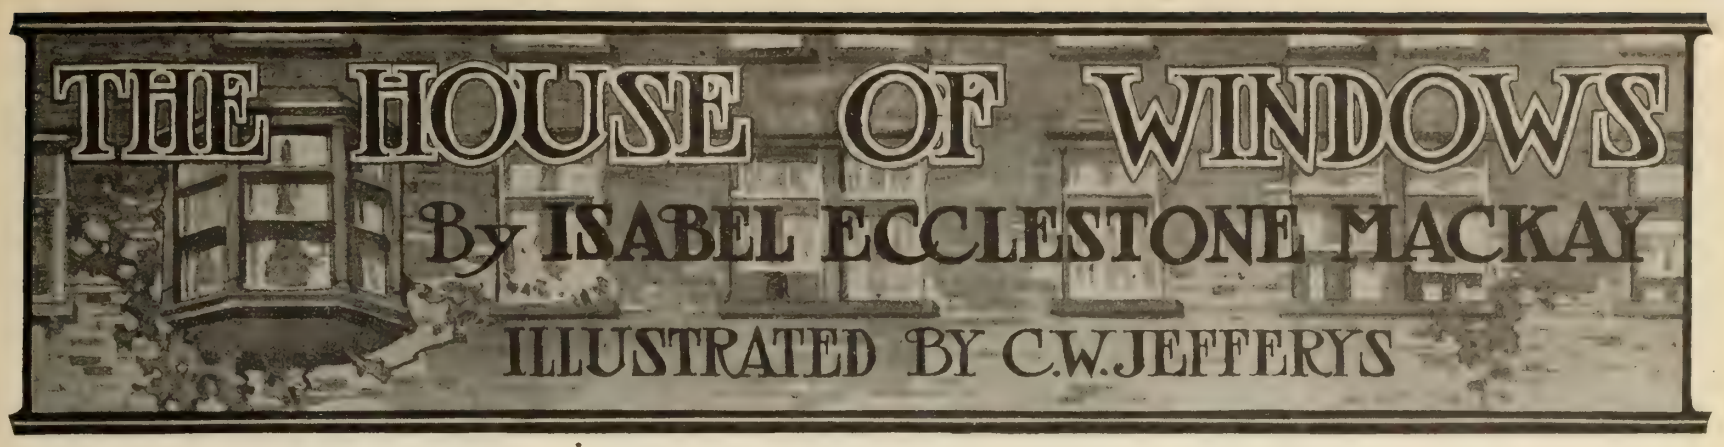
Moreover, there is a most interesting romance connected with the marriage of the King and Queen. The match was a true love affair. Princess Elizabeth had already been married when she met Prince Albert.

Some time previous to her marriage she scandalized Austrian and Belgian society by making a runaway match with a young, penniless officer in the Austrian army named Von Seefried.

Her royal parents declined to have anything to do with her, the offence being aggravated by the fact that her husband was a Lutheran, while she belonged to the most Catholic of all the sovereign families in Europe.

Her husband soon began to neglect her in a most shameful manner and then disappeared. He afterwards died abroad.

The present Queen was born at Possenhofen, July 25th, 1876. She is very pretty. Her features are regular, her nose is aquiline and her expression one of great sweetness.



SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine, and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia. Christine secures a position in "the Stores." Christine is followed by a sinister-looking old beggar woman, and is further annoyed by the attentions of Gilbert Van Slyke.

HE felt, as he explained afterwards to a select few, as if he had been insulting a lady, don't you know! And before he had recovered sufficiently to make any further advances Christine was far ahead. It was a defeat as complete and unexpected as Waterloo!

The discomfitted young man gazed after her in angry amazement. Nor was his humiliation lessened by the old woman, who now sidled up with an evil smile.

"Wouldn't the pretty lady listen?" she whined.

"Get out," said Van Slyke savagely.

The old creature tittered. "Fit for a king, she is," she insinuated, "and poor! Only car tickets, as I can swear. What would you give a poor widow if she knew a way to make the pretty lady listen?"

Van Slyke looked at the repulsive face with wonder merging into disgust. "What are you talking about?" he said. "What do you take me for? You old hag, if you don't get out I'll give you in charge." Unmistakeable sincerity spoke in the young fellow's tone, he half-raised his hand to summon a policeman, but the old woman, seeing that she had mistaken her man, scuttled away.

"Wonder what she meant and why she was annoying the girl?" mused Van Slyke. "Well, it looks as if it were no go in that direction! At present, anyway. Don't believe I was ever so hard hit, either. Beastly luck. By gad, I believe she meant just what she said. Sounded like the real thing. If so, it's all over with Bertie—it might as well be Europe for mine. I'll never get her hair out of my head if I stay here. Wonder why the girls in our set don't grow hair like that—"

Musingly bitterly upon this curious partiality of fate, Mr. Van Slyke retraced his steps. Spoiled child of fortune as he was and utterly immoral, he was not dishonorable according to his lights, and, convinced that the object of his ardent but temporary affections was really unresponsive, he would not persist in persecution. Yet never until the present had he been quite so "hard hit."

From the dusy entrance of a neighboring lane the old woman watched him go. She was trembling all over with some suppressed emotion; fear, perhaps or more likely rage, for she shook a skinny fist after the retreating figure, and, muttering inarticulately, made off herself in the opposite direction. She could move quickly in spite of her ancient limbs, and she must have known plenty of short-cuts, for, avoiding the main streets and keeping as much as possible to lanes and alleys, she came in a marvellously short time to Hill Street, and here it needed no special perspicacity to tell that she was at home. Hill Street does not need the presence of the burliest policeman on the force to betray its character. In the day time it is a quiet street, but even then there is a "something" which causes the unwary intruder to hurry out of it with a cautious hand tight upon his pocket-book. Only the dwellers in Hill Street do not fear it, and, slipping past the blue-coated guardian at the corner, the old woman hurried on, greeting no one, and finally disappearing within the door of its most disreputable hovel; a residence justly celebrated in Hill Street as "Granny Bates'," and shunned accordingly.

Once within this refuge she gave vent to her feelings in so vehement a manner as to rouse to protest its only other occupant, a dark-browed man of forty.

"Here, cut it out!" he growled, raising a coarsely handsome face from the paper he was reading. "Stow it, d'ye hear! What's come to you, you old harridan?"

At this the old woman's mood changed suddenly, and, throwing herself upon one of the rickety chairs, she burst into wailing and tears, more disconcerting and if possible more disgusting than the violence had been.

The man rose calmly and shook her; not savagely but as if it were a necessary matter of routine. "That's enough!" he commanded peremptorily, "you'll go off in one of these here fits if you don't look out! Been following the girl again, have you? Now, look here, I've told you it isn't safe. Do you want to give the show away?"

Under his drastic treatment the old woman's wailing had subsided. "No, not yet; it ain't time yet. I can wait. I've waited so long. I wouldn't care how long I had to wait if I could only see it coming."

"Well, you told me last week that you did see it coming."

The old woman began the wail again. "That's it," she whimpered, "I've been disappointed—so disappointed, and I've waited so long. I thought I saw it coming when she went into the Stores, and then when that fine young spark Van Slyke began to notice her I felt sure. But she won't listen to him. She and her fine lady airs! Better than my Agnes, is she? Blast her! And him such a fine-looking spark—blast his coward's heart! Turn tail and off the minute she up and sauced him—oh—oh!" She pounded her skinny fists upon the table in an ecstasy of disappointed rage.

The man, after a parting shake, filled a dirty pipe and began to smoke philosophically. "Go it," he said, "Go it! Some day you'll go off altogether and nobody sorry!"

With another change of mood the woman ceased her raving and looked up with a curious grin. "And who'll get my bit of money, Billy? Who but you if you help me like you swore to."

"Who's saying I'm not goin' to help you? Ain't I helped you. Ain't I played spy on them Browns for years until you know more about their business than they do themselves? Ain't I held my tongue? Don't I know that Christine ain't no more Brown than you are—"

"Yes, but you don't know who she is, do you, Billy? Oh, if you guess, you ain't got no proofs, have you, my lad? Trust your Granny for that!" The old hag laughed evilly.

"Well," changing the subject, "what's the trouble now? Given Van Slyke the strong eye, has she? I thought she would."

"He's a fool!" shortly and suddenly dropping her whine, "He'll never get her. Spoke to her in the street to-night and made off like a whipped cur when she faced him. Told me to get out when I offered to help him."

"Did, did he?" the man chuckled. "Well, see here, you know what I always said, that girl's straight, and you can't get her to go crooked. If you want to get back at her dad that way, you'll get left."

"I won't get left. I'll have her yet. I'll see her in the gutter where my poor Agnes went—she is poor already and getting poorer. Wait till she's hungry. Wait till she's a skeleton like Agnes with want and sickness, wait till she sees her sisters dying for want of medicine, then she'll give in, like Agnes did—as good a girl as ever lived."

"I ain't sayin' anything agin' Agnes. She's been dead long enough to be a saint by now. But you'll never get this girl like Agnes. For one thing she'll never be really hungry. She's got friends, hasn't she? D'ye think that Burns man would ever let them girls want? Proud, are they? But they'd take help from him if they were hungry enough. She'd go to him for help before she'd look at any of your fancy men. I tell you you'll never get revenge that way. Why don't you just let him believe she's dead—ain't that enough?"

"Enough! To let him live thinking his darter's in a nice clean grave? Did I steal her for that? Did I keep my fingers off her baby throat for that? How did my Agnes die, as good a girl as ever was? You know, and he did it. Him with his Stores and his wages that drive a girl to ruin! D'ye think Agnes would ever have listened to that traveler chap if she'd had good food to eat and medicine for her old mother! As good a girl as ever lived! And pretty, as pretty as his girl! No, I can't die till I tell him that his darter's where mine was. I'll drag her down. I'll—"

"Chuck it!" commanded the man again. Yet this time there was an oddly sympathetic note in his rough voice. Perhaps the old woman felt it, for she ceased her threatening and subsided into a broken muttering about "As good a girl as ever was!"

"I ain't sayin' that you've no reason," began the man. "I'm just sayin' that it can't be done. That girl's born good and trained good. You can go agin nature sometimes and agin training most any time, but you can't buck up agin both, ever. That Christine won't look at your Van Slyke or anyone else. So, if you're bound to get back at her dad that way, what you'll have to do is to make it seem like she did—see?"

The old woman was listening eagerly. He dropped his voice. "Your plan didn't work, that's all. You had her brought up by shop girls, and now she's a shop girl herself, and she's pretty enough to set every man in town on her track. But that's all. She'll never listen to any of 'em. She'll marry respectable yet and settle down. So that plan's a deader! Now, what you want is to get back at the dad. I may guess who he is, and I may not, but I ain't got any proofs, and he thinks his darter's dead. Besides, I don't blame you for wanting to get back. I'm a Socialist, I am. Now, the only thing you can do is to get hold of the girl and make believe she's gone off herself. There's a chance for that. I've been spyin' as per usual, and I know that Van Slyke is goin' to Europe. He's been putting it off on account of her, but as soon as he finds she's turned him down he'll up and scoot. S'posing she went at the same time—leavin' no address, so to speak—eh?"

The old woman watched him with shining eyes. "That's it!" she croaked. "That's it! and the little bit of money, Billy, it's all for you, if you'll help."

"Oh, I'll help. But you've got no call to harm the girl—savey?"

For an instant murder looked out of his companion's fierce old eyes. Then she dropped them meekly. "Sure not," she said. "It ain't the girl I want to harm. She'll be alright, trust your Granny."

A look of what almost seemed relief spread itself over the man's face.

"That's settled then. When we let her go she can say what she likes. No one will believe her. She won't be any too clear as to what's happened herself. We'll take her West. By the time she gets back here, or gets a letter through, her hash will be cooked alright. Her father wouldn't want to have her then! But, mind, you, she's not to be really harmed or I'm out of it. Now, you leave me to arrange details. Only tell me where'd be the safest place to put her before we can get her away. It may be a month before it'll be safe to try."

"That's easy. You know the inn on the Dalby Road—Haffey's? It's changed hands. Sal Hornby's got it. She owes me one. That's the place. Respectable and all! The police ain't on to it yet. It's a place for your life, and Sal won't mind."

"Sal is hell! I don't like taking the girl there. I told you—"

"I know, Billy. But I'll see to her. Sal won't go near her. It's just to keep her safe, that's all. You know what kidnapping is if we're caught."

The man laughed. "If we're caught," he sneered. "I ain't been caught yet, have I? Go and get some supper and get it quick!"

CHAPTER XVII.

HAPPILY unconscious of the evil which had come so close to her, Christine hurried home. Her most prominent feeling was one of anger and disgust at the thought of Mr. Van Slyke and his presumptions. She was not at all afraid of him, for that girlish instinct which is almost infallible had told her that in his case no fear was justified. Van Slyke's attentions might be impertinent, but they would never become formidable. Besides, there was always Tommy. In spite of her weariness and anxiety, Christine smiled as she thought of the exquisite Van Slyke in Tommy's avenging hands. The incident of the ugly old woman she dismissed without a second thought, simply because she could conceive of no possible connection between herself and her. To Christine the old hag was but a street beggar, to be rather shudderingly pitied, to be helped if possible, but under no possible circumstances to be feared. No, the problem of real interest was how to break the fact of her holidays to Ada! This was still in a state of miserable indecision when she mounted the stairs in the House of Windows. She even opened the door with no definite plan in mind; but when she entered the room it was to find that fate had settled her question for her.

"Oh, Christine," exclaimed Ada, in a voice which fairly trembled with relief, and which was at the same time much louder than usual. "I am so glad that you have got back from your walk. Celia is better—she has asked to see you!" Then, as she helped the astonished girl to remove her hat, she whispered hurriedly:

"She asked for you. I said you were out walking. Oh, how fortunate you are early to-night! If you had not come till the usual time she would have suspected. Every hour of peace of mind that we can give her will count so much. Go in to her now, and—don't tell her if you can help it!"

Christine nodded and went quietly into the inner room. Celia lay there, weak still, but no longer uncaring, and with an eager question in her blue eyes. When she saw Christine the questioning look faded, a satisfied smile stole over her white lips.

"You are better, dear?" asked the girl, bending down to kiss her.

"Yes, what time is it?"

"Nearly half-past five, dear."

"Ah!" The invalid's weak voice held relief. Never as long as she could remember had Angers & Son closed at half-past five! She asked no more questions. Enough to know that her darling had not become a shop-girl—yet!

When she had sunk into sleep again Christine came noiselessly into the outer room. "It is all right," she whispered. "She is asleep."

Ada, who was spreading the cloth on the little round table for supper ,gave way to the relief of tears, and the two girls kissed each other in silent thankfulness.

"She is sure to get well, now," said Ada, wiping her eyes. "It seemed like Providence that you should be early to-night. I saw her longing to ask and yet afraid. Now she will have a good night's rest and will not need to be told until to-morrow."

"Not even then," said Christine. "I am not going to work to-morrow. I have some holidays. Mr. Torrance inspected the Stores to-day, and as a consequence some of us have a few days off."

"Christine! Do you mean—"

"No, I am not discharged! Amazing as it may seem, the holidays are genuine. And Mr. Torrance was so kind. I think he is the very nicest man I ever saw—I mean the nicest middle-aged man. But, of course, he isn't young. His hair is quite grey at the temples. But he has a face one might dream about, dark and clear, with such kind, brave eyes. The Store girls are quite foolish about him, not that it does them any harm. I expect a little hero-worship doesn't hurt anybody."

"No," agreed Ada, and then, for no obvious reason, she sighed. Christine did not know and Ada herself was hardly conscious of the reason for that sigh; but it just happened that Christine's description had come very near to a secret place in the blind girl's heart. Every girl has a secret place, the home of an ideal, a prince, a glorious being never quite incarnate in this world; and Ada's prince, whom she would never see, had a face that was dark and clear, with kind, brave eyes. Poor Tommy!

He, Tommy, was coming up the stairs at that very moment. In one hand he carried a new magazine, in the other a jar of a new and highly-recommended beef juice, and under his arm was carefully tucked a bunch of late asters in crinkly paper. A cheery visitor to be coming up one's stairs! But not a visitor to inspire day-dreams. Not a visitor whose face was dark and clear, and over whose eyes a girl might ponder timidly. Tommy was eternally and hopelessly short, broad-shouldered, round-faced, and sandy-haired; and his eyes (however brave and kind the soul behind) persisted in being china blue.

Unable to open the door on account of the beef juice, Tommy kicked it gently with his foot. He entered in silence and upon tiptoe, and indeed the only thing that marred the effect of his gallant carefulness was the dropping of the beef juice exactly upon the spot where it would make the most noise.

"Oh, Tommy!" said Christine, starting up.

The blind girl ran anxiously to listen at the invalid's door.

"Hang the thing," said Tommy. "Isn't that just my luck? All the way up the stairs I expected it to fall any minute and was quite prepared for it. Then the minute I think I'm safe it does its worst."

"It was very careless," said Ada severely. "But, thank goodness, it did not waken her. What was it—a bomb?"

"Beef juice!" said Christine, picking it up. "Beaton's Bountiful Beef Juice for Poorly People."

"It's something new," said Tommy, recovering. "Cracking good thing, they tell me, simply full of nourishment. It isn't broken, is it?" anxiously.

"No, it's safe, and oh, Tommy, Celia is better! She has spoken. She asked for me, and now she is sleeping—real sleep. How nice that you have brought some flowers. They will be the first thing she'll see when she wakes up."

Tommy, who had brought the flowers for Ada, was too genuinely glad of Celia's improvement to object to this disposal of his gift.

"Sure!" he said heartily. Then, in a piercing whisper, "How did she take it about the Stores?"

"Hush, she doesn't know yet, and won't for a day or so. Christine has got holidays, Tommy. Mr. Torrance inspected the store to-day and gave some of the clerks a few days off."

"Holidays?" Tommy's blue eyes widened wonderingly. "Whatever for? As a kind of celebration? How many did he let off?"

"How many did you say, dear?"

"I didn't just say."

"But you must know." There was an edge of suspicion in Tommy's voice.

"I don't suppose the child counted, Tommy."

"No, of course I did not count," with an aggrieved air.

"U-um!" said Tommy.

"These flowers are really lovely," went on Christine, hastily. "Will you take them in, Ada. You are lighter-footed than I. Put them on the dresser, where she will see them first thing."

Ada went unsuspectingly upon the mission and as she disappeared with the vase Christine turned to meet the other's accusing glance.

"How stupid you are, Tommy. Of course, it was only me. I was silly enough to faint and Mr. Torrance saw me. Ada doesn't need to know that. I'm alright now. But I'll admit I felt dreadfully this afternoon. I don't know how I happened to faint, and it's quite true about the holidays. I am to get full pay and have my same place when I go back."

"Oh—indeed!" There was a volume of comment in Tommy's voice. Christine dimpled.

"He didn't do it on account of my good looks, either," she said mischievously. "He did it to save himself the pangs of a disturbed conscience. I assure you that he looked upon me with something like horror. I was a 'orrid proof of something rotten in the state of Denmark. Young ladies may faint, but not in Mr. Torrance's Stores, and above all not in Mr. Torrance's sacred presence. I could see that the poor man felt quite upset."

"Pity he didn't feel upset some years ago," commented the grim Tommy.

"Yes, but better late than never. You see, he's just getting around to it. If he really takes things in hand I can hear things falling in the future."

"So!"

"Well, I think he will. He's so nice looking. People don't look nice in that way unless they are really nice. Even Ada said he "sounded nice."

"Did she? What is he like?" Tommy's voice was eager. But as item by item, Christine set forth the details of Mr. Torrance's appearance, Tommy's face grew woebegone.

"He does not look at all like me, I suppose?" he remarked casually.

"Oh, not at all." Christine's laugh tinkled musically. She did not mean to be unkind, for Tommy's broadness and shortness had always been a privileged joke; but this time, as she was quick to detect, the light words carried a sting. Was Tommy becoming vain?

"Tommy," she announced dramatically, "guess what happened to-day? A man spoke to me without being introduced!"

Immediately all Tommy's selfish yearnings were forgotten., "Where?" he demanded briefly.

"On the street."

"What was his name?"

Christine's pretty eyebrows rose in innocent surprise. "Now, Tommy, didn't I tell you he had not been introduced?"

"Well, what was he like?"

"Oh, just a man. Rather tall, rather fair, nicely dressed."

"Lots of men are that."

"Yes. He was like lots of men. But I don't think he'll annoy me again. He looked so ashamed when I spoke to him."

"When you spoke to him!"

"Yes, I had to, you know. I said, "Young man, I know thee not. Let a humble maiden go her way in peace."

"Christine!"

"Well—I did—or words to that effect. You didn't think I could, did you, Tommy?"

"No, I didn't. I don't think it now. It's a shame and a disgrace that a young girl cannot walk on a public street without being exposed to—to—that kind of thing." Tommy's anger spluttered fiercely. "And how about that piano chap—any more letters from him?"

Christine cast down meek eyes.

"One more," she admitted softly.

"Christine, dear, I wish you wouldn't. I don't like it."

Christine's eyes flashed up, sparkling.

"How can you say so? You didn't read it. It was a very nice letter. I liked it."

But Tommy was not to be side-tracked. "I don't mean that letter, that particular letter," he said. "I mean the whole thing. You know so little of him—"

"Yes. It would be nice if I knew more," cheerfully. "But when he comes back I shall."

"You will have to tell Ada and Celia then," said Tommy, grimly.

"Yes, and I have thought of a way—a lovely way. You see, you know him now. I introduced you. Well, you can just bring him to call—"

"Never."

"Oh, Tommy."

"I tell you I will not."

"And then you could introduce all of us and everything would be all right."

"Would it?"

"And Ada would be spared such-er-anxiety."

"It will be you who will have caused it, Christine."

"Yes, but it would be your fault, really. Because if you refuse—"

"I do refuse."

"—to introduce him, I shall have to say: 'Ada, here is Mr. Wareham, a young man whom I have met in clandestine fashion and with whom I have corresponded in defiance of Mrs. Grundy. Tommy knew all about it—"

"Christine!"

"Well, you did, you know. Didn't you?"

"If I did, it—"

"Still asleep," said Ada, coming back softly. But feeling with that wonderful sixth sense of the blind that the atmosphere of the room was charged with feeling, she added quickly, "What is the matter?"

"I was telling Tommy my adventures and he did not like them," pouted Christine. "And, oh, Tommy, there is still another. You know that ugly old woman I told you about? Well, she came right up to me and spoke."

"What ugly old woman?" The blind girl's voice was sharp. Both Tommy and Christine turned to her in surprise.

"It's nothing, Ada. Just an old beggar. She seems to haunt these streets, and I have often noticed her watching me—"

"Watching you. Did you say 'watching'?"

"Dear, what is the matter? She was only making up her mind to beg. To-day she screwed up her courage and did it."

"What did she say?" Ada's face was so white that Christine was frightened.

"She only asked for money, dear. She is quite a harmless old thing. I never would have told you if I thought you would have worried. No doubt the poor woman was hungry—and I had nothing but car tickets."

Ada's color came slowly back into her pale face. "I am foolish," she murmured. "But I have a horror of beggars. Christine, will you run down to the store for some butter. There is none for breakfast."

Christine jumped up with alacrity, and for once Tommy did not interpose with his ready, "Let me go instead."

She was hardly out of hearing when the blind girl turned to him in a passion of nervous anger. "How long have you known this?" she demanded imperiously. "Why did you not warn us?"

"Warn you? What do you mean?"

"This old woman—Christine says you saw her—watching—"

"What of it? I did see her once, or thought I did. She is only an old beggar. The watching is all in Christine's imagination—anything out of the ordinary, I mean. Everyone watches Christine. She told you herself that she attempted to beg from her. It is quite an ordinary occurrence."

"Do you think so—really? It frightened me so. I suppose I am foolish. But it has always been like a nightmare to me." She dropped her voice to a nervous whisper. "What if that creature who deserted her is alive? Watching?"

"Nonsense!"

"How do you know? Or what if she left a sister or a cousin or someone who knows the story? What if one of them should come forward now? She is so sweet, so pretty. It terrifies me to think of that black shadow behind her!"

"Don't, Ada. Even if one of these improbable fears proved true, no one could take Christine from you—not even her own mother."

"It isn't that. But think of what it would mean to her. The whole shameful story. To find out that instead of being one of a family, loved and cherished from her birth, and with a mother and father whom she can honor and love, she was that most pitiful of all things—a deserted child—left like a stray cat to live or die. Haven't you any imagination? Don't you see that it would darken all her life? Is it any wonder that I am terrified?""

Tommy turned away that he might not see the rare tears which filled the blind girl's eyes.

"Yes, Ada, I see. And I have guarded her as well as I could. And you two girls have been wonderful. But, really, I do not think that you need worry. That woman who left her is dead, depend upon it. And if anyone had been left who knew the story, you would have heard of her before this. Besides, the only possible motive for anyone speaking now would be blackmail, and the demand would come to us, not to the girl. Then," Tommy's broad shoulders squared themselves, "we would know how to deal with it."

It was too bad that the blind girl could not have seen Tommy's blue eyes then—kind and brave. Yes, they were indeed kind and brave and full of the love of a brave, kind heart. Some sense of it did reach her, perhaps, for she leaned over and took his short, square hand in her long white one.

"Not many girls have a friend like you, Tommy," she said gently.

There was no one to see, so for once he looked at her as a man looks at the woman he loves; but the blind girl only knew that his hands grew cold under hers.

CHAPTER XVIII.

ADAM TORRANCE had never been a hard man. Save where pride was concerned he had been considered, by others more callous than himself, to be quite inconveniently sentimental. It was known that no appeal from one in trouble ever reached Mr. Torrance in vain; the difficulty was to reach him. Like most rich men, he was

Continued on page 42

THE COST OF A CRIME

A Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Reedham steals thirteen thousand pounds of trust money, held by the firm of Lowther, Currie and Company in London, England. He confesses to his friend, Lidgate, who allows him to escape, and who afterwards informs Mrs. Reedham of the crime. The only child, Leslie, is at school in Surrey.

CHAPTER II. (Continued).

THE AFTERMATH.

MRS. REEDHAM shook her head.

"Thank you, dear, but—but don't you see I must go this road alone?—that while I am, and will always be, grateful for your love, it cannot shield me from all the blows that must come? But it will be quickly over, and soon I shall get away to some little house where I can be at peace."

"How could John Reedham do it?" cried Evelyn rebelliously. "Oh, it was wicked and cruel; and to leave you to bear it all alone is the worst of all. I shall never forgive him."

"He cannot be happy where he is," said Bessie steadily; and her wide, sad eyes seemed to be gazing into impossible depths. "Let us try to think that, and not be too hard on him."

The maid brought in the tea tray at the moment, and somewhat relieved the strain. They did not linger very long; the object of their visit—to hear some particulars and assure her of their sympathy—had been accomplished. They felt that even she did not desire them to prolong their visit then. They were very silent as they walked through the leafy garden to the beautiful sheltered road leading to the station.

"I don't realize it even yet, Teddy," said Mrs. Luttrell at length. "And I can't believe it of John Reedham. I have heard of people living a double life. Do you think it could have been anything of that kind?"

"I don't know; I hardly think he was that kind of man. But the motive does not matter so much as the consequences, and they are disastrous enough."

They returned saddened and perplexed to their cheerful household, and Evelyn felt that she could not see Leslie Reedham that night, or she must betray something of her inward thought.

They reached Reigate, however, only to find that someone had been before them.

Comforted and strengthened by the sympathy and practical assurance of her friends, and reassured concerning the immediate future of her boy, Bessie Reedham was the better prepared for the visit of the stern old Scotchman, whose condemnation of Reedham had been without stint.

From an upper window she could see his tall, spare figure turn the end of the road and come towards the house. She even fancied that his face, with its grey whiskers and straggling beard, was sterner than usual, and that the long line of his clean-shaven lip was without mercy.

He was shown to her presence without delay, and she, not certain whether to offer her hand in the usual greeting, stood a little proudly in the middle of the room waiting for some advance on his part.

He put down his hat and gloves, which he had carried with him into the room, and approached her with a sort of dry compassion.

"I am very sorry for you," he said sincerely, if a trifle harshly. "Please sit down; this is a monstrous business. Lidgate says you can throw no light on it, but I have come to see for myself."

"Mr. Lidgate is right; I know nothing, Mr. Currie," she said quietly. "No woman has ever understood business less than I have done, and I—I have nothing to say."

The senior partner glanced enquiringly round the room, as if seeking to appraise its value. But there was nothing to help him there. The home was luxurious, but in no way beyond the position of the man who had lived in it. His own house on Hampstead Heath had cost much more. And he had never heard Mrs. Reedham's name coupled with extravagance. As families they were not intimate, having little in common, a formal dinner once or twice a year, and the subsequent calls comprised the sum of their intercourse. He ran his fingers perplexedly through his thin grey hair.

"I simply can't understand it. He was earning a good income from the business, he had a home like this, what more could a man want? It forces one to the conclusion that there was a mystery somewhere. It may seem harsh to put certain questions to you, but this is a time when private feelings must be relegated to the background. If you know of anything in your husband's private life to account for this, it is your duty to tell us, even at the cost of pain to yourself."

"I know nothing, Mr. Currie," she repeated, and her bosom rebelliously heaved.

He shook his head.

"I would not shirk that duty, believe me, Mr. Currie; but I can throw no light upon it," she repeated, controling herself with an effort. "So far as I know my husband had no secrets from me. He did not talk business with me, certainly. He was fond of saying a man ought to leave it behind him when he came home. I am simply left in the dark as much as any of you."

The old man gave a kind of snort and shrugged his shoulders.

"And you have not heard from him of course?"

"I have not."

"Well, it's a desperate business. It is very hard on honorable men like myself and Sir Philip Lowther. Lidgate is younger, and, in a sense, has his record still to make. I am so ashamed, I have not been the same man at home, and I am afraid to tell my wife. She will see it in the papers herself tomorrow, and it will be a crushing blow to her."

"But you have done nothing wrong," she suggested, with a curious inflection in her voice.

"Of course not," he said with an aggressive squaring of the shoulders. That makes it all the harder. The innocent suffer with the guilty. My daughters will feel it acutely also, and perhaps we shall have to leave Hampstead. I am an elder in St. Stephens. It will be my duty to withdraw from that office and give up much that is precious to a man of my character and standing."

There was a querulous note in his voice which easily indicated that selfish considerations were uppermost in his mind. Bessie Reedham remained silent. She was humiliated and ashamed beyond all telling, but she was not moved to sympathy. The self-righteous old Scotchman repelled her, that was all. She thought of his fussy, ambitious wife, so houseproud over her mansion on the Heath, of the angular, prim, complacent daughters, and gave a little sigh. Currie, though not a sensitive man, suddenly became aware that her interest and sympathy for him were of the most lukewarm order. He looked at her rather severely from under his beetling brows.

"You will have to leave this house and sell your furniture, of course."

"Yes, I shall have to do that."

"There might be a few things Mrs. Currie could make room for at Fair Lawn. There is not much got for second-hand furniture in the auction rooms. Private sale is generally best. I will send her up when she is able to face everything. That will probably be next week. I shall have to tell her to-night before the newspaper announcement to-morrow. And the boy? He will have to turn out and earn for you and himself."

"His teacher has been here to-day, and in the meantime he will keep him at Reigate," she said, bravely, remembering as a precious thing the warm and tender sympathy that had come to her from the Luttrells.

Currie shook his head.

"A mistake, indeed, even if they are willing to keep him for nothing. It will do the boy good to understand that he has to be a prop to you, and that as far as he can, he must atone for his father's sin. The consequences of it may be further reaching than any of us can grasp now. There must have been a serious lack of moral responsibility about Reedham. I was opposed to the partnership. As I reminded both Sir Philip and Lidgate, we had not proved him, and there was a certain flippancy of character I never liked. Of course, he was popular. That class of man generally is, until he is found out."

"Mr. Currie!" cried Bessie, in tones of acute distress. "Need we prolong this conversation? It is most painful to me. You forget you are speaking of my husband. Whatever may have been his faults outside, he was a good husband to me, and I loved him dearly."

"It is to your credit that you can speak like that considering the awful position in which you are left through his wickedness," was the unpromising reply. "Of course the greatest kindness he could have shown at the last was to disappear as he has done. The consequences would have been even more painful if he had remained. But at the same time he will not altogether escape punishment, nor is it desirable that he should. The Book says, 'As ye sow, so shall ye reap.'"

Bessie Reedham looked round desperately, wondering just how much more she could stand. At that moment the door was suddenly pushed wide open and a boy dashed in, having heard the last words uttered with the righteous solemnity of the conventionally religious man.

His young, eager face was flushed, his eyes were rebelliously bright, his whole attitude betokened a fine spirit strung to the highest pitch. He was quick enough to grasp the fact that in some way this man was inflicting suffering on his mother. He ran to her and threw his young arm about her and turned his brave face to the grim old man.

"If you have anything more to say, sir, say it to me," he cried rebelliously. "Don't you see that my mother is not fit to be tormented like this? It is cruel of you. She cannot help what has happened. Pray go."

Bessie Reedham bowed her head a moment on her boy's slim shoulder, and a sudden sweetness welled in her heart. After all, she was not alone, there was something strong and precious between her and the buffets of the world!

Currie looked considerably put out, his face flushed slowly, and he frowned upon the lad's eager face.

"Come, come, young sir, that is not a becoming way to speak to your elders and betters," he said reprovingly. "A very different spirit should animate you at the present time, I assure you."

"I don't care! You should not be unkind to my mother, and I will protect her," was the undaunted reply. "She is not responsible for anything that has happened, and anyhow no gentleman makes war on a woman."

Bessie Reedham put her hand over the boy's eager mouth.

"Hush, hush, darling. Mr. Currie is doubtless within his rights. Pray forgive him, sir. It is his love for me that guides his tongue. I am proud of it. God help me, it is all I have left."

Mr. Currie took up his hat and began to draw on his left hand glove.

"A futile interview," he muttered. "I am sorry not to see a more chastened spirit, but still I will ask my wife to call upon you when she is able for the ordeal. Good day, Mrs. Reedham, I would advise you to curb that young son of yours, to bring a little discipline to bear on him, or you may have trouble of another kind in the near future." He went out as he had come, leaving a cloud behind him. Leslie shook his clenched hand after the retreating figure, and once more assured his mother of his courage and ability to fight for her.

"But, darling, how are you here?" she faltered. "Mr. and Mrs. Luttrell have not long gone. How did you know that trouble had come? I had planned to keep it from you for a few more days at least."

The color receded from the lad's face as he put his hand slowly in his pocket, drawing from it a plain, common envelope, evidently addressed in a disguised hand.

"This came by the noon post. I was just in time to get the two o'clock train. I got permission from Mr. Greville. I showed it to him and he seemed to grasp it at once. He even came to the station with me, and was so very kind."

Bessie Reedham took the slip of paper from its covering and devoured it with desperate eyes. It was very short and began without heading or prefix of any kind.

"My boy, whenever you receive this go to your mother, she will need you. Try to forget your old dad, except that he loves you. God! How he loves both you and your mother, neither you nor she will ever know."

"Mother, give it to me, it is mine," he said, when she would have put it in the bosom of her dress. "What has daddy done? It is something in business, of course. I knew when I saw that old bounder here."

"Hush, dear; Mr. Currie is a very worthy man; he cannot help the way he is made. Yes, it is business. Your father has made some disastrous speculation. I am unable to explain what, nobody can explain it, but it amounts to defalcation."

The lad's face blanched.

"Does that mean that the police would have had him, will have him now, like they had Mr. Wallis, who lived in Grove Road, last year?"

She nodded.

"But it will be cleared up some day. Father will pay back the money, I know he will," he cried proudly. "Father would never really rob anybody, or be guilty in that way. Why, mother, don't you know it is impossible?"

The high clear note in the lad's voice fell like music of the spheres on Bessie Reedham's rent heart. The boy's faith in his father was absolutely the first and only ray of light that had been shed on her desolate heart.

"You make me live again, dearest," she whispered brokenly. "Leslie, promise me that whatever happens, you will stick to that, and keep on telling me about it."

"But, mother, you ought to believe it too, of dad!" said the boy in tones of pain and surprise. "Why, don't we know what he was, the very best dad in the whole wide world?"

His voice broke, and with an effort he choked back the tears which he felt must now be unmanly. "I wish that he could hear you, that all the world could hear!" she cried. "Surely God sent you to me to-day, Leslie, for indeed I felt I could not bear any more. But now let us talk of other things. You have no idea how kind the Luttrells have been. You will be able to stay on at Reigate perhaps, for another year, through their great kindness."

The lad shook his head.

"No, mother, I shall never go back. What I have to do now is to stop by you and work for you till father comes back?"

She was unable to reply, and was casting about for some suitable word, when the doorbell rang, and in a minute Lidgate was shown in. He looked the surprise he felt at sight of the boy.

"You here, Leslie? How does it come about? When I saw you yesterday, Mrs. Reedham, you did not expect him?"

"No, he heard accidentally of what had happened, and came off at once. He has just this moment said he will not go back, that his future duty must be to care for me."

She shook hands with Lidgate as she spoke these words, and the pride of a fond mother shone in her eyes. Lidgate smiled a trifle ruefully at the boy.

"A very natural and right resolve," he said heartily. "But how old are you, Leslie?"

"Nearly fourteen. I was going to Winchester in the autumn. I am quite big enough to work."

He drew himself up as he spoke and threw back his finely-shaped head. It was a gesture so like John Reedham's own that both started, and Bessie grew a shade paler.

"Well, it is never too young to make a beginning," said Lidgate, trying to speak naturally. Somehow, the pleasure he had anticipated in another confidential talk with Bessie Reedham was marred by the youngster, and he realized, what he had not as yet done, that he was a force to be reckoned with. He was astonished to find him so well-grown and so manly; he had not happened to see him for a whole year.

"Did you meet Mr. Currie as you came up the Grove Road?" Bessie asked. She was very quick in intuition, and immediately felt that sympathy was lacking between Lidgate and her son.

"No, I came by the Lane. I knew he intended to call to-day, and I hoped that I might be in time to meet him here. I am afraid that he was very disagreeable. He was not in a good humor to-day, you may imagine."

"He was rude to my mother, Uncle George," cried Leslie hotly, "and I resented it. I just came in time to tell him to shut up. I think him a horrid man."

"Hush, dear, Mr. Currie has had provocation," his mother reminded him. Even at cost to herself she would be just. But the hot spirit of the boy, detecting in these words disloyalty to his father he passionately adored, burst forth again. He turned his flashing eyes on Lidgate's face.

"Look here, Uncle George, surely you believe that father will come back yet to explain everything —that if things don't seem quite straight, there has been a mistake somewhere? You can't believe—nobody could—that he would take money that did not belong to him?"

"We hope it may be cleared up some day, dear lad," said Lidgate softly. We must all live in that hope."

But though the words were uttered sincerely enough, they rang false in Leslie Reedham's ears. He had inherited from his mother an astonishing quickness of intuition, almost amounting to inspiration, and in his mind from that moment he wrote Lidgate down as the enemy of his father.

He could not have explained just then why he believed it. Certainly he had no real grounds, but his eyes filled with a dull suspicion, and jealousy consumed his heart.

Bessie Reedham saw the boy's lowering brows, and looked rather anxiously at Lidgate when the boy suddenly dashed out of the room.

"I don't seem to know this Leslie," she said, perplexedly. "Can you explain him to me?"

CHAPTER III.

SANCTUARY.

MRS. MARY ANNE WEBBER had put her numerous brood to bed, and heard her last lodger go upstairs, and had just settled herself for a mouthful of bread and cheese and a glass of stout, when the front door bell rang.

She grunted, and looked enquiringly at the clock, as much as to enquire whether its honest face could throw any light upon the untimely ring.

It was now twenty minutes to eleven o'clock.

"The Bobby, maybe that tiresome Tommy's left the area window open, as like as not."

She pushed back her chair, and wiping her mouth, proceeded in leisurely fashion out to the hall, where she produced a box of matches from her pocket and lit the gas. All her movements were leisurely. Yet it was astonishing what an amount of actual bodily exertion she managed to get through in a day; the immaculate state of the house proclaimed that someone toiled early and late for the comfort or the household. That somebody was Mary Anne herself. Her face was very comely and placid, and betrayed no signs of perturbation as she undid the bolt of the front door.

She kept up the chain, however, and peered through the narrow opening with a caution befitting a widow woman who had learned to take care of herself.

"Who is it at this time o' nite?" she enquired, not querulously, but rather with a kind of patient forbearance. "Everybody's gone to bed, and nobody's goin' to be took up in this house to-night, no, not for Halbert Hedward hisself, so there!"

"Have you a room to let, Mrs. Webber," a low voice enquired, "I want a bed for the night, perhaps longer. Open the door."

"Not ef I knows it," replied Mrs. Webber firmly. "Respectable folks don't come to respectable houses at sech a time o' nite. There's a common lodging house down to College Street; that'll just suit yer, I guess.' "

Mrs. Webber seldom minced her words, and had a habit of saying precisely what she meant. The lodger who disliked plain speech was at liberty to shift his camp. She could afford to be independent, for her house had a high reputation for cleanliness and honesty, and first-rate cooking. Mary Anne had found that independence pays.

The stranger without the gates cleared his throat a little for another attempt.

"I'll pay you well," he said desperately. "I—I have reasons for wishing to come here. If you open the door I'll be more explicit."

"Maybe they're after yer, eh?" she asked facetiously. "You'd better be going quietly, mister. I keeps a policeman's whistle handy to my pocket, and the beat ain't far off."

She would have closed the door, but the suppliant's desperate voice once more intervened.

"Mary Anne, don't you know me, you must let me in. It's an old friend of yours in trouble."

Something came to Mary Anne, a kind of intuition, though it could not be said to be absolute recognition. She undid the chain, and bade him enter. She eyed him keenly as he steeped across the threshold, but still failed to recognize him. A tall, thin, clean-shaven man, though with a sort of stoop in his shoulders, and a furtive look in the eyes behind the blue goggles; he was unlike any man of her acquaintance. Yet there seemed something hauntingly familiar about these eyes.

"Don't know yer, mister," she said suspiciously. "But, maybe, now ye've wormed yourself in, you'll say yer nime and whatcher wants. I am a lone widder, and though I ain't afraid of the likes of you, I don't want no truck wiv folks that ain't honest and sober, and hardworkin', see, them's the werry foundations of forty-siving St. Paul's Crescent."

The stranger faintly, ironically smiled, and it seemed as if some vague fear fell away from him. For this woman had known him on terms of intimacy for five years, had been a servant in his house, carrying his meals and opening his door, and though he stood of a set purpose directly under the light of the hall lamp, she failed to recognize him.

"Can I come in anywhere, Mary Anne?" he enquired; then some familiar inflection of his voice went home and she gave a little cry as she walked before him to the sitting-room door.

"Lor-a-mighty, tain't Mister Reed'am," she said, beginning to tremble, though why she could not have told.

"You have said it, Mary Anne," he replied, "I am your old master in need of help and shelter, and—and I had better say it out frankly, hiding."

"Lor-a-mighty!" she repeated, and her placid face grew pale, and her hand trembled as she steadied herself by the end of the table to take a better look at him.

"Lor-a-mighty," she repeated, I shouldn't a knowed yer. Wotever is it? Wotever 'as happened, and where is the Missus and Marster Leslie?"

He shook his head, and there was such anguish in his eyes that her kind heart smote her almost to tears.

"Don't go fer to tell me anythink I ain't needin' to know," she said quickly. "I never wus one to ast questions or pry inter nobody's business. Them as goes pokin' their noses into that fire gits burnt hoftener then they like. You looks desprit. Hexcuse me, sir, but—but are they hafter yer?"

She made mysterious signs with her eyes and her fingers, and Reedham merely nodded in response.

"Listen, Mary Anne, and I will tell you all you need to know. It is business trouble, which I cannot explain to you; you would not understand it. I have spent money that did not belong to me, always hoping to get it back, and be able to repay, you can follow that?"

"I kin. It's a bad wy, Mister Reedham, fer rich or fer pore, it don't matter. It leads 'em all the sime wy."

"Yes, but one does not always stop to think of that. There were other reasons why I wanted to get rich quick, reasons I have never breathed to a soul. One day, perhaps I may tell you. The hue and cry will die down soon, I expect. Every day I have expected to read an account of myself in the newspapers, and the general idea will be, that I have committed suicide as they generally do."

"I see."

Mary Anne began to grasp the situation, and she never took her eyes from the white, desperate face of the man standing by her table pleading for shelter and help. She knew that she would give him both. She had no code of ethics as taught by the schools, but she had a grateful heart, and the years of her service at Norwood had been rendered pleasant and easy by the unfailing kindness and consideration of this man, who had been her master.

"You kin stop, of course. I don't want to know any more, please, nor tell me another think. I honly want to ast one question. Is it safe, for yerself, I means?"

"I think it will be safe. You have known me well, you did not recognize me, Mary Anne, you look at me now as if I were a stranger."

"Yer own wife wouldn't know yer, sir, I never seed such a chinge. But fer how long? What'll be the hend of it, sir?"

"The end will justify the means, Mary Anne. I have been cast outside the pale; I will find my way back again. And that money will be honestly earned and refunded, do you understand? If I live, I will do that."

She regarded him doubtfully, yet with a certain admiration. She was only an ignorant woman, but she knew that the task of which he spoke with such a desperate confidence was a superhuman one. In her reminiscent moments she was fond of railing against the inexorableness of London life, and of alluding to the city itself as a huge monster without bowels of compassion.

She knew little about business, but her eyes filled with an immense compassion as she looked and listened to Reedham in that desperate hour of his downfall and disgrace. Help him she would, however, to the very best of her ability, and he read it in her eyes.

"I don't want much, and for that little I can pay," he said feverishly. "Some small back room which would serve as a respectable address; silence and peace to go in and out, but above all the feeling that you are in the background, a friend to whom I may speak when life becomes unendurable, these are the things I have come to ask, Mary Anne. It is a great deal, but—but by granting them you may save a soul."

"Yer kin 'ave the room, an' has fer pay we shan't quarrel abart thet. Many's the sovring hover an' above I got at Norwood from yerself, an' from the Missus. Is she ter know you are 'ere?"

"No, no; nobody must know," he answered feverishly. "Henceforth I am dead, do you understand, dead to the old life and the old name; I shall be Thomas Charlton, of St. Paul's Crescent, Camden Town. That is all you need to know concerning me."

"But the missus"; faltered Mary Anne, going back in memory to the love which had been the mainspring of the Norwood home, illumining life for all its inmates.

"If my wife believes me dead, it is the best that can happen," he said gloomily.

Mary Anne shook her head.

"It'll break her heart, sir, maybe hafter things 'as bin forgot a while you or I could let her know, quiet like, that you're 'ere."

"No, no, that could never happen. I must work out my own salvation alone. If it so be that fortune attends me, and I am able to reinstate myself before it is too late, so be it. But I understand that I have to pay the price."

"But, sir, they're mighty clever, them 'tecs now. Supposin' they tracks you 'ere?"

"They'll not take me alive, but I think my disguise is complete. I have been back to our very own premises and spoken to the porter who has seen me every day of his life for the last twenty years, and he did not recognize me. If my wife should communicate with you in any way you will promise to hold your tongue?"

"I will, but I ain't 'eard from the missus for over a year," she said regretfully. "I've been allus goin' to run over to Norwood ov a Sunday, but it ain't never come hoff, so much the better as it turns out. Well, will yer 'ave a bit of bread an' cheese, sir? It's werry 'umble fare, an' the honly bite I gits in peace an' quiet, hafter they're all a-bed."

"I am afraid I have disturbed you wofully. No, I will not eat anything. If you can show me to the room, a back room for preference, I'll go to bed. I've slept on some strange beds the last week, I tell you. It will seem like a paradise to-night."

"There's the room back o' this, an' yer'll want the sittin' room as well. Party only lef' it on Monday, goin' back to Ameriky."

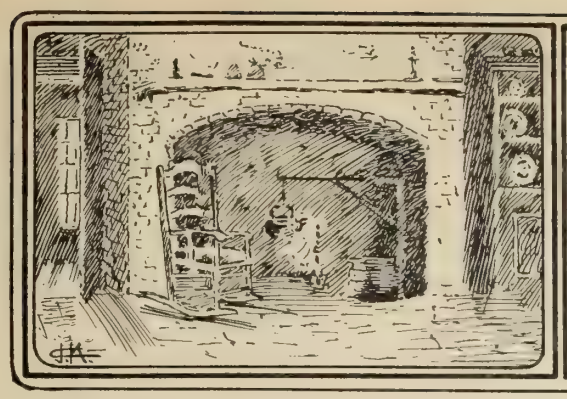
Reedham shook his head.

"I could not pay for this meanwhile, Mary Anne, and I don't care how small the room may be. I know it will be clean and sweet, and will savor of home."

He spoke as he felt. The hunted experience of the past few days had changed his whole outlook on life, and he naturally idealized the homely woman whom in the whole hostile wilderness of London was the only one he thought he might trust. She, no less than he, knew how great was the debt under which he was laid by her readiness to help.

"The room's jes' 'ere," she said, stepping back to the communicating door. "It's the honly one I've got. I'm full hup now, cep fer this. And I carn't let 'em seperit. I kin afford it, sir, to let yer 'ave 'em cheap, as cheap as nuthin' maybe, till yer gits round the corner. Yer see me worst battle's over. Teddy he's earning his sixteen shillin' a week now in Goodall's down to College Street, an' likely to go hon gittin' better, for 'e's a clever chap wiv 'is 'ands and 'is 'ead. An' even little Tommy 'as his 'arf crown o week fer goin' hafter a milk pram, and Tilda's to the dressmakin', an' little Annie gits that 'andy abart the 'ouse, yer can't think. Oh, me battle's hover, an' I kin eve a bite to spare for a

Continued on page 46



AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

"Were I so tall to reach the Pole,
Or grasp the ocean with my span,
I must be measured by my soul,
The mind's the standard of the man."

THE SERVANT QUESTION

TO give a whole page of my ideas on the servant question is something I promised, and therefore shall fulfil, although it seems to be a subject worn threadbare, one that has always been, and always will exist, as broad as the world, that cannot be explained, and is apparently unsolvable. It has been presented to us from every standpoint, has been reasoned out, and viewed from every possible position. Each phase of the question has received its quota of attention; it has been scoffed at, wrangled over, and debated upon, until there would seem to be nothing more to say, and when all is said and written, it remains at the starting point.

We cannot get past the fact that domestic service is so objectionable that girls will enter any other employment in preference, and in consequence, are growing less in numbers; that they are asking more money for less service, and demanding greater privileges continually. Also, that housekeepers are finding it more and more difficult to secure and retain the services of a maid, that there is a lack of interest in their work, and an independence of spirit among them that is unendurable. This is what I understand the so-called servant question to embody, with its branches and spur lines of discontent and dissatisfaction, reaching the lives and homes of all who are obliged to perform and accept such necessary service.

The whole system seems to be unsettled, and needs readjustment. Of all the present-day problems women have to deal with, it is the most vexed. There are wrongs to be set right on both sides, there are underlying principles to be regulated, a solid foundation to be laid. Everything seems to be too haphazard in relation to the question. It lacks the business basis upon which men engage their employes, they demand qualification for the position, discharge them as often as their inability is discovered, treat them as being responsible for their side of the bargain, and failing to meet requirements, pay and dismiss them. They do not batter each other with a fusilade of questions regarding character and privileges, nor waste time discussing a contract that may only last a day. They are told to "Come on in the morning, and we'll give you a trial," and if at night they are paid off, no one accuses the employer of being a hard man. This is where women should take a leaf out of man's book, not fearing the verdict of being considered "a dreadful woman to please," because she is trying to select what answers the demand in her case.

THERE is a root to the matter, deep-seated and well-grounded, and it sprang up generations ago when all labor was considered menial, and slaves were compelled to work for tyrannical masters, and all down through the centuries that inherent sentiment has lived, bearing its fruits of opposition to tyranny on the one hand, and an overbearing attitude of superiority on the other, a downtrodden race looked down upon by an aristocratic class. The labor question and laws are endeavoring to uproot this long-fostered idea that work is ignoble. They are preaching a new gospel of dignity of labor, and proving the truth of "The mind's the standard of the man."

Let us go back in Canadian history to the root of the matter, when all were on equal footing, and the daughter of one respectable settler helped the wife of another in times of sickness, and in busy seasons. Jack was as good as his master; there were no fine distinctions; all sat together, and ate at the same table. As the country grew and the Old Land customs crept in, there was resentment about people being so much better and grander than their servants, and when maids arrived who had spent years in service, and perfected themselves for their positions, who were not averse to wearing the badge of servant, nor ashamed of the name, young Canada awakened to the fact that they must fall in line. But they never did it with a good grace, and this feeling of equality was largely responsible. The very air and swing of the new country breathed freedom, the maid of one year was the mistress of next, and the Old Country girls caught the infection, and threw aside much of the restraint which had always surrounded them, and, behold! we have an independent class of workers to deal with, who demand their rights, and largely make their own laws.

Right here a great mistake has been made, and both sides have blundered. There has been a tendency to keep down this self-reliant spirit among servants, to make them feel subordinate, and they have been subjected to indignities, their demands have not been met. Then they, themselves, do not seem to realize that while the earth lasts there will always be servants and masters, and that their master is servant to some one above him, that we are all servants in a way. They have not learned to understand how dignified they could be in performing their tasks, nor how much power they have to elevate their own work to the measure of their minds. "I have never been asked to do such a thing," a maid demurred, when asked to do a certain piece of work. I took the pail and brush, and did the work myself. "Now," I said, as I finished, "I do not feel that I have lowered myself in doing that, because I never stoop to the level of my work, I raise it to the level of my mind." In my experience with servants I constantly try to impress that all work should be characterized by the best that is in us of mind and effort, that "whatever is worth doing at all is worth doing well."

WOMEN complain of the incompetence of the average maid. They are not qualified to fill the place, but are willing to learn at her expense. She undertakes to teach, to train, to reason with, the results varying according to the material she has to work upon, and there may be patient instruction and honest endeavor, or it may be scoldings and dismissal. Often when they have done their best, even teaching them to speak our language, overlooking mistakes and condoning faults, they meet with downright ingratitude, inasmuch as some slight provocation, or more money will lead them to desert a woman who has been faithful and kind, and strike out for fresh pasture, no matter what the predicament the sudden departure may mean to the one who has sacrificed so much time and nerve force to help her attain to a standard of usefulness which will benefit her for all time.

On the other hand, servants accuse women of being unreasonable, of keeping them occupied too long hours, and allowing them no time they can call their own while in the house, thrusting upon them in their leisure, work they are not supposed to do, and expecting them to understand the care of children as well. Let me give you the verdict of one who believes she knows: "If women would show some consideration for the comforts of their maids, treat them as though they were human beings; let them get out of the kitchen occasionally, and try and elevate them by example and good treatment, there would be less trouble in keeping help in the home."

A diversity of mistress and of maid, the different ways of dealing with them, and the various demands of our homes, has raised a barrier of distrust and suspicion. This can often be broken down by timely explanations. For instance, a maid broke out with, "A woman told me to-night that she wouldn't work for people if she wasn't good enough to go in and out of the same door the family did." I explained that it was not a question of good enough, but a matter of convenience. "You know," I said, "how often after office hours, my husband has little business talks in the front hall; you would not wish to disturb that by passing through, and you also see how the children use the side door." She was perfectly satisfied. No two homes are conducted on the same principle, and are as widely diverse as it is possible to be, and should afford an opening for every style and disposition of maid. There are qualities common to all our necessities, such as honesty, truthfulness and faithful service. Beyond that, one should decide the attribute desirable in a domestic for her particular needs, then kindly overlook what is not up to the standard in other matters. (I would ask "thoroughness" as a chief quality).

"WHEN you women treat your helpers as we men do ours, you will be able to keep them," said a man to me. "We are not ashamed to be seen speaking to them on the street, or walking with them, or even driving with them, but you women would not be seen doing that." I did not try to argue the point with him, because I knew there were grains of truth in his sweeping assertion, but I resolved to think it over, and get at the reason why women do not make "jolly good fellows" of themselves, as this man seemed to feel he was prepared to do. Now, I swallowed his speech with a pinch of salt, because I think he would do all he said, in a business way, but I doubt whether he would give him an invitation for a pleasure trip on his yacht, or to a dinner in his home. And why not? The man would not want it nine times out of ten; he would prefer his own chums.

Just so with maids. Their friendships are formed before they enter our homes, their enjoyments and diversions lie in an entirely different direction. They have individual tastes, and do not want to be interfered with. I admit there are women who seem to fear they will lose prestige should they notice their servants on the street, but they are in the minority, and most girls are recognized by a nod and a smile from their mistress. As to driving out together, why, if they both go, who is to mind the baby, answer the door, the telephone, take in the meat, the ice, and most important proposition, dear man, get the dinner?

The chefs in your clubs or bachelor apartments are not interested in your pleasures, they are interested in doing what you are paying them big wages to do—serving your meals, and doing it well. Our maids ought to have the same interest in the meals dished up to the family, and be perfectly disinterested as to our recreations. There is no reason why we should be confidential friends any more than men should. Ours is a business deal, too; we engage them to do certain parts of our work, and in most cases they would repel any advance towards comradeship, and give us to understand they were capable of managing themselves. I am positive that if I filled the position of servant, helper, hired girl, in any person's house, I would keenly resent anything that prevented me from living my own life as I chose to live it. I will relate a case of mistaken kindness to prove my contention, A friend of mine asked her maid to join the family on their Christmas sleigh ride. She went, giving evidence of her unwillingness by a very sullen demeanor. During the drive she confided to the oldest child that she had given up her own plans with her girl friend, and came along, because she thought she was wanted to help mind the children, while the motive had been to give her pleasure, which was misunderstood.

SO after nearly a quarter of a century of housekeeping, and dealing with the servant question, I have come to the conclusion that the rock of offence that prevents many excellent girls, who love housework above all else, from entering, is not the lack of the bond of sympathy that many people believe should exist between mistress and maid, nor the absence of creature comforts, but because of the social ostracism. A girl may be pretty, neat, competent, educated, but because she is Mrs. So-and-So's maid, she is debarred from association with her equals. As if there is any degradation in one good woman working for another, whether she trims her hat, makes her gowns, or dusts her parlor! The secret lies here—the social status—and girls turn to other occupations, to office work, to clerking, anything, so long as they are admitted within the circle of society, and homes are deprived of smart, clever housekeepers just because women refuse to allow a good, pure girl to enter the ranks and mingle with her "set," because she has not specified hours to work in some public office, but prefers the privacy and protection of a home, and is willing to bear with the diversity of labor a household represents.

The remedy lies largely in the hands of the servants themselves, and the Domestic Science Training Schools hold the key of the solution. Of course, every girl cannot come in touch with that, but it is within the reach of all to raise the standard of their profession. Housekeeping is an art, and it requires an artistic eye and an expert brain to make it a success. When a girl can produce a certificate of efficiency, and can enter a home with the self-assurance that she knows her business, and elevates her calling by bringing to bear upon it scientific knowledge, dons a uniform that will distinguish her as a graduate of a certain institute, she will meet with the same respect that our graduate nurses exact from the people who employ them. Her deportment will coincide with her ability, carrying with it the dignity that will remove all barriers of social standing, her "wages" will be called a salary, she can have her own apartments and appointed hours, and command the best patronage from regular customers, whose homes will open welcome doors, and accord the same courtesy as that which the seamstress and music teacher receive.

If the fact that a woman doing her own work is not lowered in the eyes of her friends, why should the individual who performs the same tasks be demeaned? That brings me back to where I started, viz., that "The mind's the standard of the man." The whole question, therefore, resolves itself into that of a mental attitude. How this will right itself remains to be seen. My prophetic vision fails me here. The Chinaman, the Jap, and other foreign element may assist in solving the matter, but of them I know nothing by experience, only by hearsay. It is with British and Canadian girls my article deals, and the sooner women adopt the business basis, and are broad-minded enough to remove the society ban, the quicker will the servant difficulty disappear. We will have to be educated up to it, and there is no doubt we will rise equal to the circumstances which alter cases in this progressive age, and in this broad and prosperous land of liberty.

THE 1847 GIRL

When You Purchase

Knives, Forks, Spoons

OR

Fancy Serving Pieces

in Silverplate, examine the trade mark closely. If they are stamped

1847 ROGERS BROS. X S TRIPLE

they are genuine

Remember there are other ROGERS, and various makes of silverware which are claimed to be "just as good," but like all imitations they lack the beauty and the wearing qualities identified with the original and genuine the heaviest triple plated silverware obtainable.

1847 ROGERS BROS. X S TRIPLE

Sold by Leading Dealers everywhere, others do not. They will offer and try to induce you to take a substitute.

Examine the trademark and remember to purchase "1847 ROGERS BROS." is to be certain of getting the best.

MERIDEN BRITANNIA CO.
HAMILTON CANADA

With the Journal's Juniors

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

A New Competition

AT the time when this page goes to press it is impossible to say what letters about the holidays have secured the prizes offered. The cousins have written most interesting letters, and we hope to hear from all again.

We are offering two prizes for Juniors under fifteen years of age for the best articles—not exceeding five hundred words—on "A Winter Adventure." The competition will close February 1st, 1912, and the prizes will be three dollars and two dollars. Now, let us have "lots and lots" of letters.

Our Holiday Letters

A DAY IN VACATION

Dear Cousin Clover:

My father has a meadow about three miles from home. While he was cutting his hay we all went, three of my aunts and four of my cousins and two of my sisters and my mother and father and our hired man, and we went canoeing and fishing, and in the woods after birch bark. My two cousins, Thornton and Harry Thornton could not paddle, but Harry and I paddled. We went in bathing. Our hired man came out that night and he asked us if we wanted anything and we said "No." We ate so much the next day, we ate all the food and was very hungry before we reached home. Will close; hope there is room for me. Good-bye.

PHYLLIS MALLETTE.

Aged 9. South Range, Digby Co., N.S.

This is to certify this is Phyllis' own work.

MRS. W. A. MALLETTE.

* * *

Dear Phyllis:

Such a nice little story by a nine-year-old, from far-off Digby County. You must be a strong little girl to be able to paddle at your age. I hope you will have a happy Thanksgiving.

Birds' Hill P. O.
Manitoba.

Dear Cousin Clover:

Here comes a new cousin to join the "Summer Holidays" competition. I couldn't try in "Maple Sugar," as I never so much as saw a sugar maple.

I spent my holidays quietly at home. They were far from dull, though. We live nine miles north of hustling, bustling Winnipeg, but haven't a neighbor within a mile. We can cross Red River, take a trolley, and be in the city within half an hour of leaving home.

A great deal of my time was spent in picking wild berries of all kinds. Wild fruit is so abundant this year. I love to go off alone for rambles in the "bush," which extends for a mile back of the river, and the berries gave me many an excuse. I usually took the dog for company, also because his presence gave me a feeling of security, which, I fear, was unwarranted. I love everything about Nature, and often, when on these solitary expeditions, I have found flowers and fruit whose existence were unknown to my long-resident schoolmates.

Several things happened this vacation which will make me remember 1911. One is that I saw aeroplane flights. At the "Canadian Industrial Exposition" there were many wonderful, beautiful things which delighted me, but this most modern wonder pleased me most. The aviator flew right above me, and the whirring of the planes was too audible for comfort.

Another milestone was that I was first initiated into the delights and mysteries of rowing. The Red River is here about a thousand feet wide. My chief difficulty was that I could not follow a straight and narrow path. By the bubbles in the wake of the "Dipper" I know that mine was serpentine. I have a certain dread of the water, for we hear so much of drowning accidents to Winnipeg pleasure-seekers on the same treacherous river.

Still another event—I saw my first circus. The greatest part of the performance was by trained animals, and they did some truly wonderful things. Then there were contortionists, acrobats, clowns, and a kicking mule. The charm of novelty added to my enjoyment.

Added to these were little jaunts to the city and quiet picnics with my chums, all contributing to the round of quiet pleasures which characterized my summer holidays, and helped me gather energy to carry me through another long school term. I will give you an instance:

A party of intimates gathered at one of our local beauty spots, where giant elms shade the lawn-like river bank. We played some favorite games, ate a lovely supper, and then took to the water like young ducks. Even a sedate miss of nineteen years, gathered up her skirts and romped with the least of us. After we were shod again we went to a chokecherry patch. The fruit was still hard, and "puckery" to taste, but we ate lots. None of us were sick. You see, we are very healthy "out West."

Yours truly,
ISABEL TURNBULL.

Aged 13.

Isabel wrote this without assistance.

MRS. L. TURNBULL.

* * *

Dear Isabel:

It is a pleasure to hear from such a cheery Red River lassie as you. I have not yet visited your province, but am "just longing" to go out West and see how all my cousins are growing. I think you are a fortunate girl to live in such a land. Your letter is very well written.

Owen Sound, Sept. 19th, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

We take the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL and like reading it very much. I especially take an interest in the Juniors' Page. I did not know it was so interesting before.

I will now try and write as good a story as I can on "Our Summer Holiday."

"One day last autumn five of my friends and I went out getting butternuts. It was quite a way out to where we wanted to go, so we started off at half-past seven in the morning. The three boys carried our lunch for us and we carried the empty baskets that we were to bring our butternuts home in, if we got any at all, and, of course, we expected to get them or we would not have come at all.

HAPPY HOURS BY THE CREEK

Photograph by Ruby Williamson

We had to climb barb-wire fences and every kind of fence, and we jumped over ditches, and very often got our feet wet in them. We next crossed an orchard, and we all filled ourselves with the delicious red apples that were on the trees. Then, just as we were climbing over the fence a big-nosed bulldog popped out of the barn, and as Robert was getting over the fence, after he had helped us all over, the bulldog came tearing over to him and tore his stockings all to bits. Robert then ran after us and told us we were going in the wrong direction. Well, at last we got in the right tracks, and walked along as fast as we could till we came upon a large tree that had been knocked down by a storm. The girls said they couldn't walk a step further and I was good and tired, too, so we all sat down upon the old tree.

The boys said they would walk on and when they found a tree loaded with butternuts they would call us, or whistle. We waited a long time, but no sound did we hear. We grew rather impatient and were going to walk on by ourselves when we heard a loud, shill whistle, which echoed through the trees like the wind. We listened from where the whistle had come from and then struck for the place as fast as we could. We heard rustling in the trees above us, and who did we see but three boys, each up a tree. The trees were in a row, and so we named them "The Triplets." The boys had their baskets full, and we set to work to fill ours. The boys shook the trees and we picked them up as fast as we could get them, but, however, we soon had our baskets full.

I then suggested that we have something to eat, so the three of us girls set to work to fix the lunch up, while the boys busied themselves by catching minnows in the stream nearby. We then all sat down and ate a hearty luncheon of ham and egg sandwiches, cake and salads and fruit and such things. We then cracked jokes with each other and asked riddles, and said other funny things. It was starting to get late, so we thought we had better make for home before it got too dark. We started to find our way out of that place, but found that it was no easy matter. We tried one way after another, but none of them seemed to lead the way out. We called and whistled, but nobody seemed to hear, and if they did they never took no heed.

"This is just like the "Babes in the Wood," said Ada.

"Gee whizz," spoke up Robert, "I'm mighty glad I'm not a baby. Of course, you girls may be, but I'll tell you right now, we're not babies."

"Well, I think the best thing to do just now is to find our way out of this hole," said sleepy-looking Florence.

Continued on page 47

MATTERS MUSICAL

IT is hard to realize that this is the fifteenth season of active work for the Mendelssohn Choir, of Toronto. It will probably be considered one of the most notable in its annals, when one considers the programme which Dr. A. S. Vogt has undertaken to present. The Toronto concerts have been arranged for the 5th, 6th, 7th and 8th of February, and it may be necessary to increase the number in order to meet the demands of the constantly-growing number of subscribers. In the last week of February the members of the Choir will take a trip across the border, giving a concert in Buffalo, on February 26th, two concerts in New York, the 27th and 28th, and in Boston on February 29th. Many times has the Choir appeared in Buffalo; four years ago it captured New York, and it remains to be seen how Boston, which retains much of its ancient literary and musical prestige, will regard this organization, of which Canadians are justly proud.

The music selected for study by Dr. Vogt for the Toronto concerts includes two important works, Wolf-Ferrari's "The New Life," for adult and auxiliary chorus, soprano and baritone solos, full orchestra, organ and piano, almost every known device having been employed by the composer to create the desired effects. Berlioz' "Te Deum," for orchestra and chorus, including an auxiliary chorus of children and an augmented orchestra will also be given. Following the insistent requests from many sources, Dr. Vogt will repeat this year Verdi's "Requiem," in which the Choir achieved such a triumph at the concerts of last season. The Theodore Thomas Orchestra has again been engaged for both the Toronto and out-of-town concerts, and the soloists who will take part are among the front rank of continental vocalists. Mr. Stock will again present an orchestral matinee programme on the afternoon of February 8th.

WAGNER, the German dramatic composer, poet, and essay writer, was born at Leipzig, 1813. His musical career began when about seven years of age, when he composed an overture, which was performed at Leipzig theatre ten years later. In that year he matriculated at the university, and took lessons in composition from Theodore Weinlig. A symphony was produced in 1833, and the following year he was appointed conductor of the Magdeburg opera. This position did not prove satisfactory, and he became somewhat unsettled for a time. During the next two years he composed several other operas, but only one was given, in 1836.

In that year he married an actress of a theatre at Konigsberg. He accepted an appointment there, but the lessee became bankrupt, and Wagner accepted another appointment at Riga. He remained here till 1839, making his first visit to Paris. He took with him an unfinished opera, based on Bulwer Lytton's Rienzi, and on his own libretto, as usual. This proved a complete failure, and Rienzi was rejected. He completed it, however, in 1842, and produced it at Dresden.

Though great energy and ambition were shown in Rienzi, it was far from representing his ideal. This he now endeavored to embody in the composition Der fliegende Hollander, for which he designed a libretto quite independent of any other treatment of the legend. This was well received at Dresden in 1843, and in February of that year he was formally installed at Hofkapellmeister at the Dresden theatre, and he soon began work on a new opera. He chose the legend of Tannhauser, collecting his material from such works as the ancient Tannhauser-Lied, Hoffman's story of Der Sangerkrieg, and the medieval poem on Der Wartburgkrieg. This last legend introduces the incidental poem of Loherangrin, and led Wagner to the study of Wolfram von Eschenbach's Parsifal and Titurel, with great results later on. But for the present he confined himself to the work in hand, and on Oct. 19th, 1845, he produced the great Tannhauser, with Schroeder Devrient, Johanna, Wagner, Tichatschek and Mitterwurzer in the principal parts. The success was not very brilliant, but Wagner fought boldly for his rights, and might have prevailed earlier had he not taken part in the political agitations in 1849, after which his position in Dresden became untenable. In fact, after the flight of the king and the subsequent suppression of the riots, a warrant was issued for his arrest, and he had only time to escape to Weimar, where Liszt was engaged in preparing Tannhauser for performance. Liszt at once procured a passport and escorted his guest to Eisenach. Wagner fled from there to Paris, and afterwards to Zurich, where he lived quietly till the year 1859. During his retirement most of his prose works were given to the world.

The medieval studies which Wagner had begun for his work at the libretto of Tannhauser, bore rich fruit in his next opera, Lohengrin, in which he developed his principles on a larger scale, and with a riper technique than before. He had completed the work before he left Dresden, but did not succeed in its production; but he took the score to Paris with him, and, as he himself tells us, "When ill, miserable, and in despair, I sat brooding over my fate, my eyes fell on the score of Lohengrin. Suddenly I felt something like compassion that the music should never sound from off the death-pale paper. Two words I wrote to Liszt, and the answer came back that preparations were being made at Weimar for the performance of the work on the grandest scale that means would permit." In 1850 Lohengrin was produced under Liszt's direction at Weimar. It was a severe trial to Wagner not to hear his own work, but it was in good hands, and success was the reward.

During his exile he matured his plans and perfected his musical style, but it was some time after his return before any of his works then meditated were placed upon the stage. In 1855 he went to London, where he conducted the concerts of the Philharmonic Society with great success. In 1857 he completed the libretto of Tristan und Isolde, at Venice, but the music, for some reason, was delayed till 1859. In that year he again visited Paris, where Tannhauser was accepted at the Grand Opera. Great preparations were made, many rehearsals took place, and much money was expended, but, for political reasons, a riot took place, and after the third representation the opera was withdrawn. He then settled in Vienna, composing many other good works, and in 1861 producing Lohengrin; but he again found trouble and had to retire to Triebschen for six years. During his trouble King Ludwig of Bavaria was very kind to him and granted him an allowance, but scandalmongers made his friendship with the king a danger to both, and Wagner had to retire.

We might mention many more of his compositions and his performances during the next few years, but we will pass on to his last, and great work, Parsifal, based upon the legend of the Holy Grail. The libretto was complete before his visit to London, in 1877, but the music was not completed till 1882, at Palermo. The first sixteen performances took place at Bayreuth, where he now resided, under his own direction, and fully realized all expectations. Unfortunately, the exertion of directing so many consecutive performances was too much for the veteran master's strength, and his health failed rapidly. He spent the autumn at Venice, and was well enough to conduct his early symphony of 1833, on Christmas eve, at a private performance. But a few weeks after his friends were shocked by his sudden death from heart failure.

He was buried at Walmfried in the tomb he had himself prepared.

Learn to Play and Teach the Piano

You Can Take a Complete Conservatory Course Under the Most Distinguished Teachers Without the Inconvenience and Expense of Leaving Home

No matter where you live or whether you wish to take up music as a profession or as an accomplishment, you can't afford not to investigate fully the splendid opportunity now offered you to take our complete Conservatory Piano Course as originated and perfected by William H. Sherwood —a master musician who obtained universal recognition as one of the greatest pianists and most successful teachers.

Teaching Music by Correspondence One of the Greatest Achievements of the Age

Nearly all of the leading colleges have correspondence courses—indeed, two-thirds of the work required for any degree can be taken satisfactorily by correspondence. It has remained, however, for us successfully to adapt the correspondence method to the teaching of music—and the ease and thoroughness with which our students master our lessons fully demonstrate the simplicity and completeness of our courses. The

SIEGEL-MYERS Correspondence School of Music

—the foremost Correspondence School of Music in the world—offers a complete course in Piano Instruction in your home which can be taken in your spare time. This course is the culmination of a lifetime of study and successful experience by one of the most talented pianists and most thorough instructors—a pupil of Kullak, Deppe and Liszt—who, in turn, received their training from Czerny, who sat at the feet of the greatest master of them all—Beethoven.

WILLIAM H. SHERWOOD

The sum of all this knowledge of the great masters, Sherwood put into imperishable form in this course of correspondence lessons for the benefit of this and future generations.

His methods, both in general musical analysis and in arm, wrist and hand training for technique and musical expression, are, indeed, many steps forward in the evolution of musical art.

This piano course consists of 100 lessons, one each week, covering a period of about two years. Our Instruction Department sends weekly examination papers to each student and insists that the student so thoroughly comprehend each lesson as to be able to answer the questions asked in the examination paper, correctly before being permitted to take up another lesson.

If the questions are not correctly answered when the student first returns the weekly examination papers, our Instruction Department checks incorrect answers and returns the lesson for further study. This is repeated until each lesson is completely mastered.

Every difficulty is explained and the subject of each lesson made so clear and plain that anyone of average intelligence may readily comprehend it. That is why our course is so far in advance of other methods. A student will attain results at less cost and in less time than by other methods of study.

Our Courses of Lessons Endorsed by the World's Greatest Musicians

There are no higher musical authorities in the world than Paderewski, Damrosch and Guilmant. Ignace Paderewski says of our work:

"It is one of the most important additions to the pedagogical literature on Pianoforte playing published for years. As an excellent guide for students and solid and reliable advice for teachers, it is bound to become popular—the more so as it bears the stamp of a real pianist and accomplished musician and experienced pedagogue.

I. J. PADEREWSKI."

Walter Damrosch, Director of the New York Symphony Orchestra, says of our work:

"Your lessons are admirably prepared and serve their purpose in every particular. I congratulate you and your pupils.

WALTER DAMROSCH."

Felix Alexandre Guilmant was, without doubt, the greatest organist in the world. He wrote regarding our work:

"This course is strong, well graded and easy to follow. The difficulties are presented in a clear manner and I have no doubt that the lessons will be useful to students and productive of good results.

F. GUILMANT."

Other Branches of Music Taught by Equally Prominent Masters

Each member of our Faculty is a specialist, eminently fitted to take charge of his department. Schooled as they have been, by the most eminent masters of Europe and America, they realize the absolute necessity of presenting their subjects in so careful, clear and complete a manner that anyone, with an ambition to learn, average intelligence and able to read and write the English language, may be assured of satisfactory results.

VOICE CULTURE by George Crampton
the noted English basso concert singer and teacher of the art of singing. The electrical wizard, Thomas A. Edison, has with his remarkable special Phonograph made it possible for you to study under Mr. Crampton and receive his personal instruction—even though you are at the other end of the continent —with absolute success and satisfaction.

HARMONY, COUNTERPOINT AND COMPOSITION by Adolph Rosenbecker, Dean of the Faculty Eminent composer and conductor—and

Daniel Protheroe.
Eminent Composer, Director of the Lyric and Arion Musical Clubs and of the choir of Dr. Frank W. Gunsaulus' Church.

CORNET by A. F. Weldon.
Most eminent teacher of the cornet, bandmaster, soloist and composer.

VIOLIN by Arthur Heft.
The celebrated violin soloist and composer.

ORGAN by Frank W. Van Dusen.
The popular teacher of piano and organ;

MANDOLIN by Samuel Siegel.
The great mandolinist, famous concert player and composer. Official mandolinist for the Victor, Edison and Columbia Phonograph Companies.

BANJO by Frederick J. Bacon.
The eminent banjoist and well-known concert player.

GUITAR by William Foden.
The great guitarist, noted composer, eminent soloist.

PUBLIC SCHOOL MUSIC by Francis E. Clark.
A foremost Public School Music Supervisor

ASK US TO PROVE THAT OUR LESSONS ARE RIGHT

A music student's neglect in not properly investigating his teacher beforehand quite often results in paying the price of first class instruction and getting worse than none. All we ask is an opportunity to furnish you with convincing proof that, no matter in what branch of music you desire to become proficient, our system of instruction is far superior to others available for you. If you are not convinced, you are nothing out ofpocket, but if we do convince you, as long as you live you will be glad.

Fill and Mail Coupon To-day

Our Guarantee or Satisfaction.

It is not merely that you lose time and money when studying with poor teachers and under poorer methods, but, think of the drudgery—so discouraging to students—of unlearning wrong instruction! The fact that we have successfully taught many thousands by correspondence is absolute evidence that we can successfully teach you—yet in order that you may be convinced beyond the shadow of a doubt, and because we, ourselves, are so sure that we can satisfy you and give you just what you need musically, we offer you our legally binding guarantee that if you are not satisfied with your progress, after completing our prescribed course we will refund all you have paid us.

Diploma or Teacher's Certificate awarded.

Siegel-Myers Correspondence School of Music
2430 Monon Block, Chicago

Siegel-Myers Correspondence School of Music, 2430 Monon Block, Chicago.
Send free Book of Proof regarding your course of Home Music Lessons for Piano

Name.....Address.....

City or Town.....State.....

How old are you?.....Do you now play or teach?...

Do you wish to prepare to teach?.....

What musical instruction have you had?.....

.....

If interested in any other branch of music, write us about it.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

How "Dust with LIQUID VENEER" is Being Taught in the Public Schools

The illustration of this little girl dusting a chair is exactly reproduced from text books used in the public schools of America, and shows how the busy housewives of tomorrow are being taught the many advantages of dusting with

LIQUID VENEER

The same message is extended to the busy housewives of today. Dust everything with LIQUID VENEER. Simply moisten an ordinary cheesecloth duster with it and dust in the usual way. Dust everything—old furniture and new, cheap articles and costly, bright finishes and dull, metal work and enamelled and lacquered surfaces. In the one dusting operation LIQUID VENEER removes all the dust, dirt, finger marks, scratches and other unsightly blemishes, and at the same time restores the "just like new" appearance of everything on which it is used. It is simply wonderful! No other household article begins to be like it.

Trial Bottle Free

Prove it for yourself. Fill in and mail the attached coupon today for a free sample bottle, fully prepaid and duty free. Then you will KNOW why the school books of America say "Dust with LIQUID VENEER."

Mail the coupon NOW.

'CHEER UP" COUPON

BUFFALO SPECIALTY COMPANY
25 Liquid Veneer Bldg., Buffalo, N.Y.

Please send me, fully prepaid, duty free, and without any charge or obligation to me, a sample bottle of LIQUID VENEER.

NAME .....
.....
STREET & No .....
CITY & STATE .....

Buffalo Specialty Co., 25 Liquid Veneer Bldg. Buffalo, N.Y.

SYSTEM IN THE KITCHEN

A KNECHTEL KITCHEN KABINET makes for order, neatness and lightened labor. It means "a place for everything and everything in its place"—all the time.

Every housewife will appreciate being able to go to a KNECHTEL KITCHEN KABINET for any article she needs in her cooking and be sure of finding it.

LOOK FOR THIS TRADE-MARK.

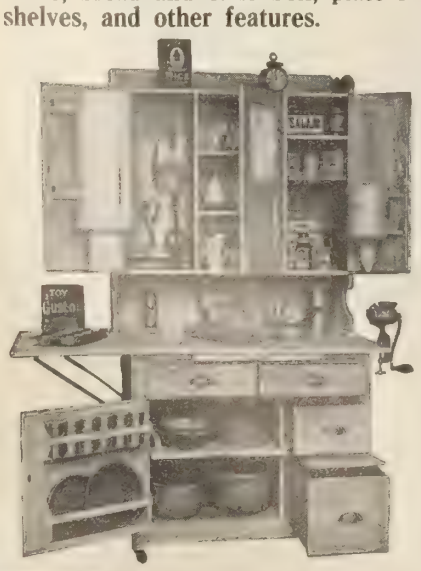
Extension top of bright aluminum. Will neither tarnish nor rust.

KNECHTEL KITCHEN KABINET
REGISTERED

Makes things easy in the kitchen. Saves time energy and foodstuffs.

MADE IN FIVE HANDSOME STYLES

Has flour, sugar and meal bins, spice jars, airtight canisters, bread and cake box, plate racks, pot cupboard, sliding shelves, and other features.



You can see the KNECHTEL KITCHEN KABINET at any good dealer's. The cost is not excessive. and it's a boon to any woman.

Booklet "B" mailed on request.

KNECHTEL KITCHEN CABINET CO.,
LIMITED
HANOVER, ONT.

CHRISTMAS STENCILING

WHEN well done, stenciling is one of the most effective and beautiful methods of ornamenting fabrics. By means of our carefully designed stencils and especially prepared colors, which can now be procured, this occupation is within the reach of all. In addition to the wall decoration it is now possible for the worker to produce the most attractive effects in curtains, portieres, table covers, pillows, etc., which harmonize with the wall and form a most pleasing ensemble.

Whether for a curtain portiere or pillow cover, the operation is practically the same. The fabric is first stretched very smoothly over white blotting paper or pieces of newspaper, and fastened firmly to a drawing-board or table top with thumb tacks or large pins. The stencil should be fastened firmly in like manner. The paper underneath absorbs all extra color and prevents its creeping under the stencil. After selecting an appropriate design it is necessary to make careful measurement in order that the repeat of the stencil will meet properly at the corners or fit the piece to good advantage. The proper guides for repeat patterns are always cut on our stencils. A soft pencil line or basting thread will serve as a guide line on border patterns. Tube colors are prepared ready for use; they are of the exact consistency for stenciling, and only require the addition of one-tenth part medium in order that the completed work may be "fast" and withstand soap and water washing. White can be added in reducing any of the colors or combination of colors, thus making possible an unlimited number of effects.

A DAINTY FAN

A smaller stencil brush (about one inch wide) is used for fabric decoration than for that of the wall. Dip the stencil brush into the colors, which have first been thoroughly mixed with the medium by means of a spatula or small knife, get the brush thoroughly filled and scrape off all superfluous color, then proceed to stencil. Better results are obtained by tapping or pouncing than by brushing on the color, and it is usually best to try out the stencil and the color on a waste piece of the fabric in order to ascertain the exact consistency of the color before proceeding with the actual work. Watch the work carefully and clean the back of the stencil occasionally so that the color may not run under it. Sometimes a reverse pattern is desired, and in such a case it is absolutely necessary to have the stencil clean on both sides. On all designs where two colors are required two stencils are provided. Either separate brushes should be used or the one brush cleaned very carefully. Turpentine or benzine should be used for cleaning both stencils and brushes. Stencil colors can be thinned with turpentine if desired.

At first an equal application of color may be easiest, but later if you desire to shade, simply bear on a given portion which you want darker a little longer and a little harder than on the part which you wish to shade off. If there are a number of small parts to the design in close conjunction it is often of advantage to use a small brush for these parts, thus avoiding running over the edges into other parts of the design. Use a separate brush for each color.

The ties or connecting parts of a stencil are very important, and on some designs are rather fine, and, therefore, require careful handling. Should the ties break they can be repaired by pasting small pieces of the same paper over the broken parts with glue or shellac. For applique work, place the stencil on the ground material and trace with soft pencil or tailor's chalk. Then place the stencil on the fabric to be appliqued, and, after tracing in similar manner, cut out design forms, allowing one-eighth inch for turning in, unless a fancy stitch is to be used.

Such fabrics as Russian crash, denim, burlap, linens of all kinds, canvas, muslin, cheesecloth, madras, poplin, bobbinette, silk, etc., are suitable for work with stencils and can be used with tube colors whether previously washed or not. Many beautiful Christmas gifts can be stenciled, the following descriptions being found helpful:

A Party Fan

IF you do not wish to go to the expense of buying a decorated fan, and if you do not care to design and decorate one yourself, the wisest course is to procure a plain or spangled gauze fan and stencil it. In this way you are adding the finishing touch yourself and the fan will be more than appreciated as a gift if it is intended for such a purpose. A gauze fan may be purchased for a reasonable sum (while the only other expense, if you do not own a Sherwin-Williams stencil outfit, will be the stencil materials. The flowers are made a delicate pink, having the color deepest in the centre, and the leaves and stems a nice shade of green obtained by using a little of the crimson lake mixed with the green. Of course, any other delicate shade could be used for the flowers with a pleasing result. This fan suggested would be a welcome Christmas gift.

DECORATED LAMP SHADE

A Lamp Shade

A FASCINATING lamp shade may be made at home at about one-half the cost at which one could be bought in the shops, and can be made much more attractive by the use of a stencil as a decoration.

The shade in question is planned especially for the living-room, in blue and brown mentioned before. The following materials are required in order to make it: One wire frame, which, for a large shade, costs 85 cents, ⅝ yards golden tan Rajah silk, at 85 cents per yard, and 1½ yards silk fringe to match at $1.00 a yard. For stenciling, two medium-sized brushes, one small tube Indian yellow, one small tube Vandyke brown, and a stencil, size 1½ inches high.

First cut a paper pattern the size of a panel of the frame, and with this as a guide cut six panels from the silk, allowing for seams. Baste these carefully together and stitch. Then pin around the frame in order to be sure that your covering will exactly fit the frame. When assured that the panels will fit in place properly, take off and stencil. Use the Vandyke brown for the leaves and yellow for the berries. The bands used as a finish about the top and bottom are also of brown. The bands may be cut in any desired width from stencil paper or from light cardboard. The silk now may be applied to the frame, care being exercised to have it fit snugly.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Lastly, add the fringe and the shade is finished. You will find that the brown and yellow and the golden tan of the silk forms quite a nice harmony of color.

A Decorated Ribbon Belt

PRINTED beltings can be purchased in a variety of colors and designs from $1.00 to $1.50 per yard, but the belt shown in our illustration can be made for less than 50 cents. By stenciling the plain white belting a desired shade can be secured. A simple conventional flower treatment that could be used in several color combinations has been applied to white belting 1⅞ inches wide. The design itself is only 1½ inches wide, thus giving the proper margin.

A PRETTY APRON

Lavender and green were used on this belting. The plain white belting can be secured at 50 cents per yard, and ¾ of a yard will be required for one belt. Stencil No. 116 is 1½ inches wide, and can be secured for 15 cents. Although the design is in one part, two colors can be easily applied by using small brushes.

Stencil colors, olive lake, permanent crimson lake, and cobalt, will be necessary for the green and lavender decorations. As very little color is used on this article, small tubes of each of the colors will be sufficient. Two small brushes, one tube of medium, a pallet knife, a pallet or piece of glass, a clean rag and a small quantity of benzine will be required in addition to the stencil colors.

Determine the centre of the belt and place the flower portion of the design here. Mix the permanent crimson lake with one-fifth part cobalt and one-tenth part of stencil medium. This will give a deep purple. The lavender is secured on the white ground by filling the brush with this color and wiping off almost dry with a cloth. The little color that remains in the brush will give the light tint to the belting. The stem portion of the design is handled in the same way and the olive lake reduced with one-tenth part of the permanent crimson lake will give the proper tint of green.

AN ATTRACTIVE BELT DESIGN

A craftsman buckle in dull brass and green will be pleasing and appropriate with this belt. As a further suggestion in connection with the dress, the decoration just described can be used on the trimmings most effectively. This belt would certainly make an attractive Christmas gift.

An Attractive Tea Apron

CROSS-bar muslin, lace and stenciling are so combined that individuality is suggested, and the ordinary apron far outclassed. Muslin can be obtained for 18 or 25 cents per yard, and as only ¾ of a yard of material is required, with 3 yards of lace, the made apron is most inexpensive.

As shown by the illustration, the stencil has been repeated to form the solid border. This can be applied in any color, is attractive and dainty, and has been used in the apron illustrated. Cobalt 1 part, olive lake 1-20th part, and permanent crimson lake 1-20th part, mixed with 1-20th part stencil medium, will produce a rich, pure delft shade. The color, however, should be thinly applied to the white to produce the proper effect. The interesting shaped bib and pockets are attractive features of the apron, while the lace frill produces the dainty effect. Cut the body of the apron 18 inches wide and 22 inches long, scalloping at the bottom, as shown in the finished apron. The bib is cut off a 9-inch square and the pocket of 4½ inches. The ties are cut 4 x 2¼ inches, and the belt 10 x 2 inches. Stencil the various parts, placing the design 1¼ inches from edge, reversing at center to make border symmetrical, and shifting the pattern in such a way as to embrace the outline of the apron.

Fall Bulbs

BULBS in the house. Most bulbs are very easily grown in pots, and if given plenty of time in a cool, dark cellar, in which to make a good supply of roots, they will give an immense amount of pleasure and satisfaction for the trouble bestowed upon them. From the time they are planted until they begin to show above ground should be about twelve weeks, if the temperature of the cellar has been right, i.e., just above freezing point, the greater part of the time. A cellar where potatoes keep without sprouting and apples without shriveling or decaying, is just right.

Potting bulbs.—The soil that is most congenial to bulbs is a mixture of two-thirds good fibrous loam, to one-third leaf mould, then add a good sprinkling of sharp sand, enough to keep it porous. Put some bits of broken pot over the hole in the bottom for drainage, next put in an inch or two (according to the size of the pot) of thoroughly well-decayed manure, then soil, on which place your bulbs and cover with soil, leaving space enough, after they are covered with soil, to allow of watering, say from half to three-quarters of an inch. If you have difficulty in getting well-decayed manure, it must be practically turned into soil before it is in a condition to use in pots, then use bone meal instead, in the proportion of a pound and a-half to a bushel of soil.

Supplying moisture.—To keep potted bulbs sufficiently moist, so that there is no chance of them shriveling is one of the main secrets of success with them. As they are almost out of sight in a dimly-lighted cellar, they are very apt to be out of mind also; now a bare, earthenware pot dries out in a very few days, even when it stands in a saucer, so the best thing to do is to place the pots containing the bulbs in boxes. Place first a good thick layer of newspaper on the bottom of the box, an inch or two of earth, on which stand one of your pots, and work the soil well into the corner and round about it, then place another pot in position and pack in the earth again, and so on until the box is full; the earth must be so thoroughly packed in that there are absolutely no spaces. The box should be deep enough to allow the earth to come right up to the top of the pot and allow an inch between the earth and the top of the box, to allow of thorough watering. A box that will hold from four to six pots of the six-inch size, is the most convenient, larger ones are too heavy to lift comfortably. The earth for packing round the pots does not need to be a good quality.

CEETEE
UNDERWEAR

The Under-wear That Makes You Feel Well-Dressed

The basis of all good dressing is in the underclothing worn.

"CEETEE" Underwear is made specially for those who appreciate and can afford "quality" and taste in their clothing.

You cannot either look or feel well-dressed if your underwear is ill-fitting and uncomfortable. Your outer clothing will not sit well nor hang properly unless your underclothing "fits" properly.

People who recognize the value of being properly dressed appreciate the necessity of "CEETEE" Underclothing.

The success of "CEETEE" Underclothing is chiefly the result of the great care taken in its making, and that is the kind of underwear the people want.

The process of manufacturing it is expensive from start to finish—on account of the great care necessary to attain the "CEETEE" standard of excellence. Every garment is shaped to fit the form during the process of knitting—the edges are all knitted together (not sewn).

Nothing but the very finest of Australian Merino Wool is used in each "CEETEE" garment.

We guarantee every "CEETEE" garment to be absolutely unshrinkable.

Made in all sizes and weights for Ladies, Gentlemen and Children.

WORN BY THE BEST PEOPLE
SOLD BY THE BEST DEALERS

ALWAYS ASK FOR "CETEEE"

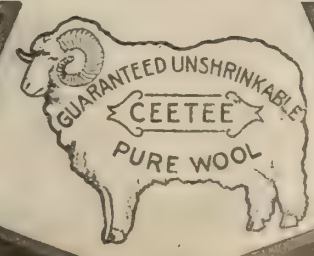
Manufactured by

THE C. TURNBULL CO. OF GALT, LIMITED

GALT - - - ONTARIO

102

LOOK FOR THE SHEEP ON EVERY GARMENT



Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

The Least Fuel, The Most Satisfaction

A "Happy Thought" in Every Home

We can scarcely hope to accomplish this, but we can let everyone know what a thoroughly good range the Happy Thought is, so that when you are buying one you can recall our statements, see the range for yourself, ask the advice of someone who owns one, and be in a position to select your range with a knowledge of what a good range should be.
The manufacturers have tried to make the a satisfactory general-purpose range—one that will fulfill the needs of the ordinary household, in the best possible manner.

HAPPY THOUGHT

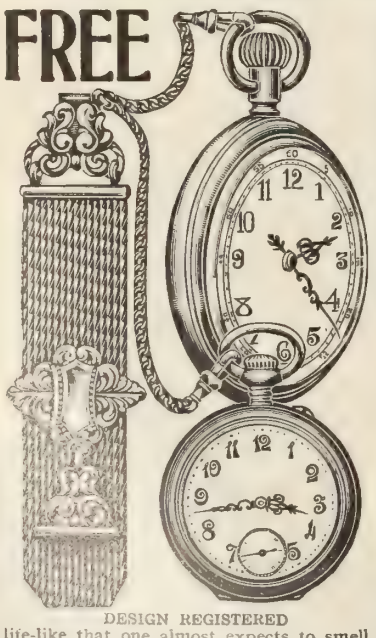
Those who have used one say that they have succeeded. It bakes and cooks perfectly. It has all the newest labor-saving conveniences, many of them peculiar to itself.
It is a range, the general appearance of which is an ornament to any kitchen.

More than a quarter of a million "Happy Thoughts" are in daily use in Canada.

The William Buck Stove Co., Limited
Brantford, - - Ontario

Send THE CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL for Christmas Presents to your friends.
We will send three yearly subscriptions to addresses in Canada for $2.00. Order Now.

WATCHES WITH FOBS FREE



DESIGN REGISTERED

This unprecedented offer is now open to every Boy and Girl, every Lady and Gentleman, to take advantage of promptly. We will give you absolutely free your choice, or both, of these handsome and accurate Watches with Fob attached. The Gentleman's Watch is the latest thin model, stem wind and stem set, with a genuine Swiss Precision Movement, Solid Silver Nickel Case, highly polished, fancy Dial with ornamented hands protected by a heavy bevelled French Crystal. The Lady's size is also the newest thin model, stem wind and stem set, with the same quality Swiss Precision Movement as in the man's size, highly polished Solid Silver Nickel Case, beautifully ornamented Dial with fancy gold hands, and clear French Crystal. The beautiful Fob is the newest design, Solid Rolled Gold Plate throughout, fancy Mesh Pattern with Safety Chain attachment. The Suspension Clasp, Ornament, and Pendant Signet are all handsomely engraved. For selling only $3.60 worth of our high-grade Floral Motto Pictures, we give you your choice of either of the above Watches with Fob attached. Words fail us to give more than a faint idea of the quality and beauty of these Pictures, the Floral portions of which stand out clearly from a delicate satin-finished Solid Gold Background. The rich, natural colors of the flowers are so life-like that one almost expects to smell their sweet perfume. These Mottoes are full size, 16 inches long and 12 inches wide. The deep, rich coloring, and beautiful homelike sentiments of the Illuminated Text portion, will make a set of these desired by all who see them. These refined Motto Pictures sell regularly in Art Stores at 50 cents each, so that at our wholesale price of 15 cents each you can sell the entire lot in an hour. To assist you to make your sales quickly we will send a Prize Coupon to give with every Picture you sell, which will entitle your customer to receive an extra present from us absolutely free. Order right now. We will send the Mottoes by return mail Postpaid. When sold return us our money $3.60, and your choice of either of these beautiful Watches with Fob attached complete, will be sent to you at once Postpaid. Address:

COLONIAL ART CO. Desk 54, TORONTO, ONT. 124

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

FLOWERS AT CHRISTMAS

By JESSIE E. RORKE

A LITTLE care and forethought at the close of the summer will make it quite possible to have the house beautiful with home-grown flowers when the Christmas season comes. Both bulbs and house plants may be coaxed into bloom then quite as readily as later in the winter if they are potted at the right time and given the moisture and light which they require.

Bulbs are probably the easiest to manage, and will give the most certain success. A window full of yellow daffodils or snowy white narcissus is abundant reward for the little time and work that is neiessary for their care. Hyacinths, narcissi, tulips and daffodils require much the same treatment and soil, and for Christmas blooming should be potted in late September or the first week of October. It is wisest to purchase new bulbs each year, selecting only those that are firm and healthy-looking. Pot them as soon as possible after purchasing, as exposure to the air will have a tendency to make them dry and shriveled and retard their growth. A rich loamy soil with sand added in the proportion of one to three is good. Use pots that have been previously soaked in water, to prevent their absorbing the moisture, and water the bulbs well before putting them away in the dark—a cellar that is not too damp is usually the best place for this purpose.

THE CALLA LILY

The bulbs should not be brought to the light again until they have ample time to develop good strong roots, and the tops have begun to push their way through the soil—six weeks or two months will not be too long. During this time water should be given sparingly and is not necessary at all if the cellar is damp. When they are ready it is better to bring them to the light by degrees than to place them immediately in a sunny position. Indeed at any time they like a north window better than a more sunny exposure, and a temperature of about sixty degrees will give the best results. The pots should have a good drainage, and water be given frequently unless they show signs of blooming earlier than you desire; then they may be set away in a more shady position and given less water for a few days.

Any of these flowers may be forced in shorter time by bringing them sooner to the light, and giving more water and sunshine, but the bloom will rarely be as large and perfect.

Bulbs grown in water are sometimes very satisfactory, but they are much more uncertain, and even hyacinths and Chinese lilies will usually do better in soil.

If they are to be grown in water, select a dish with plenty of room for root development; fill this to the top with large pebbles and bits of charcoal, and set the bulb on firmly with its base about even with the bottom of the dish, after removing the brown outer covering and old fibrous roots. Fill the dish with lukewarm water and set away in a darkish place until the green shoots appear. At least once a week draw off the old water and replenish with new. Chinese lilies may sometimes be forced in four weeks, but it is better to allow six, and set them back a little from the light if they show signs of blooming too soon.

When Chinese lilies are grown in soil the treatment is much the same as for hyacinths, but they need not be potted until early November, and may be brought to the light as soon as the green shoots appear. While the roots are forming they are better in a place that is only moderately dark, and the soil should contain a larger proportion of sand.

IF fresias are to bloom for Christmas they should be potted in August or early September at the latest. To secure fine large flowers a very rich soil must be used; a compost of good light turfy loam and a little leaf soil is most suitable. Place the bulbs about two inches apart and cover fully an inch with soil. Set them away in any cool shady place, and water sparingly until the shoots appear, then bring gradually into full sunlight and give more water. Though success is not as assured as with the other bulbs, the fresias are so beautiful that they are well worth trying.

The big white blossoms of the calla lily are exceedingly decorative, and may easily be induced to open for the Christmas season, but it is better to give the plant plenty of time, and do little forcing, or the flowers will not be healthy and vigorous. After the summer rest the old foliage will have fallen away, and there is only the root left when the time for repotting comes. This should be done in early September. Select a moderate sized pot, as this will give the best flowering results, and use a good rich soil, watering the plant well as soon as it is repotted. When the leaves begin to show move it into the house, at once giving it a light, rather sunny window, and watering daily. The foliage should be showered frequently, every other day at least, as this will serve the double purpose of aiding growth and keeping the little red spider from attacking it. In October enrich the soil about the plant with some good fertilizer, to ensure large, healthy bloom.

THE ORIENTAL LILY

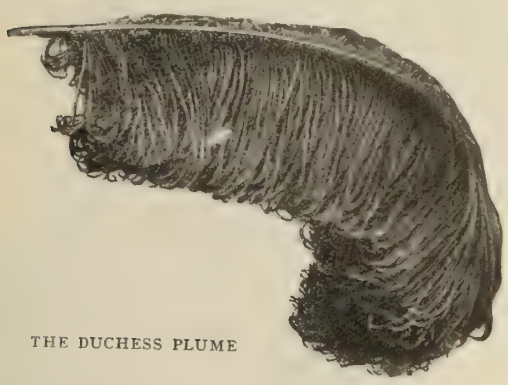
Geraniums for Christmas blooming should be kept in some shady place during the summer where they get only

Feather Fabrication

MAUD APPLETON

CERTAINLY no part of a woman's wardrobe is such an important item as the hat. No matter how becoming and beautiful the gown or suit may be, the entire ensemble is often ruined if the hat does not harmonize.

That this season's millinery will be and is particularly conspicuous with ostrich plumes, there is no question; Parisian, London and New York styles have left little choice outside of the beautiful ostrich feather trimming. The variety of styles, colors and combinations shown, from the inexpensive mount for the tailored hat, costing from seventy-five cents to three dollars, to the wonderful two and three-color duchess and willow plumes, costing from five to fifty dollars each, makes choosing simple and easy for any occasion. The durable and lasting qualities of plume. The smaller illustration is the duchess plume, and is not, as many imagine, a natural feather as it comes from the ostrich. A single ostrich feather is very poor and thin looking, and before it becomes a plume, two and often three are added to it, while an extra feather is always put in at the head. This makes the full, fluffy and rich plume. Great care is needed in the sewing together of these feathers, and only after careful examination will one notice the fine silk thread which fastens the three or four feathers together to make the plume.



THE DUCHESS PLUME

The greatest care is needed in the dyeing of the ostrich feather, which often means its making or its unmaking, as a feather properly dyed increases its value fifty per cent., while, if it is poorly dyed, it lacks life and is often brittle and easily broken. This is particularly so in black feathers. Black ostrich feathers are peculiarly affected by the weather. Damp weather will close the little flues, while dry, warm heat will open and fluff out the fibres.

The larger illustration is of the willow plume. This plume is originally the same as the upper illustration, but the fibres of other feathers have been cut off at the quill and tied on by hand, to the ends of the original plume. This makes the fibres double the length, and often two, three and sometimes four ostrich feather trimmings over other trimmings is a most important factor. Many expensive trimmings do not retain their shape and beauty half the season, while almost any ostrich feather trimming will retain its beauty, color and softness throughout the entire season, and is often called into service for several succeeding seasons. Like all fibres or ties are added all the way around the plume, thus making the long, graceful, flowing willow plume. This work of hand knotting is always done by girls, and when one examines a willow plume and notes the thousands of tiny knots, one wonders how any person could accomplish such a task. Two to four days is required for the knotting really beautiful things, neither time nor continued usage has ever effaced their beauty, but rather enhanced it as each season appears.

THE WILLOW PLUME

MAKING THE WILLOW PLUME

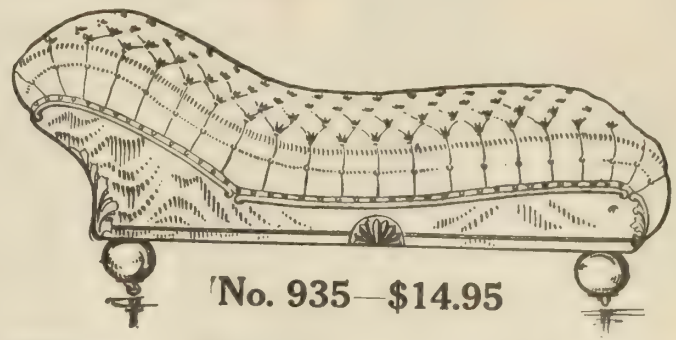
In the accompanying illustrations we show the contrast between the duchess, or ordinary plume, and the willow alone. Then the feather is passed on to an expert curler, who gives the plume the finishing touches.

Illustrations and information supplied by courtesy of the London Feather Company, Limited, largest exclusive manufacturers of ostrich feathers in Canada.

Remarkable Values in Furniture

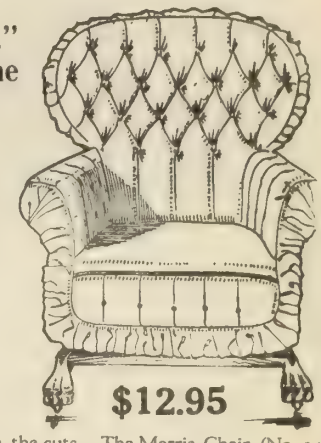
Just look at these three pieces of furniture—have you ever seen such wonderful value? We are offering these pieces at these very low prices to introduce our large illustrated "Catalogue H." 500 photographic illustrations of the newest furniture are shown in this catalogue. It's a big book full of big bargains. You ought to have it.



No. 935—$14.95

$6.75

Write for Catalogue "H." It is free for the asking.



$12.95

These pieces are in design exactly as shown in the cuts. The Morris Chair (No. 2420) has solid quarter-cut oak frame, upholstered spring seat and adjustable back. Couch (No. 935) has quarter-cut oak show-wood frame, neatly carved, heavy ball feet, full spring edge and deep spring construction, button tufted—a luxurious piece of furniture. The large Turkish Rocker is all-over upholstered with buttoned back, ruffled border and spring seat, mounted on spring platform rocker, base of solid oak.

Each of these pieces is covered in best quality moroccoline—an imitation leather that will wear like iron, and can only be told from the genuine leather by an expert.

We guarantee every article as represented, or will refund your money if you do not find them so.

The Adams Furniture Co. Limited

Canada's Largest Home-furnishers Toronto, Ontario

The Piano You Buy

should reflect credit both on your taste and intelligence. Over 20,000 satisfied Canadian buyers have in their homes. Their instruments not only possess the latest and most beautiful in case architecture, but the lasting quality of tone makes of each buyer an enthusiastic admirer of the Gerhard Heintzman Pianos.

Gerhard Heintzman Pianos

Let us send you our new booklet with full information.

Your present instrument taken as part payment.

Gerhard Heintzman, Limited

New Salesrooms: 41-43 Queen St. West

Opposite City Hall, TORONTO

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

keeps you perfectly dry, but the air circulates freely. You can wear a "Cravenette," Reg. showerproof coat any day, wet or fine and it will look dressy and becoming.

Be sure to get "Cravenette" Reg. — the trade-mark is stamped on every genuine "Cravenette" Reg. garment, made in all styles for men, women and children.

THE CRAVENETTE COMPANY, Limited
39 Well Street 20
BRAFORD, Eng.

BLACK KNIGHT

The best stove polish on the market—and the biggest can for the money. "Black Knight" is a paste—no mixing—no trouble—no dirt. Convenient, economical—shines quick as a wink—and the shine stays on. Just as good for pipes, grates and ironwork as for stoves.

If your dealer does not carry "Black Knight" Stove Polish, send us his name and 10c. and we will send a full size tin by return mail.

THE F. F. DALLEY CO., Limited, Hamilton, Ont.

Makers of the famous "2 in 1" Shoe Polish. 33

STOVE POLISH

REAL SCOTCH WINCEY

—LAWRIE & SMITH—
have for many years manufactured this fabric, which has been much appreciated, and goes on increasingly so. The excellent quality of the material, which is practically unshrinkable, makes it most adaptable to those who make up garments for day and night wear in their own homes.

PRICES-
1/- to 3/6 per yard.
Write for Free Samples to
Lawrie & Smith, Ayr, Scotland.

Every Home A College

Under our original method of correspondence instruction EVERY HOME BECOMES A COLLEGE. We go right to your home with the most practical courses under the supervision of expert tutors.

STUDENTS DELIGHTED GRADUATES SUCCESSFUL

W. H. SHAW, President

Here are a few of our courses—make your selection—underline it—fill in name and address—cut out this ad. and send to-day for full particulars.

Illustrating, Commercial, Accountancy, Journalism
Story Writing, Show Card Writing
Photography, Penmanship

NAME. . . . . .

ADDRESS. . . . . .

Shaw Correspondence School
H J. 393 Yonge St., Toronto

CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB

The $10,000 Melon

YOU have all read of the so-called "cutting the melon," when some company which has made a lot of money divides it up among its stockholders. It is a feast to make anyone's mouth water. Now, the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL expects this season to divide a splendid big melon among members of the Girls' Club in the way of commissions, salaries, and prizes. It will mostly be divided up between now and next April, and the largest slices will be given out before Christmas, because that's when the members are hungriest. I know of one member who will get a big slice, at least $400, I presume. Others will get smaller slices. Others will get $40 or $50, while many will be satisfied with $15, or $20, or $25.

Heaps and Heaps of Melons

BUT the best part of this melon feast is that it is always as large as the demand. It doesn't matter how many club members gather around the festive board or how large each one's appetite may be, there is always a piece waiting to be handed out. And this is quite different, isn't it, from our allowances, or salaries, or incomes, which are always just so much and no more to be had in any way. And shall I tell you how this is possible—and now I think I will surprise you—because the members help grow the melons. So, naturally, the more members and the harder they hoe and water, the more and larger the crop of melons.

Size of the Melon Patch

ALL over Canada, in cities and towns and villages, there are hundreds of girls, club members, earning money. Some are satisfied with a few dollars to buy a new dress or some other special thing, others want just heaps of things, and a bank account into the bargain, so they keep on working every opportunity. Now, in your case, you can write down in ten minutes dozens of people, friends and neighbors, who should be subscribing to the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL. Lots of them, probably most of them, never heard of it. Now, will you tell them about it and ask them to subscribe? Will you try to make your town the best HOME JOURNAL town in Canada, with a larger number of subscriptions in proportion to the number of people than any other. If we only had one enthusiastic girls' club member in every neighborhood, the JOURNAL would soon be as well known as it desires to be.

Who Shares the Melons

YOU would be very greatly surprised if you could see all the members of the club gathered together. And what you would wonder at most is how many of them can possibly find time to do any outside work. There's a busy married woman with a house and husband to look after. She heads the list—at present. It is her energy and determination and ability that not only makes her the most successful club member, but has made her leader of many social organizations to which she belongs. Many business girls, working every day, in offices, have used their evenings and holidays to earn extra money. Nurses, between cases, have happily used this method of combining change of atmosphere, getting exercise, making new friends and earning money. School teachers have earned lots of money in their holidays. Hundreds and hundreds of girls who are helping in the home work are earning the things which their allowances will not buy, and for which they have to burden father.

Successful Melon Growers

IF you are really enthusiastic about the JOURNAL, anxious to see it the foremost magazine in Canada, to have it displace all foreign magazines, and believe it should be in every home, you will find your enthusiasm quickly convinces your hearers, and secures an order. "I think the JOURNAL is splendid, a great help to every home," writes one worker, "and I know people are glad to learn of a Canadian magazine like this, for I have scarcely had a refusal." "I tell everyone they simply must give a Canadian journal a trial, and if they aren't satisfied after a few months I'll give them their money back. I've never had to refund yet, and that makes a good argument, too," writes another. "Finding that people like it and subscribe again has been the greatest encouragement. I used to be pretty timid, but now I urge like everything, since I find that the very people who at first said 'I never read,' 'I have too much reading matter,' and 'I like something else better,' are the first to renew," writes a third.

Finis

WILL you, too, join our club? There are no regulations as to how long to work, when to work, how to work—just work. And no age limit or matrimonial restriction—just women. Write me that you, too want to earn money and would like to know all about our organization.

Very sincerely,
Secretary C. G. C.

Office of CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL.

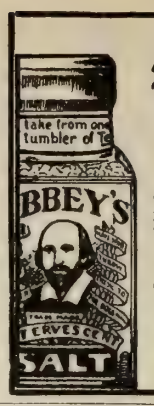
BEETHAM'S La-rola

La-rola is a perfect emollient milk quickly absorbed by the skin, leaving no trace of grease or stickiness after use. Allaying and soothing all forms of irritation caused by frost, cold winds and hard water, it not only preserves the skin but beautifies the complexion, making it SOFT, SMOOTH AND WHITE, LIKE THE PETALS OF THE LILY.

The daily use of La-rola effectually prevents all redness, roughness, irritation and chaps, and gives a resisting power to the skin in changeable weather. Delightfully soothing and refreshing after Motoring, Golfing, Skating, Cycling, Dancing, etc.

Men will find it wonderfully soothing if applied after shaving. Ask your Chemist for it.

M. BEETHAM & SON - - - CHELTENHAM, Eng.



Abbey's Effer-vescent Salt

A good stomach and a merry soul are inseparable—lacking which, try Abbey's Salt.

25c and 60c bottle.
Sold everywhere.
80

MAXWELL'S HIGH SPEED CHAMPION

If women would only realize what a time—and—labor—saver, Maxwell's "Champion" Washing Machine really is, they would not put up with tub and wash-boards for a minute.

Maxwell's "Champion" takes all the hard work out of wash-day—and makes the actual washing a short, simple task. The tub is made of Red Cypress—the wood that lasts a lifetime.

In design, finish and working appearance, Maxwell's "Champion" has no peer.

Churn your butter with Maxwell's Favorite Churn. Write us if your dealer does not handle these two time-savers.

David Maxwell & Sons, St. Mary's Ont.

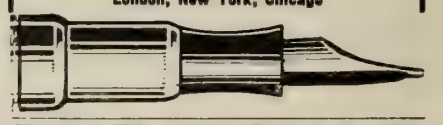
87

TRY A "SWAN" FOUNT PEN. FIRST

The comfort of it, the sureness, ease and sweetness—each and every characteristic deserves notice. Unqualified satisfaction guaranteed.

Prices from $2 50 Sold at Stationers.
Catalogues Post Free.

MABIE, TODD & CO., 124 York St., Toronto
London, New York, Chicago



THE WORLD In Colored Post Cards—FREE

We want a chance to cure every stammerer and stutterer. We want their names and addresses and ages as near as you know them. Send us all you know and we will mail you, free of all charge, a series of 25 wonderful colored post cards illustrating a trip around the world. Splendid for your album or to mail to your friends. At the same time you'll be doing a good turn to the sufferers whose names you send us. Send the list to-day to 10b

The Arnott Institute, Berlin, Ont. Can

BRIGGER'S

Brand is a synonym of purity. Preserved in a modern, bright sanitary factory and nothing is contained in their Marmalade but the highest grade Granulated Sugar and the choicest selected Fruit from the orchards in Spain. Try a jar of this appetizing, satisfying and nutritious preserve, and you will be convinced that the brand cannot be improved upon. Just ask your grocer for BRIGGER'S ORANGE

ORANGE

MARMALADE H S

DAINTY EMBROIDERED APRONS

THIS is the season of the year when the cool days (which always seem to come upon us suddenly) bring with them the thought that Christmas gifts will be the next problem to vex the busy brain which every year has to find "something new," so we have planned to show in this column some suggestions which are attractive and yet will not take too much time to evolve. We are sure our readers will be interested in the pretty aprons illustrated on this page, and it will be seen that they have been selected to show some novel ideas, and are quite different in design and finish. Fine sheer lawn is the material upon which the first three have been embroidered.

No. 1426—Stamped on Lawn, 40 cents and the Butterfly design, No. 1426, is extremely dainty, the same idea being carried out in the bib. The sample illustrated is embroidered in dainty shadow colorings of pale pinks, blues, mauves and green, the scalloped border being white. The wings are worked in long and short or tipping stitch, and the dots in solid padded embroidery. The dainty strings and loops finishing this apron are of soft pink ribbon, and it would be hard to imagine a more novel apron than this.

No. 1428—Stamped on Lawn, 40 cents

No. 1428 has a very pretty design of fine French embroidery, which has been carried out in white and shows an effective combination of eyeleting and solid work. Long eyelets form an insertion effect which run right up to the bib and through which pretty blue satin ribbons are laced. Dainty bows complete this pretty apron.

No. 1427—Stamped on Lawn, 40 cents

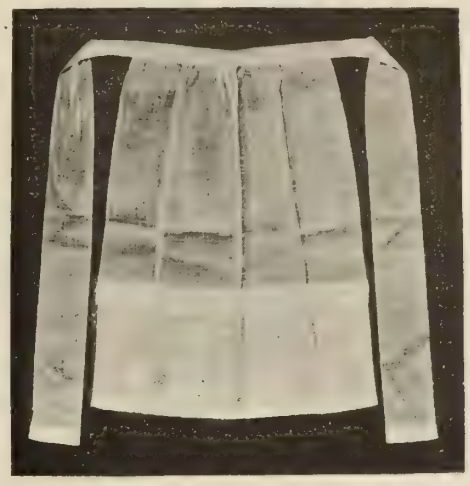
No. 1427 shows yet another idea which has been carried out in colored embroidery, for the dainty polka dot design has been embroidered in pinks with the white button-holed edges. Ribbon bows complete this charming little apron, and strings are embroidered to match. Any of the three aprons illustrated above may be finished with a soft frilled lace edge underneath the button-holing, and makes a very dressy finish. These aprons are suitable to wear at the afternoon tea table and on many occasions upon which the woman of dainty tastes loves to wear these attractive little womanly touches.

Another apron which is one of the more useful variety, is widely known as the "work bag pattern,"



No. 1324—40 cents

and has a deep hemstitched pocket which forms the lower edge, and soft ribbons are run twice through the hem; the upper portion of the apron when not in use folds back into this, and the ribbons draw up the article into a deep work bag. One of the advantages of this apron is that it launders easily, and the eyeleting pattern (which is the only work needed on this apron, comes already hemstitched and made up), is very easily embroidered.

No. 1425—$1.00

One of the most useful varieties of aprons is what is known as a "traveling apron," and anyone who has tried to dress in a crowded wash room, where one cannot find a place to lay down many articles which are indispensable to one's comfort will appreciate the fact of being able to keep the needed articles each in its own pocket. The 1425 apron is made up from brown linen bound with brown ribbon, and has the pockets to contain the soap, etc., rubber lined. The second apron, No. 1424, is bound with pale blue lawn, and has not the rubber-lined pockets. Some people prefer this one, as the pockets to contain the soap, etc., may be ripped, and lined with a thin oiled silk. This apron folds up into a smaller compass than the larger one, but both are of a convenient size, and take up but a very little room in the traveling bag.

No 1424—75 cents

If these articles cannot be obtained from your dealer, or for further information regarding any of the articles contained in these columns, address Belding Paul Corticelli Co., Limited, Dept. L., Montreal.

SEND AT ONCE

— 35 CENTS —

For eight skeins of ART EMBROIDERY SILK which is sufficient to embroider a 15 inch CREAM LINEN CENTRE PIECE, stamped for the fashionable Mille Fleur or Thousand Flower Embroidery which we will give you FREE and sufficient Cream Lace to edge this beautiful Centre Piece; ALSO A DIAGRAM LESSON which will enable any woman to do this embroidery which is simple but effective.

Send to-day, as this generous offer is good for a short time only.

This offer is made to convince every woman that BELDING'S ART EMBROIDERY SILKS are the best made.

Send 10c for a copy of Belding's Needle & Hook Book which contains all the latest suggestions for art embroidery.

Address

BELDING, PAUL, CORTICELLI CO'Y.
LIMITED

Dept. L MONTREAL, P.Q.

HOME JOURNAL FASHIONS

When two numbers are given with one costume, two patterns are required at 12 cents each. Send cash to PATTERN DEPARTMENT, CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL, 59-61 John Street, Toronto, Canada Order always by number, stating size wanted. Patterns are mailed from our Toronto office the same day as order is received. PAPER PATTERNS TWELVE CENTS EACH POST PAID.

Oriental Embroidery

THE Oriental feeling pervading recent fashions makes itself felt among the blouses in the embroideries, sometimes lovely, sometimes more weird than beautiful. Embroideries of Oriental design, and coloring more or less barbaric, are executed in wool crewels on chiffon, net, silk, etc., and wonderful color schemes are obtained by embroideries, in rich, jewel-like tones on heavy metallic nets and laces of dull gold or silver. Even white blouses are built up of these materials, and if artistically and cleverly accomplished are curiously rich and effective without being garish or spectacular.

Pretty Frocks for Winter Wear

PLAIN, striped and fancy materials are all in vogue this season, and girls' dresses are unusually pretty and attractive. In the illustration is shown one frock of rose-colored broadcloth, and one of striped challis. They are both charming.

The older girl's dress is made on quite new lines. The blouse is cut in one piece, but is arranged over a centre portion. In this case the centre portion is of allover lace, and the blouse is braided with soutache, but it will be seen that any two materials can be used and the blouse can be made of one throughout, just as may be liked. It can be trimmed with banding, or embroidered, or braided or treated in any such way. The skirt is six-gored, with front and back gores forming box plaits and with inverted plaits at the sides. It can be made with either a high or natural waist line. The broadcloth illustrated is in every way charming, very girlish and very attractive, but this model suits small women as well as young girls, and it can be made from velvet to be very handsome. It can be made from poplin or silk serge, indeed, from any seasonable material. For the 16-year size the blouse will require 2 yards of material 27, 1½ yards 36, 1¼ yards 44 inches wide, with ⅝ yards of allover lace; for the skirt will be needed 4½ yards 27 or 36, 3⅜ yards 44 inches wide, the width at the lower edge is 2½ yards, 2 yards when the plaits are laid. The pattern of the blouse, 7178, and of the skirt, 7154, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

The younger girl's dress is a very pretty one, and it also is made with the favorite six-gored skirt that forms a box plait at front and back. The blouse is in peasant style, but it is tucked and finished with a trimming portion that renders it quite novel and distinctive. It can be worn over any guimpe. Challis is one of the best-liked materials for younger girls, and the striped is very pretty, but the dress could be made from simple silk, voile, cashmere, or any similar material with trimming of silk, velvet, or satin, as liked. For the 12-year size, will be required 4¼ yards of material 27, 3¾ yards 36, 3⅝ yards 44 inches wide, with 1½ yards of satin for the trimming. The pattern, 7179, is cut in sizes for girls of 10, 12 and 14 years of age.

No. 7178 No. 7154 No. 7179

Long Sleeves Coming In

THERE are many signs to indicate that long sleeves, at least, on afternoon costumes, will be fashionable again. This is clearly shown in some of the most exquisite models by several of the most famous Paris designers. The long sleeves, fitted quite closely over the wrist, and ending in a frill of lace over the hand, is the dernier cri, and especially welcome to the woman who does not rejoice in plump forearms. The lace over the hand is frequently continued on the outer sleeve line four or five inches, and on some models almost to the elbows.

This outer line of the long sleeve is also defined and emphasized by rows of tiny buttons, or by braid in border designs. Sometimes the slashed lines will be held together by buttons and loops, with fine net or lace undersleeves showing through the openings. Pipings of satin or velvet are used on the edges of the long cuffs. Wonderful handwork is seen on long lace sleeves. This takes the form of embroidered flowers, ribbon work, narrow quillings of frayed silk, and narrow soutache effects worked over the design of lace.

The Home Dressmaker

When putting in sleeves, put the under arm sleeve just the length of your second finger ahead of the under arm seam of the waist. This is an easy way, and they are always sure to be in correctly.

A neat finish for the armhole seams of a fine lingerie waist is made by buttonholing the edges with loosely twisted embroidery cotton. If done rather closely this will conceal the raw edges and will be invisible from the right side, and is lighter than binding the seams.

When making any kind of wash dresses, those for children especially, it is a good plan to baste a piece of the material on the inside of the dress and let it be washed with it. Then when the patch has to be put on it will be the very same shade as the dress.

Mourning Accessories

SEVERE mourning is so trying to most women that the addition of white accessories is very welcome, and is a feature of the present fashions. For everyday mourning wear cuffs and collars of white organdie with hems turned back and doubled to depth of half an inch are satisfactorily and quickly made. These last longer if worn on stiffened black silk bands. Organdie creases easily, and many persons do not put stitches on these collars. For these collars and cuffs there is a hemstitched banding of sheer muslin to be found in the shops. As it is hemstitched on both edges it is used in full width for the cuffs and cut lengthwise down the middle for the collar, the corners being mitred. White net yokes and undersleeves are worn in deep black and are universally becoming. Plain silk or crepe blouses have different kinds of neck and sleeve accessories to be attached for variety.

The Rough Weave

FOR the long coat or the coat and skirt for fall and winter wear, the rough woven material is the favorite. These fabrics, though of heavy appearance, are soft in finish, and come in rich warm colorings, as well as in the standard greys and drabs of cheviots and tweeds.

Among the long coats shown in the shops, the favorite novelty appears to be the "plaid-back" material, a reversible fabric, showing the plaid on revers and cuffs, and on the inner side. Some, of a greenish twill, show a green plaid on the reverse side, and as trimmings. Other popular coats, in Scotch tweed, have a lining of silk or satin.

Vogue of Velvet

THERE has never in the history of fashion been so much velvet used as noted on gowns and wearing apparel this summer. Practically everybody has some model trimmed with it. Lingerie gowns have lower flounces of velvet and trimmings on the bodice of same. Velvet ribbons ornament many handsome gowns and waists.

Handkerchiefs

A HANDKERCHIEF that has little body and much embroidery is not used by the woman of good taste. A plain linen hemstitched article pleases her much better, and the tendency in this year's styles is to gratify this taste. The very newest thing shown is of fine muslin or linen, with a narrow hem and a single flower or spray in one corner. This has captured the patronage to the partial exclusion of its more elaborate and embroidered edged rival. Handkerchiefs with lace edges are very dainty this year, the lace being very narrow, and has the appearance of having been crocheted right on the edge of the linen.

Gowns for Afternoon Wear

GOWNS for afternoon occasions are being made from many different materials. Chiffon broadcloth in lighter colors is much liked, striped satins are many, poplin is a pronounced favorite, henrietta cloth is exceedingly smart, and a great many silks are used. Here are two models that can be utilized from any one of the fabrics mentioned, and, indeed, from many others.

The dress to the right is designed for small women and for young girls. In the illustration it is made of blue broadcloth, and it is braided with black soutache braid combined with a chemisette and undersleeves of white lace, but it would be very handsome made from velvet or from chiffon velveteen, and it would be charming made from poplin or any similar material. The collar and cuffs can be of the same or contrasting material, as preferred. The dress is made with a blouse and skirt that are joined on a slightly raised waist line, and it is closed at the left of the front. The collar can be made as illustrated, or round, as indicated in the small view, and the six-gored skirt can be with or without the revers. The neck can be finished as illustrated, or with a standing collar. For the 16-year size will be required 6 yards of material 27, 4¾ yards 36, 3½ yards 44 inches wide, with 1¼ yards 18 inches wide for chemisette and undersleeves. Th

SECOND DISTRIBUTION BY THE PRESS OF THE University of Cambridge.

(England)

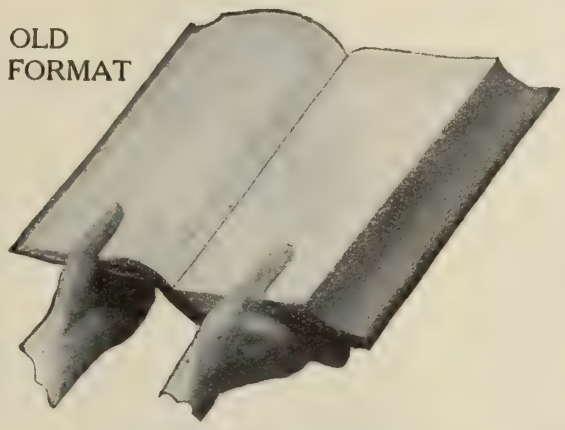
OF THE NEW ELEVENTH EDITION OF THE

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA

A COMPLETE AND MODERN EXPOSITION OF HUMAN THOUGHT, LEARNING AND ACHIEVEMENT.

29 VOLUMES 40,000 ARTICLES 44,000,000 WORDS

"When one takes up a volume he is apt to be led on from one article to another with absorbing interest. The volumes are the very triumph of the printer's and bookbinder's art, and it is a delight to handle and to read them. The book is an epoch-making book. One who possesses a copy of the Britannica has a very complete library, even if he should have no other books."—Extract from letter from Subscriber C.B. 7201.



A volume printed as heretofore on ordinary book paper measures 2¾ inches in thickness and weighs 8 pounds.

Printed on India paper, the same volume is but 1 inch thick, and in the Full Limp Leather binding may be rolled up and held in one hand.

"Concerning the eleventh edition, it is a gift of unspeakable value to all classes of readers from the plain man up, one of those human debts that money does not discharge. . . Every growing family of Canadians, pretending to any intelligence, whether they have carpets or not, ought to be provided with the eleventh edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica."—From a Review in the Manitoba Free Press, August 5th, 1911.

THE New Encyclopædia Britannica, 11th Edition (1911), is a vast repository of human thought, learning and experience brought down to the autumn of 1910. In virtue of its comprehensiveness and unfailing devotion to the exposition of knowledge, it combines three features of the widest usefulness to the present generation.

1.—It is a register and detailed summary of the world's life and progress.

2—It is a complete inventory of extant knowledge reduced to an A, B, C simplicity of arrangement.

3—It is an index to all recondite, not less than to all common things in which an intelligent person is likely to be interested.

There are 28 volumes of text, aggregating 28,150 pages, which average 1,600 words to the page. Volume 29 consists of an Index containing 500,000 references, and a complete Table of Contents giving every article-heading in the work under its proper classification. By the aid of this Index, which was carefully prepared at an expense of £15,000 ($75,000), it is believed that the reader will be able to find, in the body of the text, the answer to any conceivable question within the limits of reasonable inquiry.

The 1,500 contributors include: 1. Men of Learning (scientists, philosophers, divines, university professors, historians, economists). 2. Men of Action (soldiers, sailors, men of affairs, jurists, administrators, surgeons, architects, artists, inventors, archæologists, explorers, engineers, sportsmen, manufacturers, financiers). 3. Practical experts, men of special knowledge who are professionally engaged in the advancement of industrial undertakings for the welfare of mankind.

The sum of £230,000 ($1,150,000) was paid to contributors and editors, as well as for maps, illustrations, typesetting, plates, etc., before a single copy was offered for sale.

THE Encyclopædia Britannica, the only work which has summarized and elucidated universal knowledge in successive editions during 140 years in a manner commensurate with the expansion and international primacy of the two branches of the English-speaking race, has come, by virtue of its acknowledged excellence, to be recognized as an institution, as one of the most prized heritages of scholars and readers, wherever the language is spoken.

THREE NOTABLE NEW FEATURES

The issue of the new edition (the eleventh since 1768-71), while it is a notable literary event in itself, is signalized by three unprecedented features:

1. THE UNIVERSITY OF CAMBRIDGE

The new edition bears the imprimatur of the University of Cambridge instead of being issued by a private firm of publishers as hitherto. The added endorsement of the authority of the 1,500 eminent specialists, representing all civilized countries, who contributed to the book, served to confirm its status with a swiftness and a certainty not possible otherwise.

2. THE INDIA PAPER FORMAT

The work appears in a revolutionary format, which renders the Encyclopædia Britannica for the first time a convenient book to hold and, therefore, agreeable to read. Printed on India paper (tough, light and thin, but at the same time opaque), the volumes measure but one inch in thickness instead of two and three-quarter inches as heretofore, though containing identically the same matter and produced from identically the same plates as the familiar impression on ordinary paper.

3. THE LOW PRICE

The third new feature is the low price. The last completely new edition (the Ninth, 1875-1889) had been sold at $7.50 a volume, cloth bound, and at $10.00 a volume in Half Russia. The 11th Edition, on the other hand, is sold at prices averaging, in the several bindings, about 40 per cent. less. A single volume of the New 11th Edition contains some 1,000 pages, and over 1,500,000 words, yet is sold at only $4.50 a volume in cheapest form. In assuming control of the Encyclopædia Britannica the Syndics of The Cambridge University Press regarded its sale at a low price as an inherent characteristic of the undertaking.

They believe that in respect of cheapness no publication can be compared with the 11th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica at the present price.

The 29 volumes of the new Encyclopædia Britannica in Full Limp Leather (Prayer-book style) in the special bookcase (mahogany) used only for this binding. The volumes in this beautiful format have perfect flexibility (see photograph overleaf) and each rests on its own shelf. Width of case, 16 inches. Height, 4 feet.

OVER 32,000 sets (value over $5,000,000) of the new 11th Edition of this celebrated work were sold by The Cambridge University Press, of England, before publication, and were printed, bound and delivered to subscribers within nine months—between January 20th and October 25th, 1911.

Prompt Delivery of the entire work is now assured to those who apply at once. The entire set of 29 volumes will be shipped (f. o. b. Toronto) shortly after receipt of a first payment of $5.00, or for cash in full. The work, in 28 quarto volumes (12″ x 9″) and index, is in two forms:

(1) On India Paper (very light and opaque) in four styles of binding: Cloth, Full Flexible Sheepskin, Full Limp Leather (Prayer-book style), and Full Flexible Morocco, the volumes being one inch thick (about 1,000 pages).

The India paper impression bound in either Full Sheep, Full Limp Leather or Full Morocco is strongly recommended.

(2) On ordinary book paper in three styles of binding: Cloth, Half Morocco, and Full Morocco, the volumes being 2¾ inches thick (about 1,000 pages).

FIRST PAYMENT, $5.00

The present low price may the more easily be afforded owing to the institution of serial payments, $5.00 is all the immediate outlay that is required to obtain delivery of the 29 volumes, and after they have been received, purchase may be completed in monthly payments of the same amount. The work is, therefore, placed within the reach of all.

Should the subscriber, however, find that it better suits his convenience to complete purchase in a shorter time, he may do so by making 4, 8 or 12 monthly payments, at practically the cash price.

A 164-PAGE PROSPECTUS SIMILAR IN FORMAT TO THE WORK IT DESCRIBES—POST-FREE UPON APPLICATION

The reduction in weight and bulk effected by the use of India paper has been utilized by the publishers of the new Encyclopædia Britannica in the preparation of a new prospectus in which the book is described with a fidelity and at a length attainable within a reasonable compass in no other way. In format this prospectus is a replica of the India paper impression, and it has thus been possible not only to reproduce a large number of extracts from typical articles exactly as they appear in the original work, but to exemplify in the prospectus itself, which consists of 164 pages of printed matter, together with numerous selected plates, maps, cuts, etc., the convenience and compactness of the India Paper Format.

AN IDEAL CHRISTMAS GIFT

THE supreme merit of the Encyclopædia Britannica, 11th Edition, as a gift is that it effectively imposes high standards.

The recipient feels, especially if in the formative period, that the gift of a work of such learning and authority is a subtle tribute to his intelligence, and he feels that, in accepting it, he incurs an obligation to familiarize himself with its contents.

The number of directions in which the systematic use—and this comes naturally—of the Encyclopædia Britannica may influence for good a developing mind, is legion.

For idle and listless reading, it substitutes an accurate scrutiny of the foundations of conclusions, opinions and beliefs. By its insistence on what is essential in every question, and by its elimination of all that is irrelevant, it promotes habits of concentration and analysis, and instils a sense of intellectual values. In its thousands of biographies of the men and women who have figured prominently in the human story it opens new horizons and sets up new ideals.

To some readers, it may even indicate, for the first time, their real vocation, for it is a fact that, in nearly every efficient, useful life, there is traceable, at some parting of the ways, the determining influence of a book.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

(Encyclopaedia Britannica Department)

Royal Bank Building - 10-12 King Street East, Toronto

Please send me the new India Paper Prospectus of the 11th Edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica.

0503

Name.....

Profession or business.....

Residence.....

BON-TON

DIRECT FROM THE FACTORY

The Bon-Ton Fall & Winter 1911-1912 Catalogue should be in every home—Secure a copy now—We send it free on request.

Every woman needs this Bon-Ton Catalogue. It is a shopping guide as to what is newest in Autumn and Winter Styles, and it shows how to clothe both young and old, well and fashionably, at prices so low that they cannot be duplicated elsewhere—and with cool weather rapidly approaching, now is the time to make your Autumn and Winter purchases. Many are surprised at the values we offer and at our paying transportation charges on all purchases—large or small.

But we purchase direct from the mills, manufacture everything in our own finely equipped and hygienic factory, and sell direct to you saving every intermediate profit. Then we fix our prices low enough to assure large sales and a quick turnover. Ours is the modern way.

Such is our confidence that we will cheerfully and without question refund your money and pay transportation charges both ways—should any article ordered fail to satisfy.

The three illustrations shown here are taken from the Bon-Ton Catalogue and are samples of the many new styles which it contains.

5132.—Suit for young lady, fancy striped material, good quality. Dark grey and navy blue, or dark grey and green. Coat 28 inches long, semi-fitting, with good mercerized lining and black satin trimming on collar and pockets; pretty buttons finish off the sleeves and edge of coat on the sides. The Skirt, with panel in the front, and flounce trimmed with buttons on the sides, is well fitted over the hips, and has a large pleat in the back—a perfect cut. Fine value at..... $9.75

5167.—Waist made of striped alpaca imported from England, in cream white only. This material will give fine satisfaction. The front is cut as shown in illustration and shows a fancy button; tucks on either side of opening. Tucks at back also, and on collar. Tailor-made sleeves. Good value at..... 98c

5162.—Skirt made of good English Cheviot black or navy blue. Trimmed on either side as shown in illustration, with bands of good quality satin, and six serge covered buttons, double box pleat at bottom on sides and inverted pleat at back. The style is very smart..... $3.50

5142.—Child's Coat of imported Cheviot; good quality in black or navy blue. Double-breasted, made full and comfortable. Part-lined in same material—which makes the garment warm. Fancy braid and small button trimming at collar and edge of sleeves. Sizes:—4 yrs., 25 inches; 6 yrs, 27 in.; 8 yrs, 30 in.; 10 yrs. 33 in.; 12 yrs, 36 in.; 14 yrs, 39 in.
4, 6, 8 years..... $3.25; 10, 12, 14 years..... $3.75

Write today for your Catalogue to

THE BON-TON CO. 439 St. Joseph Street,
QUEBEC, P. Q.

Just Try

MAYPOLE SOAP

For Home Dyeing

Don't throw away those faded dresses—soiled blouses—feathers—boas—ribbons—stockings—toques—sweater coats—curtains. Don't go to the trouble and expense of sending them out to be cleaned and dyed. Do it at home.

For Easy Dyeing

You can both clean and dye them in one short, simple, easy operation with MAYPOLE SOAP—a soap dye, in cake form, that cleans at the same time that it dyes.

For Clean Dyeing

Being in cake form, MAYPOLE SOAP does not scatter or make a mess, like powder dyes. Better still, it does not stain hands or kettles.

For Sure Results

MAYPOLE SOAP gives brilliant, even colors, fadeless in sun or rain. Dyes cottons, wools, silks or mixtures. 24 colors—will give any shade. Colors 10c., black 15c., at your dealer's or post-paid with free booklet, "How to Dye," from tern, 7169, is cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

FRANK L. BENEDICT & CO., Montreal

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

The second costume also is closed at the left of the front. In this case the skirt is made with a front panel, and this panel is cut on the cross of striped material. The effect is an excellent one, and it harmonizes to a nicety with the collar and cuffs on the blouse, but there are a great many different ways in which the same design can be varied. The panel on the skirt and the collar and cuffs on the blouse could be of contrasting material, or the entire gown could be of plain material, with blouse, collar and panel embroidered or braided. The long list of materials utilized for indoor gowns are appropriate for this model. Corduroy is being used in this way, as well as more familiar materials, and corduroy with the panel, collar and cuffs of broadcloth would be exceedingly smart. The blouse is made in two pieces, there being only underarm and back seams. The chemisette is separate and closed at the back. The undersleeves are attached beneath the cuffs. The skirt is made in two pieces that overlap the panel. It can be finished with inverted plaits or habit back, and made with high or natural waist line. For the medium size the blouse will require 3 yards of material 27, 1¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with 1¼ yards of allover lace, 18 inches wide, for the chemisette and undersleeves; for the skirt will be needed 6 yards 27, 3¾ yards 44 or 52 inches wide. The width at the lower edge is 3 yards with inverted plaits, 2⅝ yards with habit back. The pattern of the blouse, 7177, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 inches bust measure, and of the skirt, 7199, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

Graceful Gown and Frock

NOVEMBER means the opening of the holiday season, and is sure to bring the demand for pretty dressy costumes. Illustrated is a charming frock for a young girl or for a small woman.

The young girl's dress combines a three-piece skirt that is tucked with a blouse that is distinctly novel. This blouse is made in peasant style, but with a yoke portion, and with separate pieces over the shoulders, and these pieces are tucked. In this case the material is flowered chiffon, combined with lace, and it has been used for the entire gown, but the tucked portions of the blouse could be of a contrasting material to make a very pretty effect. Again, if a high neck is wanted, the blouse can be made as shown in the back view. The skirt is gathered at the upper edge and finished with a wide hem and tucks. It can be made with either a high or natural waist line. The model will be found an excellent one for all the pretty materials that are thin enough to be made full, crepe de chine, crepe meteor, chiffon, voile and many others. For the trimming can be used any banding or contrasting material. For the 16-year size the blouse will require 2¼ yards of material 27, 1½ yards 36, 1¼ yards 44 inches wide, with ¼ yard of banding 4¾ inches wide, 2¾ yards of banding 2½ inches wide, ½ yard of allover lace for the undersleeves, ⅜ yard for yoke, when used; for the skirt will be required 4½ yards 27, 3 yards 36 or 44, the width at the lower edge is 2⅛ yards. The pattern of the blouse, 7186, and of the skirt, 7184, are cut in sizes for misses of 14, 16 and 18 years of age.

No. 7169 No. 7177 No. 7199

The gown shown to the right includes a very new and graceful skirt. It is made in three pieces, and is slightly gathered at the upper edge. In this case the trimming is applied over the lower edge on an indicated line, but two materials could be used, and joined on this line if preferred, or the skirt could be made plain in either round or walking length, and with either high or natural waist line. The blouse is most charming. It is made in peasant style, yet it is in sections, and the outer section, or yoke, is cut with deep points that harmonize to perfection with the points on the skirt. In this instance chiffon cloth is combined with satin, and with lace, and the lace is applied over the skirt in the point at the front formed by the combination of material. If liked the blouse can be made with high neck and standing collar. For the medium size the blouse will require 2¼ yards of material 27, 1¾ yards 36, 1⅛ yards 44 inches wide, with ¾ yard of allover lace 27 or 36 inches wide, and ⅜ yard 18 inches wide for the undersleeves; for the skirt will be needed 6½ yards 27, 4¼ yards 36, 3 yard 44 inches wide, with 2¾ yards of satin 27 inches wide, ⅜ yard of allover lace to trim as illustrated, 4 yards 27, 2¼ yards 36 or 44 for the upper portion, 2¾ yards 27 or 36, 1¾ yards 44 for the lower portion when two materials are used. The pattern of the blouse, 7202, is cut in sizes from 34 to 40 inches bust measure, and of the skirt, 7171, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

No. 7186 No. 7184 No. 7202 No. 7171

Scrap Bags

EVERY well-ordered house has at least one bag for the reception of odds and ends. The stores are now full of beautiful remnants of all sorts and lengths of lace and many dainty and useful articles may be made from them. It takes only a little thought and ingenuity to see what the newest touches are in neckwear and fancy articles to be able to concoct many pretty things from odds and ends of lace and embroidery. If you happen to have some bits of real or good imitation lace in your possession every scrap, however much it may be torn, may be used to good advantage if mended first by being transferred neatly on to the finest net and sewn to this through paper, afterward tearing the paper away. Any pieces, however small, can, by skilful fingers, be turned into articles of beauty.

Delightful caps for babies may be fashioned from unprized trifles in the way of muslin and lace scraps. No one looking at them when completed could believe they were ever anything but one uniform whole. Also the little fanciful theatre and boudoir caps and other head-dresses.

In the Mode

THE leading materials to be used will be rich velvet, with costly embroidery embellishments and fur trimmings. Fashionable dresses will be in every way the most expensive ever yet devised.

Complete banishment has been declared against the vogue of black, but black and white will hold its own, especially later in the season. Some modistes are producing exquisite models of this style.

Autumn hats are to be smothered with feathers. Flowers are not to be

OSTRICH PLUMES
ARE MORE THAN EVER IN FASHION THIS FALL

Splendid Value

The exquisite 17 inch "London" Willow Plume we show here is made from best imported male ostrich stock, is full, rich and glossy in appearance. We sell direct from maker to wearer, so you buy this plume at the manufacturer's price of $4.90

No. 137

17 inches long. Black or white. 3-ply, hand-tied, beautifully curled, made from finest genuine ostrich stock

Very Popular

This graceful 18 inch "London" Ostrich Willow Plume made from finest imported male stock, hand-tied, and, like all other "London" plumes is sold under a guarantee of perfect satisfaction or money refunded. You will be delighted with this plume at the "maker-to-wearer" price of..... $7.25

No. 138

18 inches long. Black, white or colors Beautifully curled. 3-ply, hand-tied from best male stock.

A Beauty

Is the only description for this rich, lustrous, 20 inch "London" Willow Plume---just the thing for fashionable fall millinery. It is wonderful value at its "maker-to-wearer" price of $9.75

No. 139

20 inches long. A beautiful plume Black, white or colors. 3-ply, hand-tied, from finest stock. Exquisitely curled.

We pay express. Remit by express order or postoffice order. We ship same day as your order is received. We guarantee satisfaction or refund your money.

Catalogue Free——Write To-day

It shows the full "London" line of beautiful plumes, all new fall colors. Marabou stoles and muffs. Ostrich mounts for street hats from $1.00 up. Everything plainly priced. It also tells how we make your own feathers into beautiful willow plumes at reasonable cost. Write Dept. "A." to-day for Catalogue.

London Feather Co., Limited, 144 Yonge St. Toronto, Ont.

London, Eng. Paris New York Montreal Toronto

An Innovation in Oil Heaters

The Perfection Smokeless Oil Heater, with its drums enameled in turquoise, is an ornament to any room, whether in the country or city home.

No home is quite complete without a Perfection Oil Heater. It is a necessity in the fall and spring, when it is too warm to start the regular heating apparatus, and too cool to be without heat. In the midst of winter it is often convenient as an auxiliary heater, as there are always some cold corners in a house.

The enameled heater always presents a nice appearance, as the enamel will not tarnish or burn off. It is not an "enamel paint," but it is the same as the enamel of your cooking utensils.

The Perfection is the most reliable and convenient portable heating device you can find. An automatically-locking flame spreader prevents turning the wick high enough to smoke.

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Dealers everywhere. Ask yours to show you the Perfection Heater enameled; or write for descriptive circular to any agency of

The Imperial Oil Co., Limited
The Queen City Oil Co., Limited

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

BOVRIL

assists the digestion of ordinary food.

That is one reason why it is so valuable as an addition to gravies, soups and sauces It is also in itself highly nutritious.

Dr. Andrew Wilson says it is a true food.

(See "Brain and Body.")

PERFECT Willow Plumes

IN any color, from your old ostrich feathers. Money saved and more lasting than new "factory" plumes.

SPECIAL processes for cleaning and dyeing evening gowns and street dresses. The lustre and softness of new goods retained. Feathers, silks and laces given special attention.

EXPRESS paid both ways on orders amounting to $5.00. Ask for our advice and prices. Quarter century reputation.

SINCLAIR DYE WORKS

656 College St. - Toronto, Ont.

$3 a Day Sure Send us your address and we will show you how to make $3 a day absolutely sure; we furnish the work and teach you free, you work in the locality where you live. Send us your address and we will explain the business fully; remember we guarantee a clear profit of $3 for every day's work, absolutely sure, write at once.
ROYAL MANUFACTURING CO., Box 1713, WINDSOR, ONT.

PEACH'S LACE CURTAINS

From Looms Direct. Money Saving. Wonderful Offerings. GIVEN AWAY. Lace Cover with Catalogue & Buyer's Guide of Curtains, Window Draperies and Furniture compact for shipping. Household Linens, Ladies' and Gents' Tailoring, Underwear, Shoes, &c. 54 Years known Reputation. Send a trial order to actual makers in the old country.

$6.60 Curtain Parcel Postage & Duty Paid

Our Patent Contrenet Make durability guaranteed, 2 pairs good quality Rich Old Lace design Curtains, 3½ yds. long, 60in. wide, worth $2 per pr.; 1 pair exquisite Curtains, Basket & Ribbon, 3½ yds. long, 60 in. wide; 1 pair curtains, Floral Festoon design, 3yds. by 43 in.; 1 Duchesse Toilet Set of Six Lace Covers, Postage & Duty Paid $6.60 White or Ecru Great Saving. Buy direct from the makers.

SAML PEACH & SONS, The Looms,
Box 667 NOTTINGHAM, England

suffered on headwear this season. Many hats will be trimmed with fur to match the trimming of the dress. The most fashionable fur trimming will be the once despised moleskin, and after that fox.

Smart and Practical Gowns

THERE are a great many very attractive gowns being shown this season that are practical at the same time. Here are two that can be utilized for numberless occasions. They can be made from wool material or from silk or from velvet or velveteen, and they can be made elaborate or simple, as they are trimmed and treated in one way or another.

The gown to the left is made in semi-princess style with a panel at front and one at back. It is closed invisibly at the left of the front. It is altogether new and smart. In this case it is made of wool poplin, with trimming of satin and fringe, while the chemisette is of dotted net. Fringe makes a notable

No. 7198 No. 7196 No. 6906

OXO Cubes are in the same class with the cable, telephone, adding machine and electric light.

They are time savers and money savers.

Just as the masculine world is beginning to realize the value of electricity, so the feminine world is fast awakening to the countless uses of OXO.

54

10 for 25c.
4 for 10c.

Well, Well!

THIS is a HOME DYE that ANYONE can use

I dyed ALL these DIFFERENT KINDS of Goods with the SAME Dye. I used

DY-O-LA

ONE DYE FOR ALL KINDS OF GOODS

CLEAN and SIMPLE to Use.

No chance of using the Wrong Dye for the Goods one has to color. All colors from your Druggist or Dealer. FREE Color Card and STORY Booklet 10, from

The Johnson-Richardson Co., Limited
Montreal, Can.

"Best for Baby—best for you."

Baby's Own Soap

Made of specially purified and refined vegetables oils. It will not hurt the most delicate skin.

Refuse all substitutes.

Albert Soaps Limited
Mfrs.,
Montreal. D511

Protect Yourself From Chronic Colds

Of course you prepare for winter weather externally by changes in your clothing. Prepare yourself internally, too, by taking a course of

NA-DRU-CO TRADE N & D C G MARK

THIS TRADE MARK IS YOUR GUARANTEE OF HIGHEST QUALITY.

NA-DRU-CO Tasteless Cod Liver Oil Compound

this Fall and the colds won't bother you.

Na-Dru-Co Tasteless Cod Liver Oil Compound is rich in the medicinal and nutritive qualities of the best Norwegian Cod Liver Oil, specially treated to remove the disagreeable fatty acids that upset the stomach. Combined with this, in carefully worked out proportions, are Extract of Malt, Hypophosphites and Extract of Wild Cherry.

The preparation is very pleasant to take, without a trace of the disagreeable flavor of the plain Oil.

For delicate or run-down children a course of Na-Dru-Co Cod Liver Oil Compound in the Fall and another in the Spring is one of the best possible safeguards.

Your druggist can supply it in 50c. or $1.00 bottles.

National Drug and Chemical Co.
OF CANADA, LIMITED.

A NA-DRU-CO Specific for every ill.

101

BUST AND HIPS

Every woman who attempts to make a dress or shirt waist immediately discovers how difficult it is to obtain a good fit by the usual "trying-on-method," with herself for the model and a looking-glass with which to see how it fits at the back

"HALL-BORCHERT PERFECTION Adjustable Dress Forms" do away with all discomforts and disappointments in fitting, and render the work of dressmaking at once easy and satisfactory. This form can be adjusted to 50 different shapes and sizes; bust raised or lowered, also made longer and shorter at the waist line and form raised or lowered to suit any desired skirt length. Very easily adjusted, cannot get out of order, and will last a lifetime.

Write for illustrated Booklet containing complete line of Dress Forms with prices.

Hall-Borchert Dress Form Co.,
of Canada, Limited.
70-72 Pearl St., Toronto, Can.

feature of the season, and this treatment is an especially good one, but, nevertheless, the skirt can be left plain or trimmed with bands only, or treated in any way to suit the fancy. For a handsome gown chiffon velvet would be lovely, with a plain skirt, and with collar and cuffs of heavy lace. For simple occasions the poplin is in every way correct, and this same treatment could be applied on colored broadcloth with trimming of velvet to produce a really chic result. The skirt is four-gored, the front and back gores forming the panels. The blouse is cut in one piece, with the sleeves, but is seamed at the back. The chemisette is separate, and attached beneath the collar. For the medium size the gown will require 7 yards of material 27, 4¼ yards 44 or 52 inches wide, with 2 yards of fringe, 2 yards of satin for collar, cuffs and band, ⅜ yard 44 inches wide for chemisette, the width of the skirt at the lower edge is 2¼ yards. The pattern, 7198, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust measure.

The second gown is made with one of the new coatee blouses, and the peplum can be cut on either the diagonal or straight line, and the blouse can be finished with revers or with banding. The collar can be made round or square at the back. The skirt is circular, and can be made in one or two pieces as best adapted to the material. It is fitted with darts and can be made with high or natural waist line. For such a model the list of available materials is long and interesting. The striped novelty illustrated is charming, velvet would be beautiful so made, broadcloth would make a most attractive costume of the kind, and the model is equally well adapted to the favorite poplin, henrietta cloth and the like. For the medium size the blouse will require 3¼ yards of material 27, 2⅛ yards 44 or 52 inches wide with 1⅛ yards of allover lace 18 inches wide for chemisette and undersleeves, and ⅝ yard 27 inches wide for collar and cuffs; for the skirt will be needed 4 yards 27, 3 yards 44, 2¾ yards 52 inches wide, the width at the lower edge is 2⅜ yards. The pattern of the blouse, 7196, is cut in sizes from 34 to 42 inches bust measure, and of the skirt, 6906, in sizes from 22 to 30 inches waist measure.

New York Notes

This season much of the success of the gowns and wraps depends upon the mode of trimming and the patterns thus employed. In order to carry out the East India ideas which are so prevalent just now, much trimming is used. The latest note in this endeavor is the trimming called East Indian, which supplies novelty and elaboration to the garment.

The new sleeve idea indent preserves the flat contour of the shoulder, but widens out below the elbow. There is a tendency in some models to gather it here into a huge puff, which is held in place by featherboning. This latter effect is known as the "balloon" sleeve. It is a modified copy of a style worn in one of the early centuries when puffs and hoop skirts were in high style. About two years ago this same idea was introduced, but without the featherboning, and its durability was of a very short duration. The puff was not quite so full or large, and lower down, but it was on the same principle, and was called a "wrist puff." Just how the new idea will take remains to be seen, however.

SEND FOR THIS CATALOGUE

IT IS MAILED FREE UPON REQUEST

T. EATON CO. TORONTO, CANADA
5 GOATS EXCELLING IN STYLE ANY PREVIOUS OFFER
FALL AND WINTER CATALOGUE No. 100 1911-12
FOUR STYLISH COATS SPECIALLY PRICED AT 10

FALL AND WINTER 1911-12

WRITE FOR YOUR COPY TO-DAY

THE QUALITY OF OUR MERCHANDISE IS DEPENDABLE

SATISFACTION OR YOUR MONEY REFUNDED IN FULL

WE WANT YOU TO TRUST US, we want you to place every reliance upon the EATON Mail Order Service, always bearing in mind that we guarantee to please you or refund your money. We will endeavor to fill every order you send us in such a manner as to retain your confidence and patronage.

IT IS OUR CONSTANT ENDEAVOUR to quote the lowest prices consistent with the superior quality of EATON merchandise. Your satisfaction and your economy are our constant aim, in the fulfilment of our duties.

THE DOLLAR AND CENTS REASONS why you should buy from us are manifold. We are confident that we can save you money and we want to prove it to you. Make a selection from our Catalogue of the articles you are needing and mail us your order. Do so now—make a start to-day in the direction of greater economy.

REMEMBER that one of the easiest and surest ways of increasing your capital is by saving your income. We want you to carefully examine and scrutinize each and every article you get from us. Make any comparisons you wish. EATON quality, EATON values, and EATON prices will always withstand the most critical tests.

EVERY EFFORT will be made by us to fill your orders promptly, accurately and satisfactorily. We realize that the better we serve you, the oftener you will buy from us—and the oftener you buy from us the more you will find it to your advantage to continue.

SAMPLES OF OUR FULL VALUE GIVING

SEND US YOUR NAME AND WE WILL MAIL YOU OUR WALL PAPER SAMPLE BOOK

THE T. EATON CO LIMITED
TORONTO CANADA

Sleeping Princess

Given for Selling
XMAS FOLDERS, AT 3 FOR 5c.

This Sleeping Beauty Princess is the prettiest dolly you could imagine. She has a lovely pleated dress, completely covered with lace, threaded through with satin baby ribbon; lace-trimmed underclothing, cute little openwork lace stockings, and the prettiest little white kid slippers, with silver buckles. Her hat is pleated and lace-trimmed to exactly match her dress, and puts the finishing touch to as dainty a costume as you could wish to see. This little Princess is so like a real baby that she can move her arms and legs to any position, sit down, close her eyes when she is tired, and go right off to sleep. She has lovely curls, and the sweetest smile just parting her lips to show her little white teeth. She is just longing to have a nice, kind mamma to care for her. Won't you adopt her? She is given for selling only $3.00 worth of the Prettiest Fancy Folding Xmas and New Year Cards ever sold in Canada for less than 5c. 60 different kinds. Fancy shapes, lovely designs, embossed in nature's own colors—Robins, Holly, Poinsetta, Violets, Ivy, Oak Leaves, Xmas Bells, Winter Scenes, etc., with handsomely Illuminated Greetings, and charming verses inside. They will be all the rage this season. Everybody wants them. At 3 for 5c you can sell them as fast as you can hand them out. We have all kinds of postcards, too, in fancy designs and Canadian Winter Scenes, at 3 for 5c. This is your chance. Act quickly. Sell $1.50 worth more, $4.50 in all, and we pay express charges. THE GOLD MEDAL PREMIUM COMPANY, DEPT. 13 H, Toronto.

LOVELY FUR

60 inches long, 5 inches wide, given for selling XMAS FOLDERS at 3 for 5c. This is not a shabby, cheap fur, but a beautiful imitation Persian Lamb, made of good material, and with a glossy black curl, closely resembling the real skin. Well padded and lined. Looks handsome, wears well and will keep you snug and warm. Sent postpaid for selling $3.00 worth of the Prettiest Fancy Folding Xmas and New Year Cards ever sold in Canada for less than 5c. 60 different kinds. Fancy shapes, lovely designs, embossed in nature's own colors—Robins, Holly, Poinsetta, Violets, Ivy, Oak Leaves, Xmas Bells, Winter Scenes, etc., with handsomely Illuminated Greetings and charming verses inside. They will be all the rage this season. Everybody wants them. At 3 for 5c you can sell them as fast as you can hand them out. We have all kinds of postcards, too, in fancy designs and Canadian Winter Scenes at 3 for 5c. This is your chance. Act quickly. GOLD MEDAL PREMIUM CO., DEPT. H 14, Toronto.

THE
"Kitchen Queen" will stay longer if her realm is beautified with
"Lacqueret"

The old chairs are worn and soiled. A coat of "Lacqueret" (any shade to suit your fancy) will make them look better than on the day you bought them.

Touch up the refrigerator with Oak "Lacqueret" and note the effect. The wainscoting wants a coat of Colored "Lacqueret" too—scars and scratches will vanish.

"LACQUERET" is a great rejuvenator and will help you to keep the "hired girl" by reducing her work and making her happier.

Write for our free booklet, "Dainty Decorator", and learn for yourself the many uses of this household beautifier.

Most prominent Hardware and Paint Dealers sell "Lacqueret."
Sold in Full Imperial Measure Cans only.

International Varnish Co., Limited

Toronto Winnipeg

G86

THE TRUTH ABOUT HER APPEARANCE

When a woman realizes to the fullest extent, her natural advantages, she has attained real and lasting beauty.

The difference between well-groomed and unkempt nails is just that between good breeding and slovenliness. With the preparations and tools, manicuring becomes a simple and pleasant task, and gives the added touch of distinction and finish to your toilet that this alone can achieve. Lustr-ite preparations are used by 90% of the leading manicurists of America, and very extensively in Europe. They contain no pumice or grit, and are absolutely harmless. Their effects are brilliant and lasting.

LUSTR-ITE

Nothing responds so quickly to care, or so quickly deteriorates from lack of it, as the hair. The scalp must be properly nourished and kept free from dandruff.

PALMER'S Hair Tonic

cleanses and refreshes the scalp, and gives the soft, lustrous quality, that belongs to perfectly healthy hair. Those who are troubled with dandruff, falling-out of the hair, or a dry burning sensation in the scalp, will find in Palmer's Hair Tonic (50c. and $1.00 bottles) the means of promoting a vigorous healthy condition of the hair.

Wrinkles, a sallow, muddy complexion, and roughness of the skin, indicate a neglected, ill-nourished condition of the skin tissues.

DAGGETT & RAMSDELL'S Perfect Cold Cream is a skin food, made from the purest and finest ingredients.

A Massage and "clean up" with it, works wonders in restoring the natural oils of the skin, building up and rounding out the contour of the face, arms and bust, and restoring the flesh tissues to their normal, healthy condition.

All of the above can be obtained at most up-to-date dealers in Toilet Requisites, or for six cents (6c.) in stamps (to defray packing and postage) we will send you a sample package of D & R Perfect Cold Cream and Lustr-ite Nail Preparations together with booklets of much interest to you.

J. PALMER & SON, Limited 5 and 7 De Bresoles St., MONTREAL

FREE THIS ALADDIN LAMP FREE
BURNS COAL OIL (Kerosene)

Outshines city gas or electricity. Simple, noiseless, odorless, clean, safe, money-saving. Guaranteed. Write nearest office for catalogue M and learn how to get an Aladdin Mantle Lamp FREE.

AGENTS T. H. BALL SOLD 850 on money back guarantee, not one returned. Stacey sold 12 in one hour. Newsom sold 12 in 10 calls. Gibson sold 48 in 5 days. Sells itself. Needed in every home. Our Sunbeam Burner fits other lamps. Complete line for homes, stores, etc. Ask for our liberal agency proposition.

MANTLE LAMP CO. of Am., Inc., Dept., 133-B

Offices at Winnipeg and Montreal

CHAMBERLIN
Metal Weather Strips
KEEP OUT
DUST - NOISE - DRAFTS

Guaranteed to last a Lifetime. Can be attached to any Building

A postal will bring prices and the names of satisfied users in your neighborhood

Toronto Office---598 YONGE STREET

EXTREME styles in hairdressing are unpopular for the time, and the huge mounds of hair which have projected ungracefully from the back of the head have disappeared in favor of more becoming fashions. The middle parting, when all is said and done, is a style which always keeps its place, as it usually imparts to the feminine countenance that mildness and demureness of expression which has been considered essentially womanly.

When we think some of the coiffures of the present century are most ungraceful and extravagant, it is reassuring to turn to old pictures and discover that the women of long ago were also offenders in grotesque hairdressing.

In the hairdressings of the moment, says a New York authority, soft, fluffy effects prevail, and pads are, from a modish point of view, things of the past. There is a tendency to part the hair either upon the side or in the middle of the head, although flat pompadour effects are being worn also, but naturally require a soft waving of the hair, which generally proves becoming. With this arrangement a soft, fluffy fringe is worn, about an inch and a half long. It is predicted that there will be much bang-cutting.

With constant training straight hair may be made to curl if the following hints are observed:

First of all, the front of the hair is parted off from ear to ear and combed down over the face; then it is divided into three parts.

The middle portion is combed back, and wet slightly with a small brush dipped in some good tonic; then it is ready for the waving.

The tonic not only makes the hair easier to handle while getting it ready to wave, but is what its name implies.

With this part of the hair held back in one hand, the comb is run slowly through the hair and a "combful" is pulled loose and allowed to fall in a wave to whichever side it seems to show a natural inclination. This tendency should always be remembered and the procedure never reversed. With the forefinger of the other hand hold the wave flat against the forehead, releasing the comb, and with the latter bring forward another wave, turning in the opposite direction.

The second finger should be slipped down over the second wave to hold it in place, and the process continued until three or four waves have been formed; then each row should be pinned down flat against the head, using a great number of very small hairpins.

If desired, one or two more waves may be added to the top, though usually four are sufficient to make a wavy pompadour. Next, the side hair is taken up and first the right and then the left treated in the same manner, each wave held carefully in place and then pinned flat. Tie a soft old veil over the pinned down hair and keep it on until the hair is thoroughly dried; an hour usually suffices, though sometimes it is advisable to leave pins in longer when possible.

The trick is all in handling the comb and in getting the hair to fall in even waves, but with patient practice you can attain the desired effect.

Another way of making the hair dry and fluffy and keeping it in curl during damp weather is to do the hair up in a particular manner after first moistening well with the white of an egg. The white of one egg is stirred slightly, but not beaten or separated in any way. This liquid is then diluted with a little water, or rose water. One-third as much water as white of egg are the proportions, and this should be kept in a small, wide-mouthed jar upon ice, if possible, where it will keep for a week, or until it is all used.

At night the hair that is to be waved is parted from the back hair, and the latter rolled up out of the way. Moisten a comb repeatedly in the egg preparation and draw it through the hair to be curled until it is thoroughly damp, then divide the hair into strands, and before winding each strand around the curler, twist it round and round tightly, then roll it round and round the curler. It is the first twisting before wrapping it around the curler that is so much desired. The wrapping it around the curler makes it wave, and the egg wash causes it to retain the fluffiness. The curl given by this method is most natural, but if the fluffiness is not desired, a plain wave may be made by merely wrapping the hair about the curler, omitting the twisting described. This wave ought to last for two or three weeks.

Another and most unusual method of waving hair is to braid as tightly as a strong man's fingers can draw it, a thick cord being plaited in with each strand to keep it immovably in place. The braid should then be dropped into boiling water, allowed to dry in its braided form, and then thoroughly pressed with an iron as hot as can be without scorching. The result is a wave that will remain until placed in water.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS

M. O. D.—Truly, yours is a pathetic letter, and yet I cannot help rather envying you, as rosy cheeks are usually desired by women, whether old or young. I have often wished that I could blush becomingly, as, when at all confused, I merely present a mottled face—which is not to be considered charming by the most friendly critic. Perhaps some readers of this department, who have known this affliction and have recovered, will be able to help you. Self-consciousness is frequently the cause, and for the cure of this there is nothing but persistent and unwearied interest in other things and persons. If you can really concentrate your thoughts on a subject wider than personal concerns, you will find this embarrassing trouble lessening. I would not take for it the drug which you mention. It may be that your nerves (the most tiresome things in the world) are out of order. In that case, you had better consult a physician. Get as much exercise in the fresh air as possible, and be careful in the matter of diet. I am afraid this is very unsatisfactory advice, but yours is a trouble arising from the mental state of timidity or distrust, rather than from any specific disorder. Your letter shows that you have a sense of humor, and that possession should be a great help.

MRS. A. G. C.—I am sorry that we cannot purchase for you the article referred to in this column some months ago. I am sending you, however, the address of a firm to which your local druggist may apply. I cannot speak personally of its benefits, although it comes highly recommended. If the trouble is so serious as your letter would indicate, medical advice would not be out of place. You are quite right to seek relief from such an affliction, and I trust the trouble will soon be removed.

MABEL S——.—We cannot recommend a style of hairdressing, without further particulars, as to your height and figure, as much depends on such circumstances. Study the illustrations of the various modes now worn, until you find one suitable and pleasing to yourself. Do not adopt a style which is said to be fashionable unless it is personally becoming. It is much better to be known for a somewhat distinctive individuality in matters of this kind than to be too anxious to be "in the style." This autumn, the various coiffures are unusually attractive, and you ought to be able to make a selection. If there is a good hairdresser in your town, money would not be wasted in consultation regarding a becoming coiffure.

EDITH—A girl should use the same care in choosing a husband that she does in selecting a piece of beef. Both should be tender.

Maud—And after marriage she should treat them the same. Both should be well roasted.—Yonkers Statesman.

Royal Vinolia

Toilet Preparations

represent the Highest Possible standard of purity, the crowning achievement of the best science, the best abilities, the best taste and the best resources in the production of the Finest Soaps, Perfumes and Toilet Preparations that the world has known.

Royal Vinolia Soap

gives an exquisite, soft and luxurious lather. Price 15c. a cake or 35c. for a cardbox of 3 tablets.

Royal Vinolia Tooth Paste

not only makes the teeth white and lustrous but also preserves them from decay.
Royal Vinolia Tooth Paste has a special ribbon shape which clings to the bristles of the tooth brush.
Price 25c.

Royal Vinolia Talcum

It has the charming Royal Vinolia Perfume, and other ingredients add to its pleasant and refreshing qualities. The tin with the wedgewood design and hinged sprinkler top. Price 25c. a tin.
IT'S A GREAT BIG BARGAIN!

Royal Vinolia Cream

For skin troubles of all kinds and in every case where soothing, comforting and perfectly hygienic ointment is required, no better cream than this can be found in all the world. Sold in two sizes.
Price 35c. and 50c. per box.

Royal Vinolia Perfume

The finest essences of flowers and sweet plants in a form to charm and delight discriminating users. Its fragrance lingers. In two sizes, each bottle with crystal cut stopper in a beautiful carton.
Price $1.00 and $1.50 per carton.

The VINOLIA PURITY—the highest purity known to science.
Vinolia goods are on sale at all good Druggists.

VINOLIA CO., Limited, London, Paris, Toronto

By Appointment to His Majesty the King.

Canadian Depot—Eastern Avenue, Toronto 11

Suggestions For Bad Complexions

For twenty years the Princess Toilet Preparations have been used successfully at home for curing or removing complexional troubles of all kinds. They are not experimental. We assure satisfactory results from their use. Many clever physicians recommend them.

Princess Complexion Purifier is used very extensively at this season of the year for clearing the skin of tan, freckles, mothpatches, discolorations, rashes, blackheads and other impurities. It surely makes a poor complexion good even when other remedies fail. A large bottle of excellence for $1.50, express or postpaid.

We invite consultation by mail regarding any Skin, Scalp, Hair or Complexional troubles with which you may be afflicted. A specialty is made of the permanent removal of Superfluous Hair, Moles, Warts, etc., by Electrolysis and treatment of Acne, Eczema, Red Nose and kindred skin diseases. A sample of Toilet Cream and booklet "H" mailed free if this announcement is mentioned.

Hiscott Dermatological Institute
Hiscott Building
61 College Street, - Toronto
Established 1892

Don't take chances with your fine things — Silks, Satins, Laces, Suits.

Send them to Fountain, to be cleaned or dyed.

If soiled, our Dry Cleaning will restore them to pristine freshness. If stained or faded, we can dye them as good as new. Fountain's work is irreproachable.

We pay express one way on goods from out of town.

Write for free copy of our book, which tells all about our work and our prices.

Fountain "My Valet"
30 Adelaide St. W., Toronto.
15

The most tempting breakfast is spoiled if the Coffee be of poor quality. But—every meal is a Banquet when you use

Seal Brand Coffee

Packed in 1 and 2 pound cans only. 126

CHASE & SANBORN - MONTREAL.

BENGER'S FOOD

FOR INFANTS, INVALIDS AND THE AGED.

A food of great nutritive value, which can be made suitable for any degree of digestive power by the simple process of letting it stand for a longer or shorter period at one stage of its preparation.

Benger's Food forms with milk, a dainty, delicious and highly nutritive cream, entirely free from rough and indigestible particles. "The Lancet" describes it as "Mr. Benger's admirable preparation."

Readers can obtain a 48-page booklet, "Benger's Food and How to Use It," which contains a "Concise Guide to the Rearing of Infants" and practical information on the care of Invalids, etc., on application to Benger's Food Ltd., Otter Works, Manchester, England.

Benger's Food is sold in tins by Druggists, etc., everywhere. B33

"GOOD CHEER" FURNACE With its Big "Circle Water Pan"

For Your Health's Sake

install a Good Cheer Furnace with its good big Circle Waterpan and its assurance of a warmth that is cosy and healthful.

Don't kiln-dry yourself breathing the parching moistureless heat of the average furnace where the waterpan is a joke.

The "Good Cheer" Circle Waterpan Furnace is the only furnace in which really satisfactory provision is made for supplying enough moisture to make the air as humid as it is on a perfect summer day.

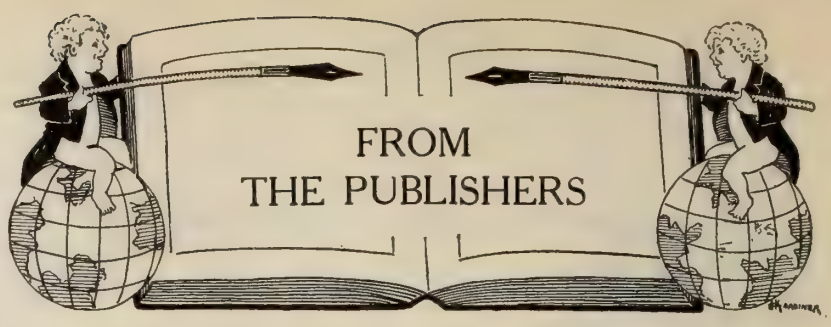
The big waterpan encircles the fire-pot, where evaporation is rapid, and distributes the moisture evenly through the whole volume of heated air.

The perfecting of the healthy heat feature may be taken as an indication that the "Good Cheer" Furnace leads in excellence of other features.

Investigate this new "Circle Waterpan" feature of the "Good Cheer" Furnace—it is of first importance. We'll gladly send you Booklet giving the facts. 11

The James Stewart Mfg. Co., Limited
Woodstock, Ont. — Winnipeg, Man

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.



IN the summer of 1909, the International Council of Women met at Toronto for the Quinquennial Congress. The deliberations of that assembly and the papers read thereat are published in two substantial volumes by George Parker & Sons of Toronto. There is a wealth of information on philanthropy, sociology, literature, art and domestic science in this report. From a paper by Mrs. Agnes Knox Black, Professor of Elocution in Boston University, on "Women's Influence in Poetry, Fiction, the Drama, History," we may quote the following:

When one considers the intellectual and emotional qualities which make women successful in the field of the modern novel, even the modern historical novel, the wonder grows why she has not accomplished more in strictly historical research and reconstruction. Such powers of description, narration and exposition of things of the real world, as are shown in the letters of Madame de Sevigne, Lady Mary Montague, and Jane Welsh Carlyle, or in the essays of Madame de Stael, are an earnest of what yet may be achieved by women in this department of literature. But if women have not written history in the grand style, they have made it.

SKIRT OF BROCADE SILK

The influence of woman in history is the history of the world. Every crisis in history, political, ecclesiastical, domestic, has been controlled by a woman. Upon her the social structure rests, and when she sinks ruin is imminent. The corruption of woman is a sure sign of a nation's downfall. Messalina was more ominous than Nero. On the other hand, many a nation has received everlasting uplift from a noble woman. Reference has been made to the Abbess Hilda in the seventh century. Of similar significance is the story of Queen Margaret of Scotland at the close of the eleventh century. The high-souled, sensitive Saxon princess who wedded the swarthy Malcolm gave to Scotland those elements of imaginative vision and religious zeal which have characterized the nation ever since.

That woman has won her pre-eminent success in literature in the novel is a fact of peculiar moment. The modern novel dates only from the middle of the eighteenth century, when, stimulated by the efforts of the four sturdy writers of the time of Queen Anne, the higher education of women began to take shape and form. There never was a time when there was in England a lower estimate of women than at the close of the seventeenth century. After the Restoration we have the decay of the Feudal ideal. "The passionate adoration with which woman was regarded in the Age of Chivalry had degenerated into a habit of insipid gallantry or of brutal license, contempt veiled under a show of deference, a mockery of chivalry, its form without its spirit. This was the attitude towards women in the years succeeding the Restoration." It was this that made Defoe propose as one of his projects a college for the higher education of women. Swift, too, the black-browed, the terrible Dean, saw that only by such opportunities as a college could afford could woman be given her due and rightful place. And you all know what was accomplished in this direction by the essays of Steele and Addison in the Tatler and the Spectator. They showed to the world what it had lost sight of—the true feminine ideal. When in the 49th Tatler Steele said of the Lady Elizabeth Hastings, "to love her is a liberal education," he not only paid the most magnificent compliment on record, but he gave external expression to the dignity and benign power of woman in her several relations and true sphere.

Now that everywhere women are admitted to the higher institutions of learning on equal terms with men and have full opportunities for undergoing that elaborate discipline which is the basis of all true originality in speculation and productive scholarship, we may reasonably expect worthy results in other departments of thought and expression. More than this, may we not dream that as a result of this educational activity these native qualities of woman, trained and disciplined to new powers, may give the world literary forms hitherto unthought of. We see indications of this around us. Woman's attempts at social reconstruction and reorganization in the form of problem-drama and sex-romances, blundering and ludicrous, and worse as many of them are, make us dare to hope that a woman will give the world a work of art, that, like a mirror, will reflect the complex and multitudinous life of modern society, with its hungry materialism shot through by the aspiration of the human soul, and its grief and sorrow illuminated by the "light that never was on sea or land."

FROM William Briggs, Toronto, come four volumes which may well occupy the hours of a summer afternoon. The best of these is "A Blossom of the Sea," a collection of poems, by Lyman C. Smith. The author has a pleasing and melodious gift, which is exercised on such themes as "Our City Cousin," "A Pioneer Farmer," and "Builders of the Broad Dominion." There is a gentle music in his lines which makes them a grateful accompaniment to the ripple of Canadian streams or the murmur of the wind among the grain. "Ulysses" shows a classic taste and influence, and, altogether, the volume is the expression of a refined and thoughtful nature, aspiring to "the things which are more excellent." The verses, "To Miriam," enshrine an ancient sorrow, the grief of a parent, and have a tender grace which makes an immediate appeal. There is an intense love of Nature, that glimpse of something immortal beyond the passing gleam of wave or glory of sunset, which is the true poet's heritage.

"Day Dreams of a Pioneer," by John Mortimer, is a slender book of verse, which is somewhat commonplace in treatment of various well-known themes, such as "A Woodland Vision," and "In Childhood's Clime." There is a fond tribute to the "honest worth" of Robert Burns, so extolled by Scottish-Canadians, and there is also a tribute to the young Canadian poet, Eric Mackay Yeoman, whose early death was deeply regretted. The work of Mr. Mortimer is far from remarkable, but will doubtless give pleasure to readers who find a gentle relaxation in the fiction of Rosa Nouchette Carey.

"East and West" is a collection of sketches by Adelaide P. Fitch that in the course of fifteen chapters, deal with a wide variety of themes, from Cleopatra to Luther Burbank, and from St. Columba to the Guardian Spirits of Nippon. The sketch, "Martha of Bethany," is unusually discriminating, and the concluding paragraph is worth remembering:

"Mary's influence still lingers in the world, and Martha is ever with us. We need both sisters: they are indispensable. It is not altogether beside the mark to assert that the leading personal characteristics of Martha and Mary are, and ever will be, constituent elements of womanhood."

"Seeing Canada and the South," by H. Percy Scott, M.A., is a book of travel concerned chiefly with Western Canada. San Francisco and Texas have a chapter or two, and the book concludes with a short description of the "sugar-cane and cotton" country, with a final return to the Land of the Maple. The author has a pleasing style, in description of the varying scenes he visits. In his comments on trade relations between Canada and the United States, he shows himself to be an out-and-out supporter of that much-discussed measure—reciprocity.

"To-day," says the writer, "we may fairly be said to be living in the age of corporations. These concerns control the parliaments of England, the United States, France, and Canada. In the best days of the Nineteenth Century, say from 1830 to 1880, it was quite possible for any man of clearly marked thought and forcefulness to get a seat in parliament. That day has gone by."

What about Mr. David Lloyd-George?

MRS. SIMCOE IN WELSH DRESS

MR. JOHN ROSS ROBERTSON, of Toronto, is a gentleman of varied activities. He is known in journalistic circles as the proprietor of The Evening Telegram, he is known among philanthropists as a citizen most keenly interested in the Hospital for Sick Children, and he is known among the Masonic fraternity as one of the noblest brethren of them all. Not the least useful of Mr. Robertson's gifts is that of local historian. His "Landmarks of Toronto" is a book of great value to all who regard the making of a city as the finest municipal art.

The latest publication for which we have to thank this many-sided journalist is "The Diary of Mrs. John Graves Simcoe, wife of the first Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, 1792-6, with Notes and a Biography." The original manuscript of the diary, of which this volume embodies the only copy, has been carefully transcribed by the permission of Mrs. Simcoe, of Wolford, the Simcoe estate, near the old town of Honiton in Devon, so well known to womankind for its manufacture of exquisite lace. "As a general rule, entries were made in this record day by day, and the writings mailed every week to Mrs. Hunt, a lady who had undertaken the charge of Mrs. Simcoe's four daughters, Eliza, Charlotte, Henrietta and Caroline, all under seven years of age, who remained at Wolford. Sophia, born in 1789, and Francis Gwillim, born in 1791, accompanied the Governor and his wife to Canada.

"The diary was commenced on the 17th September, 1791, nine days prior to Mrs. Simcoe's departure from Weymouth for Quebec, on the Triton, man-of-war. The last entries are on the 16th October, 1796, when Governor Simcoe and his wife again arrived in London."

This is a book which every Canadian would do well to read—especially, every Canadian woman. The record of the social life of the province, more than a century ago, shows how sturdy and simple was the early colonial civilization, with an old-fashioned courtesy which we should profit by emulating.

Niagara was then the capital of the province, with Navy Hall as the Governor's residence. "Castle Frank" was chosen as the York residence, and the modern Torontonian will be interested in the description of this spot as it appeared at the close of the eighteenth century. The account of the way in which the wife of the Governor spent her days reveals that she "looked well to the ways of her household and ate not the bread of idleness." She usually arose at six o'clock and was frequently on horseback at an hour when the modern housewife is merely thinking it is "time to get up." Hence we are not surprised to learn that she lived to be an octogenarian, and was an active force all the days of her long life.

Her diary, as given in these pages, is a straightforward and simple account of her Canadian sojourn, with such feminine attention to details as makes the picture of the everyday life more vivid. It is interesting to know that she received red watermelons from York (Toronto) and that during a cold drive near Quebec she wore a fencing mask lined with fur. Perhaps the most valuable feature in the volume is the large number of illustrations, two hundred and thirty-seven, including ninety reproductions of interesting sketches made by Mrs. Simcoe.

Everyone who cares to know about "Ontario in the making" will be glad to add this volume to the historical bookshelf.

The illustration of silk skirt is from gown worn by Mrs. Simcoe at opening of First Legislature of Upper Canada. Toronto: William Briggs.

A CURIOUS title has been chosen by E. B. Dewing for the novel, "A Big Horse To Ride." The reader discovers that Life itself, is the big horse which the heroine rides—and it must be admitted that she is a spirited equestrienne. She follows the "profession" of dancing, but finds it a vastly different art from the ordinary representations of its critics. The book is written in a style much superior to that of the ordinary novelist in vividness and unity. The reader becomes a little wearied, towards the close of the narrative, by the constant self-analysis, and is glad that the devotee of Terpsichore ultimately shows that she is possessed of common sense, as well as "temperament." Toronto: The Macmillan Company of Canada.

New Books issued and in Press

The Diary of Mrs. John Graves Simcoe

Wife of the First Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Upper Canada, 1792-6

With Notes and a Biography

BY

John Ross Roberston

Containing two hundred and thirty-seven illustrations, including ninety reproductions of interesting sketches made by Mrs. Simcoe.

Cloth . . . . . $3.00 net

Postpaid

A work of intense interest to every Canadian. One of the most important books ever issued in Canada.

From Tenderfoot to Scout

BY

Anna C. Ruddy

A story which every boy in the country should read

Boy Scouts will revel in it. A great book for the "Old Boys" too.

Cloth, illustrated, attractive cover design - - - $1.25 postpaid

On Western Trails in the Early Seventies

Frontier Pioneer Life in the Canadian Northwest

BY

John McDougall

Cloth, with frontispiece - - - $1.25 net postpaid

A stirring book descriptive of the early days in the North-West, being the personal experiences of John McDougall, the veteran pioneer.

Prairie Born

BY

Robert J. C. Stead

Cloth - - - - - - $1.00 net postpaid

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS OR FROM

Wm. Briggs, Publisher, 29-37 Richmond St. W., Toronto

CANADA

The World's Greatest Operatic Stars
Use and Endorse
THE
NEW SCALE WILLIAMS
CANADA'S GREATEST PIANO
"The tone is simply magnificent"—Slezak.
If you stop to consider the number of times this Piano has been used on the Concert platform, and the standing of the Artists who use it, there can be no doubt in your mind about the high position it occupies in the musical world.
Artists like CARUSO, FARRAR, HOMER, FREMSTAD, RAPPOLD, SLEZAK, SCOTTI, ELMAN, SEMBRICH and DESTINN, have chosen this great instrument for their Canadian Tours, because it is different from other pianos, and its magnificent tone is recognized as the NEW STANDARD which appeals to those who will have only the best.
Sold by reliable dealers from Coast to Coast or from factory direct.
Ask about our extended payment plan.
242
The Williams Piano Co., Limited
MANUFACTURERS Oshawa, Ont.
LEO SLEZAK
Great Wagnerian Tenor

Ontario Women's Institutes

GEORGE A. PUTNAM
SUPERINTENDENT
PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS, TORONTO

Annual Convention

THE Provincial Women's Institute Convention will be held in Toronto on Wednesday and Thursday, Nov. 15th and 16th. The day sessions will be held in the Normal School hall, and the evening sessions in the University Convocation Hall.

Provision has been made for a session of special interest to Institute officers and workers on the morning of the first day. Representatives from a number of Institutes which have been successful in special lines of work have been asked to take part in the discussions. The delegates look forward to a most profitable session.

PROGRAMME.

Nov. 15th—Forenoon.

Presiding, G. A. Putnam.

9.30—"O Canada."
9.40—Business Methods in the Institute.
10.20—Demonstration Lecture Course, Miss M. U. Watson, Macdonald Institute, Guelph.
10.45—Programmes and Literature.
11.00—Extending and Encouraging the Work.

Afternoon.

Mrs. H. Endacott, Orangeville.

2.00—National Anthem, Invocation.
2.15—Address of Welcome, Mrs. Jas. L. Hughes, Toronto.
2.30—Reply to Address of Welcome, Mrs. L. C. Burns, Caledonia.
2.45—Report of Superintendent.
3.15—"The School; Its Relation to the Community," Miss A. M. Hotson, Parkhill.

Evening.

Presiding, Mrs. E. G. Graham, Brampton.

8.00—Address, "Young Women and the Twentieth Century," Miss E. Guest, Belleville.
8.40—Address.
9.20—What Our Institutes Have Done, Representatives from Alton, Port Credit and Parkhill.

Thursday, Nov. 16th—Forenoon.
Presiding, Mrs. L. A. Hamilton, Port Credit.

9.30—Question Drawer.
10.15—"What We Can Do for the Boys," C. J. Atkinson, Broadview Boys' Institute, Toronto, and Representatives from Kent Bridge and Jordan Harbor.
10.45—"Moral Reform."
11.15—"My Child's Future," Mrs. M. N. Norman, Toronto.

Afternoon.

Presiding, Miss Laura Rose, Guelph.

2.00—"Community Improvement," Reports from Jarvis, Mimico, Chesterville, Lion's Head, Finch, Clifford.
2.30—"St. John's Ambulance Association," Dr. C. J. Copp, Toronto.
3.00—"Water Supply," Dr. W. T. Connell, Queen's University, Kingston.
3.45—"Marriage," Mrs. H. W. Parsons, Forest.

Evening.

Presiding, Miss M. U. Watson, Guelph.

9.00—Musical Selection.
8.15—"Women and Finance," Musical Selection.
9.00—"Our Dumb Animals," Mr. P. C. L. Harris, Secretary Humane Society, Toronto.

The officers of the Institutes will please send names of delegates to the superintendent.

Delegates who wish to be billeted will please call at the Ontario Government Immigration Office, a little to the west of the Union Station, on the opposite side of the street.

We regret that we are not able to announce all the speakers for the evening sessions at this time. Full programmes will be sent to all delegates and the secretaries of all Institutes not later than the 5th of November.

Demonstration Lecture Course

IN the early history of Ontario Women's Institutes, considerable attention was given to demonstrations in cooking. It was impossible, however, for the instructors to give anything of real value with the limited time at their disposal, and when they appeared only once or twice a year before each organization. At the Women's Institute Convention in 1910 the feasibility of a course of lectures was discussed. The members of the Institutes throughout the province will be pleased to learn that such a course was begun on October 2nd. The Institutes branch has secured Mrs. C. H. Burns, Toronto, to give the demonstrations and lectures. Mrs. Burns is a graduate of Macdonald Institute, Guelph, and has taken some special instruction under Miss Watson and her staff to specially prepare herself for the work in hand.

The contract and list of lectures given below will give our readers particulars regarding the work in hand. The places taking advantage of the work are as follows:

Cayuga—Monday.
Dunnville—Tuesday.
Delhi—Wednesday.
Hagersville—Thursday.
Caledonia—Friday.
Canfield—Saturday.

Classes will be held each afternoon, and at Dunnville, Cayuga and Caledonia both afternoon and evening, in order that school and office girls may take advantage of the work.

At some of the places the officers of the Institute expect from fifty to seventy-five to take advantage of the full course of lectures.

Contract between the Department of Agriculture and a group of six Institutes.

The Department of Agriculture agrees

1—Provide all portable equipment, except the necessary tables, chairs and one cook stove.

2—Defray the cost of the teacher's board, lodging and railway and other transportation.

3—Provide one teacher for the six Institutes, who will (a) Give fifteen demonstration lectures, one each week, the date and subject to be according to the schedule agreed upon between the Institutes concerned and the Department. (b) Iinstruct each local assistant in her assistant and marketing duties. (c) Furnish her assistant with written directions for any local marketing or special preparation, at least one week before they are needed.

The group of Institutes agrees to:—

1—Divide the week according to the most convenient transportation arrangements.

2—Provide any general printing and advertising necessary. An honest effort must be made by the Institute concerned, by way of advertising and personal invitations, to make the class as large, and the receipts as much above $25 as possible.

Each local Institute agrees to:—

1—Provide for any necessary local printing and advertising.

2—Provide a room or hall suitable for the lectures, equipped with the necessary chairs, tables and cook stove; also to see that the hall used is properly cleaned and lighted.

3—Provide all materials for demonstration work.

4—Provide an assistant who will become responsible for the opening of the room, do the necessary local marketing, and clear up the demonstration tables, dishes, etc.

5—Guarantee the sale of twenty-five (25) course tickets at $1.00 per ticket.

6—Appoint some person who will be required to keep an exact record of the attendance, in addition to those holding course tickets, at each session, and report the same to the Department within two weeks after the close of the course.

7—Pay the $25 charged for the course, and one-half of the receipts above $25, whether payment be on account of course tickets or single admissions, to the teacher, and secure a receipt from her for the same.

8—The Institute concerned is at liberty to sell course tickets in addition to the twenty-five required, and also to admit members and others to single lectures at ten cents per person.

The following shall be furnished with a copy of this contract:

1—Mr. G. A. Putnam, Superintendent of Institutes.

2—The individual Institutes concerned.

3—The teacher.

Signed by:—

.....
Representing the Dept. of Agriculture.
.....representing ..... Institute
.....
Teacher.

MRS. W. E. SANFORD, HON. PRESIDENT OF SANFORD INSTITUTE

Demonstration Lecture List

Each Institute concerned may select fifteen lectures from the following list.

If any Institute wishes to enlarge any one subject into two lectures in order to cover the ground more thoroughly, it may be so arranged.

The sequence of the lectures should be left to the lecturer to arrange. She will, however, defer to the wishes of the Institutes as far as the proper development of the whole series will permit.

The lecturer will place especial emphasis in all lectures upon the food value of the foodstuffs used, and upon the comparison of money value of the different foodstuffs, as related to food value.

Lecture No. 1—Fruit, typical methods of cooking, combinations, different ways of serving fresh fruits.
2—Vegetables, fresh, starchy and dried.
3—Spring vegetables.
4—Milk, soups, puddings and combinations, with especial relations to infant, children and invalid diet.
5—Cereals and cheese, varied methods of cooking, their high food value compared with other more expensive foods.
6—Eggs, correct methods of cooking, variations on methods, storage.
7—Tender meats, roasting and broiling, the correct cuts, food value compared with other meat cuts and other foods.
8—Tough meat, braised dishes, stews and soups.
9—Substitutes for meat.
10—Baking powder breads.
11—Yeast bread.
12—Fancy breads.
13—Cake.
14—Steamed dishes, puddings, supper dishes, vegetables, etc.
15—Salads, preparation of the ingredients, the dressings, etc.
16—Poultry, drawings, trussing, roasting, fricassees, etc.
17—Made-over dishes.
18—Canning and preserving.
19 Gelatine dishes.
20—Frozen dishes.
21—Hot weather foods.
22—Breakfast dishes.
23—Supper dishes.
24—Candy.
25—Invalid cookery.
26—Fireless Cookery.

Any Institute may postpone selecting the subjects for the two final lectures until the course is half over.

A Timely Enquiry

QUESTIONS regarding the formation of Institutes are always in order. The following letter has been forwarded from the Superintendent of Women's Institutes, Toronto:

Dear Sir—Can you tell me if there are any Women's Institutes in Saskatchewan? Since coming here, have been speaking about Women's Institutes, and have been asked to write and ask how one could be organized here. This is a small town, but they support three churches, and I think a very good place for an Institute. I belonged to a number of different societies in Galt, but there is none I miss like the Women's Institute. So will be very pleased to hear from you regarding the matter, and also if you could send me any reading matter regarding the organization, rules and regulations, etc., I will be much pleased.

Yours truly,
MRS. A. B. R.

A Muskoka Branch

ALTHOUGH Sanford Woman's Institute is still in its infancy, it is rapidly approaching a vigorous and lusty youth, and, like other youths, wishes to come out in the world. Our Institute consists of Port Carling, Windermere, and Brackenrig, and has a membership list of fifty-four names. The officers for 1911-12 are: Honorary president, Mrs. W. E. Sanford; vice-president, Mrs. J. Davison; secretary, Mrs. A. L. Casselman; treasurer, Mrs. W. A. Hanna; director, Mrs. G. Cannell; auditors, Miss Amy Arksey, Miss Ethel Stubbs.

Our meetings are held monthly, and are well attended, and the interest is maintained throughout. Some special features are: Prizes are given at the fall fairs for the following items: Best flowers produced from seeds supplied by Institute; best-kept cow; best home-made bread; best buttonholes made in cotton; best made dolls' clothes, open to girls 12 to 15 years, also under 12 years.

Another feature is the receiving and returning fraternal visits from neighboring institutes, also removal of literature having an immoral tendency.

On August 16th we had the pleasure of an address by Mrs. W. E. Sanford, our honorary president, in which she described her winter's work in establishing Women's Councils in France, Italy, Greece, Turkey, Roumania, Bulgaria and Great Britain, with the result that various institutes were formed. She graphically described the social condition of women in the places visited, and found that invariably as these countries were Christianized the women took the place they were intended to fill. In responding to a very hearty vote of thanks to Mrs. Sanford, she invited the members to her beautiful island home, Sans Souci, Lake Rosseau, on Friday, August 20th, which invitation was accepted by about forty members. Mrs. Sanford's beautiful launch "Naiad" conveyed the party to and from Port Carling.

Mrs. Sanford gave a delightful description of the coronation of King George, which she had attended, and a musical programme was rendered, after which dainty refreshments were served. A very hearty vote of thanks was tendered to Mrs. Sanford for her hospitality, and many other acts of kindness to Sanford Institute.

On September 2nd we had the pleasure of receiving delegates from various branches of South Muskoka district at the home of Mrs. George Sutton. There were forty-one present. The district president, Mrs. H. Goetz, occupied the chair. The subject was "Training of Children." Mrs. Killen read a thoughtful paper in which she emphasized parents giving an example in all things to their children; never break faith with a child; all obligations to them are as binding as any social engagement. Be as kindly and courteous to your household as you are to strangers. Teach children to observe the work and beauties of nature. Parents should seek inspiration from above to guide the little feet aright.

Mrs. Thomas Croucher read an instructive paper, the chief points being: Insist on prompt and absolute obedience; teach children truthfulness. When children are too young to understand deceit is the time to instil truthfulness and honesty. Always appeal to a child's reason. Punish if necessary, but always in love. Jails are populated by graduates from a street education. Make for your children a home, not a sleeping place.

Mrs. Sutton read a valuable paper, the leading thoughts being: We receive children fresh from the hands of God to be moulded by home training and example. Instil in early youth habits of cleanliness of person, speech and surroundings. In everyday life parents are a living example; shall it be good or bad? Mrs. Andrews of Orillia, then read a very amusing selection, descriptive of a formal "at home, 4 to 6." After discussion on the subject of the day and the acceptance of an invitation to Bardsville on October 3rd, refreshments were served, which were enjoyed by all. In closing we wish all sister institutes success, and may they all enjoy the advance in sociability and general instruction as Sanford Woman's Institute has enjoyed it.

MRS. A. L. CASSELMAN,
Sec. Sanford Women's Institute.

Children's Ailments

FROM Jennie Warnica (Miss or Mrs.?) of Stroud, comes the following informing article:

Toothache.—This is one of the most irritating pains that flesh is heir to. Dry heat is soothing, applied by means of a hot water bag or hot salt in a flannel bag. If there is a cavity in the aching tooth it should be packed with cotton, which has been soaked either in alcohol, witch hazel, oil of wintergreen, cloves, peppermint or cinnamon.

Sore Throat.—There are many varieties, but for the ordinary sore throat, introducing a cold, nothing brings quicker relief than a gargle of hot salt solution every two hours. If hoarseness is present, a piece of flannel saturated with oil of eucalyptus or camphorated oil, applied to the throat over night, will work wonders.

Fever Sores are the result of colds, indigestion or fever, usually occurring on or near the mucous membrane of the lips or nose. They should be painted with flexible collodion, as this will form a protective skin, preventing further infection, and help to dry them up. Do not apply an ointment, as that will increase the moisture, and the tendency to spread, except zinc ointment, which is of a drying and absorbing nature.

Canker Sores are caused by excessive uric acid or a nervous condition. They can often be despatched by swabbing with alcohol.

Hiccough.—This usually denotes some digestive disturbance, but at the same time seems to be controlled by the nervous system, as a sudden fright will often stop them; but this will hardly do for a sick child. Holding the breath while you count fifteen or taking seven swallows of water without pausing for breath is often effectual.

In Whooping Cough a child should be encouraged to expel from the mouth all the secretion which is released by coughing, because if this is drawn back into the throat there is danger of secondary bronchitis or pneumonia. A prominent German doctor advocates the use of a hot bath every evening, the child staying in the bath from ten to fifteen minutes. Children sleep well after it, and the number and severity of the paroxysms of coughing seem much diminished. It is very important to keep children's teeth clean. Germs enter through and by bad teeth, causing adenoids, tonsilar affections and glandular enlargements in the neck. Dr. Osler has said: "If I were called upon to state which of the two in my opinion, cause the most evil, alcohol or decayed teeth, I should unhesitatingly say decayed teeth." These weighty words coming from one of high authority must be taken seriously.

During the first few weeks of the life of an infant pain sometimes arises from the fact that too little water is given. To keep the baby well, give it pure air day and night. No food except mother's milk or food directed by the physician. When it cries or is fretful, do not offer it nourishment, give it water. Be sure that it gets enough sleep. Don't handle it; let it alone.

The hardest work in the care of children is not when they are seriously ill for then they want to be "let alone," and judicious letting alone, by the way, is one of the fine points of nursing. The really hard work comes later, when convalescence smiles around the bend in the road to recovery, and the spirit of youth comes back to its own, eager to be up and doing, intolerant of delays and restraints. A child is not happy in a warm, fussy, fretty atmosphere, but will blossom into happiness, as a flower does in sunshine, in fresh air, cheerfulness and serenity. Too many people in the room at once are a tax on the strength you are trying to restore.

All De Laval Cream Separators ARE ALL RIGHT

The De Laval Separator Co.
173-177 Williams St.
MONTREAL
VANCOUVER—WINNIPEG

Catalog free.

Agents everywhere.

It Is Worth The Difference

St. Lawrence Sugar costs the dealer more than ordinary sugar, but it is worth the difference.

St. Lawrence "Crystal Diamonds" are absolutely the perfection of sugar refining—brilliantly clear and sparkling—and an ornament to every table.

Ask for "St. Lawrence Crystal Diamonds"—in 5 pound boxes—also sold by the pound.

The St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Co. Limited
MONTREAL 30

CHANGE your opinion of the union suit as a garment for men's underwear. See the new union suit with every merit and never a fault of the old, and striking merits of its own. See (and you will buy) Watson's Klosed - Krotch Combination. This comfort garment, knit-to-fit perfectly and warranted not to shrink nor sag, sets snugly across the seat, doesn't strain, doesn't gap (because krotch-kloses like a pair of ordinary drawers). Only a single button to fasten, and it placed at one side, out of the way. Fits smoothly, neatly, comfortably across the hips, and is really comfortable, sitting or standing. Any weight you want; and the size you ask for will fit. It's knit that way by Watson Mfg. Co., Limited, Brantford, Ont.

ASK FOR 26

WATSON'S Klosed-Krotch COMBINATIONS

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

The GILLETTE Is An Economy

Not An Extravagance

Because a fairly good open-blade razor can be bought for two dollars, while a GILLETTE costs five, have you concluded that the GILLETTE is an extravagance? It is not.

The open-blade costs you $2.00 to buy and at least 25c. a year to keep honed and in condition. Total, $2.25 for the first year.

The GILLETTE, with 12 double-edged blades, costs $5.00, and a second box of blades (should your beard be very tough) adds $1.00. Total, $6.00 for first year. Difference $3.75.

Looks bad for the GILLETTE, eh? But wait!

The three-minute GILLETTE will save you 5 to 10 minutes every time you shave. Put it at 5. That's over three working days a year. Isn't your time worth over $1.25 a day?

When you're nearly late for the train or an important engagement, the five minutes which the GILLETTE saves you is apt to be worth several times the whole cost.

Then there's the comfort of the clean, cool, easy GILLETTE shave—worth in itself several times the difference in price.

For real economy—time and face as well as cash considered—buy a GILLETTE and enjoy it.

Standard Sets $5.00.
Pocket Editions $5.00 to $6.00.
At your Druggist's, Jeweler's or Hardware Dealer's.

"The Standard $5.00 Set".

Gillette Safety Razor Co. of Canada, Limited.

Offices and Factory: 63 St. Alexander St. Montreal.

Offices in New York, Chicago, London, Eng., and Shanghai, China.

Factories in Montreal, Boston, Leicester, Berlin, and Paris.

248

Moreover, people always "feel a draught," and want to shut the windows. The morning bath may seem more interesting if, while giving it, you repeat some rhymes. Here is one:

"Dippety dash! Dippety dash,
Wash his face with a merry splash.
Polish it well with a towel fine,
Oh! how his eyes and cheeks will shine."

Brushing teeth may be most interesting and important, for one must take very good care of them to make them last until one is as old as father. One thing which appeals to nearly all children is story telling, but, of course, you all know it. Told stores seem more real than those read from a book, and their uses are endless. Many glasses of milk have gone down unwilling little throats, because when the last drop was swallowed a wonderful story would be told. Many a child has taken a much-needed rest hour each afternoon knowing that later someone would sit by the bed and recite verses from Stevenson's "Child's Garden" or Eugene Field's "Love Songs of Childhood."

A multitude of toys are not restful; two or three for a day or two, then a complete change. The antics of Brownies are enjoyed by girls and boys alike. To make them get a large-sized heavy marble and bend a stiff shirt cuff into a tube just long enough for the marble to roll through. Fasten a piece of white cloth smoothly around the tube, and at each end put a piece of velvet, gathered like a tam-o'-shanter, the marble being inside the tube, of course, before the second tam is sewed down. Sketch the face below one tam, stitch two pieces of cloth for legs to the other tam, where they should dangle limply. Now get an ironing board, put one end on the bed, the other on the floor, set Brownie at the top and push him. Be sure that the tam is just full enough to hold half the marble; if it is too full the marble will not give the proper push against the wall of the tube and Brownie will not tumble. Each child will find new stunts for Brownie to do. Blowing soap bubbles is a good way to pass an hour or two. Lukewarm soapsuds, to which has been added a little glycerine, is a satisfactory bubble solution. A substitute for a pipe is a straw or a spool. Did you ever try combination drawing? The first person draws a head and folds over the paper, leaving two dots to show where the body should be attached. The second person draws a body, folds over the paper, and an obliging third puts on legs. It does not sound so funny, but if you get a donkey's head on a cat's body, supported by chicken legs, see how funny your small patient will think it.

* * *

A favorite guessing game is played like this: The child thinks of some object; you try and find out what it is by a series of questions that may be answered by yes or no. Mount colored magazine covers on cardboard, cut the mounted pictures into numerous irregular pieces for the patient to reconstruct. Make a list of twisted letters, which when properly arranged, spell the names of nuts, trees, fruits, flowers, etc. Get large white beans or peas, soak them in water, and by sticking toothpicks in, ladders and very many queer and funny objects may be made.

Above all, the child is made cheerful, not temporarily, for someone has said: "If you make children happy now, you will make them happy twenty years hence by the memory of it."

Table Manners

MRS. JOHN McQUAKER, of the Kemble Institute, has some suggestions regarding table manners, which are decidedly worth while.

Shall we put first things first, and begin with the soup? The first thing in the way of table manners I recollect my mother trying to teach her children was that we must sup our soup from the side of the spoon, and not from the point, if anything, nearer the handle than the point. We must not draw the soup into our mouths with our breaths, thereby making a disgusting noise, but must open our mouths and hold the spoon so that the soup would naturally gravitate to the required spot. We were not allowed to break our bread or cracker into our plate and sup with the spoon, but must eat this separately.

The hand when not in use must be kept in the lap. When the soup plates have been removed and the next course served, one must only use the knife for cutting what cannot be broken with the fork, and on no account must the knife be put into the mouth. Add to these the little courtesies "Please" and "Thank you," as the different dishes are passed or helped, and you have found the secret of table manners. I forgot one essential—the elbow of the arm in use must be kept close to the side, bending and turning the wrist when necessary, but keeping the elbows so that you will not interfere with your neighbor, no matter how closely seated. I have been pleased to note in my little trippings here and there, supping sometimes at large tables and then at small ones, that this code taught in the little old house

Useful, pretty and smart are these improved knit coats

For driving or motoring—as for a hundred other outdoor enjoyments—you will be glad of your Pen-Angle Sweater Coat on windy days and chilly evenings. For, though they feel so fleecy to the touch and set so lightly on the body, they are warmth-giving indeed. Knit by the Pen-Angle process, from wools of the choicest; these useful garments possess a smartness and style not known to the usual knit coat. And they retain their shapely lines, because they are carefully shaped to fit snug to the figure. That shape stays in them because it is knit into them – the Pen-Angle way.

Your exact physical type is included in the wide range of

Pen-Angle Sweater Coats

Your taste in style and colors has been carefully consulted. Some store convenient to you will show you these beautiful garments for men, women and children. 62

Pen-Angle Penmans Limited Paris, Canada

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

on the farm by one who was thoroughly trained by her mother is the one invariably used by those who know. The use of the proper spoon or fork may be learned by experience. It is always safe to do as our hostess does in this, as she knows what each article was placed for, and these vary at different tables. At home I train my children to refold their napkins carefully, as the same one is used for several days, but on a formal occasion it is left loosely at the side of the plate, as it will not be used again till laundered. The art of conversation should be carefully cultivated, in order that the meeting times of the family may be as pleasant as possible. While the training of children on these principles is slow, tedious work, having to be repeated at every meal for years, still it is worth the trouble in order that our children may sit in any company at any table free from embarrassment.

From Murillo

WE held our sixth annual meeting at Murillo town hall on May 18th. We had on the roll forty-nine members. Our meetings are held the third Thursday in each month, and are well attended, considering the long distance some of our members have to travel to attend. We held twelve meetings, and twenty-eight papers and three addresses were rendered. On the 15th of March we held a joint dinner with the Oliver Agricultural Society, and the W.I. received $13.60 after all expenses were paid. We have given prizes to the amount of $25.00 to the Oliver Agricultural Society each year for the annual fair since we were organized. We have a library, which is much enjoyed by all; the books are being called for more each month. There were ninety-one exchanges made last quarter.

At our last annual fair our president collected nine dollars and fifty cents from Institute members for the McKellar Hospital, Fort William, and a delegation from the E. M. & G. Hospital, Port Arthur, attended our December meeting, asking for aid in their work. Committees were appointed from our Institute members, who canvassed the township, and goods to the value of about eighty-two dollars were collected and delivered free to the E. M. & G. Hospital. At our March meeting a collection was taken up from our members in aid of the memorial fund for the late Mrs. Hoodless, founder of the Ontario Women's Institutes. Altogether we have had a busy and successful year, and we look forward for greater things in the future.

MRS. A. BOULTER, President.

Two Programmes

ALTONA sends the following programme:

June, 1911—Review of last year's work by the President; reading, Mrs. March; Cool Dishes and Cool Drinks for Summer, Miss C. Hoover.

July—Delegate; Butter-making and Other Dairy Problems, Miss B. Miller, Guelph.

August—The Institute and the Home, Mrs. Lehman; recitation, Miss B. Mowder; The Canadian Home Cook Book, Mrs. McKay.

September—Saving Steps, Miss S. Stewart; reading, Miss Myrtle Hoover; recitation, Miss Blanche Reesor; Roll Call; Lavor-saving Devices.

October—Care of Children's Teeth, Dr. Smith; reading, Miss Eckardt; recitation, Miss G. McKay.

November—Subject to be chosen, Dr. W. A. Sangster; recitation, Miss A. Coates; reading, Mrs. Yake.

December—Report of Convention; The True Spirit of Christmas Giving, Mrs. B. Reesor; recitation, Miss L. Slack; Competition by the Junior Members, Darning and Buttonhole Making; Roll Call; Christmas Suggestions.

January, 1912—Delegate.

February—The Home and Housekeeping of To-day, Mrs. M. Kester; recitation, Miss E. Smith; How to Cultivate Habits of Thrift in our Boys and Girls, Mrs. A. Reesor; Roll Call.

March—What Dishes to Prepare When the Appetite Needs Coaxing, Mrs. Eli Lehman; reading, Miss J. Kester; paper, Summer Care of Woollens and Furs, Mrs. Wm. Reesor; Roll Call; Fish and Egg Recipes.

April—Tidiness in Home Surroundings, Mrs. Jos. Hill; reading, Miss A. Hoover; Sketches of Some of Our Canadian Writers, Mrs. R. White, recitation, Miss Ida Mowder; Roll Call.

May—Subject to be chosen, Mrs. Mowder; Evils of Fault-finding and the Harm of Worry, Mrs. T. Smith; Election of Officers; Roll Call.

From Murillo, also, comes a programme, which may interest you:

July—Warm Weather Dessert, Mrs. C. Gorton; Canadian Women of Note, Mrs. H. Moffatt; Question Drawer.

August—Methods of Canning and Preserving, Mrs. A. Reid; Ways of Cooking Poultry, Mrs. R. B. Martyn; Discussion of Saving Steps, Members.

September—Pickling and Canning of Vegetables, Mrs. A. Gorton; Prevention and Cure of Colds, Mrs. R. Larabee; music, Miss L. Smith.

October—The Value of Courtesy, Mrs. J. M. Sherk; Are Plants Injurious in the Sleeping Room? Mrs. A. McGillivray; Question Drawer.

November—Dollars and Sense in the Household, Mrs. J. Hahn; Fall Work in and About the House, Mrs. G. Munroe; song, Miss W. McKenzie.

December—The Value of Punctuality, Mrs. R. McKenzie; Our Year's Work, Miss S. J. McNally; What Christmas Means To Us, Mrs. J. McDonald.

January—Different Ways of Cooking Meats, Mrs. J. Stevenson; Value and Uses of Olive Oil, Mrs. E. Lynn; selected Readings, Members.

February—Everyday Helps for the Housewife, Mrs. J. Oster; Question Drawer; music, Mrs. A. Felker.

March—What Benefit Do We Derive by Meeting Together? Mrs. A. Boulter; Different Preparation of Eggs, Mrs. R. Nicholett; Essay on Easter, Mrs. Norman.

April—Compare Seed Sown in the Ground to Seed Sown in the Heart, Mrs. Grant; Spring Flower Garden, Mrs. T. Downs; music, Mrs. H. Yelland.

Kemble and Bancroft

BANCROFT Women's Institute attended the L'Amable picnic at the lake one day in late August, and spent a delightful afternoon. The L'Amable Institute left nothing undone to give the guests a good time. An organ was on the grounds, and a gramophone with all the latest pieces—Harry Lauder in abundance—and the spread was simply sumptuous. L'Amable Lake well deserves its name, "the amiable." It is indescribably picturesque. Its verdure is in every shade of green, and its many indentures vary from each other by some fresh point of beauty. The ripple of the canoe, as it glides noiselessly along in the deep, still water; the rush of the falls in the distance; the glorious sky of an ideal summer day, reflecting its rich colors on the landscape and water, was a sight not soon to be forgotten. A flotilla of boats went over to the island, and a miniature British Isles as regards shape. The Union Jack was hoisted, and its grand old colors, waving over the green trees, was a loyal and pretty sight. We sailed around to the south-west side, where we came to a neat little wharf, and landing, proceeded to "Loch Lomond," the dainty little cottage of Mr. James Spurr, from the summit of which floated the Union Jack. They call the island Scotland, and it is no misnomer, as there are the Highlands and the Lowlands. We wended our way along a meandering path gradually sloping to the lowlands, a perfectly level little valley of green at the base, jutting out almost parallel with the water. We stood there in silence, drinking in the beauty of forest, sky and lake, gazing as in dreamland, and the soul poured out in adoration to nature's God.

Returning to shore, the L'Amable ladies had supper prepared in true picnic style, and we were prepared to eat it. Then were played a number of historic airs, very dear to every Scottish heart, the singing of songs which made the heart seem young, the children swinging among the tall trees, all having a genuine good time. Parting came all too soon. God Save Our King, three rousing cheers for L'Amable, kind adieus, and then we were on our way home to dear old Bancroft, feeling purer and better from our afternoon's innocent enjoyment.

How short our happy days appear!
How long the sorrowful!

Note the Color of your flour—
And the Bread it makes for you.
Delicately creamy is FIVE ROSES flour.
Because it is not bleached, don't you see.
Clear—Immaculate—Desirable.
A pure Manitoba wheat flour—FIVE ROSES.
And the healthy sun-ripened spring wheat berries are naturally of a golden glow.
And the meaty heart of the polished kernels is creamy.
Milled from this cream, FIVE ROSES is delicately "creamy."
The only natural flour from Manitoba's prime wheat.
Which gets whiter and whiter as you knead it.
And your bread is most appetizing, unusually attractive in appearance.
Looks good.
And is good.
Bake this purest unbleached flour.

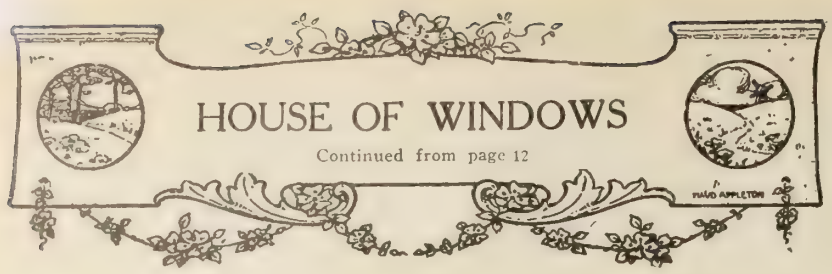
Five Roses Flour

Not Bleached Not Blended

LAKE OF THE WOODS MILLING COMPANY, LIMITED MONTREAL

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.



well protected from indiscriminate appeals. His servants, his business manager, his secretary, formed a quiet but efficient bodyguard, allowing him to go upon his luxurious way in peace. But, although he allowed himself to be thus guarded through a kind of moral cowardice, and the shrinking of a man who is half afraid of his own best impulses, it was always with the reservation that some day he intended to break through and look things in the face. Just what this "looking things in the face" implied he hardly knew; but that it implied something unpleasant he was satisfied. Men of this calibre are liable to long indecision with the seeming inconsistency of quick determination at psychological moments, so that Mr. Torrance's secretary need not have been quite so surprised when, the day after the interview with Mr. Bunce, he found his usually indifferent and somewhat bored employer determined to go personally into the business of reforming the Stores. Nor was he without some very definite plans—plans which astonished the secretary the more by their feasibility. The would-be reformer was himself astonished at the secretary's astonishment, and vaguely irritated by it. He had been conscious for so long of his own determination to "do something" some day and had been so long working up to a certain point that the point once reached he passed beyond it with no effort at all. The slowly gathering momentum of all his idle years were behind him, but it annoyed him and hurt his pride to see that other people did not understand this; that they looked upon the inevitable expression of his long purpose as the sudden and erratic impulse of a rich crank.

Even Miriam, whom he had supposed would have known him better, had been inclined to be skeptical, and it was evident that Mr. Bunce, the manager, looked upon his interference as a temporary inconvenience merely.

Well, he would show these people that he was in earnest, in practical earnest, too. When Mark came back he would have a helper. Mark would like nothing better than to be given a definite work. He was young and eager. His energies had not been atrophied by years of—well, of indecision. And he would probably have sense enough to know when a man was in earnest. Definite work would also do much to wean him from any lingering traces of his fancy for Miss-er-Brown.

Often in these days he congratulated himself upon having acted promptly in Mark's case. More and more he became convinced that he had not exiled him without cause. Something in the lad's letters seemed to tell of a subtle change. And Miriam had been so sure. How relieved he had felt when she had been able to assure him that the young person named Brown, in whom Mark was interested, was not employed in the Stores. How awkward it would have been if the girl who had fainted had been she. In that case he would have felt—well, he would have felt remarkably like a villain in a book; like the cruel Uncle of Fiction and other unpleasant personages. But since Mark's Miss Brown was not the Miss Brown of the Stores, he felt able to attend to the case of the latter without prejudice. There was no fear of him doing less than his duty and his duty in this case was plain.

This is how he put the case to himself. A young girl employee of his had fainted while at work. Query—Was the girl unfit for the work or was there something wrong with the conditions under which she worked? It was clearly his duty to find out first of all if she had been engaged in accordance with the Stores' principles. The easiest way to do this was to see for himself. A year ago this would have naturally seemed to be the secretary's work, now it, just as naturally, seemed

WHEN YOU SHOP BY MAIL

INSIST UPON GETTING

DELIVERY-PAID MERCHANDISE

Whether You Order Fifty Cents' or Fifty Dollars' Worth of Goods, You Will Have All Delivery Charges Paid if You Adopt

SIMPSON'S

SIMPLIFIED SYSTEM OF MAIL ORDER BUYING

No more looking up express or freight rates. The price you see PRINTED is all the money YOU SEND to have Goods Delivered to your nearest Station.

No more padding out your order to $25.00, or buying more goods than you want, in order to have charges paid.

Our Fall and Winter Catalogue Prices will show you that you're losing money by shopping any other way.

We're enrolling thousands of new customers, and receiving "delighted" letters from all over Canada.

Here's an Example from Our New Fall and Winter Catalogue of the value you receive with all charges paid.

W. 1506.—Serviceable Waist of Heavy Jap Silk, black or white, opens in front and has groups of double one-inch tucks; centre panel of lovely guipure lace, full length sleeve, tucked cuffs and collars with lace edging.. $1.95

Send money order for $1.95 and we will send you this beautiful waist with all charges paid.

We take all the risk. If goods are not entirely satisfactory, RETURN THEM AT OUR EXPENSE and we will exchange them or refund your money

A feature of our New Fall and Winter Catalogue is its 45 pages of Delivery-Paid Furniture. Just write on a Post Card "Send me FALL AND WINTER CATALOGUE, No. 33" to be his own work. He would call upon the girl at her home and settle the matter in his own way.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

How pretty she had looked lying there on the stiff office couch. How young, how charmingly childish. He had felt as a lover of flowers might feel upon seeing a lovely opening rose carelessly beaten down. A most unpleasant sensation. What wonderful hair the young girl had—honey color. A spasm of pain crossed his face as he thought of that other whose honey-hair had been the light of his life. Strange how this girl persisted in reminding him of Mona. They could not be really alike. But likenesses are strange things. Mona's eyes had been blue and her short thick lashes dark; this girl's eyes were hazel with long curling lashes of golden brown, but for all the difference there was a resemblance. When she had looked up and smiled at him—surely Mona used to smile just like that! Mona's face had not been oval like Miss Brown's, yet Miss Brown had Mona's dimples. It was most remarkable—it was a torturing resemblance. What a freak of fate—to see one's dearly-loved wife, long dead, smile up at one from the face of a shop-girl!

As he made his way to the House of Windows he braced himself to meet inevitable disappointment. He did not conceal from himself that he wanted to see Christine again—to convince himself that she did not really smile like Mona. It would be just as well to get that idea out of his head, for somehow there had seemed a reproach in that smile, a reproach which would vanish with the fancied resemblance. Doubtless he would find the girl with the lovely face in a vulgar home amid sordid surroundings—that would break the spell.

True, he had thought, in the office, that she had looked like a lady; but Adam Torrance had never suspected that a lady serving in a store was a possible phenomenon—not that he knew anything about it, only he had taken such things for granted.

His heart sank as he entered Brook Street. Already he felt disillusioned, for what could be expected of one whose home was here. At the House of Windows he gave up a last hope. It was horrible to think of anyone with Mona's face living in this human warren. Yet to retreat now would be to fail in his duty. The doorway stood open into the dirty hall, the dirty stairs stretched uninvitingly upward, with a sniff of distaste he decided to go on.

High up there was a sound of music. Was it a violin, or a bird—either would be surprising enough in this place, he thought. He paused to listen. It was neither violin nor bird, but a woman's voice singing. The air he did not know, but it was something sweet and simple and the singer had a birdlike voice. Somehow the sweetness and purity of it made the dreary staircase less dreary. As he listened, the singing stopped abruptly before he could determine from whence it came. He began to mount again with better heart.

At the Misses Brown's door he paused, taking a firm grip upon his resolution. It was really most embarrassing to call upon people in this way. He hoped they would not feel that they were being patronized or anything like that. And yet it is quite true that he had set out with the full intention of patronizing. Someone laughed inside the room just as he knocked, and the laugh made him start and shiver—it was Mona's laugh.

The next moment the door opened and Christine stood smiling in the doorway.

"Why, it's Mr. Torrance," she exclaimed in pleased surprise. She offered her hand frankly. It had evidently not occurred to her that she was in danger of being patronized. Her ease of manner, aside from a certain shy delight, was as perfect as if she had been a Vere de Vere. "Ada," she said, "Mr. Torrance has come to see us."

He was within the room now, the dreary stairs were shut out, and facing him with outstretched hand and a strange listening look upon her face was Ada Brown. Strangers never knew that Ada was blind, yet Adam Torrance knew it in a moment, so quick and subtle is the action of a rare personality upon one atuned to it. In the one moment which elapsed when he went over and took her hand Adam Torrance drew nearer the true Ada Brown than many who had seen her daily for years. He knew also that it was she who had been singing.

"Song birds build high," he said, smiling. "I am out of breath."

Christine saw with amusement the soft red creep into Ada's cheek. Ada who so seldom blushed.

"Yes," she said prosaically. "But in the absence of wings one sometimes longs for an elevator. Won't you sit here?"

He had time now to glance about the room. The same to which the little deserted baby had been brought sixteen years ago. The green table cover had been replaced by another, a hole in the green carpet had been neatly covered by a rug. The chairs had been re-covered, the curtains at the windows were different, but they still hung with a modest grace. Practically there was no real change in the room, and its air of homely taste and comfort struck the rich man quite as forcibly as sixteen years ago it had struck Mr. Thomas Burns, of the book department at Angers'. There was no squalor or vulgarity here. Poverty, perhaps, but poverty with a difference. Mr. Torrance fairly blushed at the recollection of his thoughts coming up the stair.

"I see that your sister is already feeling the better for her rest, Miss Brown," he began a little awkwardly. Both of the girls were more at ease than he. "I suppose Miss Christine has told you—"

"Of your kindness in giving me a few holidays," interposed Christine softly. "Oh, yes, indeed I have."

"It was very good of you," said Ada, gratefully.

"Ah-er- not at all! Your sister—I suppose you are sisters?"

"Yes," said Christine, "although we are not at all alike."

Their visitor certainly thought that he had seldom seen sisters more unlike; but this want of family likeness is not at all uncommon in cases where mother and father have both been of pronounced type—remarkably fine types they must have been, he thought, as he looked at the differing beauty of the sisters.

"It is very kind of you to come and see us," Christine said in her straightforward way. "I am quite well now, and on Monday I hope to be back at work. I think I can promise not to need any more holidays."

"You must not return until you are quite able," said Mr. Torrance, "and if the conditions of the Stores have anything to do with your illness we wish to have these conditions remedied." He was grateful to her for bringing things so quickly to a practical level. "You see," he went on, "I am anxious to really understand the working of our present system. That is one reason why I called to-day. Would you mind, do you think, if I were to ask a few questions?"

"Certainly not," said Christine. "But I doubt if I can help you. I am so new, you know; I have been only a fortnight at the Stores. If Celia were able she could help you much better."

"Celia is—?"

"Oh, I forgot you did not know. Celia is our eldest sister. She has worked in the Stores for sixteen years, ever since I was a baby. The girls say she got to be one of the best saleswomen they ever had." Christine's innocent pride in Celia's abilities was pretty to see, but it brought a fresh shock to her visitor. Celia, the elder sister of these girls, a shop-girl for sixteen years! He glanced again at the perfectly tasteful room, at the lovely, refined faces of its occupants, and his whole world of values began to reel. Meanwhile Christine, sitting with clasped hands and bright head bent forward and prattled away. She told him of Celia, of Celia's remarkable expertness as a seller of ribbons, of the beautiful neatness with which Celia "kept stock," of her own despair of ever being half as clever, of how Celia did not wish her to go to work, and of how they had been obliged to circumvent Celia, of how fortunate it was that she had come home early the other day and so was able to allay Celia's anxiety, and, finally, of how they hoped Celia would be strong enough not to take a relapse when they had to tell her the truth. Adam Torrance listened to her in a dream. Was it possible that things like this were happening right along? These three girls, one blind and one a child and one ill from overwork? Christine had not said that Celia was ill from overwork, but he had no doubt of it. Neither did Christine make a bid for sympathy. She did not even seem to think that sympathy was needed.

To be Continued

Women's Institute Members

SHOULD VISIT THE

Ontario Horticultural Exhibition

Toronto, Nov. 14 to 18, 1911

Special prizes for fruit preserved by members of Ontario Women's Institutes.

Reduced Rates on all Railways

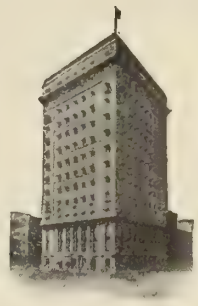
Apply early to your station agent for particulars.

This will be a splendid time to visit Toronto and attend the Convention which will be held during the Horticultural Exhibition.

FOR PRIZE LISTS APPLY TO

H. R. Frankland, President

P. W. Hodgetts, Secretary
Parliament Buildings, Toronto



Head Office . TORONTO

CAPITAL AND SURPLUS
$6,650,000

TOTAL ASSETS
$49,000,000

Your Banker is an Important Factor in Your Success

Do you take him into your confidence and discuss your business problems with him? He may possibly be able to aid you. Whether you are a customer of this Bank or not, call and see him. His advice will cost you nothing.

The Traders Bank

of Canada

INCORPORATED 1885

113 BRANCHES THROUGHOUT CANADA

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

My Lady's Garden

Garden Chat

By M. E. B.

THE autumn is a good time to do many things that will relieve the pressure of spring work. Every woman knows that the spring brings so much housecleaning and renovating generally, that she is quite busy enough without doing any gardening at all, were it not that the garden is perhaps her greatest pleasure, and a certain cure for her overworked nerves. Even so, there is always plenty to do in the spring garden, when everything that is possible has been done in the autumn. To begin with, the raspberry canes that have borne fruit this season may be cut off at the ground and burned—do likewise with the old asparagus stems. Clear the ground of all rubbish and burn it, as it affords it a place for insects to hibernate. Weed out all dandelions, docks, sow thistles, etc., as these are perennials, and guaranteed not to winter-kill under any circumstances whatever. Some people try to destroy such weeds by decapitating them with a hoe, but it is a slow process, as it has to be repeated a great many times to be successful. Lay in a supply of good strawy manure, ready to be used as a covering later on, when the ground freezes up. There is a time in the autumn as well as in the spring that is very trying to plants—warm, sunny days and hard frosts at night—a slight covering at such times helps them wonderfully. Remember in covering to put your litter close up to the stem of the plant, when thrown right into the heart of such plants as have soft or woolly leaves it makes them decay. Those who "take time by the forelock" have their bulbs in by now, and their paeonies planted, but for those who are procrastinators there are still a few days of grace, but only a few days. So long as the ground is not frozen, bulbs may be planted, if the soil is not too wet and cold. Late planting is, of course, at the expense of the vitality of the bulb—it may possibly produce just as good flowers next spring, because nature provides for this before the bulb ripens, but if it has few or no roots when it blooms, it is so weakened by the process that the recovery is very slow, if it recovers at all, therefore if you want to naturalize what you put in, early planting is necessary. For those who plant bulbs every fall and dig them up and throw them away after the blooming season is over, it does not matter so much.

Such full directions for planting bulbs were given in the Journal last fall, that it seems unnecessary to go over them again minutely, but for those who have forgotten, and for new subscribers, a few general ones may be repeated. First—Never plant bulbs when the soil is sticky or heavy with moisture; it should be in a nice friable condition; this is easily ascertained by squeezing some in the hand; if it has no tendency to remain in a lump it is right, if, on the contrary, you can form it into a ball, it is probably both too damp and too stiff, a clay, in which case it would be wise to let it dry before planting and to surround each bulb with plenty of sand, working some into the soil as well.

Second—Do not use fresh manure as a fertilizer for bulbs, as they do not take kindly to the ammonia in it. No manure should come in direct contact with them, but well-decayed manure such as comes from a spent hotbed may be placed where the roots of the bulbs can grow down to it. Remember, though, that there must be an inch or two of plain earth between the manure and the bulb, it must not rest on the manure. Bone meal is a safe fertilizer for bulbs, and can be bought at any seed store. A small handful worked into the soil below the bulb is sufficient.

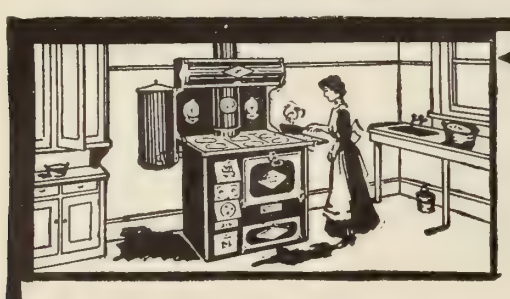
Third—The depth to plant. A good general rule is to cover the bulb with soil once and a half to twice its own depth—measuring the bulb from base to shoulder. There are exceptions to this rule, for instance, the late tulips. Cottage-garden, Darwin, etc., may be planted from five to six inches deep on heavy soils, and six to seven inches deep on light soils; indeed, where the soil is thoroughly well drained and of a sandy nature, they may be planted, so an excellent authority states, a foot deep, in order that "bedding plants" may be planted above them when they lie down, without disturbing them. The crocus is another exception to the rule, but this requires very shallow planting, and should only be covered with soil, say half an inch. Another point in crocus growing is that if you want them to make a good show the first year they must go in early—September is the time, and the earlier in the month the better.

Fourth—Covering. If your bulbs have been planted late, mulch at once with a good thick coat of leaves, or strawy manure; this helps to keep the frost out for a time, and gives them a chance to make a little root growth before very cold weather sets in. If your bulbs have been put in early, do not mulch until the ground is frozen, as they will have had a chance to make their root growth, and an early mulch might start a top growth, which is not advisable.

* * *

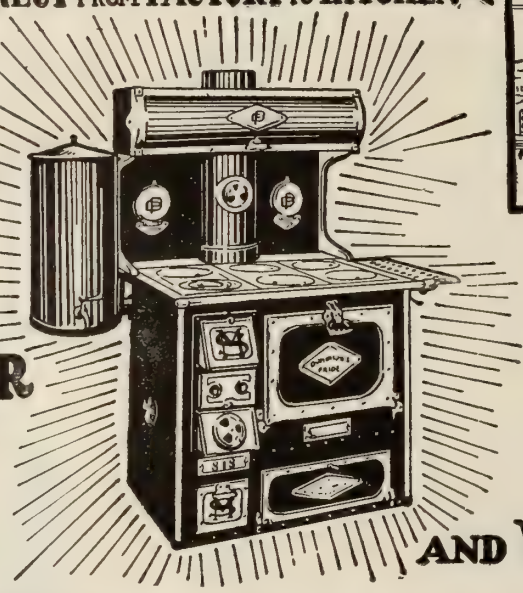
PAEONIES. Paeonies are certainly the better for being planted in the fall. From the beginning of September to the middle of October is the ideal time to transplant them; still they may be put in much later if the season is an open one, and the soil thoroughly drained, if well covered after planting. They should be planted deeply enough for the eyes, or shoots, to have two inches of soil above them; in light soils, three would be better.

The old vexed question of the best varieties to plant still stares those who are hunting for the very best in the face, and opinions, even of experts, vary so greatly. The value of anyone's opinion on the subject can only be measured when you know just what varieties that person has seen and grown, and life is rather too short to expect any paeony specialist to give such a list. We should be grateful, very grateful, to them for giving us a list of what they consider the best twelve, for we may be sure that they are all well worth growing, even should they cease to be mentioned in the "best twelve" in later lists. Mr. R. B. Whyte, of Ottawa, is certainly one of the best, if not the best, of Canadian authorities on the paeony. He told me recently that he had flowered one hundred and sixty varieties in his garden this summer, and had made copious notes thereon, so his 1911 list, which varies considerably from his 1908 list, is even more valuable, and up-to-date. Although the 1908 list was published last year in the Journal, it will not hurt to repeat it. Here it is:



DIRECT FROM FACTORY TO KITCHEN

SAVE OVER $25 WHEN BUYING YOUR RANGE THIS FALL.



$41.00 TO $49.00

AND WE PAY THE FREIGHT

You can buy DOMINION PRIDE RANGE at Factory Price

Direct from the Largest Malleable Range Works in Canada

THE price which the Dealer quotes you on a Range is made up like this — Manufacturing Cost + Manufacturer's Profit + Jobber's Expense of Handling and Selling + Jobber's Profit + Retailer's Expense of Handling and Selling + Retailer's Profit + Freight.

By our direct "Factory to Kitchen" selling plan all these charges are cut out except the actual manufacturing cost, a small profit, and freight. The difference to you is the difference between the $41 to $49 which you pay for a "DOMINION PRIDE" Range and the $69 to $78 which you would have to pay the Dealer for a Range which cost as much to make.

Are you anxious to contribute $25 or $30 to the middlemen?

In the—

Here is a Book Worth Having

IT tells about cooking from the time the Cave Dwellers used to put hot stones in the pot to boil it. The Book contains interesting information gathered from many sources and is illustrated profusely.

The "Evolution of the Cook Stove" also tells all about the "Dominion Pride" Ranges. Whether you need a Range just now or not you will enjoy this book.

Write for free copy.

"DOMINION PRIDE RANGE"

you get a full dollar's worth of actual stove value for every dollar you pay.

The "DOMINION PRIDE" is made of tough, strong malleable iron and the best blue polished steel—materials that will neither warp, crack nor break, so that it will last a lifetime. It is made in the largest Malleable Iron Range Works in Canada, and each range is backed by our unconditional guarantee.

The "DOMINION PRIDE" looks well, cooks well, saves fuel and is easily cleaned. You'll be proud of its neat, handsome appearance in your kitchen, and of the appetizing food it will cook to perfection for you. You'll appreciate the ease of keeping its blue polished steel surface and the bright polished top spick and span with a few rubs of a cloth. Your husband will be more than pleased with the reduction in the coal or wood bill—for the "DOMINION PRIDE" saves, by actual tests, 30% of the fuel.

A "DOMINION PRIDE" Range, with High Closet Shelf and Elevated Tank or Flush Reservoir, with Zinc Sheet to go under range, 8 sections Blue Polished Steel Pipe and 2 Elbows, will be delivered to any Station in Ontario, Quebec or the Maritime Provinces for $41, or to any Station in the Four Western Provinces for $49—$5 to be sent with order and balance to be paid when Range is delivered at your Station. If not convenient to pay cash we will arrange to accept your note.

Canada Malleable & Steel Range Mfg. Co. Limited, Oshawa, Ontario.

When writing it will be a distinct favor to us if you will mention this paper. 6

DOMINION EXPRESS
Money Orders

and Foreign Cheques are payable all over the World.

They may be sent in payment of produce, tax, gas and electric light bills, interest on notes and mortgages, insurance premiums, subscriptions to newspapers and magazines, and in fact in payment of all kinds of accounts, whether in or out of town.

We give you a receipt and if the remittance goes astray in the mails, we refund your money or issue a new order free of charge.

TRAVELLERS' CHEQUES ISSUED.
MONEY SENT BY TELEGRAPH AND CABLE.

When purchasing Goods by mail, ALWAYS remit by DOMINION EXPRESS CO.

MONEY ORDERS

RATES FOR MONEY ORDERS:

$ 5. AND UNDER		3 CENTS
OVER 5.	TO $10.	6 "
" 10.	" 30.	10 "
" 30.	" 50.	15 "

AGENCIES THROUGHOUT CANADA.

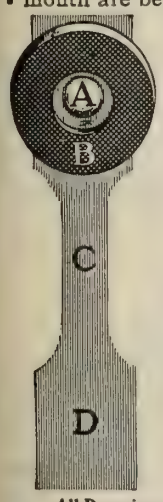
Corns Ended in a Jiffy

The instant you apply a Blue-jay the corn pain stops. You forget all about it. Then the bit of soft B & B wax gently loosens the corn. In 48 hours it comes out.

Think of that. No soreness, no pain, no discomfort.

Fifty million corns have been removed in that way. Half a million a month are being ended now. All because of this invention.

If you suffer from corns you do yourself an injustice. Go get Blue-jay—end them now



A in the picture is the soft B & B wax. It loosens the corn.
B protects the corn, stopping the pain at once.
C wraps around the toe. It is narrowed to be comfortable.
D is rubber adhesive to fasten the plaster on.

Blue-jay Corn Plasters

Also Blue-jay Bunion Plasters
15c and 25c per Package

All Druggists Sell and Guarantee Them
Sample Mailed Free

Bauer & Black, Chicago and New York
Makers of Surgical Dressings, etc. (18)

Those are best satisfied who spell camera:

K-O-D-A-K

Quality marks the goods that bear the "Kodak" trade-mark.

Kodak cameras, Kodak films and the Kodak sundries are used by those who know photography best because they incorporate every modern improvement and because honest workmanship has grown to be a habit in the Kodak factories.

If it isn't an Eastman, it isn't a Kodak.

CANADIAN KODAK CO., LIMITED
Toronto, -:- -:- Canada

Catalog free at the dealers or by mail.

Mr. Whyte's revised list for 1908 of the twelve best paeonies:

Md. d'Hour—Very large, free bloomer, flesh color, tipped carmine.

M. Jules Elie—Silvery pink, very large.

La Rosiere—White, yellow centre, semi-double, remarkably free bloomer, very sweet.

Festiva Maxima—Very fine, rose shaped, white, centre tipped carmine.

Floral Treasure—Soft rose, fragrant, free bloomer.

Asa Gray—Salmon pink, very large, free bloomer.

Claire Dubois—Light rose, very large, free bloomer.

Ella Christine Kelway—Extra fine pink, very large petals, flat, sweet.

Baroness Schroeder—Pale pink to cream, large guards, perfumed.

Miss Salway—White, primrose guards, large, very fine centre, perfumed.

Bunch of Perfume—Rich, deep pink, large, very doubled, perfumed.

Rubra Superba—Purplish crimson, very free bloomer.

Mr. Whyte's revised list for 1911 of the twelve best paeonies, regardless of cost:

Marguerite Gerard — Flesh color, creamy white centre, perfumed.

Marie Crousse—Globular flower, salmon pink, perfumed.

Festiva Maxima (described above).

Asa Gray (described above).

Mons. Jules Elie (described above).

Madame d'Hour (described above).

Therese — Flesh-shaded pink, very large flat flowers.

Mlle. Leonie Calot—Soft flesh color, perfumed.

Marie Lemoine—Sulphur white, shaded chamois, late.

Martin Cahuzac—Crimson red to maroon, very dark.

Albert Crousse—Deep pink, large.

Grandiflora Nivea Plena—White, centre sulphur and salmon carmine stripes.

This list is supplemented by another list of "twelve first-class varieties," which are not so highly priced. They are:

Festiva Maxima, Mlle. Leonie Calot (in previous list).

Madame de Galhan—Flesh pink, shaded salmon.

Livingstone—Soft pink, perfumed.

La Tulipe—Flesh pink to white, carmine tips.

Duchess de Nemour—Sulphur white, perfumed.

Charlemagne—Creamy white, shaded chamois.

Felix Crousse—Bright carmine.

Modele de Perfection—Pink, shaded rose, perfumed.

La Rosiere—Creamy white, straw-colored centre, shaded white.

Avalanche—Milk white, creamy centre, perfumed.

Couronne d'Or—Creamy white, some petals bordered carmine.

One can learn a great deal from a careful study of these three lists. One rather remarkable thing is the absence of "Baroness Schroeder" from the 1911 list. This paeony has been so much talked of as being such a marvel of beauty, with the price $3.00 in some catalogues, and $5.00 in others, for a single root, that one would naturally suppose it was quite unsurpassable, so I enquired why it had been left off the new list, and got from Mr. Whyte the opinion that while it was beautiful, yet it was a very much over-rated variety. Another thing to note is that "Marie Lemoine" has come into her own again. She was on a previous list to the 1908 one, but not on it. I am glad to see her reinstated; she is so pure a white and so lovely, and arriving on the scene rather late, when Festiva Maxima has waned, makes her all the more valuable; it is this lateness that increases her value over "Duchess de Nemour," who flowers at the same time as Festiva Maxima, the blooms being almost identical with "Marie Lemoine's." "Festiva Maxima" seems to be the one paeony about which there are no two opinions. In truth it is perfection in white paeonies, its huge beautifully incurved petals of purest white, with the central ones daintily edged with crimson, borne on strong yet graceful stems, its handsome foliage, and again its reasonable price, make it the one paeony that no one can afford to do without. It is on every list one takes up, and no wonder. I cannot help thinking that Mr. Whyte will add "Germaine Bigot" to his 1912 list, and make it a "baker's dozen"; it is one of the loveliest of the lovely, a great loose-petaled blossom, not regular at all, but very beautiful in both form and coloring—it shades from flesh white to salmoned tea—and if gathered when opening it lasts a full week in the house.

The Famous Rayo Lamp

The Rayo Lamp is the best and most serviceable lamp you can find for any part of your home. It is in use in millions of families. Its strong white light has made it famous. And it never flickers. In the dining room or the parlor the Rayo gives just the light that is most effective. It is a becoming lamp—in itself and to you. Just the lamp, too, for bedroom or library, where a clear, steady light is needed.

The Rayo is made of solid brass, nickle-plated; also in numerous other styles and finishes. Easily lighted without removing shade or chimney; easy to clean and rewick. Ask your dealer to show you his line of Rayo lamps; or write for descriptive circular to any agency of

The Imperial Oil Co., Limited The Queen City Oil Co., Limited

TO keep on washing clothes the old way is simply to destroy youthfulness and shorten life itself. Why should women do it—since an up-to-date washing machine can change the drudgery of washday into a pleasant pastime? The colored lady knows better.

"De washing machine dat can wash moah clo's cleaner in half an hour dan three washerwomen."

The New Century Washing Machine works quickly, easily, and operates far cleaner and more gently than any washerwoman could possibly wash. It gushes the water through the fabric, leaving it fresh, sweet and clean in a few minutes. And it cannot injure the finest, filmiest garments you possess, because it is built right and built to endure.

CUMMER-DOWSWELL Limited
Hamilton, Ontario 2

40 POPULAR SONGS WITH MUSIC, ONLY 2c

Forty of the choicest musical gems in our language, words and music all complete, with full four parts for both hands, clearly printed and neatly bound in colored covers. To get acquainted with you in a business way I will send one of these books for a 2c stamp to pay the postage. Such an offer has never before been made, and this is good only till the few thousand copies of this book that I have now are gone. To make sure of one send me your name and address and a 2c stamp at once. A. M. Jury, Music Book Dept. 2H, Toronto.

Have you read our guarantee on page three? If not, read it and buy from Canadian Home Journal advertisers.

PEASE FURNACE

Note vertical shaker; no more back-bending.

Saves fuel because it extracts all the heat units possible.

No ash sifting because everything is consumed to a very fine ash.

No dust because there are fewer joints and these few are cup joints and dust proof.

Distributes fresh warm air from all registers at once.

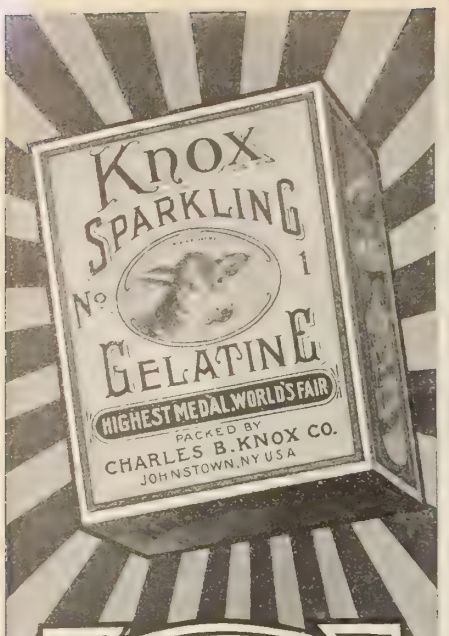
"Ask the man who has one."
Write for our Books: "The Question of Heating." or "Boiler Information," sent free on request.

PEASE FOUNDRY COMPANY, LIMITED
TORONTO 37 WINNIPEG

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.



This is the Package of Plenty and Purity

Both you and your family will have something to be thankful for if you serve with your Thanksgiving dinner a dessert made from

KNOX
PURE · PLAIN
SPARKLING
GELATINE

Knox Thanksgiving Dessert—¼ box Knox Sparkling Gelatine; ½ doz. rolled stale macaroons; 1 doz. marshmallows, cut in small pieces; 2 tablespoonfuls chopped candied cherries; ¼ lb. blanched and chopped almonds; 1 cup sugar; 1 pint heavy cream; vanilla or sherry; ¼ cup cold water; ¼ cup boiling water. Soak gelatine in cold water, dissolve in boiling water, add sugar. When mixture is cold, add cream beaten till stiff, almonds, macaroons, marshmallows and candied cherries. Flavor with vanilla or sherry. Turn into mold first dipped into cold water; chill. Remove from mold; serve with angel cake.

If you think the above is not just what you want, our recipe book, sent FREE for your grocer's name, will give you any number of ideas for preparing tempting dishes for not only Thanksgiving but every day in the year.

Pint sample for 2c stamp and grocer's name.

CHARLES B. KNOX CO.
000 Knox Avenue
Johnstown, N. Y.

A New Head in 30 Minutes

Exchange that aching, throbbing, suffering, muddled head for a clear, cool, comfortable one by taking a

NA-DRU-CO Headache Wafer

25c. a box at your druggists' or by mail from NATIONAL DRUG and CHEMICAL CO. of Canada, Limited, Montreal. 28A

Webb's

Chocolates

for people who want the best

The Harry Webb Co. Ltd.

TORONTO, CAN.

THE COST OF A CRIME

Continued from page 14

friend. Besides," she added fiercely, "Jes' look around, where did all this furniter come from? Hevery stick ov it were presents from you an' the missus. Where would ye come to, if not to pore old Mary Anne?"

She wiped her eyes with the corner of her apron, while she hunted for the matches to light up the inner room. It was a small square apartment looking out upon the long narrow strip of garden which in summer was an astonishingly pleasant place, shut in by branching limes which would have done no discredit to a country lane. True, the rush and roar of London, the whistle and din of innumerable trains never ceased night nor day, but these were minor discomforts, not mentioned or even noticed by the dwellers in St. Paul's Crescent.

"There ye are, an' I'll jes' clear away," she said cheerfully. "The bed's hall ready an' as clean as a new pin," she added proudly. "That wos wot them Americans said, it was a treat. Good night, sir; when would yer like to be called in the mornin'."

"Any time, any time, I don't know how to thank you, Mary Anne, but I swear that you will come to no trouble through it, and that I will repay in full measure pressed down and running over, what you've done for me to-night."

"Don't go fer to mention it, sir," she replied hurriedly, and made her exit with considerable haste. In a minute or so she was back, however, carrying something white over her arm.

"Beggin' pardin, sir, fer the liberty; but, seein' as you ain't brought no things, would yer mind puttin' on this 'ere nightshirt wot belonged to poor Webber. It's bin aired. There'e a 'ot water pipe wot goes through the cupboard where I keeps me linen, an' wot a godsend it is fer me yer can't think."

She laid it down softly and withdrew, for the sight of her new lodger sitting with his hands before his face seriously disquieted her, and as she did not hold with exhibitions of emotion on her own account, she was glad to escape. She slept on a chair bedstead in the kitchen herself, partly to be handy in the morning and partly because danger from marauders usually threatened from the basement, and she liked to keep an eye on everything. It was very comfortable there, however, especially of a winter evening, when the stove burned clear and bright, and all the work of the day was cleared away. Arrived in her own sanctum, Mary Anne stood still in the middle of the floor, with a troubled, perplexed air.

"Lor' a-mighty, who'd a thought it? There's something mighty queer. I don't like them eyes o' his; but he needs a friend, an' that friend's Mary Anne Webber, for sure."

Then she laid herself down and slept the sleep of the physically tired, while her new lodger paced the floor of his clean and comfortable room, with the back window thrown wide open, so that the fresh air might blow in upon him with a gentle, kindly touch.

He took counsel with himself until the grey dawn began to creep over sleeping London; then, reflecting that the task he had set himself required physical energy, which could only be looked for if certain laws of nature should be obeyed, he closed the window, undressed and crept into bed. The clean, cool, white sheets, washed by Mary Anne's own hands, and wonderfully sweet for London sheets, seemed to welcome his tired limbs; a feeling of safety and security stole over him, and finally he slept.

Slept so soundly that the din of the new day, the cheerful "Milk-oh!" of the earliest vendor, the hoarse roar of the coalman, and all the stir of the awakening household failed to arouse him. Possessed with a sudden fear that her house might in the silent night watches have been turned into a place of tragedy, Mary Anne at last, when the house was quietened of its morning stir, stole up to the front room, crossed it softly, and opened the door of the inner room. Hesitating there, with beating heart, she could hear his regular breathing, and she took a step further to look at him. He was sleeping soundly and peacefully, and the haggard lines of strain were smoothed away from his face. But it seemed still a strange face, and the dark hair was unfamiliar. Reedham had been noted for his abundant fair hair, his neat, pointed beard, and moustache of a golden hue, and his transformation was complete.

"His own muvver wouldn't know him, thet she wouldn't. He'll feel better wen 'e wakes hup. I won't be in no hurry to waken 'im."

She closed the door and softly withdrew, and all her housework that morning was performed mechanically, because her thoughts were so busy with the future and ultimate fate of her new lodger, and the tragedy of his life. About noon, listening in the hall, she heard him moving, and flew to get him a breakfast tray. And she had a smile for him when she took it in, a smile which warmed his empty heart. He had prepared himself for colder looks as he busied himself with his dressing. Sympathy warm at night, is apt to cool in the morning. But there was no abatement of Mary Anne's kind interest, no disposition on her part to repent of her promise made the night before. His face brightened as he read this in her comely face.

"Good mornin', sir. Yer didn't 'ear me in abart nine o'clock. You've 'ad a good nite, I kin see, an I'm glad of it."

"I have slept eight or nine hours, and I'm a new man, fit to conquer fate," he replied. "Tell me, you don't repent your promise to let me stop here as long as will be safe for you and myself? I promise you that I shall go before there is any chance of your being troubled by me or my affairs, though it is my hope that I may be able to remain here undisturbed, and until I have accomplished the task I have set myself."

"Sure yer kin stop. I'm not one to go back on me word, sir," she assured him. "Though fer yer own sake an' the sike of them we carn't nime, I 'opes it won't be long."

He shook his head, and she saw the slow red mount in his cheek.

"I will go out this morning and try my luck. There is a sovereign to begin with, the next one I hope I shall have earned."

Mary Anne shut her lips together with the nearest approach to a snap.

"I dursn't tike it, sir, no, not now. When yer kin tell me there's a job an' good pay fer it, it'll be different. Leave it like that, if yer please, for the sike of them we dursn't nime."

Reedham replaced the sovereign in his pocket and Mary Anne softly withdrew. About an hour later when she heard him in the outer hall preparing to leave the house, she appeared from the underground regions.

"What time fer dinner, sir, if yer please?"

He squared his shoulders and looked at her.

"Look here, Mary Anne, bed and breakfast meanwhile, and a bite of bread and cheese when I need them, and no ceremony, these are the terms, and I've left the sovereign on the mantelpiece. It'll pay for the week. By the end of that time I'll have a job, I hope, or I'll know the reason why, and meanwhile mum's the word."

She put her finger on her lips and nodded sagaciously. When he bade her good-day she entered the sitting-room and watched him walk out to the end of the Crescent. He certainly did not look like her old master. He had discarded the frock coat and silk hat, and now wore a somewhat shabby suit of dark blue serge and a bowler hat. He looked like a clerk out of work.

It was the most amazing experience that had ever come into Mrs. Webber's life, and it seemed to quicken her interest in everything. Not the smallest qualm regarding the moral aspect of the affair troubled her.

Her old master, from whom she had received untold kindness, to whose help she really owed her present position, was in trouble, and had besought her help. Such as she could give him was most heartily at his disposal; such were the ethics of the position supposing they had been called in question. Mary Anne therefore passed a most interesting and singularly short day in contemplation of the new element that had come into her existence.

Reedham, now Thomas Charlton, walked out into the Camden Road and there mounted to the top of a yellow omnibus moving citywards.

To be Continued

VINOLIA

TOILET REQUISITES, SOAPS AND PERFUMES.

One application of Vinolia Cream will instantly prove its curative and soothing qualities. Vinolia counteracts any irritation of the skin—including insect stings—and affords protection to delicate complexions attacked by wind and rain.

Price 35 cents & 50 cents per box. On Sale at all good Druggists and Stores.

V 224

83 CALLS

Were received last month for office help—37 were left unfilled. Demands for trained help are so great that we can afford to "guarantee a position to every graduate or refund tuition money." If you are anxious to succeed write for our beautiful catalogue to-day.

CENTRAL BUSINESS COLLEGE
Toronto, W. H. Shaw, Principal

The Real Canadian Girl

will never waste her money on imported table salt. She knows that right here in Canada, we have the best table salt in the world—

Windsor Table Salt

The real Canadian girl, and her mother and grandmother too, know that Windsor Salt is unequalled for purity, flavor and brilliant, sparkling appearance.

WINDSOR Table SALT

13

JOURNAL'S JUNIORS

Continued from page 16

We all suggested that too, but what was the use of doing that when we couldn't get out?

"Listen," said James, "I'm sure I heard something." We all listened, and sure enough we all could hear it as plain as if we could see the object. The sound rolled nearer and nearer all the time. At last, to our great joy and amazement, the top of a buggy appeared distinctly through the trees. And who do you think was in it? Well, I will tell you, it was my father, who said he had been looking for us pretty near all afternoon. He said that mother had taken sick in the afternoon and was very anxious about us children. I felt very sorry for mother and wished that I was home with her. But nobody can say that we did not have a dandy good time that day. That was the last holiday we had that season, but that one holiday was as good to us as if we had had a dozen of them.

Yours sincerely,
IRENE HOLMES.

Aged thirteen.

I certify that Irene wrote this letter entirely herself.

MRS. T. H. CORRIE.

* * *

Dear Irene:

Yours is such a pretty name, and your letter is very nicely written. The butternut expedition must have been most enjoyable, and I'm sure you had such a good time. I remember a hill near an old schoolhouse in Wentworth County, where we used to gather walnuts on Saturday afternoons. You live in a beautiful city. I spent one summer near Owen Sound and enjoyed every hour of it. Write to us again, Irene.

HOLIDAYS IN THE SAND PILE

Port Arthur, Ont.
Sept. 10th, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

After living on the Western prairies all my life, we came to Port Arthur, where we found an ideal spot to have a holiday. We climbed Mount McKay and reached the flagpole, which is on the highest point, and there we found a board on which was written, "The Way of the Transgressor is Hard," showing that other folks had found it as hard a climb as we did. We also visited the big cave, which is very interesting. One lovely morning, when the sun was sparkling on the water, we went down to the dock, where we boarded a tug to have an excursion to Amethyst Harbor. When we were coming home the waves were very high and maybe we didn't have a rough time. When we reached Port Arthur it was six o'clock. We hurried home, had our supper, after which we went on the Saronic for an excursion around the bay. Our cousin visited us this summer, but was so interested in the girls that he didn't see the scenery. Well, good-bye for this time. I hope we have as good a time next year.

Yours truly,
GORDON KNIGHT.

19 Crown St.

The enclosed letter was written by Gordon without help of any kind.

MRS. F. T. KNIGHT.

My dear Gordon:

So you live in that thriving town, Port Arthur, near the greatest of the lakes. I should like to see the cave, as I have always been interested in caves—ever since I read "Tom Sawyer." I wish you would write again and tell us more about the cave. You are a lucky boy to have been brought up on the prairies.

Mt. Wolfe, Sept. 29th, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

I have been a silent reader of your Corner for quite a while, and enjoy reading the Corner very much. I am going to tell you about my "Summer Holidays."

It being the commencement of summer holidays, I went home with my teacher, to Streetsville. We arrived at her home about dark. While I was there I was to a garden party. There was a comic singer, and often he made me laugh, and laugh. Then there were refreshment booths and ice cream tents.

Next morning my uncle was waiting at the store to take me home with him. After having a pleasant drive through the Credit Valley, where the scenery is so beautiful, and where there are such comfortable-looking homesteads, I arrived at my uncle's farm.

When I got there, I met my aunt, and cousins, who were visiting there also. Quite often, while I was at my uncle's, my cousin and I were seen in the cherry tree, and the rest would say, "Oh! Look at the two big robins in the cherry tree."

After having had a very pleasant visit at my uncle's, I went home with my auntie, who was coming as far as Toronto, where I stopped for a few days.

During this time I was to the park, where I saw a great many different kinds of animals, the monkeys being the most comical of all. I had many pleasant drives through the city, seeing all the principal places, and I had a ride in an auto, the first I ever had. All these pleasures were quite new to a country girl.

Having spent a very pleasant time, I arrived home in time to help pick berries.

I will close now, wishing the page success.

Yours truly,
OLGA ROBINSON.

Aged 12 years.

I certify that Olga wrote this unassisted.

MRS. GEO. ROBINSON.

* * *

My dear Olga:

So, you are a new cousin, with a Russian name. I am glad that you enjoyed your Toronto visit. Did you see the bear in the Riverdale Zoo? I think the monkey is the most amusing animal, but, to me, a tiger is the most interesting animal in the world, although he is so fierce. I hope you enjoyed the berry-picking.

Do You Bake Your Own Bread?

Everyone who bakes bread should know about my Cream of the West Flour.

I guarantee absolute satisfaction and I won't take money for less. A crust, brown, crisp and sweet; a crumb, white, light and even. Get a bag and bake a batch or two.

Cream of the West Flour

the hard wheat flour guaranteed for bread

If you don't have success with your bread after a fair trial bring back the flour left over and your grocer has our authority to refund full purchase price.

Guarantee

WE hereby affirm and declare that Cream of the West Flour is a superior bread flour, and as such is subject to our absolute guarantee—money back if not satisfactory after a fair trial. Any dealer is hereby authorized to return price paid by customer on return of unused portion of bag if flour is not as represented.

The Campbell Milling Co., Limited, Toronto. 103
Archibald Campbell, President

CREAM OF THE WEST

The Best Wall Finish

Only one coat required
Easy to apply

Most beautiful, economical and sanitary wall coating made, can be applied by anyone to any kind of surface. Will not rub off or peel, Shows no spots or brush marks. Produces that subdued, velvety effect, so agreeable to the eye.

Muresco

Muresco is made in a large line of handsome tints and colors, also white. Ready for use when mixed with hot water. It can be re-coated any number of times, and entirely removed by washing, thus rendering it a simple matter to keep walls in perfect condition.

Beware of wall finishes that cannot be removed by washing; they are neither practical or sanitary. Will eventually peel off, leaving your walls in ruined condition.

Muresco costs no more than othe finishes an goes farther, Call for sample card and see handsome combination effects.

BENJAMIN MOORE & CO. Limited
Sole Manufacturers, Toronto, Canada.
New York, Chicago, Carteret, Cleveland.

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

INGERSOLL CREAM CHEESE

SPREADS LIKE BUTTER

You can buy twice the quantity of Ingersoll Cream Cheese in blocks for the same money as you would receive in jar cheese, besides there is just as much difference in the quality in favor of Ingersoll Cream Cheese as there is in the price.

Never Becomes Hard. Every Particle Can Be Consumed.

Sold only in 15c and 25c blocks

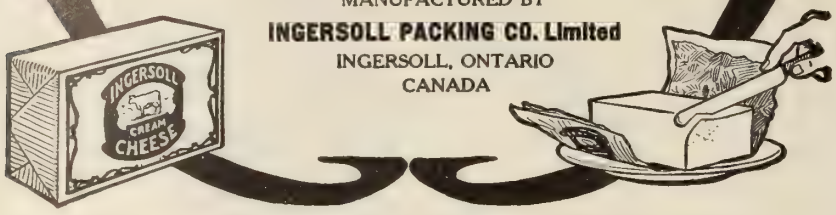
For Sale By All Grocers

MANUFACTURED BY

INGERSOLL PACKING CO. Limited

INGERSOLL, ONTARIO

CANADA



CAMP

'Camp' Coffee is hailed with exclamations of delight

Pure!

Delicious!

Refreshing!

made in a moment. Don't forget the name 'CAMP.'

R. Paterson and Sons, Coffee Specialists, Glasgow.

COFFEE

For your own benefit

Eat Shredded Wheat for breakfast for the next ten days and note how different you feel during the day.

Wheat is the most perfect food given to man—rich in every strengthening, muscle-building element, so essential for the healthy, robust body.

SHREDDED WHEAT

Biscuit is just the plain, wholesome whole wheat, steam-cooked, shredded and baked a crisp golden brown—a delight to eat and to serve.

Its very crispness assists digestion—compels the necessary chewing and mixing with saliva.

Shredded Wheat is better than mushy porridges because you have to chew it, thereby getting from it its rich muscle and bone-building nutriment.

Two Shredded Wheat Biscuits with milk or cream and a little fruit make a complete nourishing breakfast, supplying all the strength needed for a half-day's work. Delicious with fruit for lunch. Your grocer sells them.

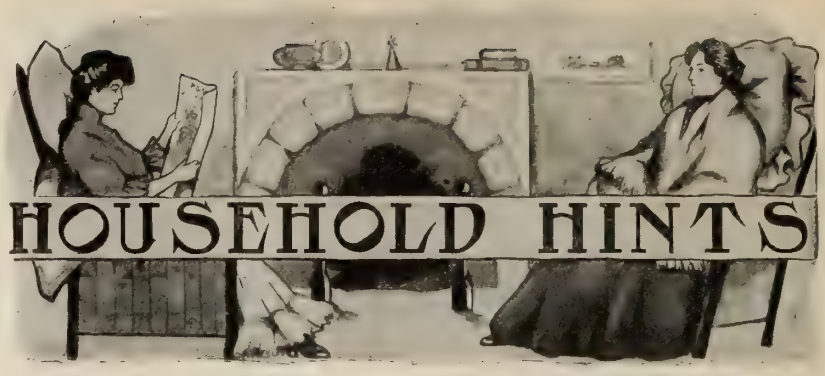
The only cereal made in biscuit form

Made by

Canadian Shredded Wheat Co., Ltd., Niagara Falls, Ont.

D42

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.



The Food Question

COLLIER'S (Canadian edition) of August 26th contains an article entitled "Westfield—a Pure Food Town," which is sure to be interesting to all housekeepers. The people of Westfield (Mass.) woke up to the fact that they were not getting pure food or pure material for use in food. They do not want, and now will not have, fruits, jams, etc., in which certain preservatives are used, peanuts that have been varnished to make them look nice, etc. Of the groceries tested in the laboratory one of the most frequently adulterated is baking powder. A delightful concoction known as a tart proved to be puff-paste made with alum, with a jelly centre dyed with coal-tar. The article goes on to say: "So little baking powder is used in some homes that this product would seem comparatively unimportant. But a great deal of baking powder, however, is used in the bought cake and biscuits, and a great deal of this is adulterated." The adulteration may be by ammonia, which is fraudulent but not injurious, or by alum, which is decidedly injurious as it hardens the tissues of the mucous membranes. As a precaution, look at label and see if ingredients are stated. Better refuse it if alum or something that looks like alum (such as alumina) is one of them, or if the ingredients are not stated by the manufacturer it will be well to select some other brand.

Jams, jellies, catsups, confections, gelatine, dessert powders, flavoring extracts are often colored with coal-tar dyes. These dyes are sometimes harmless, but very frequently injurious, depending on the particular combination. There is one bottle of Creme de Menthe at the Normal School which contains a coal-tar dye sufficiently poisonous to have killed two people. The bottle is almost full, but the small amount used caused the death of a man and his wife, and then the product was sent for analysis. Extracts are also adulterated with wood alcohol and with turmeric, a fruadulent adulterant.

No doubt many cities and towns will profit by Westfield's experience and follow its example.

Bits of Advice

VINEGAR will remove the odor of paraffin from earthen and tinware; dip a rag into the vinegar, and scour the vessel with it.

A teaspoonful of salt in the water in the outside vessel of a double boiler will raise the temperature of the contents of the inner vessel. A cereal may be made to boil in this way without danger of burning.

To clean white plumes make a thin paste from gasoline and flour. Dip plumes and cover with paste. Lay aside to dry, then shake well, and plumes will come out clean and fluffy. This has been tried many times.

Plants in the Sick Room

WE often hear the statement that plants or flowers are harmful in a sick room, and especially at night. Though scarcely anyone can explain the reasons why, they are in reality very simple, and the standing order to remove all plants or flowers from the room at night is based upon very common facts of plant physiology.

In a talk given recently in The Medical Record by Dr. Robert H. M. Dawbarn, New York, the three reasons are given very clearly: "Flowers possess three prominent functions," he says, "so far as they affect at all the air about them.

"First—Transpiration; they give up moisture taken up from the soil; hence the air is somewhat damp and humid, if many, particularly growing, plants, are kept in the room.

"Second—Respiration; they act much as we do as to this; they use up oxygen, and in the exchange give off carbonic dioxide.

"Third—Photosynthesis; this is the name given to the action of sunlight upon the stems, leaves, and all green parts chiefly. It is the reverse of the result of respiratory activity, as just stated. That is, so long as there is daylight carbon dioxide is taken in the oxygen given off by photosynthesis; consequently until nightime arrives No. 2 and No. 3 may be said to balance each other, leaving neither good nor ill results. But during the entire night Nos. 1 and 2 continue their activities, while No. 3 is temporarily suspended.

"No. 1 is not objectionable, but No. 2, without No. 3 to balance it, acts (in principle, but not in amount) until the return of daylight, just like an additional person breathing in the room, thus leaving a little less oxygen for the use of the invalid."

Sterilization in Canning

THE art of canning in one form or another is almost as old as history itself. The early Chinese possessed this secret long before the era of modern civilization, but "the reasons why" which lay back of the art have only recently been thoroughly explained.

The great secret of canning or preserving lies in complete sterilization. The air we breathe, the water we drink, all fruits and vegetables, are teeming with minute forms of life which we call bacteria, or molds, or germs. These germs are practically the sole cause of decompositions or rotting. The exclusion of air from canned articles, which was formerly supposed to be so important, is unnecessary, provided the air is sterile or free from germs. The exclusion of air is necessary only because in excluding it we exclude the germ. In other words, air which has been sterilized or freed from germs by heat or mechanical means can be passed continuously over canned articles without affecting them in the least. If a glass bottle is filled with some vegetable which ordinarily spoils very rapidly—for instance, strong beans—and, instead of a cork, it is stoppered with a thick plug of raw cotton and heated until all germ life is destroyed, the beans will keep indefinitely. The air can readily pass out of the bottle through the plug of cotton, while the germs from the outside air cannot pass through, but are caught and held in its meshes. This shows that the germs and their spores or seeds are the only cause of spoilage that we have to deal with in canning.

Germs which cause decay may be divided into three classes—yeasts, molds and bacteria. All three of these are themselves plants of a very low order, and all attack other plants of a higher order in somewhat the same way. Every housewife is familiar with the yeast plant and its habits. It thrives in substances containing sugar, which it decomposes or breaks up into carbonic acid and alcohol. This fact is made use of in bread-making, as well as in the manufacture of distilled spirits. Yeasts are easily killed, so they can be left out of consideration in canning vegetables. Molds, like yeasts, thrive in mixtures containing sugar, as well as in acid vegetables, such as the tomato, where neither yeasts nor bacteria readily grow. Although more resistant to heat than yeasts, they are usually killed at the temperature of boiling water. As a general rule, molds are likely to attack jellies and preserves and are not concerned with the spoiling of canned vegetables. The spoiling of vegetables is due primarily to bacteria.

SIMNEL CAKE

This cake is made in three parts. Mix eight ounces of flour with four ounces of butter, and four ounces of castor sugar, add enough milk to make a dough, and roll out to about half an inch in thickness, with which line a well-greased tin. Make an almond paste with four ounces of ground almonds, four ounces of castor sugar, and one egg; knead to a paste and roll out to about half an inch in thickness; cut into a circle rather smaller than the cake tin. For the cake mixture take eight ounces of self-raising flour, six ounces of castor sugar, eight ounces of currants, eight ounces of sultanas, four ounces of butter, a little grated nutmeg, half a pint of milk, and the well-beaten yolks of four eggs. Rub the butter into the flour, add the sugar and fruit, and mix all thoroughly with the milk and eggs. Half fill the lined tin with the mixture, put in the layer of almond paste, then the remainder of the mixture, filling it nearly to the top of the lining. Cover with another layer of icing, using same quantities as in the first. Bake in a moderate oven for two to three hours.

NUT GINGER CAKE

Sift three-quarters of a pound of flour into a basin; add one cupful of chopped walnut meats, one-half tablespoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of soda, one teaspoonful of ground ginger, one teaspoonful of ground cinnamon, and a little grated nutmeg; melt together in a saucepan one cupful of molasses, four tablespoonfuls of sugar, four tablespoonfuls of butter, one-half cupful of milk. Let cool and add the dry ingredients with two well-beaten eggs. Mix well, then pour into a butter and floured cake tin; bake in a moderate oven three-quarters of an hour.

BURNED SUGAR CAKE

One-fourth cupful of butter, one and one-half cupfuls sugar (light brown preferred), two eggs, two rounding cupfuls of flour (measured before sifting), one cupful cold water, two teaspoonfuls baking powder, three or four teaspoonfuls of burned sugar syrup. Use common straight tumbler to measure with instead of cup. Cream butter and sugar together, break in the eggs, and beat well; add water, burned syrup, and, lastly, flour, which has been well sifted with baking powder. Bake in layers. The burned sugar syrup is prepared by putting any quantity desired of granulated sugar in spider over the stove, stirring constantly until a nice brown, then add boiling water and cook to syrup. Put into a can or convenient receptacle you have on hand. For the frosting, use one and one-half cupfuls light brown sugar and the whites of three eggs, add a little water and three teaspoonfuls of burned syrup to the sugar, and boil until a little dropped in cold water will "ball." Stir about half this with the beaten whites and allow the remainder to cook a little longer. Beat until cold.

MEAT BALLS AND PEAS

CHOP SUEY

Put one cupful of onions, fried until brown, one cupful of celery cut in two-inch pieces and then shredded and stewed in vegetable stock for half an hour, one cupful of fried mushrooms and two cupfuls of boiled rice in a saucepan with a cupful of thin brown sauce. Let all heat together for ten minutes, and season with salt and pepper.

ESCALOPED CHICKEN

Boil large, tender chicken until done, remove skin and gristle, and chop meat. Butter a large dish, put a layer of pounded crackers in the bottom, add bits of butter, and moisten with cream. On this put a layer of chicken, season with white pepper, salt, grated onion, peel and nutmeg, bits of butter, and a few chapped oysters. Put over this more of the cracker, butter and cream, and then a layer of chicken. Cover top with the crackers and butter. Bake in hot oven half-hour.

PINEAPPLE ICE

This is not an ice cream, but an ice with all the fluffy whiteness of a cream, but without the cloying richness of the latter. It is quite different from the ordinary ice, being especially light and delicate in character, and as delightful to the palate as to the eye. No gelatine is required for this ice, egg whites giving it body as well as its creamy whiteness. Put one cupful of white sugar and one pint of water over the fire and bring to a boil. Let cool, then stir in half a can (or one cupful) of chopped pineapple and the juice of two lemons. Put in freezer and turn until it begins to thicken slightly; then add the well-beaten whites of two eggs, stir up well and beat until frozen. Pack and let stand a few hours to ripen.

GOOD SANDWICHES

Press through a sieve one pint of preserved fruit, either apple, pear or quince. Add to it one-half of a cupful of dried currants, one-half of a cupful of raisins, one cupful of chopped nuts and the juice and grated rind of one lemon. Cook for thirty minutes in a double boiler. When cooked spread between slices of buttered bread. Rhubarb and jam marmalade may be used in making delicious sandwiches, especially if cream cheese be served with them.

CREAM OF RICE PUDDING

Take one cupful of rice, three-fourths of a pint of milk, add one teaspoonful of vanilla. Cook in double boiler until very soft, and strain; add the yokes of two eggs, one-fourth of a box of gelatine dissolved in one-fourth cupful of hot water, one-half cupful of fine apple juice; and lastly, the beaten whites of the two eggs. Set on ice in mold.

"The Star" ASBESTOS PAD FOR DINING TABLES

The original and patented Dining Table Pad. The best Pad manufactured. Made of a special grade of Asbestos of sufficient thickness and weight to assure protection from damage by heat and moisture, covered with double faced cotton flannel to make it soft and noiseless. Pads and leaves made to fold to convenient size to lay away when not in use. Doily, Chafing-dish and Platter Mats of same materials, size 5 to 18 in., round, square or oval. Ask your dealer to show you the STAR Pad. All Pads and Mats bear our trade mark "Star."

These Pads For Sale By

John Kay Co., Limited	Toronto, Ont.
Murray-Kay Limited	Toronto, Ont.
T. Eaton Co., Limited	Toronto, Ont.
Henry Morgan Co., Limited	Montreal, Que.
Ottawa Fireproof Supply Co.,	Ottawa, Ont.
Chas. Duncan & Sons, Limited	Brantford, Ont.
Smallman & Ingram, Limited	London, Ont.
T. C. Watkins, Limited	Hamilton, Ont.
T. Eaton Co., Limited	Winnipeg, Can.

Booklet on request.

KERNEY MFG. CO., 157 W. 62nd Street CHICAGO, ILL.

Mince Meat—Home Made

Hot Mince Meat Pies will soon be expected by the family and you haven't had time to make the Mince Meat.

Save yourself all the bother and don't make it, because in CLARK'S ENGLISH MINCE MEAT YOU HAVE ALL THE FLAVOR AND PURITY OF THE BEST HOME MADE.

CLARK'S ENGLISH MINCE MEAT is absolutely pure and made of the finest of selected Fruits and Spices.

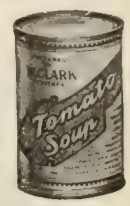
Order Clark's English Mince Meat from your Grocer.

"Inglass" Brand No. 1 and IN CANS

It's the only way to get Good "Old English" MINCE MEAT.

W. Clark, Montreal

MANUFACTURER OF THE CELEBRATED "CHATEAU" BRAND SOUPS



YORKSHIRE RELISH

"The Most Delicious Sauce in the World"

A few drops with your chop, steak, joint, fish, fowl or cold meat will give that final touch that makes the dinner perfect. It not only adds a piquant flavor, but develops the inherent flavors of the viands. The most unique and enjoyable condiment on the market.

20c. a bottle.

CHAS. GYDE, - MONTREAL.

Sole Agent for Canada.

2

WANTED—A WIFE

I want to hear from some good woman who is tired of doing the washing. I will take the first train and be on hand in time to help do the next big washing. Will pay all my expenses for four weeks. She is dead sure to fall in love with me when she finds out what I can do. I am the famous 1900 Gravity Washer. I make clothes clean in double quick time. I'm the greatest invention of the age for doing quick and easy washing. I'm a star performer—the only washer in existence that can wash a tubful of dirty clothes spotlessly clean in six minutes! Housewives everywhere are delighted with my work. They have almost overwhelmed me with compliments. They tell how I save work and worry, banish "blues" and make washday a genuine pleasure. It's almost fun to do a washing with my aid. The 1900 Washer Co. will send me, free of charge, freight prepaid, on four weeks' trial in your home. Don't send money. Try me first. See the wonders I perform. If you fall in love with me after four weeks' acquaintance, you can pay for me in little easy payments out of the money I save you. Write for fascinating free book on the 1900 Gravity Washer. Tell others about this unusual offer. All correspondence should be addressed to

H. J. B. Bach. The 1900 Washer Co.
357 Yonge Street, Toronto, Ont.

Modern Business Courses

The courses in commercial subjects offered by this school are strictly up-to-date and practical and produce the very best results. All instruction individual. A copy of our handsomely illustrated catalogue sent on request.

British American Business College
Y. M. C. A. Building
Yonge and McGill Streets - Toronto

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Your Costly Silver is Worthy of the Greatest Care

Did you ever stop to think of the hard labor and work spent in the average household cleaning the silverware? All the rubbing, scrubbing, polishing and dust. Oh, say, it's awful.

That rubbing WEARS AWAY the silver or plate very rapidly—it can't help but do so.

The best and most modern way of cleaning Silver, Gold and Plated Ware, and with NO RUBBING, is the WONDER-SHINE Way.

This method is now being used altogether by the leading Hotels, Clubs and many owners of Gold, Silver and plate services.

Silver Lasts Longer—Shine Lasts Longer

IT IS SO EASY TO USE. A 25c. package contains everything complete, with full directions for using, and with it you can clean all your silverware many times.

Does all the work in quarter the time.

25c. and 50c. Per Package

WONDER-SHINE
SILVER CLEANER

You've thought about trying PURITY FLOUR Now Act!!

FOR some time there has dwelt in your mind the thought of trying PURITY FLOUR—the flour that consists wholly of the high-grade portions of the best Western hard wheat.

That's a good thought. It indicates a desire for improvement in your baking-talent—an ambition to increase the deliciousness of your bread and pastry.

Don't let that good thought perish. Turn on your will power. ACT!!

PURITY FLOUR

"More bread and better bread"

REMINDER: On account of the extra strength and extra quality of PURITY FLOUR, best pastry-results are obtained by adding more shortening than is necessary when using the ordinary Ontario or blended flours. Also add more water when making bread.

Add PURITY FLOUR to your grocery list right now

108

ALMA Ladies COLLEGE St. Thomas, Ont.
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE FREE ON REQUEST

Don't Throw it Away
Does Your Granite Dish or Hot Water Bag Leak?
USE MENDETS
A PATENT PATCH
They mend all leaks in all utensils—tin, brass, copper, graniteware, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Anyone can use them; fit any surface, two million in use. Send for sample pkg., 10c. COMPLETE PACKAGE ASSORTED SIZES, 25c., POSTPAID. Agents wanted.
Collette Mfg. Co., Dept. Collingwood, Ont.

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

BUT THAT'S ANOTHER STORY

A Protest.

A TENDER HEARTED youth was once present at an Oxford supper, where the fathers of those assembled were being roundly abused for their parsimony in supplying the demands of their sons. At last, after having kept long silence, he lifted up his voice in mild protest. "After all, gentlemen," he said, "let us remember that they are our fellow creatures."

* * *

His Mistake.

THE husband arrived home much later than usual "from the office." He took off his boots and stole into the bedroom: but, vain precautions, his wife began to stir. Quickly the panic-stricken man went to the cradle of his first-born and began to look at it vigorously. "What are you doing there, Robert?" queried his wife. "I've been sitting here for nearly two hours trying to get this baby asleep," he growled. "Why, Robert, I've got him here in bed with me," said the spouse.

* * *

His Diet.

A COMEDIAN, who was known to be in desperate straits, was invited to a social gathering one evening. When the poor actor arrived he was seen to be thin clad, although the weather was bitter cold. He looked also as if he had not had any too much nourishment for some time. The hostess greeted him cordially.

"I am so glad to see you," she said. "How well you are looking!"

"Yes," replied the comedian, "the wind has been very nutritious of late."

* * *

His Desire.

REPRESENTATIVES Hughes and Kinkead of New Jersey, and Cravens, of Arkansas, wits of the house, had just returned from the funeral of a colleague. They were discussing the pomp and publicity of a congressional funeral. "I do not want such a funeral, do you, 'Gene?" said Mr. Hughes to Mr. Kinkead. "No, Billy, I do not care to be put away with so much display." "What about you, Ben?" said Mr. Kinkead, turning to Mr. Cravens. "I don't want any funeral," responded the southerner, dryly.

* * *

It Didn't Apply.

JOHN WESLEY had a reputation for cheerfulness. In his journal he writes:

"I preached in Halifax to a civil, senseless congregation. Three or four gentlemen put me in mind of the honest man at London who was so gay and unconcerned while Dr. Sherlock was preaching concerning the Day of Judgment.

"One asked: 'Do you not hear what the doctor says?'

"He answered: 'Yes, but I am not of his parish!'"

* * *

A Ghost Story.

A PLAN was formed to scare a certain Tim Casey, living in a village near Belfast, on his returning from market by night past the churchyard. As he went by the usual turnip, white sheet, and lanthorn of the conventional ghost were submitted to his gaze, with the customary weird howls. Tim, however, simply looked fixedly at the apparition for a moment and remarked: "Arrah, now, and is it a general resurrection, or are ye just taking a walk by yer self?"

* * *

A Rapid Reader.

IT was the custom of the congregation to repeat the Twenty-third Psalm in concert, and Mrs. Armstrong's notion of joining was to keep about a dozen words ahead all the way through.

A stranger was asking one day about Mrs. Armstrong.

"Who," he inquired, "was the lady who was already by the still waters while the rest of us were lying down in green pastures?"

* * *

His Preference.

MAUDIE was evidently feeling embarassed about something, and she blushed prettily, as she told the sister of her fiance that she would like to buy a birthday present for him.

"You know him better than I do," she said, "so I came to you to ask your advice."

"Yes?" said her future sister-in-law, inquiringly.

"What," went on the blushing Maudie, "would you advise me to get?"

"Oh, I don't know," replied the other girl, carelessly. "I could only advise you in general terms. From what I know of him, I should say he would appreciate something that he could pawn easily!"

* * *

The Whole Truth.

AT dinner in a small town in Scotland it was found that everyone had contributed to the evening's entertainment but a certain Dr. McDonald.

"Come, come, Dr. McDonald," said the chairman, "we cannot let you escape."

The doctor protested that he could not sing.

"My voice is altogether unmusical, and resembles the sound caused by the act of rubbing a brick along the panels of a door."

The company attributed this to the doctor's modesty. Good singers, he was reminded, always needed a lot of pressing.

"Very well," said the doctor; "if you can stand it I will sing."

Long before he had finished his audience was uneasy. There was a painful silence as the doctor sat down, broken at length by the voice of a candid Scot at the end of the table.

"Man," he exclaimed, "your singin's no up to much, but your veracity's just awful. You're richt aboot that brick."

* * *

His Choice.

JUDGE: You are privileged to challenge any member of the jury now being impaneled.

Moriarity: Well, then, yer Honor, Oi'll foight the shmall mon wid wan eye, in the corner, there ferninst yez."

* * *

A Trying View.

WELL," said the artist. The critic fixed his eyeglass and examined the canvas. He went close up to it; then moved away from it; then viewed it from the south-west corner; then tried it from the north-west wall.

"Good!" he said, finally. "Distinctly good! One of the best pictures of a coal mine I've ever seen! Perhaps the lighting——"

"Coal mine, sir!" cried the artist. "Coal mine!" He glared at the critic angrily, and clenched his slender fingers. "It's a bird's eye view of Blackpool! You are an ass, sir!"

"Oh, am I?" retorted the critic, warmly. "Well, that may be. But let me tell you that, if that picture represents a bird's eye view of anywhere, I'm thankful that I'm not a bird!"

* * *

Would Soon Dry Up.

THE wit of the irish was delightfully exemplified to me once when I was travelling through Ireland with the late Henry Ward Beecher. We were driven to our hotel in Belfast through a drizzling rain. When I paid the driver I said:

"Are you wet, Pat?"

"Sure, your honor, if I was as wet inside as I am outside I'd be as dhry as a bone."

PAQUET FURS

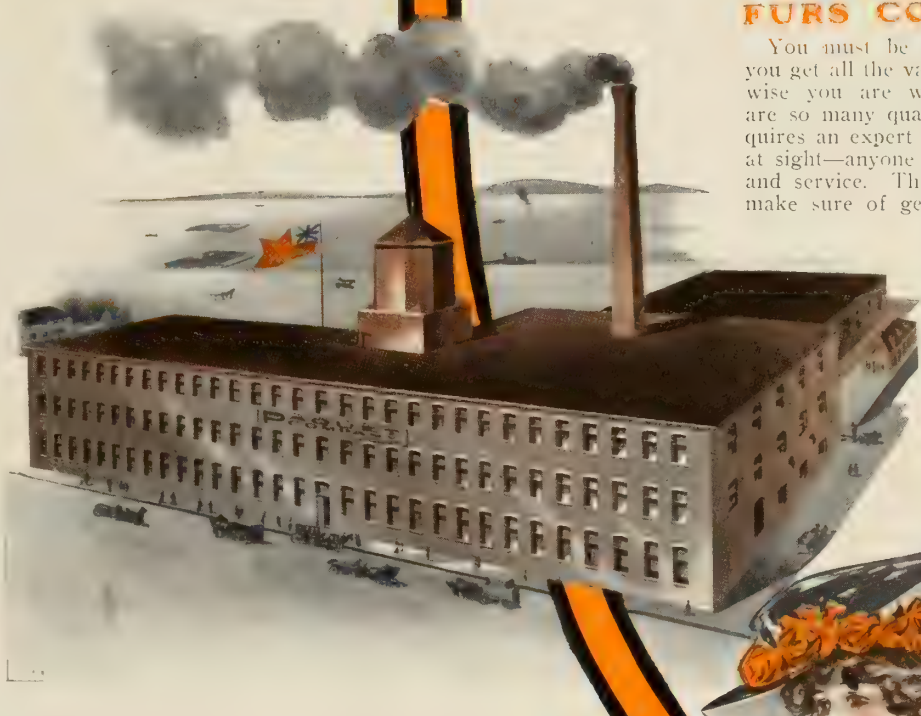
Through This Factory From Trapper To YOU

Once a Luxury Now a Necessity

FURS have long been regarded as a luxury—we've made them a necessity. Through our new method of selling direct from the factory, the man or woman of limited means may now enjoy the comfort of rich and luxurious furs without extravagance.

PAQUET FURS have long been acknowledged to be the best furs on the Canadian market. The reason is not far to seek.

PAQUET FURS are bought in the raw by men who know their business. They are carefully dressed, under the direct supervision of trained specialists. Then they are dyed in the immense Paquet dyeing tanks, and are dried in rapidly-revolving cylinders. When dry the inspectors get in their fine work, and woe betide the skin that fails to come up to the Paquet standard. The perfect skins are sent upstairs to the cutting room, where they are stretched, cut, and passed along to the operators, who know how to put the edges together so they can't come apart, and so neatly that the join cannot be located except from the back.



After another searching inspection, they are sent to the finishing room—there to receive the padding and lining—and, after a final examination, they are ready for the Order Department, where sharp-eyed inspectors stand ready to reject any and every fur piece or fur garment that falls short of absolute perfection.

That's why PAQUET FURS are recognized as

THE FINEST FURS PROCURABLE

Can you wonder, then, that more than eight million dollars' worth of these furs have been sold already? And this is the sort of furs we now offer to you at the actual manufacturer's prices of Canada's largest fur factory.

FURS COST MONEY

You must be absolutely certain that you get all the value you pay for, otherwise you are wasting money. There are so many qualities in fur that it requires an expert to detect the difference at sight—anyone can find it out in wear and service. There is one safe way to make sure of getting the greatest possible value for every dollar you spend, and that way is to deal direct with Canada's Greatest Fur Factory—the only fur factory in America where every process, from the raw skins to the finished product, is in operation under the one roof.

Fur-Lined Coat

4677/313—Lady's fur-lined coat, 50 inches long, shell of all wool imported cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, collar and revers of mink marmot, lining of brown dyed Susliki. Factory price, prepaid $32

Fur-Lined Coat

4675—Lady's 50-inch fur-lined coat, shell of pure wool imported beaver cloth, semi-fitting back, box front, 36-inch lining of genuine hampster, collar and revers in natural mink. Factory price, prepaid $55

Lady's Long Coat

4432—Lady's 50-inch coat, in all-wool imported cloth, with quilted mercerized lining and rubber interlining, collar and revers in fine quality mink muskrat. Factory price, prepaid $18

Astrachan Jacket

3378—Lady's 30-in. "Fernald" style jacket, fitted back, center vent, shawl collar, plain satin lining, jacket made with nice bright Astrachan skins. Factory price, prepaid $28

Raccoon Jacket

3098—Lady's 33-in. regulation style jacket, in fine quality, full-furred raccoon, semi-fitting back, plain mercerized sateen lining, notched collar. Factory price, prepaid $52

Man's Coon Coat

208—Man's coon coat, choice of shawl or notched collar, quilted lining of fine quality black lasting, well made and well finished in every particular. Factory price, prepaid . $50

"Paquet" Special

311—Our "Paquet" special man's coat is made in black beaver cloth, with plain farmer's satin lining and shawl collar of Russian otter marmot. Factory price, prepaid ... $13

THIS FUR CATALOGUE

containing 80 pages of fine half-tone illustrations and thousands of descriptions and prices of PAQUET FURS, will be sent you on request. Write to-day for a copy—don't put it off and forget. A post-card request will bring it by return mail. Write now.

THE PAQUET COMPANY LIMITED.

QUEBEC – CANADA

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

Scour Pots and Pans with

Old Dutch Cleanser

Cuts the "grease & burn" from Tinware
Agateware
Aluminumware
Graniteware, etc.

Avoid Caustic or acid on all
Food Utensils

Other Uses & Full Directions on Large Sifter-Can 10¢

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

DECEMBER
1911

CHRISTMAS NUMBER

Published by THE CANADIAN WOMEN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., Limited
59-61 JOHN STREET TORONTO, CANADA

PRICE
10 CENTS

GILLETT BUILDING
Mc DERMOTT AVE
WINNIPEG, MAN.

GILLETT BUILDING
KING, DUNCAN AND PEARL STS.
TORONTO, ONT.

GILLETT BUILDING
CRAIG AND St ANTOINE STS.
MONTREAL

NO ALUM

MADE IN CANADA.

MAGIC

is a moderate priced Baking Powder, and the only well known one made in Canada that does NOT CONTAIN ALUM.

E·W·GILLETT CO·LTD.

TORONTO – ONT.

WINNIPEG MONTREAL

Notice to Subscribers

Subscriptions are payable strictly in advance.
Remit by Money Order or Registered Letter. We are not responsible for remittances that go astray. Only one and two cent stamps accepted in payment.

CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL

Subscription Price

Subscription for Canada and British Isles, $1.00 per annum; United States, $1.35; Postal Union countries, $2.00 (8s.) post paid.
We accept no patent medicine, liquor, narcotic or exploitation announcements.

Published on the 25th of each month preceding date of issue by
THE CANADIAN WOMAN'S MAGAZINE PUBLISHING CO., LIMITED
59-61 JOHN STREET, TORONTO, CANADA

WILLIAM G. ROOK, President

Edited by JEAN GRAHAM

SUBSCRIBERS' ADVERTISEMENT GUARANTEE

Readers of the "Canadian Home Journal" are fully protected when buying from any of our advertisers. We know that every advertiser in this issue is reliable, and that our readers will be dealt with fairly and honorably. Should any of our readers have an unsatisfactory dealing with any of our advertisers we will undertake to have a satisfactory adjustment made or the money refunded. This absolute guarantee is good only when our readers tell advertisers when dealing with them that their advertisement was seen in the "Canadian Home Journal."

EDITORIAL CHAT

OUR CHRISTMAS NUMBER comes to you in seasonable array, with a wealth of good things for your table. In the first place, we have two Christmas stories by Canadian writers which should prove a pleasing dish of fiction. "A Wedding Witness," by A. Gertrude Jackson, tells of an averted tragedy, and "The True Spirit of Christmas," by a New Brunswick contributor, Kate H. Miles, is a bright picture of two young Canadians who found their best Christmas joy in helping others to be happy. Then there is a charming story by Nellie E. McClung, the author of "Sowing Seeds in Danny" and "The Second Chance." We are sure that when you read "The Flight of Philip's Pigeons" your heart will be filled with sympathy for the small hero, who found the ways of his feathered pets so trying. Mrs. McClung has a delightful gift in representing the trials and joys of the youngsters, and you will all probably be anxious to hear more about Philip. Then there is an English story, by Annie Tibbits, about a young man who found the course of true love proverbially unsmooth; and there are our serials, which are unwinding their plots in a dramatic fashion which ought to keep you interested. There is Jennie Allen Moore's talk, "Around the Hearth," which comes with special cheer and comfort when the Yule-log is blazing—and there is some good advice in "The Month Before Christmas," and the directions as to the manufacture of Christmas toys. Embroidered trays are among the latest fashions in gifts; any housewife would be glad of such an addition to her dining-room or reception-room equipment—and our Christmas number tells you how to make them. Our musical editor gives some excellent advice on the matter of Christmas programmes, and assures you of attention paid to any correspondence you wish to send.

THE YOUNGER READERS are well looked after in this number, and will, no doubt, take as much interest as ever in the Rebus competition, which has always proved such a popular feature. There is a Christmas puzzle, also, which will give our Juniors an opportunity to exercise their ingenuity. The letters in the recent competition regarding a summer holiday have been entertaining and creditable, and we should like to have given a prize to each young correspondent. We hope you will all take an interest in the new competition, "A Winter Adventure," and send us letters which will tell of our Lady of the Snows.

FOR NEXT YEAR we have stories and articles already promised which will make the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL an eagerly-welcomed visitor. We have a delightfully romantic story of old-fashioned days, by Percy James Brebner, who wrote the novels, "Princess Maritza" and "The Brown Mask." The January number will contain, among other fiction, "The Path of Gold," a story by Ethel Kirk, a young Canadian who is winning a place for herself in journalism. There is not a week that we do not receive letters of inquiry as to ways in which women may earn their own living. Now, it is generally admitted that, if a woman is not presiding over a home of her own, it is better for her to be providing for herself than to be dependent on others. We intend to publish a series of articles on women who have made a success of certain occupations or professions. These articles will be thoroughly practical and will deal with actual cases of accomplishment. The first is published in the current issue, and tells of "The Lady of Dainty Lunches," who has seen a forty-cent cake grow into an extensive enterprise. There is nothing more stimulating to one's own efforts than to hear of someone to whom industry and perseverance have brought success. This is a wonderful age of opportunity for the woman who is not afraid of working and waiting. And there is no country which offers a finer reward to pluck and endeavor than does our own Dominion. So, these anxious correspondents may find some answer to their questions in the articles we propose to publish. Teaching and needlework used to be the only occupations open to woman; now, there is hardly a field, from ranching to architecture, which women have not entered. An article in a future number will deal with the success of women in poultry-raising, and others will show how financial success has been attained in various walks of business. The series of articles on a nurse's career will be published during 1912, and will give a practical idea of what equipment is necessary for this calling. The work of the Women's Institutes was never so flourishing as at present, and the report of the Annual Convention will be found in our January number. The Institute Department has proved one of the most attractive in the JOURNAL. We regret we cannot publish all papers.

December CONTENTS 1911

FICTION

THE WOOING OF A WILFUL MAID - - 6
THE HOUSE OF WINDOWS - - - 8
A WEDDING WITNESS - - - - 11
TRUE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS - - - 12
FLIGHT OF PHILIP'S PIGEONS - - - 13
THE COST OF A CRIME - - - - 20

SPECIAL FEATURES

THE MONTH BEFORE CHRISTMAS - - 19
THE LADY OF DAINTY LUNCHES - - 44
HOUSEHOLD EXCHANGE - - - - 50
CHRISTMAS TOYS - - - - - - 51

FASHION DEPARTMENT

PRETTY AFTERNOON GOWNS - - - 35
GOWNS OF SILK WITH LACE - - 36
SMART GOWNS IN TUNIC STYLE - - 36
DAINTY FROCKS FOR LITTLE GIRLS - 37
AFTERNOON COATS - - - - - 38
FANCY BLOUSE - - - - - - 39
EMBROIDERED TRAYS - - - - 41
IN THE SHOPS - - - - - - 42

MATTERS OF MENU

A DECEMBER LUNCHEON - - - - 15
CULINARY CONCEITS - - - - - 57

FOR THE HOUSEHOLD

HOUSEHOLD DECORATION - - - 24
HOUSEHOLD HINTS - - - - - 56

SPECIAL DEPARTMENTS

AROUND THE HEARTH - - - - 14
THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS - - - - 16
THE CHRISTMAS REBUS - - - 17
FROM THE PUBLISHERS - - - - 18
CANADIAN GIRLS' CLUB - - - - 26
THE DRESSING-TABLE - - - - 43
WOMEN'S INSTITUTES - - - - 46

MISCELLANEOUS

EDITORIAL CHAT - - - - - - - 3
EDITORIALS - - - - - - - - 5
MATTERS MUSICAL - - - - - 28

Mr. Grocer, why don't you sell more Mince Meat? We believe it is because you haven't told the housewife enough about Heinz Mince Meat.

She naturally lacks confidence in any commercially-prepared mince meat.

Then why don't you—Mr. Grocer—explain to her the difference between Heinz Mince Meat and the kinds usually sold?

Why don't you tell her of the Heinz Pure Food Institution? Why don't you describe to her its clean model kitchens, sand scoured and flushed with water regularly, to keep every corner sweet and spotless?

Tell her of the cleanly, uniformed work people who guard the purity and quality of all Heinz products.

Every housewife would want to eat Heinz Mince Meat if she could see it made. Every detail of its making is open to inspection, and thousands of visitors do see it made every year.

Tell her that we use selected apples—ripe, juicy, and tart; that we wash, pare and core them—taking out every bruise and speck.

Tell her of the luscious Valencia raisins—every one seeded; that our currants, too, are the finest imported and thoroughly washed.

Then you know we get choice cuts of fresh beef every day. And clean, whole knob kidney suet — snow-white and wholesome.

These things, with the finest candied fruits and peels and Heinz-ground pure spices, impart to Heinz Mince Meat its wonderful flavor—delicious—incomparable. And it is as pure and wholesome as the finest home-made product can be.

The particular housewife will appreciate your telling her these things because you can save her the trouble of home mince-meat making; and she'll appreciate, too, the fact that you actually pay more in order to give her more quality for her money—in all Heinz 57 Varieties.

Heinz Mince Meat, as you know, is sold in glass jars, in stone crocks—in Heinz Improved Tins, also by the pound from bulk packages. In selling it by the pound you will, of course, always tell your customer that the flavor will be even better if it is allowed to simmer slowly fifteen minutes before using.

And tell your customer that every pound and every package really constitutes a trial sample, because she can return it to you and receive full purchase price if it fails to please her.

Heinz Plum Pudding

Heinz Plum Pudding is a luxury of luxuries—rich, light, digestible. Big, juicy raisins and currents, seeded and washed, rare spices and candied fruits — every good thing that goes to make a plum pudding good—goes into Heinz Plum Pudding.

Other Heinz good things for the Holiday table are: Heinz Tomato Soup, Cranberry Sauce, Preserves, Jellies, Sweet Pickles, Chili Sauce, East Indian Chutney, Euchred Figs, etc., etc.

H. J. Heinz Co.—57 Varieties

Member of Association for Promotion of Purity in Foods

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

EDITORIALS

At Yuletide

IT is actually here again—the best holiday of the year—and we realize that nothing can spoil Christmas cheer, and that even the modern commercial spirit takes a blushing and shame-faced departure when the rosy face of Santa Claus appears through the snowstorms. "Going home for Christmas" is the glad announcement heard everywhere, and the heart beats faster as the December days are marked off the calendar. Do you not remember the old times at boarding school, when you counted even the hours, as the Christmas holidays drew near? Nothing else will ever look as bright as the lights of the old town and the welcoming windows of the old home.

Yet there are homes, even in our prosperous and enlightened Canada, where Christmas brings neither warmth nor gladness. These are the spots which we must not forget in our own preparations for the festivities of the season.

Above all, let us remember the children in the hospital and do something towards making their Christmas bright and merry. The "small persons" who are suffering demand our sympathy and help, and the Christmas Spirit should inspire the gifts to the afflicted in the tiny cots.

* * *

The Institute Convention

THE tenth annual convention of the Women's Institutes of Ontario, has completed a decade of which the members of the order may well be proud. Even the most hopeful of the founders could hardly have foreseen such gatherings as met in Guild Hall, and the University Convocation Hall of Toronto, during the month of November. For years the convention was held in Guelph at the time of the Winter Fair, but in 1909 it was felt that the demands of the organization had outgrown the meeting-place, and in 1910 the capital of Ontario was the rallying-place for the members. This year, the Horticultural Exhibition was open during the convention days, and the members were privileged to obtain a glimpse of the floral and fruit wealth of Ontario. The first keen frost of winter was in the air, but there was no coldness in the welcome which the delegates received.

Mr. G. A. Putnam, the Superintendent of this work, is to be congratulated on the class of speakers secured for these occasions. Too often the subjects chosen by convention speakers are hackneyed or visionary, with little bearing on the actual needs of the hearers. Such is not the case with the Institute programmes. The addresses are essentially practical and suited to Twentieth Century needs. The women who gather at these conventions are fairly convinced of the importance of the home and do not need to be informed of the desirability of devotion to its needs. Consequently, platitudes on the subject are not regarded with enthusiasm. Such up-to-date addresses as that by Hon. Adam Beck, "Electricity on the Farm and in the Home," and that by Dr. Helen MacMurchy on "Social Service," are both practical and invigorating. In fact, the whole programme presents topics which are vital and progressive.

* * *

More Men Teachers

THE teacher's relationship to the community appears to be still of absorbing interest. A tragedy in the remote country districts has led to increased urgency on the part of editors, with regard to the necessity for more men teachers in our public schools, especially in the districts where the rougher element is prevalent. The subject is a somewhat difficult matter to discuss, and there is no special good in dwelling too insistently on an isolated tragedy. There is a practical objection on the part of young men to the teaching profession, especially so far as the rural schools are concerned. The salaries paid are not such as to offer compelling attractions to ambitious youths, who have many ways before them in this land of various and golden opportunities. Feminine competition is blamed by many for this state of affairs; yet woman, also, is finding pedagogy inferior in financial charm to a business career. It is a pitiful state of affairs that young girls should be sent to cope with conditions which would tax masculine strength—but the remedy is not easy to find.

Most observers of our modern school system admit frankly that it is a mistake to have so few men teachers. The man and the woman educator are both needed, if our public schools are to accomplish the best results; but the "feminisation" of the staff of instruction is remarkable. Those who deplore the scarcity of the man teacher are not criticizing adversely the woman teacher. It is quite natural that the boy, as he emerges from childhood, finds in the man teacher a readier understanding of his ambitions than could be expected from the woman instructor. The Boy Scout movement is helping in this crisis—but the cause of the difficulty is economic.

* * *

Music in the Home

IN our large cities, there is no dearth of good music, so far as concerts are concerned. In the country, it has been remarked by several observers that music is generally recognized as a desirable accomplishment and a refining influence. Where there used to be a small melodeon in the farm-house parlor, you will now find an upright piano in all its rosewood glory. It has been generally remarked that so many women give up their music after they are married—and devote themselves to more immediate domestic duties. This is so often the case, that a woman over fifty years of age, who plays duets with her eldest daughter was asked by an astonished guest how she had "managed" to keep up her music.

THE WOOING OF A WILFUL MAID

A Story of the Course of True Love Which Finally Ran Smooth

By ANNIE O. TIBBITS

JIM LEDWAITE stood beside his desk with his face growing slowly grey. His eyes were staring out of the window; his back turned to the old man who seemed oblivious to everything except his own concerns.

"Yes, it's that I'm afraid of, Jim," the old man was saying, "and I want you to help me to find out if you can. If she's in love with that scoundrel it'll break my heart. But I'm afraid there's not much doubt about it. He's always there in the evenings—always hanging about her. Just find out for me, lad."

For a moment Jim made no reply.

"Stella wouldn't," he gasped out at last, his voice shaking. "You must be mistaken, sir. Stella can't care for Reid—it isn't likely."

Mr. Herman's face looked a trifle hard in the morning sunshine, and he apparently did not see Jim Ledwaite's strange pallor when he turned after a moment and faced him.

"But—why did you ask me, sir?" Jim asked.

"Well, two heads are better than one, and I've nobody else to help me. If her mother was alive she would know, but a young lass is a difficult thing, Jim, and you've known her so well—been so close to us all these years. You'll be the very one to find out for me."

All these years! How the words echoed in Jim's mind. "All these years" dated back to the time when he had been brought, a waif of six or so, into Mr. Herman's house. Though eighteen years had gone by since then, that day stood out clear in Jim's mind as though it had been yesterday. He remembered it as a nightmare—a sullen, foggy day when his mother had been carried out of Herman's factory a shapeless mass, a helpless, covered body that lay strangely still when they put it on the table—that never moved again.

Dimly, through a fog, his mind had gathered what had happened. Only vaguely in his six small years had he heard from the fragments of talk in the streets that such things as "accidents" happened in the factory where his mother worked, but he had never thought what an accident meant until then—until the moment when a ghastly whisper told him that that still and awful thing was his mother.

After that he remembered only a figure coming out of a group of people towards him—the figure of young Mr. Herman, the master.

"You come home with me and play with my little lass a while," he had said. "Will you, lad?"

Jim's eyes shot to the figure of his mother, but she never moved—she gave no sign.

"Your mother will not say nay," Mr. Herman said, with a choke in his voice, and a minute later with the boy in his arms he strode out of the cottage up to the great house on the hill.

And Jim, remembering now the little fair-haired child who came running from the firelight to meet them, felt his heart jump and throb in his breast at the thought of that moment, even though eighteen years had gone by.

"Stella, my lass, I've brought a playmate for thee. Come and give him a kiss and tell him you're glad to see him."

And Stella, who had grown into a grand lady, who had been to France to school, who wore silk clothes and rode in a carriage, who was an heiress now—had flung her arms about his cold and ragged body eighteen years ago and kissed his tear-stained face.

In the eighteen years that had gone by he had worked and risen. His master had done well by him. He had fed and clothed and educated him, and at last put him in the office in the factory where, until the last month or two, he had done well.

If Mr. Herman had been a bit disappointed in the last month or two, he said nothing now. All his thoughts were on his daughter Stella, the beautiful young lady who was so different from the tiny child who had hugged the dirty boy in her chubby arms eighteen years ago.

"You see, there's nobody else, Jim, that I can think of," Mr. Herman was saying. "She's in love with somebody, Jim, and if I only knew whom, I should know how to act, maybe. You and she were such chums always, I thought you'd be able to find out better than anyone."

Jim's mouth gave a bitter twist.

"But—she's grown up," he stammered. "She's different now since she's come from school, sir. Things have altered, and she doesn't make a chum of me now, sir."

"Doesn't she?" Mr. Herman sighed.

"'Tisn't to be expected, sir," said Jim. "There's a difference between her and me. When I think that if it hadn't been for your goodness I should have been at the workhouse"—his voice choked—"I——"

"Tut, tut, lad. I don't want you to think of that. And anyhow, if you do it's all the more reason for helping me now. The lass is in love with some one," he went on. "That's very clear. I've seen it this last week or two since she's been home, and I want to find out who it is, for it's plain enough she's ashamed of it and afraid for me to find out. I don't want to ask her outright. If my suspicions are right, she won't tell me. I believe it's young Tom Reid. But I shall know what to do if we can only find out. Will you try, Jim, lad?"

Jim turned and nodded.

"I'll do my best, sir," he said. "Only since she's been to France she's got new friends, and she doesn't seem very friendly to me. But I'll do my best, sir."

"That's right. Now for certain we shall get at the bottom of it—two heads, you know, Jim; and if it's young Reid I'll take her for a trip round the world the week after I find out. She shan't have him if I can help it."

"But she may be fond of him, sir, and then——"

"Then I'll cure her," said Mr. Herman. "You help me——" He broke off to look a little sharply into Jim's face. It looked white in the morning light, and there was a weary look about the his eyes, as though he did not sleep at nights.

"You find out, Jim," he added, and then turned abruptly to his desk. As Jim left his office he looked after him, sighing a little.

"I hope it's only a phase," he muttered to himself. "I hope that lad won't go wrong."

He sat looking at the closed door for some minutes. Many rumors had reached him of late—whispered hints that Jim Ledwaite had started on the downward path—that the lad he had taken and reared and befriended was becoming a gambler, a frequenter of a bad club and a boon companion of Tom Reid, a man who was, in his opinion, a scoundrel.

Jim had been always punctual in the mornings so far and had not neglected his work, but Mr. Herman had looked anxiously often at the tell-tale lines about his face, at the heavy look in his eyes that spoke of late hours, and perhaps worse.

"Thinking about Stella will cure him, maybe," he said to himself as he settled to his work. "I'll give him something to do, and"—he suddenly chuckled—"two heads are better than one, they say. Well, we'll see."

JIM'S task was bitter enough. All his life he had adored Stella Herman, and now to be set to watch her, to look for the lovelight in her eyes, to find out who was the lucky man she loved, was almost more than he could bear, even though she had grown proud and cold since she had been in France. She no longer seemed even friendly. But he loved her just as he had always done all his life.

Ever since Mr. Herman had adopted him he had lived in the great house on the hill almost as if he had been the millowner's own son. Stella had treated him almost like a brother until lately, and now the sense that he was in the way in the drawing-room at night when he returned with her father from the factory, that she resented his appearance at their dining-table, had sent him out into the streets, to wander about restlessly until one night Tom Reid had introduced him to the club in the town.

After that he had always somewhere to go, and it seemed to him better that than face the coldness in Stella's eyes or risk the snubbing she might give him.

Now he would have to stay at home to keep watch, and it seemed to him that he was face to face with a crisis in his life as bitter as the one of eighteen years ago when his mother had been killed. It meant another break—another upheaval, for he could not remain in Medchester. He had, in fact, been on the point of telling Mr. Herman that morning that he wanted to go, and it was only the suggestion about Stella that prevented him. He would do just what Mr. Herman asked, and then go somewhere out of sight of Stella—and out of memory of her—if he could!

But at the door of the drawing-room that night he stood aghast. How could he ever forget her?

She stood by the fireplace, tall and slight, and fair, and as he opened the door she turned her head quickly. A strange flicker passed over her face when she saw him.

"You!" she said coldly.

Jim crossed the floor with an effort to appear indifferent that seemed to drive all the blood from his cheeks; and sat down in a chair on the hearth. He did not look at her, but he seemed to feel her hard, cold eyes upon him—seemed to see reflected in the very fire the proud curl of her lips. He knew the contempt she had for him, but he dared not look to see it in her face.

From a confused want of something to do, he took out a tobacco pouch and began making cigarettes. Stella stood looking down at him, with her face curiously hard and white. If he had looked up he might have thought she hated him.

"Has the attraction in the town paled—or what?" she asked with a slight sneer. "I don't believe you have spent an evening here for weeks. You'll be bored to death."

He did not lift his head.

"I daresay," he said.

"Besides," she paused, "besides, Frank and Alice Currie and Mr. Reid may look in. We shall probably play cards, and you'll be out of it. I wonder why you came in to-night?"

His fingers paused in the act of rolling a cigarette.

"I wanted a change," he said. He looked up. Ah, why did she hate him so? What had he done? How was it that his own wild love for her seemed to rouse in her such fierce antagonism?

"I believe you hate me," he said suddenly.

She turned away her head.

"Don't be silly. Why don't you go out as you always do? You'll only be in the way to-night—you'll put everything out. The others won't like to play unless you do, and you'll be the odd one. Why have you chosen to-night to stay at home? It's just like you to do such a stupid thing."

He did not speak for a moment. He rolled another cigarette, and a sudden queer silence fell between them.

"I suppose," Stella said abruptly at last, "that the girl has given you up, or something."

"What girl?" Jim lifted his head sharply.

Stella's lips curled.

"Of course there is a girl," she said. "Do you suppose I don't guess? You're like an ostrich, burying your head in the sand. But, after all, who cares? And hark! Isn't that someone outside?"

She lifted her head to listen. As she did so there was a knock at the door, and Tom Reid came in.

Jim felt the blood stand still in his veins as he watched her, and for a moment he could not believe his eyes, for a decided look of annoyance flashed over her face before she went forward to greet him.

Then it was not Reid!

Jim drew a breath. Reid came in, gave an abrupt, condescending nod towards him, and settled down to talk to Stella.

If it was not Reid, then who was it she loved? Not Reid! How his heart bounded now in his body! Not Reid!

He waited impatiently for the others to come in, and when they did at last, he rose to his feet, standing with his back to the mantelpiece almost as if he had a right to be there, forgetting for the moment that he was a nobody, and that the Curries looked down upon him just as Stella did.

She glanced towards him sharply, and for just a breathing space stood watching him—watching him, Jim thought, with a fierce, angry pang, as if she was thinking of some way of getting rid of him.

But nobody should get rid of him to-night. He had one thing to do—he would do it, and go! He was independent even of Stella's opinion to-night. He was like one at bay, and just then he did not care.

She seemed to toss her head a little. Doubtless it was his imagination. And then she bent forward, and it was no imagination now that she greeted Fred Currie with warmth.

Jim's heart burned within him. He felt hot, desperate, and sick. If Tom Reid was a scoundrel, Fred Currie was something worse—a white-faced, cringing hypocrite.

He felt ashamed and angry. That Currie should dare to speak to her! That a blackguard like him should even touch her hand!

Jim's own hands clenched. At least, whatever his origin, his life had been clean and open and straight. And while she sat encouraging this coward who was beside her, she treated him with open contempt.

It was the longest evening Jim had ever spent. Mr. Herman was away, and no one else came to break up the little party of four.

There were songs and music. Stella and Currie sang together, and then afterwards for a bitter half-hour before they went he and she sat together on the far side of the room; and Jim watched the flush rising on her cheeks, the light sparkling in her eyes, with bitter misery. If Mr. Herman had been afraid of Reid, then what of this other—a man who knew neither truth nor honor? Better even Tom Reid, he thought, than an unscrupulous coward like Currie.

They were going at last. He rose, too, almost unconsciously following them out into the hall where they stood laughing and talking, finally saying good-night and disappearing in the darkness of the street outside.

He was brought to himself by the slamming of the hall door and the sound of Stella's retreating footsteps. She went past him proudly, not even glancing at him, and with the depression bitter and heavy upon him he turned, walked in a mechanical way towards Mr. Herman's study, where he sat sometimes.

He dropped into a chair before the dying fire, sitting for a long time cold and still, with a sense of almost bodily ill being upon him. When he heard the rattle of a key in the hall door at last he started; and it was a strange grey-white face that Mr. Herman saw when he came in.

"He dropped into a chair before the dying fire."

"Hallo?" he said, "what brings you here?"

Jim did not reply to the question.

"I've found out for you," he said abruptly. "I've found out who it is Stella cares for."

"Eh?"

"It's Currie—young Fred Currie," broke from his lips. "I'm sorry, sir."

For a moment Mr. Herman stared with a puzzled, bewildered look upon his face. Then he laughed outright.

"Go and tell that to the marines," he said.

"But it's true, sir."

Mr. Herman looked again sternly into his face, and stood for a moment with steady eyes fixed upon him. A faint shadow seemed to have crept over him, but Jim expected more than that.

"I'm sorry, sir," he said. "Currie—Currie isn't a good fellow—not good enough for Stella."

"Not good enough, eh?"

"Didn't you know, sir? He's bad, and he comes of a bad stock. No, he's not good enough, but he's the one she cares for."

Another odd look swept Mr. Herman's face. He raised his hand and stroked his beard, and if Jim had happened to look at him then he might have seen that he was hiding a smile.

"There's one thing I ought to tell you," he said, "I meant to tell you before. I want to leave you, sir."

"Eh?" Mr. Herman looked startled.

"I want to go. I've felt it for some time, sir. I want to go to America."

"Good gracious, Jim!" broke in Mr. Herman. "You can't mean it? Don't talk nonsense, lad——"

"I do mean it, sir." Jim swung swiftly round. "I can't remain here any longer—I can't stand it——"

"Can't stand what?" Mr. Herman repeated sharply.

"The life, sir. I don't like it. I want to see a lot more of the world than I can see in Medchester."

His voice was steady enough, but Mr. Herman stared hard into his face as if he was seeking the key to a riddle.

"Nonsense, Jim. Think it over. Sleep on it. But now—are you sure of what you say about Stella and Currie?"

"Sure!"

"Well, I must put a stop to that. But tell me how, Jim? Two heads are better than one, aren't they? Well, put yours against mine and tell me how we are to turn her fancy. What do you think of getting some other fellow to make love to her?"

Jim made no reply.

"What do you think would be the result if you did."

"I?" Jim blazed round, hot and breathless.

"Yes, you. Don't you think you could cut out young Currie?"

"But—for fun, sir? Make love to her—for fun!" There was a depth of hoarseness in his voice that stirred Mr. Herman sharply. He bent forward, his face changing and growing serious, and put his hand on his shoulder.

"Why should it be for fun, Jim?" he asked.

Jim started sharply. His face went quickly white, the blood drained from his very lips.

"I—I don't understand, sir," he said in a whisper. "Don't torment me—I'm in a torment already. It is more than I can bear. Don't tease me, sir."

"I'm not, Jim. I mean it; I can see a lot farther than my nose as a rule, and when I suggested to you to find out who she was in love with, I knew what I was doing. I've seen how you felt for a long time. I know, my lad, why it is you began to spend your nights in a bad club, and I determined to stop it—and I set you on a job which I thought would keep you at home. Yes, I've seen it in your face—your looks. God bless her, lad! how could you help falling in love with her? The bonniest lass in Medchester. And you—do you think she couldn't care for you?"

"She hates me, sir," whispered Jim. "Snubs me——"

"Go and snub her in return, my lad," said Mr. Herman.

"I?" cried Jim, startled. "I? If you are good enough to forget who I am and how I came to you, she doesn't, sir. And you can't mean it seriously—not really."

"I do, Jim, lad. I know you for what you are, and I'd rather have you for a son-in-law than any chap in Medchester; and if you'll go in and try, I'll back you up. You'd better set to work at once and make love to her before my very eyes. And how would it be for me to be indignant, eh? To forbid her to flirt with you? That's the way wise parents set about things, I believe. What do you think, Jim?"

"I don't know, sir," said Jim in a whisper. "I only know that she hates me more than you think. She detests me."

Mr. Herman shook his head.

"Faint heart never won fair lady," he remarked; "but all I can say to you is—save her from Currie. Seriously, my lad"—his voice and face changed—"seriously, she must be saved from him, and you can do it—I know you can do it."

"Know." What did he mean? Jim was puzzled, but the chance he had given him, the hope of success worked a magic change in him.

Stella's snubs lost half the effect. He even snubbed her back, to her dismay and astonishment, and somehow the look of indignation and rage which she flashed at him scarcely hurt him.

"Tell her what you told me," Mr. Herman suggested to him. "Have it out to-night—I'll keep it up."

He did; and his words fell like a bombshell upon Stella's ears.

"Has Jim told you," her father asked, "he's going to America?"

Stella drew her breath with a little gasp.

"Jim?" she began, and stopped.

"Yes, and he wants to go at once, as far as I can make out."

"For—for how long?" Stella faltered.

Mr. Herman rose from his seat with the gesture of a man in a rage.

"That's just it. He wants to go for good—wants to go and leave us forever. His mind is set on it, I'm afraid. He's been restless for some time, and now—he'll be off unless you can persuade him, Stella. He won't stop for me—even though I'm as good as a father to him. I've called him ungrateful, but he don't care for that. But anyhow, I can't stand in his way, can I, Stella, if it's for his good?"

Stella was deathly white. All the gaiety of her seemed to have vanished like a smiling country under a mist, and as she went up to her drawing-room she stooped heavily, looking suddenly like a little old woman instead of a girl who had just left school.

She went up to the mantelpiece, and putting down her head upon it, gave a sudden sob.

Jim came in just as Mr. Herman crossed the hall, and was sent to her at once.

"Jim, go and see if I've left my tobacco pouch in the drawing-room and bring it to me."

Jim did not suspect, and at the door he stopped abruptly.

"Stella," he cried, "what is the matter?"

She stood still, scarcely breathing, her head down upon the marble.

He went forward.

"Stella," he repeated, "you are crying."

"I'm not," she lifted her head, and was instantly betrayed.

"You are," Jim took her by the shoulder and swung her round. He would not have dared do that a few days ago. "Stella, what are you crying for?"

"Father says you are going away."

"That's true."

"Why are you going?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Tired of Medchester, I suppose," he answered.

She took a step suddenly towards him.

"Oh, Jim, how you've altered lately," she said. "You're not a bit the same—not like you used to be. Jim, we used to be such chums——"

"That was before you went to France and became a fine lady," he said. "I'm not good enough for you now."

"Not good enough?"

"Well, it seems so—and, after all, it's natural, Stella. My mother a weaver and my father only a working man. I ought not to have felt it so when you snubbed me. I ought to have known my place better."

"Jim, Jim, forgive me," the tears were streaming down her face again. "Jim, I've been a coward—I—I—Oh! do forgive me."

She held out her hands, and the touch of her was too much for him. He trembled sharply. His face went from grey to white

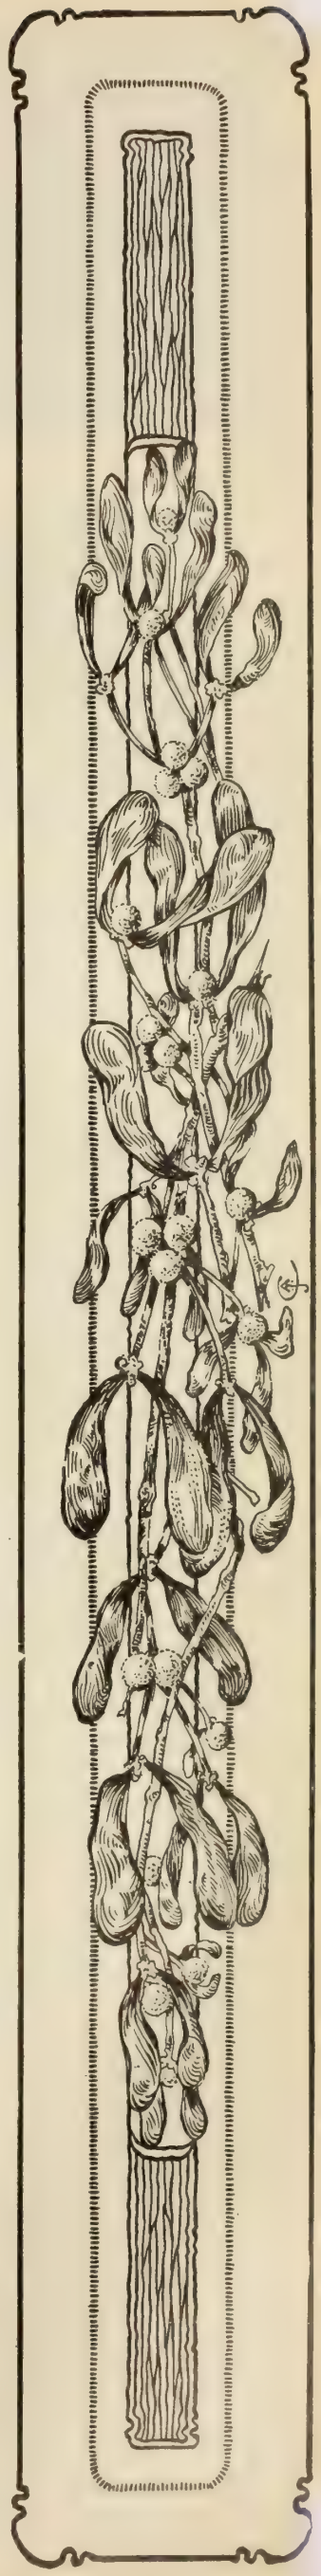
"Stella," he said hoarsely, "I—I can't help loving you—it's been torture to me day and night—I love you—that's why I'm going. I can't stand it—I can't bear seeing you and Currie together, and I've told your father so. He knows. Oh, Stella! I wish I had dared—to try to make you—forget him. I might have saved you—I might——"

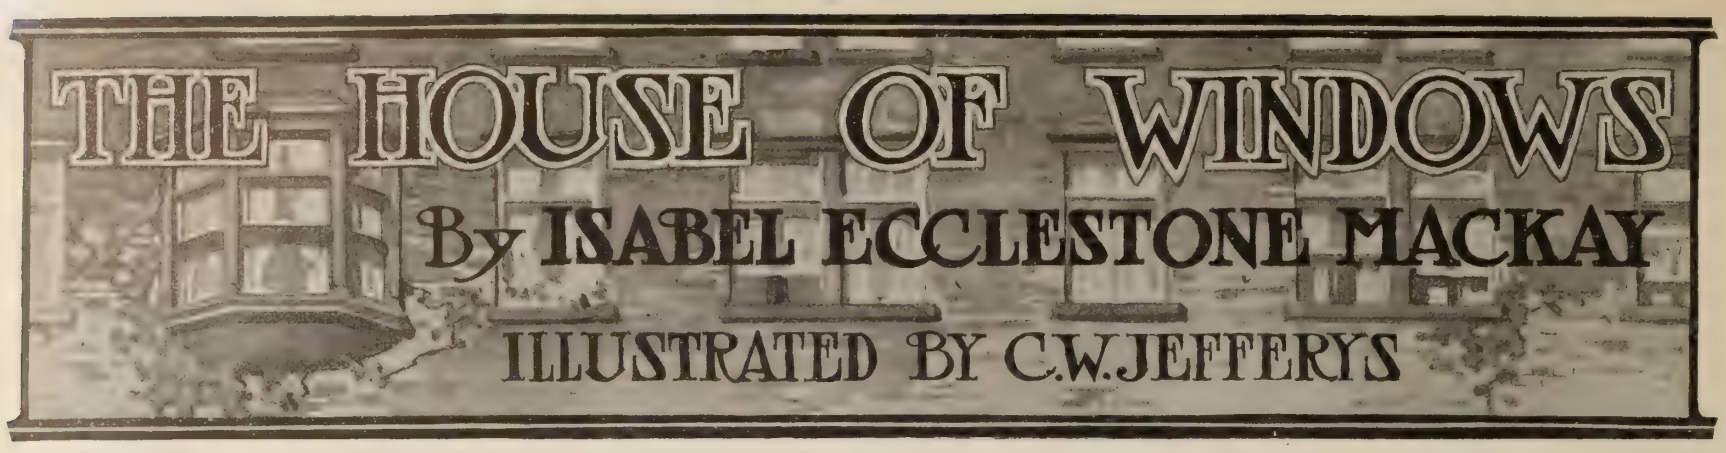
A sudden flush ran up into her face.

"Oh, Jim, do you think it is too late now?"

For a moment he stared at her. Then suddenly his arms were round her, and he was saying over and over again: "I love you, Stella, I love you."

"Oh, Jim, it was because you wouldn't say it that I snubbed you so, and tried to flirt with Currie," she whispered at last.





SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

An infant is deserted by a woman who leaves it in the store of Angers and Son. It is adopted by Celia Brown, who takes it home to "The House of Windows." The child is given the name of Christine Brown. Some time before the desertion, Adam Torrance, the real owner of Angers and Son, has his only child kidnapped. Of this occurrence Celia is ignorant. Adam Torrance hears that his child has died. His wife also dies, and he lives abroad. Sixteen years pass and Christine continues to live with Celia and her blind sister, Ada. Celia is in financial distress and Christine determines to apply for position of "reader" to Miss Torrance. Mark Wareham, nephew of the latter, follows the unsuccessful Christine, and contrives to make her acquaintance. Adam Torrance, who has returned to the city, sends Mark, his nephew, out to British Columbia. Christine secures a position in "the Stores." Christine is followed by a sinister-looking old beggar woman, and is further annoyed by the attentions of Gilbert Van Slyke. The woman, whose daughter's employment in "the Stores" long ago, had led to moral disaster, is determined to wreak vengeance on Christine, whom she had stolen. Adam Torrance visits "The House of Windows" in order to relieve the sisters' distress.

"ARE you all alone?" he asked Ada. "Have you — no brother?"

She shook her head. "No," she said, "but there is Tommy. He is like a brother. He is such an old friend—"

"My godfather," explained Christine. "He does everything unpleasant for us, sees the plumber when the bill is too large, and sees that the coal man sends us decent coal. There are times," she remarked thoughtfully, "when one really needs a man."

Adam Torrance laughed.

"You increase my respect for my sex immensely," he told her.

"Oh, Tommy does much more than that," said Ada, quick in defence. "He helps us in every way. It is he who keeps up my garden. No one else would bother. If you will come to the window you will see what he can do."

To Christine's consternation their visitor at once crossed to the window. With a proud air Ada drew back the curtain. "It is not at its best now," she said, "you should see it when the roses are out."

Adam Torrance looked out eagerly and caught back an exclamation! The tin cans and the waste paper looked even worse than usual to-day. A starved cat sat on the broken fence. An ugly dog worried an unhealthy-looking bone.

Christine laid a timid hand upon his arm. "It is Ada's garden," she said slowly. There was entreaty in her look.

"It--it is remarkable! said Mr. Torrance.

Ada dropped the curtain smiling. "One is naturally surprised to see it in so busy a street," she said.

"But," he floundered, "don't you—do you never walk in it?"

"Oh, no!" she answered. "It is closed. No one is allowed there. But that does not matter. I can imagine it all so well. No doubt it would be nothing but a wilderness if it were not for Tommy."

"No doubt," said Adam Torrance. In his heart he found himself feeling a curious envy of Tommy. The making of Ada's garden was an achievement of which any man might be proud. And this fellow appeared to be something of a gentleman. How old might he be? he wondered. If he were Christine's godfather he was probably old. Nevertheless curiosity pricked him. "I wonder," he remarked casually, "if I happen to know your friend. You said his name was——"

"Mr. Burns," said Christine. There was a dimple of mischief in her cheeks. "No, I do not think that you know each other. He left the Stores years ago. He is now managing a department in Brindley's Bookshop."

Here was another blow. He, Adam Torrance, had been guilty of feeling enviously toward a clerk --where was this thing going to end?

"You amaze me," he said. "I would have thought that a man capable of—er—thinking out—such a garden would be possessed of some imagination."

"Oh, he is a poet, too," said Christine carelessly. "He has simply piles of imagination."

"Then why is he in a bookshop?"

"Why shouldn't he be?" The girl's voice was puzzled. "He never neglects his work to write poetry. And he loves books."

"Oh, Tommy is very clever," added Ada earnestly. "Mr. Brindley simply could not get along without him—must you go?"

"I am afraid I must." He felt if he stayed much longer he would begin seriously to doubt the stability of his scheme of things. "For once in my life I am a busy man. I am, as you know, investigating the state of things in the Stores. Perhaps you will allow me to call again when Miss Celia is better. As it is, you have given me many things to think about." Again he took the small hand she extended to him and again it seemed to change miraculously from the hand of Miss Brown into the hand of some delectable princess. He bowed over it as a courtier might have done.

Upon the stairs it was already growing dark, and Christine, mindful of the third step from the top, lighted the lamp and held it so that he might not have to feel his way. When safely past the pitfall he looked back, laughingly, to thank her, but the laugh died on his lips. He put out a blind hand grasping the greasy bannister, for it seemed that he was at home, in the old home of his early youth, and it was Mona who stood there looking down upon him from the dim stair with the lamplight like an aureole round her head.

"Good-bye," called Christine cheerily. The vision faded, and he stood alone upon the dark landing.

CHAPTER XIX.

IT was getting on for supper time in Brook Street when Adam Torrance came slowly out of the House of Windows. An aroma of frying fish was in the air. Through a dirty window, from which the draggled curtain had been jerked aside, he could see the table destined to receive this delicacy; its cloth, white once, was soiled and stained, its edges were ragged, its sprawling crockery ugly and chipped. Mr. Torrance had not seen such a table for many years, indeed he had almost forgotten that such horrors existed. A vision of his own beautiful dining-room came to him, and, mingling with it, pictures of all the dining-rooms to which he was accustomed, their soft light, their pictures, their polished tables, their shining glass and silver and porcelain, their soft masses of flowers, the silent tendance, the delicate food. A sense of angry shock went through him. What was Providence thinking about? What did He mean by allowing people to live in places like this, to eat from tables like that, to be part and parcel, in fact, of Brook Street, and everything which Brook Street stood for?

As he stood there a little child came up to stare at him, and then another and another. They seemed to rise out of the ground and their sole business in life seemed to be staring. Mr. Torrance was irresistibly compelled to return the stare and what he saw surprised him not a little. These children who lived here and ate fried herring were just like any other children. They were dirtier and more ragged, but for the rest they were just little plump, round-faced children with childish eyes.

"Going in to supper, kiddies?" he asked casually, buttoning his glove.

The starers did not seem interested in supper. "Say, are you the doctor?" asked one little fellow curiously.

"I said he ain't," sang out another. "I told you he's the preacher."

"Well, he ain't," echoed a third. "He's a undertaker. Look at his gloves."

This seemed conclusive. They all looked at his gloves.

"I'm afraid you are all wrong," said Torrance, laughing. "I'm the ice cream man. That's what I am."

How the eager eyes searched his face. "Ah, what's yer givin' us?" said one sceptically.

"I keep my ice cream in a store at the corner," said the ice cream man. "You'd better run and get some before it's all gone."

But they were not going to take a big thing like this on trust. Before he knew it two dirty little hands were slipped in his and the remainder of the escort lined up behind.

"You come too," said the spokesman. "They won't give us nothin' unless they sees you."

"You surprise me," he said gravely, "I did not know that the scepticism of the age was affecting the ice cream business."

"Can we get the pink kind?" inquired the spokesman.

"Certainly. If I have any pink kind left. I think I have some left," he added quickly.

The escort gave a faint "Hooray!" quickly checked. They entered the store at the corner in good order. Not for worlds would they have imperiled their promised treat by want of decorum.

"We have come for ice cream," said their conductor. "The pink kind."

"Five or ten-cent dish?" asked the waitress briskly.

A dozen eager necks craned forward.

"Ten-cent, of course!" said the ice cream man.

A long sigh of contentment passed around the circle. He was a really ice cream man after all.

Mr. Torrance's last sight of Brook Street was a dingy ice cream parlor crowded with happy children and presided over by a hard-faced woman, who, for once, seemed strangely human and not above the extravagance of putting an extra peak upon those gloriously pink ten-centers.

"Good-bye, Ice Cream Man!" shouted the children, and it is significant of yet another change in the outlook of this personage that as he waved good-bye, he quite forgot to pity the youngsters or to feel his own manifest superiority in the scheme of creation. "Nice little kiddies," he thought comfortably, as he swung himself on a car, and, chuckling a little, he removed the now soiled gloves of the "undertaker."

In the quiet of his library he thought of it again, and again he chuckled, wondering what Mark would have said had he been there to see. Mark—Mark was almost a child himself. A child longing for something which he could not have—that was why he had been sent away. With an impulse of loneliness he rang the bell and asked if there were any letters.

"No, sir," answered the correct Benson. "That is to say, yes, sir—there is this, sir. It did not come by the regular mail, sir."

"This" was an object upon which any well-regulated servant might look with scorn. It was an envelope of sorts, but so dirty, so dog-eared and so scrawled upon that one did not wonder that the "regular mail" had scorned to deliver it. Lying upon its silver salver it looked like a very bad joke or—a message from the fates.

Mr. Torrance regarded it with disfavor. It was a begging letter, of course, and as such was not his affair. "Give it to Mr. Jones. Tell him to attend to it."

But Mr. Jones, it appears, had attended to the regular mail and had then gone out. There was nothing for it but to open the unsavory communication himself or to wait until Mr. Jones should return. Ordinarily, he would most certainly have waited, would have thought, indeed, no more about it, but the influences of the afternoon were still strongly with him.

Strangely enough, he had no premonition of horror, no foreboding of any sort, as he picked up the soiled thing lying on the salver. We call that sixth sense which sometimes gives us warning of the approach of great or terrible things "strange." But is it not far stranger that these things should steal upon us unawares? Is it not more marvellous that their step should be silent, their approach unheralded? Is it not passing strange that one moment a man may stand facing the future, head up and with a smile, while hidden from him by only a few moments, a few ticks of the clock, is some undreamed-of blow of fate which will bring his life a clattering ruin about his feet.

Adam Torrance opened the soiled letter with a rather tired smile, but with a comfortable feeling in his heart that he was really doing his duty at last. No more shirking of unpleasant things, no more passing over of responsibility to Mr. Jones.

Not until he had the single sheet of paper which the envelope contained spread carefully out beneath his reading lamp did the first dim warning sound. Then some instinct at the back of his self-satisfied brain seemed to stir. "There is trouble here," it telegraphed. A nameless sense of lurking danger awoke, his heart began to beat more rapidly. "Danger, danger!" telegraphed the inward monitor, but its warning was not very loud, and Mr. Torrance himself was conscious only of an unexplained premonition of evil. Carefully and still smiling he adjusted the glasses which he really did not need and read the lines which were to write themselves in black across his world.

"Mr. Adam Torrance. Sir—" he read (the writing looked like that of a bad hand at its best or a good hand purposely made almost illegible.

Where had he noticed the same peculiarity before?).

"You never expected to hear from me again," he read on slowly, "but now the time has come. You thought your baby died, but she didn't. That would have been too good. She's alive all right, and going down to hell like my poor girl that your Stores ruined. My girl was a shop girl. Your girl is a shop girl, too. Where my girl went, your girl is going. When she's lost forever like my girl was I'll tell you. You can have her then if you want. But you can't save her. The end will come soon now. I'll let you know when. Never say one mother didn't get her revenge. To show you I speak the truth I send you her ring."

Mechanically he shook the dirty envelope and there rolled out upon the polished table a baby's gold ring set with a pearl. He knew that ring well. He grasped at it with a choking sound. It rolled away from him, falling, and hiding itself among the rich rugs upon the floor. After staring a moment he fell upon his knees, searching with frantic eagerness—it was such a tiny thing, so easily lost, so frail a thing, so easy to trample under foot. He thought only of the ring, he did not dare to let his thoughts stray from it. There was something else, something horrible—unthinkable—something about the child who had once worn the tiny ring. He dared not think of that—only of the ring.

But the ring, so small, so frail, eluded him—he could not find it.

When, later, the stolid Benson came in with the respectable information that Mr. Jones had returned, he thought that the library was empty. Then suddenly he saw his master lying face downwards among the crumpled rugs upon the floor.

CHAPTER XX.

AGAIN, as if, in defiance of aphorism, history were taking pleasure in repeating itself, the servants in the Torrance house went about with frightened faces. Of the strange seizure which had overtaken the master the night before they had no explanation, but real tragedy brings with it an atmosphere as impalpable yet as penetrating as the air we breathe. Mr. Johnson, the detective, felt it as he sat in the library, waiting. He had scented calamity from the moment of coming into the house, and now Mr. Torrance entered with its history writ large upon his haggard face. As once before upon entering that room, he came slowly, and in his hand he held a scrap of dirty paper; only this time he left no distracted woman upstairs; whatever the burden was, it was one which he must carry alone.

The two men shook hands in silence. Both were thinking of that other meeting and the memory weighed. The detective was the first to recover himself. He cleared his throat delicately.

"Nothing very wrong, I hope, sir?" he said. "You are not looking yourself. Must have had a nasty shock. They tell me—"

"I fainted? Yes. I believe I did. It was very sudden—the shock. But I am quite recovered. Physically I am well, but I cannot answer for my mind if—if something is not done." His firm lips trembled—a bad sign.

"Something shall certainly be done, at once," declared the detective calmly. "As you say, it will be better not to prolong the—the suspense. If you will tell me just exactly how things are." He sat down comfortably and crossed his feet with a show of ease.

"First, do you remember the other occasion upon which your help was needed? Do you remember the details?"

"Certainly. It is my business to do so. Before coming here I looked up the whole case. I keep a full record of all my cases, even such as appear to be settled."

"Ah—yes. Such as appear to be settled. We thought that case was settled—"

"Excuse me," interposed the detective neatly, "you thought."

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that it was you, if you remember, Mr. Torrance, who thought that the case was settled. When you received the letter announcing the death of the child you were convinced that the child was dead. It was a matter of conviction, not of proof."

"I was convinced," said Adam Torrance. "Do you imply that you were not convinced also?"

"For argument's sake we will say that I was, although, as a matter of fact, I am never certain of any death until the law, so to speak, has passed upon the body. This child's body was never found, therefore, speaking from a professional standpoint, I could not go so far as to say that the case was definitely closed."

"That is beside the point. As a matter of fact we both were convinced that the child had been murdered or had been allowed to die in revenge for a real or fancied wrong. What we might have done had we not been so convinced I cannot say. I dare not think. If I should once begin to reproach myself with negligence or too much credulity at that time I should go mad. At present I am still sane and I know that I was blameless in the matter. Let us put it aside if I am to retain my senses."

"I think you are wise," said Mr. Johnson quietly. "Let us begin all over again. You have another letter? I have the first here. I have brought it with me."

The two men placed the slips of paper under the reading lamp side by side. In silence the detective read the scrawled words of the second letter. "My God!" he said.

"Is the writing the same?" asked Mr. Torrance dully. His hand did not shake as he spread the papers out more carefully. They went over them together.

At first glance it could be seen that the paper was different, the ink different, but, allowing for the fact that the second letter was much more shaky than the first, more soiled and more blurred, the writer of them both was undoubtedly the same.

Adam Torrance wiped a cold sweat from his forehead. "That proves it," he said. "I felt that it was the same. Now I know. The same fiend wrote both the letters."

The detective's examination was more minute, but his conclusion was similar.

"It is undoubtedly the same," he declared. "The hand that wrote this second letter is older, and more unsteady with continual drinking or illness—drink, I should say—the paper smells of it. The envelope is poorer, probably the sender is poorer also. The ink is thick and old—like the ink in a bottle seldom used; perhaps a bottle in some third rate eating house or tavern; the pen has been almost past its use. All these things might be feigned, but I am inclined to believe them genuine. If there is anything in the story at all they must be genuine, for the person writing must by her own story be in the depths of poverty and degradation. Yes, I think we must consider them genuine."

"The corner of a crowded street car is as good a place as another for the reading of a letter."

Adam Torrance moistened his dry lips. "And where does that lead us?"

"Nowhere—at present. But it shows us that we must look for our party in the slums, among the very poor."

"The party who wrote the letter?"

"The party who wrote the letter."

"You have not told me what you think of the letter itself—of the truth of its assertions, I mean."

"My dear Mr. Torrance, I do not know what to think. The letter appears to be genuine. It is horrible enough. We must do our best to find the writer."

Again Mr. Torrance moistened his dry lips.

"If the letter is genuine, the assertions stand at least a chance of being true. There is at least a chance that my daughter is alive to-day. That she is a young girl at an age which needs every loving safeguard, that she is somewhere in this city—"

"Now—go easy. You'll break down if you go on like that. Don't imagine. Refuse to imagine. Get down to facts. There may be nothing in this at all. If there is, we will soon find it out. Stick to that. What makes you imagine that she may be hidden in this city?"

"I don't know—a feeling. It came to me last night. The fiend who wrote the letters is here. This letter was delivered by hand, slipped in the letter box. See, it has never been through the mail at all. Would she not in her morbid revenge have the girl under her own eye? Would she not add zest to her revenge by having my daughter within reach of my hand and yet so utterly beyond me? I tell you, Johnson, I believe that, if we find her at all, we shall find her in this city."

"You may be right. The first thing to do is to offer a large reward for information leading to the finding of the person who dropped a letter in the letter box of this house. Money is no object, I suppose? It gives us a chance, for, if the letter-writer did not venture here herself, someone ventured for her. And it will be a queer thing if money will not make that someone speak. Of course, if she brought it herself, we lose that chance. But it is worth taking. You have questioned the servants?"

"Yes, they know absolutely nothing."

"Well, I'll question them again. I'll mention that there is a reward. It may help.

But no persuasions of the bland Mr. Johnson, and no offer of reward could extract from the servants information which they did not have. Whoever had brought the letter had managed to bring it unseen and unheard; some time while the master of the house, in the character of benefactor, had chatted with the sisters at the House of Windows, or while, in the character of ice cream man, he had brought Paradise to Brook Street, a sinister shadow had flitted by, leaving this dreadful thing in its wake.

"They don't know anything," said Johnson, at last. "We will insert the reward in the papers at once. Then we will go through the stores of this city with a sieve. How is it with your own Stores? Any record kept of the family connection of its employees?"

"Yes, there is supposed to be a complete record."

"We'll hope the others are the same. We'll sift them out. We'll investigate all orphans, all adoptions, all households which have anything at all irregular in their families. It can be done quietly and without giving offence. Not until we know the parentage of every girl in every store in the city shall we be justified in concluding that she is not among them."

"But think of the time?"

"With money we can shorten time. It will not be a long job at all if I can have all the help I'll need. The cases needing special investigation will be comparatively few. You yourself are not in touch with any of your employees, I suppose?"

"No. That is, I have not been up until the present. But since my return from abroad I have been personally looking into the management of the Stores. I have met only one family personally. It is a family of three sisters—the name of Brown. The eldest sister is ill, and the youngest sister is taking her place in the Stores. The other sister is—is blind."

"No one else in the family. No adopted child?"

"No."

"Well, that is one family off our list. We will begin at once. The age of the lost child would be sixteen? Is that right?"

"She would be seventeen next May."

"That narrows our search still more. For although it would be unlikely that the child would know her proper birthday, she would probably be aware of her age within the limit of a year. Things look brighter than I had expected. Perhaps the old hag who wrote the letter has given us all the clue we need in telling us that the girl we seek is working in a store. I fancy that she does not mean a small store, such a store as might employ one clerk or two or three. Far more likely the girl is lost in one of our great departmentals, where she is one of a hundred, a tiny spoke, almost lost to sight in turning the immense wheel. That is probably what the woman's own daughter was—stay. It is what she was, for was she not employed in your own Stores?"

He pocketed his notebook and picked up his hat with a brisk air of confidence and, so potent in suggestion, that for the first time since the shock of the letter, Adam Torrance felt something like hope.

"Do not spare money," he said. "Thank God, there is plenty. But you must let me help too. I could not stand the suspense otherwise. And I have telegraphed for Mark—Mark Wareham, my adopted son."

"Oh," said the detective, pausing and darting a keen look at the other. "I did not know that—er—"

"That I had adopted Mark? At least, it is the same thing. He has been like a son to me for years. But, don't mistake—if—if my child is found, no one would rejoice more than Mark."

"Um-m," said Mr. Johnson. "Just so. Let me see—is Mr. Wareham a nephew?"

"No. He calls me Uncle, but if we come down to actual relationship, he is only a distant cousin."

"Independent fortune?"

"None. But you mistake if you think that Mark is mercenary. He is no weakling either, and could at any time make his own way. It has been my will and not by his that he is in the position he is. You will find him as eager in this search as if he were my own son."

The detective snapped his notebook shut again. "Well, I'll take your word for him, and you'll excuse my questions. I don't come across many such disinterested young men—not in my business. Let me know when he arrives and we'll keep him busy. And don't you worry—er—more than you can help. You know," he added awkwardly, "I don't believe that there is anything in that—er—threat, you know. If the young lady is alive it is quite possible that she may be—er—supporting herself. But, bless me, there's no disgrace in that. Lots of young ladies do it. Doesn't hurt them at all; does them good. You can take it from me that there's nothing in the other—er—suggestion."

Adam Torrance shuddered. "How do we know?" he asked. "How can we be sure? Such things have happened. If she is alone and helpless—"

"Now, don't think of it. Such things have happened. But they don't happen anything like they might. If you were in my business you'd be surprised. Yes, sir, you'd be surprised how seldom such things do happen—everything considered. And blood tells. Don't you ever believe but that good blood tells. Yes, sir, I've seen it too often not to know."

The miserable man looked at him gratefully. "Yes, I have thought of that. It is my best hope. Her mother's daughter—surely her mother's daughter—"

"Don't you ever doubt her mother's daughter," said the detective cheerfully. "Wherever she is, she'll pull through."

But as he left the house behind him he looked very grave.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE sun, which in these autumn days was getting lazier each morning, was well up and shining cheerily through the curtains of the House of Windows when Celia woke upon the day which was to see Christine return to the Stores. They had told her about it the night before, and it had seemed to Celia, then, that somehow life had cheated her. Ada and Christine and Tommy had urged, explained, and entreated. They were all against her and, perforce, she had given in. Their victory had been the more easy in that Celia herself had few arguments to support her opposition. She did not herself understand the reason for the stand she had taken, she only knew that she had fought for it, given herself for it, lavished on it every energy of heart and brain. To be defeated at last was bitter. She looked back slowly, heavily, through her sixteen years of struggle and realized how impossible they would have been had it not been for the hope which had upheld her. To give Christine what she had missed herself, to hold back with frail hands the Juggernaut which had crushed her own youth, and to see Christine free, healthful and beautiful. This had been the one sustaining purpose of her life. She had lost all sense of proportion, of course; and when they explained to her that Christine's work at the Stores was but a temporary expedient, she had no real sense of their meaning. She could not realize the calamity as a partial one. To her the fact of Christine's entering the Stores at all was defeat open and avowed.

Yes, life had cheated her. It had whispered to her to work on and on, and then, when the goal was within sight, it had allowed her to be stricken down, drained of strength, a helpless, useless being, too weak to raise a hand to avert the overthrow of her one hope. They had all been so kind, she felt no resentment against anyone, but not one of them had understood. She knew that they considered her unconquerable opposition stubbornly unreasonable—lacking in common sense.

She awoke, to find the autumn sun bright upon the wall and Christine standing before the mirror pinning her pretty hat over her bright hair. Celia could see the face in the mirror thoughtfully smiling. The hat was being adjusted very carefully, with a slow sliding in of the long pins.

Christine gave the hat a last adjusting pat and turned to her.

"Oh, you are awake, dear!" she said, slipping her round young arm under Celia's head, in order to kiss her more thoroughly. "Isn't it a scrumptious morning? I am starting early, so that I may walk all the way. I don't believe they ever have weather like this anywhere else in the world."

Celia managed to smile faintly, but Christine's eyes were sharp enough to see the effort. Immediately she abandoned her idea of walking to the Stores and sat down comfortably upon the bed.

"Cissy," she said, using the old baby name which had been the first word she had ever said. "I don't believe you are a bit resigned in spite of all our efforts. You do not look resigned, so I am going to tell you the other part of my plan. Tommy and I have been talking it over. When you are quite well and have had a good holiday and are strong again, I am going to leave the Stores at once and take a special business course. Tommy is going to lend me the money. I think I am just as proud as you are, dear, and you can trust me that it will be a strictly business proposition. The amount needed will not be large, and Mr. Brindley has guaranteed me a good position as soon as I can take it. Then I can pay Tommy back. We won't insult him by offering him interest, and of course no one could ever pay back his kindness, but, otherwise, we shall be business-like to the last degree. You know, he wants to give me the money to go to the university, but I couldn't take that. The time is too long and the risks too great; but the other proposition seems reasonable. What do you think?"

"Yes," said Celia vaguely. There was no use in disagreeing. But she had no faith in the plan. It would never be carried out. The Stores would see to that. They would never let her go, this ignorant young thing, sitting there so confidently, planning impossible things with level brows and smiling lips.

"Christine," called Ada's voice from the sitting room. "You will be late—"

Celia turned her face away, and Christine, thinking that she wished to sleep, drew the blind quietly and went out.

"You'll have to take the car now, dear," said Ada. (She had all the wonderful time-sense of the blind). "But before you go look at the letter behind the clock. It came yesterday when you were out. It is only a circular, I suppose."

"From the directory, I suppose," said Christine. Her cheeks were flushed and her hand was trembling. The letter had come then, after all.

"Is it a bill?" asked Ada anxiously.

"No, dear,—it's—oh, nothing. I'll take it with me. I must run. Good-bye."

"I must tell her," thought Christine, as she sped down the steps. "I feel like a conspirator. I'll—I'll get Tommy to tell her. No, that would be cowardly. I'll tell her myself. I'll read her the letters. She will enjoy them. There's nothing in them that anyone might not see—only I don't seem to want anyone to have the chance." She laughed in amusement at herself. Somehow the world seemed a specially pleasant place this morning. The crowded car was flooded with autumn sunshine, but she did not realize that it was she herself who brought some of the glory with it. She only noticed tired faces looked up at her brightly, and that one fatherly old gentleman beamed upon her broadly as he made room for her in the corner.

And the corner of a crowded street car is as good a place as another for the reading of a letter. Truly one's toes may be trodden upon and one's hat crushed, but there is something delightfully private about a crowd. One may blush and smile at will, quite hidden by the broad party who hangs upon the strap in front of one.

Christine's letter was shorter this time. Her correspondent frankly confessed a falling off. "I do not seem to be able to write for nuts any more," he wrote despairingly. "I don't know why. I always thought I was rather a dab at writing. And all the time I am thinking such jolly things to say, but when I sit down I can't think of them, 'not if it was ever so.' Thank goodness I shan't have to be here much longer. On Monday we start up the Coast. In another month I'll be back, and then I'm coming East, uncle or no uncle. I have absorbed enough atmosphere and assimilated impressions sufficient to satisfy a cannibal.

"We start up the Coast next week in a tug called the 'Shuswap.' According to Macgregor it is a fine name, and 'byordinar' lucky." No one, he assures me, has ever been lost off a 'Shuswap.' No 'Shuswap' has ever been wrecked, but all have come to a natural end in their beds, or, to be more exact, their scrap-iron heap. All names are either lucky or unlucky, it seems, some much more so. For instance, there are some names which simply fly in the face of Providence and are disciplined accordingly. There is in the harbor, now, a trim looking yacht with shining brass and dainty cabin. It is rumored that she carries silver plate and hand-embroidered linen, but no one will buy her because her name is 'The Davy Jones.' Already she has sent two successive owners to join her namesake in the 'locker.' Macgregor seems to think that it served them right. I suggested that the name be changed, but he shook his head. 'I doubt if there's paint made thick enough to hide a name like yon,' he said. Then he told me tales until I declare he made me wonder if there might not be something in a name, the immortal Bill to the contrary notwithstanding.

"Last Sunday we took out a picnic party on the 'Shuswap.' There were Miss Jane and Miss Marian and pretty Miss O'Hara (and don't forget the O). For men, we had Mr. Rickman and Mr. Macdougal (whose folks in Scotland have a real, live piper to assist digestion, and who is reverenced accordingly), Macgregor and myself. I had an instinct that I was supposed to devote myself to Miss O'Hara, and I did. I don't think it was my fault that I happened to be devoting myself to her in the bow when a big wave came over and soaked us both. It was entirely Rickman's fault, for insisting on steering through the tide-rip in the Narrows without knowing his business. It also was not by any want of devotion on my part that there were no curling tongs on board. I scarcely see how Macgregor and I could have foreseen their necessity; but it is certain that Miss O'Hara appeared to blame me for the whole catastrophe.

"But this was the only unpleasant incident of the day, and even it was not without its good effect. Macgregor, who was gloomy in spite of himself, as he felt uneasy about going 'pleasuring' on the Sabbath, quite cheered up after it. He seemed to think that we had got what was coming to us and could now call quits.

"Vancouver is very American in taking its Sunday lightly. That morning the Narrows were quite gay with bobbing pleasure craft of all kinds, launches, excursion steamers, yachts, and little rowboats with a single sail. Even the water was unruly. But when we had steamed into Howe Sound, Sunday came upon us unawares. It is a wonderful stretch of water, walled in by mountains, dotted with quiet islands. I don't know where all the dancing little pleasure boats went, but in half an hour we had lost them all. Five minutes more and Macgregor and Macdougall were arguing predestination, Marian and Mr. Rickman discussed esoteric Christianity as expounded by Mrs. Besant, Jane and I had agreed that whichever died first was to haunt the other, just to prove that it could be done, and little Miss O'Hara had accepted the fact of no curling tongs with a beautiful and Christian resignation.

Later on, we quoted poetry, though, when it came to my turn, I could think of nothing save

"'Far and few, far and few, are the lands where the jumblies live,
Their heads are green and their hands are blue, and they went to sea in a sieve.'

"Miss O'Hara surprised me by quoting Keats. She does not look like a Keats person. Rickman said he didn't know any but patriotic pieces, but he knew so many of them that he had no call to feel shy. He informed us in many different ways and at much length that in spite of all temptations to belong to other nations he remains an Englishman. And then Macdougall told us about the flowers o' the forest which are a' weed awa'. (Don't know what it means.)

"By this time we were all horribly hungry, so we took the 'Shuswap' in to a place where a single house is perched upon the hillside and partook of soft-boiled eggs and hard-boiled tea with fixings. I never saw anything more peaceful than that place. It had a beach of colored pebbles and water as clear as if it weren't there, a background of pine and cedar, up and up—and a sunset so gorgeous that Macgregor shook his head at it as being too pronounced for a Sabbath evening. As usual, when every prospect pleases, only man was vile. The owner of the house was grumpy. He did not appreciate the peace of his surroundings at all and complained bitterly that things were more lively here before he lost his license.

"Coming home (there were no waves now) Miss O'Hara confided in me that she would like to spend her honeymoon on a tug boat. Steam, she said, was so soothing after the eternal chug-chug of the launches. (Rickman owns a launch.) I said that I felt sure that Macgregor would loan the 'Shuswap' gladly for so laudable a purpose, but the reply did not seem to please her, for she went over and talked to Macdougall about Celtic poetry.

"Have I bored you with all this scribbling. I know that at least I have not said anything that I wanted to say, or that I thought I might be able to say. I wanted to tell you all that I really thought in that peaceful Sunday amid the mountains, but I could not do it. Thoughts seem so pretentious, so pompous, so affected when written down. Are they really so, I wonder, or is it a kind of false shame that keeps us always on the surface, ashamed to speak of deep things, so terribly afraid of provoking a smile?

"When I come East again and you and I meet (as you have promised) shall we discuss anything and everything save the

Continued on page 54

A WEDDING WITNESS

The Story of a Dramatic Ceremonywith Happy Ending

By A. GERTRUDE JACKSON

LOIS EMERSON hesitated as she viewed the only empty place in the train. For one moment a touch of racial pride curled her scarlet lips, then the Christmas spirit filled her heart, and she dropped into the seat with a smile. Its occupants, two Armenian women and a man, scowled openly. The young woman beside her jerked a magnificent mink collar around her neck, and drew back into a corner. She was short, and round, and plump, with a pretty, babyish face in dusky curls, and set with eyes like sloes. Her whole expression was a childish pout, and she turned the gold band on her finger petulantly. The young man, a swarthy, low-browed, weak-faced fellow, whom Lois took to be her husband, called her Anys.

The other woman was taller, older, and consequently more womanly. It came out in their conversation that she was a sister of the little wife. She talked to the man in low whispers, and he met the caress in her tones with covert, adoring glances. At times the girl Anys leaned forward to address them, and their open indifference aroused a smouldering fire in her black eyes. After the first dark looks they ignored Lois completely.

Across the aisle were four deaf and dumb boys, who were apparently telling stories. Their unrestrained merriment touched a chord in Lois' own happy heart, and she almost laughed aloud when they rocked to and fro with laughter. It was four months since Lois had been home, and she was bubbling over with gaiety and good spirits. The Christmas feeling intoxicated her, and her whole soul was aglow with the infectious happiness of it. Then she caught the somber eyes of Anys upon the scarlet rose on her coat, and the smile faded from her lips.

It was her first insight into a world that had been far from her own sheltered girlhood, and it fascinated, while it repulsed her. She marvelled at the youth of the little wife; she marvelled at her indifference to publicity. She wondered who they were, how they lived, and how they happened to be traveling together. The man's hands, though dark-skinned, were soft and well kept. The dress of the two women spoke of wealth and cultured taste. All around them people were laughing and joking. The crowd of young men at the door were teasing each other good-naturedly; there was a smile on the face of the peevish woman in front of them; the tired mother of four restless urchins was giggling like a girl as she shifted the weight in her arms. But back in the corner the pretty face of the Armenian girl was set and cloudy. Lois looked at her wistfully, hoping she would speak, but Anys still twisted the gold band and pouted her already heavy lips. Two crimson spots burned upon her cheeks as she watched the man, whose attention was riveted upon the woman at his side; the latter was showering upon him the subtle flattery so fascinating to a young man when it comes from a woman of maturer years.

The train stopped at last, and Lois drew a long sigh, half relief, half regret, as she picked up her suitcase to change trains. The Armenians were getting their wraps too, but she slipped out quickly. The train for Waverley was not in yet, so she wandered into the little alcove of the waiting-room, and found a quiet corner. She was scarcely settled when in came her companions of the train and seated themselves not far from her.

The woman dropped a jeweled chatelaine on her sister's lap and went off in search of a drink. Anys crept close to her husband and fondled his hand in her own, and touched her cheek against his sleeve lovingly. She said little, but the passionately clinging touch spoke volumes. Lois couldn't stand it. She turned her rocker that she might not see the bored yawns of the foreigner as he submitted indifferently to the caressing fingers.

"I wouldn't be like them," thought Lois, "for all the money on earth, though the money'd come in mighty handy just now." Then she sighed—a very wee one, for she laughed before she finished sighing. A pretty set of fox furs danced before her eyes, but she shrugged her shoulders daintily. After all, it was Christmas, and who could be bothered being sad because one's father happened to be a minister in a little outside city church, where money was a rather scarce quantity? She was going home, too. Even as she smiled at the thought of little Bub at home with his mop of curls, a shadow fell aslant her lap, and she looked up to see the Armenian girl, Anys, standing by the window. Lois looked back slowly towards the man. The woman had returned, and was talking softly to him; he was laughing, and Lois shivered suddenly. Just as the shadow of the proud, little figure at the window had shut out the sunshine, so these people clouded her happiness. Her impulsive little soul ached to throw both arms around the lonesome wife, but decorum and inbred tact forbade it, so she just tapped her rubbered foot impatiently, as she looked up at the slowly-moving cloth.

"Pshaw!" she muttered, as she went to the door to see if there was any train in sight. "You're a great goose, Lois Emerson! The very idea of getting yourself all balled up over affairs that are no business of yours."

The train was coming, but with a schoolgirl's impulse she unfastened the red rose that the girl had looked at so long, and tore back to the window in the alcove.

"I love roses, don't you?" she cried impetuously, laying it on the small, dark hand on the sill. Then she fled, but not too soon to have seen that rare smile light up the gloomy face.

She boarded the train and, to her amazement, a few moments later, she caught a glimpse of the Armenians getting on the same one, but in another coach. A feeling of irritation came over her, but the nearness of home soon dispelled it, and when she rushed off the train at Waverley into Father's arms, the Armenians faded into the oblivion that, sooner or later, is the fate of all clouds.

Talk of clatter! Lois descended on the parsonage like a cyclone, and three small tornadoes were waiting for her. She could not get near Mother, for Bub was clinging to her skirts, and Elsie was showing doll dishes, and when she grabbed up Baby, he beat his new spoon on her head in an ecstasy of joy. Father set down the suitcase, and chimed in laughingly, "Now, Mother, what do you think of this for a quiet, college-bred young lady?"

Mother smiled, but her eyes were suspiciously dim as she kissed the happy face, and took Baby.

"You noisy people!" she laughed. "Don't you know enough to give the poor girl a chance to sit down after such a long trip?"

Lois flung off her coat and caught Mother round the waist. "It's your turn to sit now, Mother. I'll run the shack."

"The shack!" echoed Father in mock annoyance. "The idea!"

Ting-a-a-ling!

"That awful bell!" said Mother. "Hush, children, hush. There's someone at the door."

It was Father who was wanted, and Lois grumbled merrily. "There, Father, some old garrulous thing has come to pour his troubles into your Christmas ear."

"Lois!" reproached Mother gently.

"Oh, well then, Mother, it's Mr. Rich with a turkey, and a new fur coat for Father, and a pig, and a set of Limoges china for you."

The dancing grey eyes were irresistible, and Mother burst out laughing. "Oh, you're a perfect terror, Lois. I laugh more in a day when you are home than in a month when you're away."

"Mmm-mmm-mm," murmured Lois reflectively. "Do you suppose I'd make a fortune if I took out a patent?"

The door opened, and Mr. Emerson put in his head. "A wedding," he said softly. "I'll need you for witnesses, Mother and Lois."

Lois made a dash for the mirror and caught the stray ends that had escaped from the well-arranged masses of brown. As they entered the hall, she caught a glimpse of the bride and groom in the parlor, and stopped with a gasp of dismay. There sat the Armenian and the woman! They were alone!

She advanced into the room, half-dazed, and waited for a look of recognition from them; but they were totally unconscious of ever having seen her before. She drew her hand across her eyes as one awakening from a dream, and, spellbound, watched them stand up together.

"So Anys wasn't his wife, after all," flashed through Lois' brain. Then she remembered the wedding ring upon the girl's hand, and her attitude towards the man.

The woman's dark face was aglow with more than love. Lois closed her eyes to shut out the gleam of the triumphant light in the black eyes. The boy—he was no more—looked ill at ease and restless.

Lois clenched her hands. She looked appealingly at Mother, but her eyes were downcast. What should she do? Did anyone ever hear of interrupting a wedding? And then—maybe it was all imagination! Maybe they were not married!

"If only I could tell Father," thought Lois wildly. He was saying it now—ah—"If anyone among you know aught that should prevent this man and woman being joined in the holy ordinance of matrimony, speak now, or else for ever hold your peace."

Then followed that awful silence. The very beat of Lois' heart cried out to stop, but her tongue was stiff, and refused to move. The deep voice began again. For one instant Lois was again in the alcove of the station, and trying to escape those agonized black eyes. Then an overwhelming flood of sympathy swept away all the barriers of diffidence, fear, convenionality.

"Father, Father!" she cried hoarsely. "Oh, stop! He's got a wife."

The sudden stillness was more appalling than a peal of thunder. Mother was speechless with amazement, and Father looked wonderingly over his glasses. Lois took two quick steps forward, and her hands were outstretched impulsively. "Oh, don't, don't!" she cried again passionately. "Such a dear little wife, with her cheek against your sleeve! Oh, how can you? How can you?"

The boy was sobbing unrestrainedly, but the woman stood with a sneer on her face. Her bitter antagonism was fast changing to disgust. The tears were coursing down Lois' flushed face, and the slight, girlish figure trembled like an aspen leaf, but she did not hesitate.

"Oh, you'll be so unhappy, when it's too late. Oh, I'm so sorry—so sorry. Please, please go to her! Do go quickly! And it is Christmas! Oh, do go!"

With eager hands she pushed them gently towards the door. The woman was silent, but the tears fell softly now from her averted face. The boy caught Lois' hand, passionately, wildly—"Ah, Mees—Mees—"

Lois withdrew it gently. "You will love her," she whispered brokenly. "Always you will be good to her—she is so little—so sad—and—and it is Christmas!"

The door closed. For an instant Lois stood motionless. Then with a swift step she crossed the room and buried her face on Mother's breast. "Mother, oh, Mother!" she sobbed.

"Dear child," murmured Mother, and she stroked the sunny brown head with trembling fingers and a thankful heart.

And among the things that Lois prizes most there lies a letter, written in a childish script and stained by tears. It came by the hand of a little newsboy who said he had been charged to give it to the minister's daughter.

"I know now," it read, "what your Christmas means. It has come to me, too. I hope you will have Christmas all your life. Anys Settissian."

THE TRUE SPIRIT OF CHRISTMAS

A Story of How the Christmas Spirit and Cupid Worked Together

By KATE H. MILES

CHRISTMAS without much money to spend is hard, but Christmas without any of the true spirit of the day is unbearable."

Nancy Langford spoke the words aloud, although there was no one to hear. She was so thoroughly in earnest that she felt she must relieve her feelings by getting some of those heated thoughts off her mind, so spoke them out to the crisp, frosty, December air, through which she was traveling swiftly, settled comfortably in the warm musk ox robes which made the light and daintily built pung a luxurious resting place, and drawn by a spirited little chestnut mare, who seemed to enjoy the pace she was setting over the smooth, well-packed snow of the country road. There seemed no reason, if one could judge by appearances, why the driver of this turnout, herself arrayed in a big fur coat, fur-gauntled gloves, and fur hat with a scarlet wing on its side, should bemoan the lack of that spirit which it seems at this particular season should permeate everybody within the radius of Christianity and the Christmas story. Indeed, one could not discern, even after a careful survey of the attractive face beneath the close fur hat—almost the color of the little tendrils of hair which curled up around its edge—any deep-rooted evidence of discontent or melancholy. It was a serious face, and just now there was a pucker between the golden brown eyes, and a little droop of sadness to the mouth. Yet the eyes observed and twinkled in sympathy with a squirrel who whisked with business-like haste along a fence rail, and the corners of the drooping mouth went up in a smile which sent a glow straight to the heart of the small boy who received it as he stood fastened in his tracks by the snowdrift into which he had plunged and waited for her to pass.

"There are all the Wheelers, or as many as can get near the window," she mused, the droop returning, although she did not forget to wave her hand to the faces in the window, watching so expectantly. "Poor kiddies, they think I'm going to town to buy their Christmas presents, I suppose, and of course they won't be able to understand when they find they have been left out entirely. It seemed the right thing when Mother and I decided that, as we couldn't afford to spend as much money for Christmas gifts as we usually do, we should cut the neighborhood families out of our list. We have saved money and time, for the cooking has been so much less with only our own family to consider; but we've lost, I know we've lost so much more happiness than the actual reducing of household expenses can ever repay. I know Mother isn't satisfied, and I'm actually sorry I have to go to town—and it's the day before Christmas."

Soliloquizing along this line, Nancy let her little mare dash over the smoothly-frozen road at its own pace and they were soon opposite the town which lay stretched along the bank of the broad river, whose covering of pure and glistening crystals was sparkling and glittering in the sunlight. She guided the lively little beast down the bank, then sighed deeply.

"It's a beautiful world and ideal Christmas weather. I must try and catch some of the right spirit which insufficient attention or something has failed to develop in myself."

She did her best to keep the pucker from her forehead and the droop from the corners of her mouth, but it was hard to set these mood vanes for fair, when, after leaving her horse at a stable and finishing her few last-minute errands, she wandered through the busy, good-natured crowds in the shops and saw the toys and books and inexpensive gifts in such quantities—and the poor little Wheelers were waiting and watching so hopefully.

"Oh, you poor kiddies," she thought in despair. "Why are you so many? I couldn't get one little gift for each and have a parcel worth while without the candy and cookies and other things which I haven't got home."

Things before the golden brown eyes grew misty, so their owner was startled when a voice at her elbow spoke her name.

"Hullo, Miss Nancy? Up to your eyes in shopping?"

She managed to smile at the big broad-shouldered fellow who had worked his way to her corner, and she hoped he did not notice the droop and the lack of cheerfulness. His glance seemed to rest on something satisfying to its owner, and his expression would lead one to believe that there was no lack in what he had found.

"Not half as far up to my eyes as I would like to be," she confessed in a tone which plainly implied that there was more to tell.

Nancy knew this man, Harold Binney, the young manager of one of the local banks, very well, as she did all the eligible young men about town, but she was surprised at her feeling of pleasure in this encounter and at her sudden desire to pour out to him her tale of woe.

"I never heard a lady make a remark like that before. You arouse my curiosity, for, strangely enough, I was just thinking along this very line—wishing I knew of some poor young beggars who would appreciate a few pennies spent on them. That's the real Christmas idea in my mind—not this empty meaningless exchange of obligations. I have just got away from the bank and I've been wishing I had some real Christmas shopping to do. Was that your idea—sighing for suitable subjects for your efforts? I dare say we can find some if we go about it properly."

Nancy's golden brown eyes were clear and direct and sparkling as she gazed at the pleasant face above her in a speculative fashion as though debating whether or not she would speak.

"I see you've got something on your mind, Miss Nancy, so can't you share it? If you know of someone who will fill the bill for our Christmas philanthropic efforts, it's your plain duty to confide in me. If you will you'll be distributing kindness in more than one direction."

"I believe," said Nancy slowly and uncertainly, "I believe I'll tell you about the Wheelers."

"Good for you. I knew you had a good card. Tell me about the Wheelers by all means, and while you are telling me can't we test that shopper's lunch which the 'Palms' people advertise?"

A very few minutes had wrought a marvellous change in Nancy's feelings. Her poor little Wheelers were looking and longing for a share, a wee tiny share, of Christmas; this big-hearted and big-bodied man was anxious for a suitable opportunity to show his faith in the season's teaching. Surely it would be right for all concerned that she should unburden her heart. Thus she reasoned as they worked their way up the crowded street, chatting gaily, and noting now and again, with newly-aroused interest, some special figure in the throng, which touched them with its unconscious joy or pathos. An old man, poorly clad and bent with age and rheumatism, stumping along with a cane, brought a lump to Nancy's throat when she saw the brightness of his face and the smile of interest and admiration he cast, as she and her attendant passed close by. When she saw a group of happy youngsters standing entranced before a Santa Claus, who was performing in a shop window, her heart warmed towards the would-be patron of her un-Santa Claused ones.

"And now for the Wheelers," smiled her companion across the little table as they waited for the shoppers' luncheon of baked beans and brown bread and aromatic coffee.

"It's rather hard to tell you all about it," confessed Nancy, looking out of the window with unseeing eyes, "but I'll have to try or you won't understand." Bravely, with now and then a little glance of appeal for sympathy at the silent and interested listener, she told of the necessity for lessening the Christmas expenses and of the doleful result as far as the Wheelers were concerned.

"I didn't even make some cakes and candy for them, and I just can't bear to think of their disappointment. I have known all week that something was wrong and to-day it came to me in full force what it was."

"Thanks," said the man simply when she had finished her story. "I'll show my belief in your true spirit by saying I'm glad your Wheelers are unprovided for, and glad and grateful for the opportunity you are giving me. Let's eat something and then make a list of the entire Wheeler family with suggestions for gifts for each. Why, the prospect of some real Santa Claus work gives me an appetite that makes these beans look good to me."

Nancy was happy, and when Binney produced pencil and notebook and bade her begin with a list of possibilities from which they might later choose a reality for the Christmas pleasure of Mrs. Wheeler she gave herself over to the joy of the task. Through the family they went, from Miss Valerie Wheeler, aged fifteen, whose name struck awe to her fairy godfather, down the seven steps to Nancy, the baby of two years.

"Nancy," murmured Binney absent-mindedly, as he wrote the name, "brown eyes and hair with real live gold in them. Nancy must have something crimson, roses perhaps."

"If you could see little Nancy's auburn curls you would shudder at the thought of crimson," laughed the possessor of the red-locked one's name. "A nice, comfortable, unbreakable dolly will make Nancy the happiest baby in the land. You don't know what a fine thing you are doing."

"I know what a fine time I am having," he retorted. "All I regret is that this afternoon must end. I've got to spend Christmas in a boarding house, refused three dinner invitations, and just decided to stay by myself and be miserable. Do you wonder I'm eager to seize the only bit of real Christmas which is coming my way?" Then, looking at his watch, he said reluctantly, "I suppose we must go and begin on Mother Wheeler, for it will take time to shop this afternoon."

"Yes, and I must get home in time to make those cakes—I'm going to do it even at this late date. Thanks to you the Wheelers will have their Christmas yet."

"All thanks is to you," he reminded her, "but, I say, can't you do without the cakes? We'll buy enough sweets to make the whole family sick."

"I must call Mother up," she said, as they made their way back to the shops. "I'll speak to her about the cookies. I'll leave you in the toy department and then we won't be wasting time."

On Nancy's return from the telephone booth she discovered the busy Binney on all fours on the floor, quite oblivious of the crowds, explaining to an entranced youngster of diminutive stature, the intricate mechanism of a toy engine.

"I'm sorry," he explained sheepishly when aware of his companion's presence, "I had to wait until you came back. I couldn't decide such a momentous question on my own responsibility. What is your good news?"

Nancy's eyes proclaimed wonderful things, and her smile endorsed the announcement.

"Why," she said, interpreting those signals of joy, "Mother has been cooking all day, she couldn't bear not to have any mince pies and Christmas cakes to give away. And she and Dad want you to come down and spend Christmas with us."

Binney wondered swiftly what part of the pleasure in her face he might take as his share in the matter. Aloud, he said, "Really? I say, that's awfully nice of your mother. Do you think I ought to accept the invitation?"

"Why, of course. If I hadn't thought so, I wouldn't have told Mother about you. You know you can help me take the parcels to the Wheelers to-night after the kiddies are in bed."

If Harold Binney was a bit disappointed by the frank unconcern of her reply, the thought of the walk under the Christmas Eve stars comforted him.

"I can't refuse such a chance. I'll go with pleasure."

"Now we must get to work," reproved Nancy in her most business-like tone.

Like two children they attacked that list and worked their way through it, not without much hard thinking and planning, for Nancy insisted on being practical as regards the amount Binney should spend, and was so considerate of the individual tastes of each of the subjects in hand that they were involved in many complicated questions. At last they were through. Baby Nancy's rag doll of prodigious size had been purchased. Binney had gone for his bag and returned, laden with a big box of flowers—crimson of course—and a basket of sweets. The little mare had been brought out, fresh and eager for the return trip, the parcels were stowed away with that necessary overflow of the larger ones from under the sides of the robes, which seems so characteristic of the season, and they were started for home.

Binney drew a deep breath as Nancy, having skilfully guided her frisky trotter past a big team and down the river bank in a breakneck fashion, shook the lines and they dashed across the expanse of white, now touched with the last ray of lingering daylight towards the west, and marked with the first shadow of abrupt twilight in the east, which lay far down, down, down that seemingly endless stretch of lifeless silence.

"I believe we'll go down the river," Nancy decided, suddenly, pulling the mare into a road which branched off from the one they were following. "The Wheelers won't see us pass if we go this way."

"It seems a shame to break into this long white line," Binney observed.

"Yes, but there is always a never-ending stretch ahead," his companion reminded him, and so he found it, for when they turned up a bank, which, to Binney, seemed an unmarked spot in an unbroken line of snowbank, there it went, on and on, now drawing the mantle of quietness and mystery more closely over it. There was something unreal to the city-bred man in this expanse and silence and he did not shake the spell of it from him until the lights of the rambling old farmhouse flashed a welcome to them and Nancy's father shook his hand and bade him be at home.

The farm kitchen, alive with light and warmth and satisfying odors, the hospitable dining-room and the table with its abundance of dainties, the whole house charmed Binney, and seemed a fitting setting, he thought, for the girl who had been revealed to him that day. And when, later, they trudged happily along under the stars, laden with the Wheeler's Christmas joy, the spell of the charm was still on him.

Quietly they crept to the back door of the little house, from whose windows all the expectant faces had vanished. Nancy tapped gently, and the door was opened quickly. It was good to see the expression of relief and pleasure which came to the face of the worn, patient-looking woman.

"Come in, Miss Nancy," she said in a subdued voice, lowered as if to avoid wakening some sleeper in the adjoining room.

Continued on page 58

The Flight of Philip's Pigeons

The Story of Some Wayward Pets

By NELLIE E. McCLUNG

PHILIP was a boy of ten years, with a generous growth of freckles and a loving heart. Most people saw the freckles, but it was only his mother who never lost sight of his affectionate nature. So, when one warm spring day, Philip sat moodily around the house, she was ready to listen to his grievance, for an air of gloom shadowed the cheerfulness of the spring freckles.

"I want something for a pet," said Philip. "I have no dog, or cat, or anything!"

"What would you like the best of all?" his mother asked, with the air of a fairy godmother.

"I want pigeons," said Philip. "They're so soft and white and pretty, and they lay eggs, and hatch young ones."

All his gloom had vanished. "What will a pair cost?" said his mother, who was a business woman.

"Twenty-five cents. Out at Crane's they have millions of them. I can walk out for them. It's only five miles."

His mother produced the money and Philip was ready to start on the instant.

"Where shall we put them when you bring them home?" she asked.

Philip's suggestion that they could share his room until he got their house built was promptly rejected; but Philip's father, interviewed in private by Philip's mother, agreed to nail a box on the end of the stable.

It was Saturday morning, and a beautiful day of glittering April sunshine. Philip was back at tea time with the pigeons, tired but happy. It seemed there had been some trouble about catching them. The price of twenty-five cents was for raw, uncaught pigeons, but Philip had succeeded, and brought back two beauties, one with blue markings, the other almost pure white.

The path of true love never ran smooth: difficulties were encountered at once. Philip put a generous supply of straw in one end of the box for a temporary resting place for the pigeons, but when he put them in they kept turning round and round as if they were not quite satisfied, and Philip was afraid they were not pleased with their new lodging. Then Philip had one of those dazzling ideas, which so often led to unpleasantness with the other members of the family.

He made a hurried visit to his sister Rose's room. Rose was a grown-up young lady of twelve.

When he came back he brought with him a dove-grey chiffon auto veil, which was much favored that spring by the young ladies in Rose's set for a head protection instead of a hat. Rose's intimate friend, Hattie Matthews, had tied a knot in each side, which caused it to fit very artistically on Rose's head. Philip took out the knots and draped it over the straw and was speechless with admiration over the effect. They looked so "woozy," he said.

In the innocence of his heart, he rushed in to get his sister Rose to rejoice with him.

Rose's language was dignified but plain, and the pretty sight was ruthlessly broken up. Philip's mother, however, found an old pale blue veil of her own, which was equally becoming to the pigeons, and all was well, for the time. It was Philip's mother who proposed a Pigeon Book, and a very pleasant time was spent making it. Not a common book, bought for money, but one made by loving hands.

Several leaves of writing paper were used, and stiff yellow paper for the cover, the whole fastened together with pale blue silk. Then Philip printed on the back of it, "Philip Brown, Pigeon Book," but not in any ordinary plain little bits of letters. Every capital ended into a feather and was topped off with an arrow, and even each little letter had a blanket of dots, and the result was very gratifying.

The first entry was as follows, April 7th:

"I wocked out to Cranes, and got 2 fan tales. I payed 25 scents.

"My father put a box on the stable for me, and I put them in on bed of straw. They are bootiful. My sister Rose would not let me have her vale, but I got a prettier one, blue. They look woozy."

On Sunday Philip declared he could not go to Sunday School—he had not time; but his mother agreed to watch the pigeons, and so his religious obligations were not set aside.

Monday he made a roost, planing it smooth with sandpaper to prevent slivers in their feet.

Monday, after four, the Browns' back yard was full of boys, inspecting Philip's pigeons, not merely idle onlookers, but prospective buyers, as shown by the next entry in the Pigeon Book.

"I sold a pare to-day to Wilfrid Garrett. He can't get them till July."

Underneath this entry, in better writing than Philip's, there was an entry, made by his brother Jack—fourteen years old:

"This is called 'selling pigeons short.'"

Philip's friends told him many and varied things that were good for pigeons to eat. He did his best to supply them all, so far as his slender means allowed. He went to the elevator for wheat, he traded his jackknife for two anaemic heads of squaw corn, which were highly recommended for pigeons, by an unscrupulous young Shylock, who had just come to town, and needed a jackknife. His handkerchief, pencils, and scribblers mysteriously disappeared, but other articles made their appearance, a small mirror to hang on the wall of their house, which Gordon Smith said would make them more contented, and seeing as it was Philip who wanted it, he was willing to sell at a sacrifice—two lead pencils and a rubber. There also appeared a swing out of a bird cage, which was duly put in place. It was too small for the pigeons, but there were going to be little ones, weren't there? Four sunflower seeds, recommended and sold by a mild-eyed little Murphy girl, who had the stubby fingers of a money-maker. Philip wanted her to take it out in eggs, but Miss Murphy expressed a preference for currency. Philip thought it just as well to make no entry in his book of these transactions.

His youngest brother, Barrie, began to be troublesome, about this time, and showed an unwelcome interest in the pigeons. The ladder which was placed against the stable under their house at first had seemed too high to climb, but, seeing the multitude of spectators, who went up and down without accident, he tried it too, and so successfully that he was able at last, after a few attempts, to carry a stick up with him, stand on the rung, and poke up the pigeons.

One day he was caught with the goods by Philip himself. So indignant was Philip that for a moment he stood speechless. His young brother, jarred by a guilty conscience, came hastily down the ladder, raising a bruise or two on his anatomy in his descent. He sat on the ground and reflected. In his infant soul he felt that it was a just punishment. Nothing was said about the affair. Philip felt that the claims of justice were met. The only really dissatisfied parties were the pigeons.

The next Sunday in Sunday School, Barrie quoted the golden text, with a slight variation. "At the last, it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like a ladder."

Only Philip knew what he meant, and he said it served him good and right.

The following entry appeared in the Pigeon Book:

"My brother barrie poks them, but he's got his lesson. To-morrow I'll let them out, there fond enuf of home now I guess."

The next day being Saturday, the pigeons were let out, and Philip's heart was torn with hope and fear. They looked so beautiful, circling and wheeling over the stable, and then away across the road. The pride of possession thrilled him, but a chill fear of their never returning kept him in suspense all day.

The Pigeon Book showed this entry:

April 14.—"I let them out and they came back. There a pritty site."

April 15.—"I dreem about them every nite. I have to dreems. My good dreem is theve layd. My bad dreem is about a tom cat and to piles of fethers, its horrid."

April 16.—"I sold another pare to-day. I have razed the price. This pare will be delivered in August. I gave them a bran mash to-da, it makes them lay."

Under this in Jack's writing were the words:

"Thinking of the August delivery."

Then the entries went on:

Aug. 20.—"Wilfred is pritty meen, he thinks he's smart. They ain't goin' to lay all in a hurry."

It seemed that the last statement was true. They were not. In spite of bran mashes, pepper, cotton batting nest, and tender care, they refused even to consider laying.

Philip was quite satisfied with them, as they were, if they would only stay with him, but the customers, who had bought and paid for very handsome young fowl, were inclined to be impatient, and even unpleasant when the two parent birds were to be seen gadding around the street at all hours, utterly regardless of their young master's promises.

Philip learned to call them. "Cuta-cuta-coooo, cut-acutacoo," could be heard up and down the street. Sometimes they seemed to come for his call, and then his joy was full. More often they seemed to say, "Cutacutacoo yourself," or some such saucy words, and fly farther away.

A rainy day came, when Philip had had them about two weeks. He came home from school to see how they were, and put in the morning fixing an oilcloth over their house. The pigeons were out, as they usually were now. At night they came home and ate their supper, much to Philip's delight. As they grew more and more independent of him and stayed away for longer periods, it seemed to him that he could not do enough for them. He changed their bed every day, he gave them fresh water, and washed their water dish twice a day.

One night they didn't come home. Philip's "Cutacutacoo" brought no answering call. He beggared himself of alleys and marbles to hire boys to help him to look. He even dared the town constable by staying out after the curfew rang, looking and asking. No one had seen them.

Through the night it rained, a cold cruel rain, or so it seemed to the little wideawake boy. He stole quietly out, afraid that he would be sent back to bed, but no one heard him but his mother, and she understood. It was dark and lonesome outside, but love lighted his way. He crawled up the ladder, hoping to find them. The straw, the cotton batting, the blue veil, and the water dish were there, but no pigeons.

Philip came back to bed. His feet were wet and cold, and he couldn't keep back the tears.

His mother, who had heard him going out, and who understood, called to him softly and sympathized. She said they were safe enough with some flock of pigeons; they would come back when they were hungry, and the rain would not hurt them, and be sure to wipe his feet.

The next day they were found across the street with another boy's pigeons, unconcerned as you please. Philip gave his Lost Heir game to the boy to help him catch them the next night when they were roosting. He shut them up then for a few days. The Pigeon Book would have been neglected only for his mother, who said it was only right to put in the bad as well as the good. That was the way of all stories, she said.

Philip wrote:

"They went awa and staid all night. I gess they were lonesome. I don't no why they don't like me. I like them."

When his mother read that she said, "Poor little fellow," and made pancakes for tea.

In a few days he let them out again. This time he was almost in tears.

They did not hesitate a minute, but flew straight down the street to the place they had been before, to the place where the people often made pies out of pigeons, and were not ashamed to say so.

Philip followed them, with a set little face.

"Say, Phil," the boy of the house called to him, "you might as well sell them to me. I'll give you ten cents each for them. They'll never stay with you. We've got about a dozen now. I'm goin' to sell a bunch of them to the hotel."

With difficulty Philip answered:

"No, Jerry, I won't sell them, but I'll give them to you if you promise not to kill them." He was watching them as they circled so gaily over his head. they were so lovely and so dear. His chin was quivering, but Jerry did not notice.

Jerry was astonished, but being a business man closed the deal at once.

The Pigeon Book was put away.

One day his mother came across it, in Philip's drawer. She found a final entry:

"I gave them away—they seem to be happy."

Then there was a smear on the paper and below it these words:

"They are ongratefull broots!"

Just WHY

Old Dutch Cleanser

Is a

Pure Hygienic

Cleanser For

Cutlery

& all

Food Utensils

Because the Cleanser is entirely free from Acid, Caustic and Alkali. It is mechanical in its action—avoid dangerous chemical cleansers.

Wash steel knives and forks, etc., then sprinkle a little Cleanser on a damp cloth and rub over a few times. Wash again and wipe dry. This is a great improvement over the old-style scouring brick.

Many Other Uses and Full Directions on Large Sifter-Can, 10c

AROUND THE HEARTH

Written for the Canadian Home Journal

By JENNIE ALLEN MOORE

"For somehow, not only at Christmas,
But all the long year through,
The joy that you give to others
Is the joy that comes back to you."

CHRISTMAS 1911

INSTEAD of my usual Christmas talk, I am going to give the readers of my page a little story, founded on fact, hoping it will carry its moral alike to men and women, whose lack of sentiment dulls the lives of their families and friends. Those who have read my former Christmas articles, know that I regard much of the giving at that season as an imposition on mind and purse, yet firmly believing in it as a family institution, making a bright spot in each year by the bestowal of some necessary, useful or ornamental gift, that one has longed for, and which rouses all that is tenderest in the family life and affections. It seems a fitting climax for the year, to banish for a time self-interest, and lavish some thought on husband, wife, and children, with such relatives as are needy, and upon "the poor, whom we have with us always."

Many readers will not be able to understand the vastness of the great West, where neighbors are miles apart, and which made it possible for those little children to be unacquainted with Santa Claus, but the Western folk know, and the distance, with the painful silence between the parents on this one subject, made the conditions as they happened to exist when the tale was told to me. Wishing all the readers of our CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL a very Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, I submit my little Christmas story.

"MOTHER, oh, Mother!" shouted little Georgie Holden, not quite seven, as he bounded into the house from school, "Say, Mother, who is Santa Claus? All the boys and girls say he is coming at Christmas, and he fills their stockings with toys, and nuts, and candy, and everything. Only they must go to bed early, and leave them hanging, and he comes down the chimney, and out of a big pack, he takes the dolls, and drums, and things. Tell us about him, Mother, 'cause I saw his picture in a paper one of the boys had; say, he looks jolly, and has a red face and white whiskers."

Mrs. Holden smiled at her little boy's enthusiasm, and Nettie, and little three-year-old Billy-boy stood at her knee, looking from her face to Georgie, flushed with his wonderful nerve, all eager to hear what her answer would be.

"Tell us what else they said about this jolly old man," she said, in order to give herself time to frame her reply.

"Oh, I can't remember all the boys and girls said, but they can scarcely wait, and they must hang clean, clean stockings with no holes in, else the candy would drop out, and the presents are all mixed in with the goodies, and, oh, say, won't we have a dilly time? And he caught the two eager-eyed little ones in his arms, and hugged them tightly. The laugh awakened baby sister in her cradle, and her rosy cheeks and cute smile brought them all to their knees beside her.

"P'raps he'll bring baby a kitty," said Nettie, "oh, come on, Georgie, and tell us every word."

So Georgie, who felt quite a hero, carried baby to mamma, and looked quizzically into her face, for he noticed an expression of sadness there. "Mother, did you ever hear of him before? Did he live when you were a little girl?"

She smiled. "Oh, you do know about him. Tell us, please, Mother."

AWAY back over the years her memory swept, and she was hanging her stockings by the old fireplace along with seven other pairs. She was snuggling down beside her little sister, talking in whispers, guessing what the morning would reveal. The country was new, and money was scarce, but the week before Christmas there was always a journey to the nearest town, and always a mysterious box which mother slipped out of sight very suddenly, and its contents came to light when sixteen little hands trembling with delight, emptied the bulging and unshapely stockings early in the morning of the glad day.

How pleased they were with the simple gifts, and the sweetmeats, the candy animals and the walking sticks,, and a big rosy apple in each stocking to fill up! Then the new mittens that mother somehow managed to knit when they were in bed or at school, and a delicious plump doughnut that was irresistible, and kept the little ones wondering when others that looked and tasted just like them appeared on the table during Christmas week. Then as they grew older, and prosperity came to them, there was the bestowal of richer gifts to each other, and she remembered her father pinning a pretty cameo brooch on mother, telling her he wished it was made of diamonds for she was worthy of the best. She saw again the glad look in her mother's face, as he kissed her, and held her close to him, and how she had wondered why her eyes filled with tears.

The old memories held her silent, as she recollected the one great pleasure of the year—the sleigh ride—when big and little were all bundled into the big sleigh, half filled with straw, and warm, woollen quilts were tucked around them. Father and mother, with the youngest between them, or on mother's knee, occupied the seat in state, and were protected by the one "buffalo skin," occasionally turning to ask, "Are you all warm, children?"

Then she married and went West, away out on a lonely ranch, a childless couple being their nearest neighbor on the one side and an old bachelor on the other. The first Christmas a box full of presents was sent, and the two lonely young hearts, so far from their friends were gladdened because they were remembered. The next year she lay at death's door, with a little wailing infant in her arms, and two more anniversaries followed without much notice being taken, for times were hard, and it was a struggle to keep going. Then little Georgie was three years old, and Nettie one, and the nice box that appeared annually, arrived as usual. She hung the little stockings that year, and put in the presents to the little ones, the little red boots, the picture book, and woolly dog, and told the happy little fellow that Santa Claus had put them there. He was too young to remember about that day, and the stockings were never hung again. Away out on the prairie, there was one house where Christmas passed as uneventful as other days, except that a goose or turkey graced the table, and the old bachelor was invited to dinner.

"MOTHER, what are you thinking about, that your eyes look so big, and you won't answer us?"

"How would it be if I told you about Santa Claus at bedtime?" she asked. "Run away, now, and have a little play, while I get tea ready."

Then she laid her head upon the table and cried, great sobs that rent her heart. When the storm had passed, she dried her eyes, placed baby in her chair, saying, "Mother's lovey, some day perhaps we can have a Santa Claus."

Then she prepared the supper, and wondered why her husband did not come in, sending Georgie to the barn in search of him. Presently he appeared, not from the outer door, but emerged from the front room, a peculiar look on his face. "Are you ill, James," Mrs. Holden asked anxiously.

"No," he said, "I was all done out shaking those heavy sacks, so I dropped on the couch for a few minutes' rest, and fell asleep."

Yes, that was what happened, but the children's voices and chatter had roused him, and he listened to all that was said. Then he witnessed the heartbroken wife, as she wept bitter tears by herself, and memory began its work. For an hour and more, a stinging remorse had lashed him. What sort of a husband and father had he been? He recalled the morning when Georgie had said in his childish prattle, "See, Daddy, see my pretty red boots, Santa Claus gave them to me."

"No such thing," he retorted, "your auntie May sent them to you," and turning to his wife, he said in an angry tone, "What's the use of filling a child's mind up with a lot of that silly twaddle?" Then he had gone out to see his dead thoroughbred colt, and indulge in the bitterness of its loss, and which had led up to the stage of irritability that made the little lips quiver, and baby eyes fill with tears. It led up to something else also, for as Mrs. Holden held the repulsed baby heart close to her own, she made a resolve, and she had kept it—no more stockings ever were hung up on Christmas Eve.

He determined he should hear the story that night, and consequently prepared to write some letters, but kept a listening ear to the merry voices in the kitchen. Presently they all went upstairs, closing the stair door behind them. He softly opened it, and sat with bated breath hearing the old, old story of Christ born in Bethlehem, the little babe in the manger, and the questions the eager little ones put to her showed at what high pressure their young minds had attained listening to the wonderful tale. Then they must know all her experiences of Santa Claus, and she went back to the days of her childhood, and told them the joys of finding her stockings full on Christmas morning, and what a happy day it always was for them, and how they looked forward to it the whole year round.

"AND now dearies, say your prayers and jump into bed." Georgie knelt a long time, kissed mother good night, and was very quiet. Nettie knelt at her knee, and asked God to bless everybody, then added, "And dear Jesus, send Santa Claus to us this Christmas. We want our stockings filled, too, and don't forget our mamma's and daddy's, and our baby's little ones, for Jesus sake. Amen."

"I want a little dog," said Billy-boy, "that wuns on wheels." The door below closed as softly as it had been opened, and Mr. Holden was busy with his letters when his wife descended the stairs, set the lamp on the table, and picked up a little blue slipper, upon which she worked quickly and silently. Her thoughts were a medley, and at times she sighed unconsciously; then again her lips closed firmly, and a set look appeared on her usually placid face. Nothing was lost to her husband, who watched her furtively as he pretended to write. He would have given worlds to hear her say, "James, let us give the children the merry Christmas they deserve after being cheated out of it so long." But she never spoke, her mind seemed elsewhere, and he felt very much alone. Not for one instant did he falter in placing the fault at his own door; he had repulsed her warm loving heart in an angry temper, and she had closed it effectually on this one point. It was his to make the advance, but how? She seemed so invulnerable that it would be like storming a fortress to break down this barrier of his own making. A thought struck him; he wrote on thoughtfully until the clock struck ten.

Christmas was drawing nearer, and the children talked scarcely of anything else, asking questions of both parents. Sometimes Mrs. Holden looked anxiously at her husband, lest he should dampen their childish anticipations with a rude awakening, but he usually evaded the direct question, and smiled indulgently while she kept her own counsel, asking no favors for the day, but was ever ready to help on the happy delusion. In a locked drawer was a gift for each of her own making, and she had sent with her neighbor for a picture book, a china cup and saucer, a little tin horse and cart, and a rattle. With the gifts that were sure to come from the East, she meant that her children should not be disappointed. The battle was on, and whether she faced opposition or no was a small matter in her present mood.

Continued on page 52

A DECEMBER LUNCHEON

PREPARED BY

MARY H. NORTHEND

THE season of jollity which comes with the Christmas holidays gives ample excuse to the hostess who would exercise the good old privileges of hospitality.

Holly and evergreens make the best possible decorations. Since the holly must be purchased by most of us, it is a good business investment to buy the artificial variety, which is very beautiful and can be used year after year.

A Santa Claus table is very satisfactory. In our illustration, the children's genial benefactor is represented sliding down a snow hill, as the central feature. White cotton, plentifully sprinkled with sparkle, is used in this construction, and a wreath of holly encircles its base, outside of which burn Christmas tapers in crystal sticks. The sled is a toy affair of wood. Santa's costume should be furtrimmed, and as fantastic as desired, not forgetting his pack of toys.

The place cards are set in sprigs of holly, the favors are bonbonnieres in the shape of red sleds, decorated with a sprig of holly and a lighted taper. Large crystal candlesticks hold white candles, having paper shades bound about with a wreath of holly. If preferred, red candles and tapers could be used, and the shades and place cards decorated with hand-painted holly patterns.

A suggestive menu is given below, to furnish some assistance to the Christmas hostess, who has so many other plans in mind that help is grateful.

Chicken Soup
Salmon in Rice Border
Chicken au Gratin
Duchess Potatoes
Olives
Tomato Cream Salad
Raspberry Jelly
Christmas Cake
Coffee

CHICKEN SOUP.—Cut up a chicken, put into kettle and cover with cold water, salt to taste, and cook two or three hours; skim off scum and add one small onion, one tomato, two sprigs of celery, one of parsley and one of thyme. Put two bay leaves, three whole peppers, two allspice and two cloves in cheesecloth bag, boil for one hour and strain, cool and skim off fat. Make a batter of one beaten egg, a pinch of salt, and flour enough to allow batter to drop from a fork in the form of strings into the soup. Cook twenty minutes. Before serving add four tablespoons of cream, but do not let boil after adding cream. Sprinkle just a shade of celery salt on the soup after serving. Serve with toasted crackers and celery as a relish.

SALMON IN RICE MOLDS.—Pack hot boiled rice in buttered molds, turn out, and after scooping out the centres, fill the cavities with coarsely chopped salmon. Arrange on a dish with buttered peas, garnish with stuffed olives and lemon, and serve hot with cream sauce.

CHICKEN AU GRATIN.—Left over bits of chicken may be combined with onions to form an appetizing luncheon dish. Peel the onions, cut off the tops and scoop out a portion of the centre. Parboil in salted water, drain and place in an earthen baking dish after filling the cavities with the chicken finely chopped and seasoned, and covering the tops with bread crumbs. Dot with butter, moisten well with milk, and bake until tender.

DUCHESS POTATOES.—Beat the yolk of one egg till thick, add two tablespoons of cream and stir in two cups of seasoned mashed potatoes. Shape in pyramids, brush with the white of an egg beaten slightly with a spoonful of milk, and bake in a quick oven until golden brown.

SANTA CLAUS TABLE

CHICKEN AU GRATIN

TOMATO SALAD

CHRISTMAS CAKE

TOMATO CREAM SALAD.—Arrange slices of tomato in glass serving dish and put on ice. Take half pint of cream, beat with fork until smooth, add one teaspoon of salt, pour over tomatoes and let stand on ice one hour before serving RASPBERRY JELLY.—Strain canned raspberries through cloth. To each pint of juice allow a pint of sugar. Put juice over the fire and bring to the boiling point. Boil for fifteen minutes. In the meantime, melt the sugar in a saucepan. Put the two together, boil for five minutes, and begin to try. When done, remove from fire, and fill into molds.

CHRISTMAS CAKE.—Make any good mixture and bake in ring mold. When cool frost with vanilla icing. Decorate the sides with stockings cut from citron, and adorn the top with strips of citron and tiny red candies to simulate holly berries. In the centre stand a cardboard figure of Santa Claus.

The Endive

A WRITER in that excellent English publication, The Table, says concerning this vegetable:

The endive comes as a welcome salad when lettuce begins to fail. In summer it is used as an agreeable change in rotation with the lettuce bed, and for a summer salad, it is sown as far back as April, just when the winter bed of it begins to fail.

Very hardy is the endive and deserving of a good corner in the garden. It is sown again in June for autumn salads, and at the end of July to carry the bed on to the year's end. For winter plants, the endive is sown in late autumn and unless frosts are very bad, the plants will endure the winter through, starting into good life early in March and providing the first dish of green salad for the year at a time when the garden is practically empty.

Green-curled or white-curled alike, the endive plants are good, the green sorts, on account of their coolness and their plentiful salts being esteemed for the salad bowl, and the white-curled sorts being liked for soups, stews, and boiled vegetables.

Like lettuce, endive can be boiled and treated as a vegetable. If chopped finely and served as spinach, it is excellent. Like all green garden plants, it is a purifier of the blood, as the popular idea runs. This means it can replenish the vital fluid with its own good saline matters, rendering it pure and well able to do its work.

Old wives held that endive shared with lettuce the peculiar property of making the skins of ladies very fair. In olden mythology, the story ran that Venus, goddess of beauty, obtained her fair skin because she loved to lie in lettuce beds and had endowed the green plant with the power of smoothing complexions for ever. Half this legend owed its being to the idea that lettuce, which contains opium, being a sleep inducer, was a beauty-giver, because a due amount of rest was essential to beauty. The other half owed its being to the fact that green salads in spring chased away roughnesses and pimples from the skin, making it smooth.

In old times, a sleep specific was a lettuce eaten every night for supper. Later in the year, endive had to take its place, though the green food was not quite so tender as a well-blanched lettuce. And it had not the gift of opium, the sleep-inducer. Endive has no narcotic powers at all.

By this Mark

E
D S

You will know the Contents are Pure

Your grocer may tell you he has something just as good, but has he?

¶ We are content to let the Inland Revenue Department of Canada be the judge, and they say in Bulletin No. 194 that the jams examined by them bearing the name of E. D. Smith were absolutely pure and did not contain an abnormal quantity of water or any glucose, in short they were absolutely pure.

Your

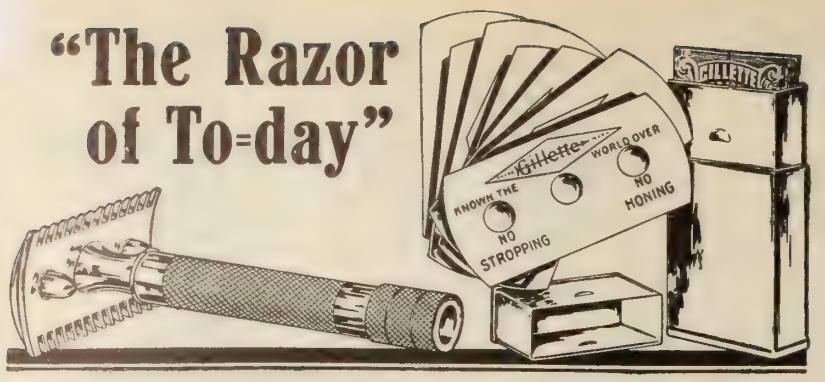
Christmas Table

will not be complete without a goodly supply of E. D. S. Pure Preserves, Jams, Catsup, Grape Juice, Jellies or Marmalade. They taste so home like that your guests will enjoy them as well as your own family.

Sold by all good grocers.

Manufactured by

E. D. SMITH
WINONA,
ONT.



"The Razor of To-day"

GILLETTE Blades are Harder

—Keener—Smoother Than Forged Razor Blades

Before the GILLETTE was invented razor blades were all forged. That is, a piece of mild steel was heated and hammered out till it took the form of a razor blade. Every heating, every hammering, changed the hardness of the steel a little—how much, no man could tell, but more in some parts than others, because these parts were hammered out more.

Naturally, to temper perfectly a blade of such uncertain and uneven hardness is impossible.

In making GILLETTE blades we start with an ingot of steel, too fine in quality to stand forging, whose composition we know by analysis. We roll this out to the thinness of the finished blade, then stamp out the blades ready for tempering.

The composition of the steel is not altered by the rolling and stamping as it is by forging, so that each blade comes out not only even in texture throughout, but of the same quality as every other blade. As our patented automatic tempering process tempers each blade through and through in precisely the same way, the finished blades have an even, uniform hardness which cannot possibly be equalled in forged blades.

Two of the hardest, keenest, smoothest shaving edges the world has ever seen are found on each and every GILLETTE blade. Not only is the GILLETTE the safest, quickest, most convenient and only adjustable razor, but it carries the best edge. That is what interests the shaver most.

Standard Sets $5.00. Pocket Editions $5.00 to $6.00.

At your druggist's, jeweler's or hardware dealer's.

The Gillette Safety Razor Co. of Canada, Limited

Office and Factory, - 63 St. Alexander Street, Montreal.

Offices also in New York, Chicago, London, Eng., and Shanghai, China.
Factories in Montreal, Boston, Leicester, Berlin and Paris. 249

Essential to Comfort

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER

Warmth is essential to comfort. As you grow older, it is hardly less essential to health.

Get a Perfection Smokeless Oil Heater, and you keep warm and comfortable in your home, no matter what the weather without.

The Perfection gives a strong, widespread heat, and gives it quickly. It is always ready for use and burns nine hours on a single filling—no more trouble than a lamp. It can be carried anywhere; no pipes, no wires, no flues; no smoke, odor or dirt.

The heater that gives complete satisfaction.

This year's Perfection is finished in either blue enamel or plain steel; nickel trimmings; light and ornamental, yet strong and durable as can be made. All parts easily cleaned. Automatic-locking flame spreader prevents smoking.

Dealers everywhere; or write to any agency of the

The Imperial Oil Co., Limited The Queen City Oil Co., Limited

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

WITH THE JOURNAL'S JUNIORS

A Corner for the Small Person

By COUSIN CLOVER

Our Competitions

OF course, the very first thing we want to say to all of you is, "A Merry Christmas." We hope that the December Twenty-fifth stocking will contain all that you could possibly desire, and perhaps that stocking will even overflow with skates and sleds and toboggans, which would never go in a small person's stocking. In the midst of all the fun of this merriest month, do not forget the little ones who are sick and whose Christmas must be spent within the walls of a hospital. In the Hospital for Sick Children, at Toronto, are many who need your kindly thought and good wishes at this glad season, and we hope some of our Juniors will remember these sick ones with words and deeds of good cheer.

HAPPY TIMES FOR SICK LITTLE ONES

The letters we have received on "A Summer Holiday" are so cheering and bright that we are sure our Juniors, who are scattered so widely, must have opportunities for the very happiest holidays in the world. It has been hard to make a selection where all have done so well, but we have finally selected the prize-winners. The first prize of three dollars goes to Miss Isabel Turnbull, Bird's Hill, Manitoba; the second prize of two dollars is awarded to Miss Dorothy Marston, Toronto. We have found it impossible to publish all the letters, but we know you have enjoyed those already printed.

In our new competition, we are offering two prizes for Juniors under fifteen years of age, for the best articles—not exceeding five hundred words, on "A Winter Adventure." The competition will close February 15th, 1912, and the prizes will be three dollars and two dollars. We have extended the closing date by a fortnight, and hope to hear from many of you again.

CHRISTMAS IN HOSPITAL

Rebus and Puzzle

FOR your special delight at this season we have a rebus, which you will find on the opposite page, and also this Santa Claus puzzle. The first who sends in a correct solution of the rebus will be given a prize of two dollars, while to the first who solves the puzzle we shall give a year's subscription to this publication. The following is the clever rhyme, sent by your good friend, Mrs. E. M. Gardner.

A Christmas most happy, dear friends, to you all,
A New Year most prosperous too;
Come, guess what I've got in this ponderous pack,
And then you'll know just what to do.
For I'm sure you'll agree not a worthier gift
Could a friend on a loved one bestow
Than the one you will find if you properly guess
What is written my picture below.
My first you will find in my ample moustache,
The next in my old heart so gay.
My third shows distinctly in both of my eyes,
My next's in my cap, so they say;
My 5th's in my ankle—indeed 'tis in both,
While my 6th in my nose you will see.
My 7th and 8th you will find in my hands,
Which are active and strong as can be.
My 9th's to be found in my whiskers so fine,
And the 10th in my shaggy white hair.
My next in my rheumatic knee holds a place,

And my 12th in my shoulders so square.
My 13th you'll find in my mouth when I speak,
And my next when its silent and still.
My 14th shows up in my rosy red cheeks—
—You may take a rest now if you will—
My 15th you'll find in my joints rather stiff,
My body so round holds the next.
Seventeen you will see in my pupils so bright,
And 18 in my arms—don't be vexed
If I tell you the next will be found in my nails,
In each one of the twenty, for sure;
And the next, with the last, in the calves of my legs.
That is all! I regret they're not fewer.

Our Holiday Letters

Toronto, Ont., Sept. 1, 1911.

Dear Editor of Journal's Juniors:

As the summer competition is on "Our Summer Holdiay," and the best time of the year, except Christmas, is in the summer, I thought I would enter the competition.

We camped for two blissful summers in a little town about twelve miles west of Toronto. We camped in an orchard, and, although we didn't leave the plums and cherries entirely alone, we could have done worse. The only thrilling experience we had in that line was when I broke a limb off a cherry tree, when we were tasting of its forbidden fruits. Have you ever broken a limb off a cherry tree? If not, you can't sympathize. It is impossible to imagine the awful feeling that rushes over one. Suffice to say, I'll never break another.

We used to play the most original games, for it seems to me that games are adapted to places, and the game that is so popular at home is quite a failure elsewhere.

Our favorite game we called "Chase." My chum and I, who were always together, were generally "chased." The four remaining ones would wait till we ran out of sight, then they would "hunt us down." The exciting part was when we were sighted, and chased. Sometimes it was a very close race, sometimes we were caught, but sometimes we reached the goal in triumph.

Our other game bore the name of "Fort." This was played in the empty barn. My chum and I were generally inside. The object of those outside was to get in, and ours, to keep them out. Such a hacking, pulling, yelling, shouting, and altogether unearthly din that went on when this game was in progress can readily be compared to a wild Indian war dance, Indians being supposed to make a great deal of noise when participating in the above mentioned.

Besides these "amusements," camp life is about perfect, in my opinion, anyway. We always had our meals outside, unless there was a drenching downpour, and even then, in the tent, it is not nearly as bad as one might expect. The sound of the rain on the tent is like a monotonous lullaby, and inside it is as dry as a house—almost.

Then it is simply glorious to sleep almost in the open every night, to discard all unnecessary raiment, and to do just about what you please. Another distinct advantage of camp life is that there is hardly any housework to do, consequently the time is almost all your own.

Then, of course, there were other characteristics of the summer life—boating, bathing, a picnic or two, bonfires on the beach, fishing, long rambles, and rows on the lake and up the river.

Then, to think we have to leave all this for school! Never does arithmetic or spelling look gloomier. Packing-up and moving-day is about the saddest of the year. But there is always a summer coming ,to look forward to, and one left behind, to remember.

Now I will have to close, as I fear I am taking too much time and room, but one could almost write a book about a summer holiday.

Wishing the Juniors' Page every success, I am,

Yours most sincerely,

Aged 14. DOROTHY MARSTON.

I certify this is the sole work of my daughter, Dorothy.

C. L. MARSTON.

* * *

Dear Dorothy:

This is a nice letter, indeed, and I am very glad to hear from you. I have never broken the limb off a cherry tree, but am sure that it must be an exciting experience. I think your games must have been delightful. I don't think there is any place quite so nice as an orchard to play in.

Mt. Albert, Sept. 3, 1911.

Dear Cousin Clover:

We take the CANADIAN HOME JOURNAL and enjoy reading it very much.

The most delightful of my holidays were spent at Lake Simcoe last summer. My mother and father and sister were with me and we had my grandpa's tent. We were right near the lake and I had fine times.

I went in bathing nearly every day. Mr. and Mrs. Brooks had their tent next to ours and I was down there nearly all the time; if I was not down there I was on the beach or out driving, as Mr. Brooks had his horse (Nellie) with him.

Mr. Brooks and I went driving every day and sometimes we were down to Sutton two or three times a day. About every evening we went over to the Black River to fish. My Auntie was with us, too.

One morning my sister got up early and went over to the river. She caught a large black bass, besides some other smaller fish. One other evening my sister caught a catfish, and as it was dark she could not see the horrid creature, but thought it was a bass. But when she went to take it off the hook it stung her finger. There were a few Indian camps back in a bush and we used to go back and visit them, and one of the Indian girls gave me a basket and I made a handle for it .

My two cousins, aged three and five, came up from Toronto. I used to wade in the water and get clam shells for them. Hoping my letter is not too long, I am

Aged 11. OTHA VANDEWATER.

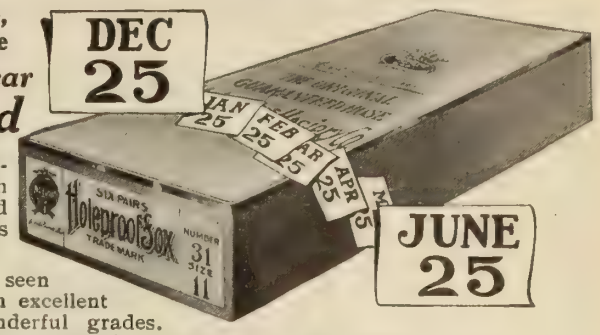
E.M. Gardner

CHRISTMAS REBUS

Solution must be addressed to Rebus Editor.

A Christmas Suggestion

Six Pairs of Soft, Fine, Stylish Holeproof Hose —Six Months' Wear Guaranteed



Here are six beautiful pairs of hose with a guarantee ticket and six return coupons enclosed.

You have never seen finer hosiery, such excellent colors or such wonderful grades. "Holeproof" in twelve years has become the most popular hosiery. A million people are wearing it now.

Give a box to man, woman or child for Christmas. They'll be delighted and so will the one who usually darns in that family.

Our Soft Three-Ply Yarn

We pay an average of seventy cents a pound for Egyptian and Sea Island cotton yarn. It is three-ply, soft and yielding. There's nothing about it that's heavy or cumbersome. No one in the United States ever wears anything else, once it is tried.

Carl Freschl, Pres.

If your dealer doesn't sell "Holeproof," we'll fill your order direct. Look on each pair for above signature. It identifies the genuine. There are scores of poor imitations.

FAMOUS Holeproof Hosiery FOR MEN WOMEN AND CHILDREN

How to Order

Choose your color, grade and size from the list below and state clearly just what you wish. One size and one grade in each box. Colors only may be assorted as desired. Six pairs are guaranteed six months, except when stated otherwise.

Men's Socks—Sizes 9½ to 12. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, navy blue, gun metal, mulberry. In light weight, 6 pairs $1.50 (same in medium weight in above colors and in black with white feet, 6 pairs $1.50). Light and extra light weight (mercerized), 6 pairs $2.00. Light and extra light weight LUSTRE SOX, 6 pairs $3.00. Pure thread-silk sox, 3 pairs (guaranteed three months) $2.00. Medium worsted merino in black, tan, pearl, navy and natural, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in finer grade, 6 pairs $3.00.

Women's—Sizes 8½ to 11. Colors: black, light tan, dark tan, pearl, and black with white feet. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00. Same colors (except black with white feet) in light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Light weights in black, tan and gun metal, 6 pairs $2.00. Same in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00. Same in pure thread-silk, $3.00 for 3 pairs (guaranteed three months). Outsizes in black, medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00, and in extra light weight LUSTRE HOSE, 6 pairs $3.00.

Children's—Sizes 5½ to 10½ for boys, 5 to 9½ for girls. Colors: black and tan. Medium weight, 6 pairs $2.00.

Infants' Sox—Colors: tan, baby blue, white and pink. Sizes 4 to 7. Four pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00. Ribbed-leg stockings, in same colors and black, sizes 4 to 6½, 4 pairs (guaranteed six months) $1.00.

Send in your order now. Write for free book, "How to Make Your Feet Happy."

TO DEALERS: Write for our agency proposition. Excellent opportunity. Thousands of dealers in U. S. making big hosiery sales with "Holeproof."

Reg. U.S. Pat. Off., 1906

Carl Freschl, Pres.

HOLEPROOF HOSIERY CO. OF CANADA, Ltd., 96 Bond St., London, Can.

Are Your Hose Insured?

(242)

One of the most Charming Pianos made is the NEW SCALE WILLIAMS

SMALL GRAND.

It is becoming more popular every day. The tone is sweet and sympathetic and appeals at once to people with a refined musical taste. It is built on the same lines (only in miniature form) as our famous Concert Grand, which is used by nearly all the great artists who tour Canada, and, as one of them said, "is the biggest little piano I ever saw."

They Are Made Right

because the workmen who build these beautiful Pianos constitute the most skillful organization of piano-makers in Canada, and they are dominated by an enthusiasm for the "New Scale Williams" ideals and standards to the same degree as are the men who guide their efforts.

"The tone is beautiful and the action perfect"
—Louise Homer

243 Write us to-day for prices and full particulars as regards both our uprights and grands

The WILLIAMS PIANO CO., Limited
OSHAWA ONTARIO

Appropriate Books for Christmas Gifts

The Evolution of the Prairie Provinces
By W. S. HERRINGTON
Author of "Heroines of Canadian History."
Cloth 75c.

Life of Father Lacombe
By KATHERINE HUGHES
$1.50 net

From Tenderfoot to Scout
By A. C. RUDDY
Illustrated, cloth $1.25
The best boy's book of the year. A great Christmas present for a boy.

The Fourth Watch
By H. A. CODY, M.A.
Author of "The Frontiersman."
Mr. Cody has made another success in "The Fourth Watch." His previous volume made a great hit and he has very ably sustained the reputation he made on his first novel.
Price $1.25

Prairie Born and Other Poems
By ROBERT J. C. STEAD
Cloth $1.00 net
An excellent book for a Christmas Gift.

East and West
Sketches and Essays
By ADELAIDE P. FITCH
Cloth $1.00 net

On Western Trails in the Early Seventies
Frontier Pioneer Life in the Canadian North-West
By JOHN McDOUGALL
Author of "Saddle, Sled and Snowshoe."
Cloth $1.25 net
The latest book from the pen of this veteran pioneer. Full of vim and adventure of the early days.

Through Five Republics on Horseback
Being an Account of many Wanderings in South America
By G. WHITFIELD RAY, F.R.S.C.
Illustrated, cloth ink $1.00 net, cloth gold $1.25 net

Past Years in Pickering
Sketches of the History of the Community
By WILLIAM R. WOOD
Cloth, illustrated $1.50 net

Is it Just
By MINNIE SMITH
A story of Life in British Columbia. Dedicated to the National Council of Women.
Price $1.00

Day Dreams of a Pioneer and Other Verses
By JOHN MORTIMER
Cloth 75c.

Songs of the Prairie
By ROBERT J. C. STEAD
Author of "The Empire Builders."
Lambskin $1.00. Velvet Calf $1.25
A beautiful gift book in dainty style. Full of the national spirit and optimism of the West.

The Diary of Mrs. John Graves Simcoe
Wife of the First Lieutenant-Governor of Upper Canada
With Notes and a Biography
By JOHN ROSS ROBERTSON
Containing 236 illustrations many of which are from original drawings by Mrs. Simcoe.
Cloth $3.00 net.

Sunshine and Shadow
By JEAN MITCHELL SMITH
A story of life in a frontier Ontario town.
Cloth $1.00 net.

Seeing Canada and the South
By H. P. SCOTT, M.A.
Cloth $1.00

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS OR FROM WILLIAM BRIGGS
PUBLISHER, 29-37 RICHMOND ST. W., TORONTO

X 11

JAEGER

JAEGER CHRISTMAS GOODS

The judgment shown in the selection of gifts adds largely to their value.

Jaeger Pure Wool Goods include something suitable for everybody.

Dressing Gowns, Smoking and Lounge Jackets, Sweaters, Motor Coats, Hoods, Gloves, Steamer Rugs, Travelling Rugs, Golf Coats, Waist-coats, Shawls, etc.

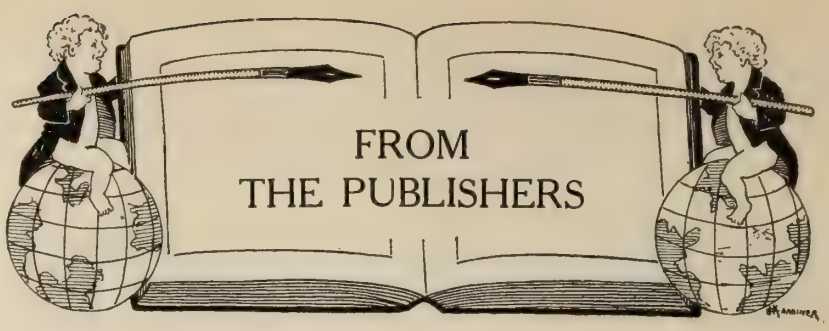
AT ANY JAEGER STORE OR STORE WHERE JAEGER GOODS ARE KEPT.

TRADE MARK

Dr. Jaeger's Sanitary Woollen System Company, Limited

231 Yonge St., Toronto
316 St. Catherine St. West, Montreal
Steele Block, Portage Ave., Winnipeg

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this sisue.



CANADIANS have a healthy love of outdoor life and the diversions which belong thereto. Urban life is not the typical sphere of the Canadian and few studies of what is vulgarly termed the "smart set" appeal widely to Canadian readers. "Love of the Wild," by Archie P. McKishnie, is an unusual story of rural life, which eminently justifies its name. The adventures of "Boy" are sufficiently exciting to hold the reader's interest to the inevitable close, when Boy forsakes the Brotherhood of Untamed Bachelors and takes upon himself the responsibility of the welfare of Gloss, as winsome a maiden as ever gladdened the Wild. The author's sympathy with unspoiled Nature is evident on every page, and his intimacy with the woods and ponds shows that he is undoubtedly a member of the Lodge of the Open Door. Those who know Kent County and the shores of Lake Erie will recognize many a stretch of reedy water, many a glimpse of woodland. Every Ontario boy will welcome this opening scene, with its whiff of autumn forest.

"The hazy October sunlight sifted through the trees and lay, here and there, golden bits of carpet on the mossy woodland. A glossy black squirrel paused on one of these splashes of sunlight, and, sitting erect, preened his long fur, then as the harsh scolding of a red squirrel fell on his ears he sank on all fours again, and bounded into the heavy shadows of the wood. A pair of pursuing red squirrels sprang from an opposite grove, and with shrill chidings crossed the opening to the snake fence. By taking this fence they might intercept the quarry's flight, their object being to make short work of the black, whom they hated with an hereditary hatred, harking back to the dim past.

"In and out they flashed, their yellowred bodies painting zig-zag streaks of gold upon the forest background of green. Suddenly they halted, and with tails slashing angrily, poured out a tirade of abuse upon the human frustrator of their designs." Toronto: McLeod & Allen.

A MOST artistic booklet, "The Evolution of a Store," has recently been published, setting forth the story of the enterprise which is now known throughout the Dominion as "Eaton's." The record of development from 1869 to 1911 is one of steady progress on a "strictly cash" basis. The late Mr. Timothy Eaton was a man of great business sagacity, with a foresight which enabled him to provide for such an expansion as no other Canadian business firm has known. Mr. John C. Eaton inherits his father's financial gifts, and it is difficult to prophesy the dimensions of the Eaton business for 1920. The little volume recently published is a gem in coloring and style, in which every artifice of modern illustration contributes to the description of this vast departmental system. The modern union of art and commerce, in which the most trained and delicate skill of pen and brush is used to explain and depict mercantile success is most happily exemplified in "The Evolution of a Store."

IT has been asserted frequently of late that poetry is unpopular—that a book of poems is, so far as publishers' profits are concerned, a failure. When we read of the poetic fury of a century ago, when "all London" was reading Scott and Byron, we begin to feel as if ours were a painfully material age. However, as Keats told us in a summertime sonnet: "The poetry of earth is never dead." The young men who would have been writing cantos and serenades a century ago are to-day putting their creative forces in mines, railways and bridges—and pre-eminently in aeroplanes. The Wrights and their fraternity are poets born, who fly rather than write sonnets and madrigals. In spite of this poetry of motion and commerce, there are a few men of imagination who still cling to the written word as medium—and of these is Mr. Madison Cawein, whose poems have just been published by the Macmillan Company.

In the foreword by William Dean Howells we are informed concerning the poet: "He is of the kind of Keats and Shelley and Wordsworth and Coleridge, in that truth to observance and experience of nature and the joyous expression of it, which are the dominant characteristics of his art." A poet of German descent, born in Kentucky, has a curious inheritance. There is no State in the Union with a more romantic history than that of blue-grass acres, there is no State where meets more strikingly to-day the New South and the Old. Mr. Cawein, in his sensitiveness to the joyous aspects of Nature, reminds one of certain poets of the older school—Timrod, Hayne and Lanier.

The present volume will prove a delight to those to whom woods and streams are dear, for the poet has entered the woodland with "that joy of life unquestion'd," which brings one very near to the heart of the Great Mother. There is youth eternal in these poems, and, even as his New England critic says, it is the youth of tender regrets, of vague aspirations, of pensive longing. It may be that the poet who feels most keenly the rapture of the sea and the stars, feels also the pathos of fleeting humanity, so much frailer than the oak, so much weaker than the waves.

NO doubt can be entertained regarding the narrative, "Is It Just?" by Minnie Smith, published by William Briggs, Toronto, and dedicated to the National Council of Women. It is a story with a purpose, and that purpose is to show how altogether abominable and unjust are the laws regarding the property rights of married women in British Columbia. Now, why cannot the writer, who is setting out with such a serious end in view, sign a more sensible name than "Minnie" to such a production? If women are to expect to be taken seriously as writers they should give up such absurd "pet" names for their work. What would be thought of the man who signed "Johnnie Milton" or "Ollie Holmes"?

We are introduced to the Pierce family, living on a Manitoba farm. Mrs. Pierce is a toil-worn, patient wife, with all the virtues except firmness and self-respect. Mr. Pierce is a lazy, conceited, good-looking scamp, for whom she cherishes an abject and foolish affection, and the children are ordinary young human beings, who are fortunate enough to resemble the maternal parent. There enters this comparatively peaceful home a real estate agent from British Columbia, with the result that the family is removed to the Okanagan Valley, where the good-for-nothing Pierce neglects a fruit ranch (which he has bought with his wife's money in his own name), falls in love with a wily widow from Chicago, deserts and divorces his faithful and industrious spouse, and betakes himself to the United States with the person who has ensnared his errant fancy. His wife is left almost destitute and is aided in her need by Philip Hastings, who has secretly adored her all these weary years. She refuses quite properly to marry him and suffers the misunderstanding of the community in a mournful silence. But the erstwhile widow wearies of the idle Pierce, who makes a virtue of necessity and returns to the broken-hearted wife, who forgives him in a meek and maudlin fashion, dying in his sturdy arms. Such is the lurid tale told by Minnie, whose surname is Smith. In answer to the title "Is It Just?" we would say that British Columbia laws regarding women's property rights are certainly in need of readjustment. But we should also remark that no laws on earth can protect a woman who is fool enough to love a cad and so lacking in proper spirit as to forgive his insults and submit to his belated caresses. The next time, Minnie, give us a heroine who is a woman—not a mixture of mush and moping.

THE MONTH BEFORE CHRISTMAS

I look back to the time I was a child. I can recall the look of anxiety there was upon my dear mother's face for some time before Christmas, for there was a good sized family of children, and I being the eldest, took a keener interest than the others. How did Santa Claus reach each and every house in one night, and between bedtime and getting-up time? We never had to be called on Christmas morning, but how did Santa Claus get in? Mother would find out what each one had a desire for by prompting us at prayer time; by telling us we had better make our supplications now that he might hear. I remember well how each had just what he asked for if at all reasonable. Then, when I became a father, my wife and I were proud to follow in the footsteps of our parents. What delight it gave us to see our little ones hunting Christmas morning for what Santa Claus left.

To see the joy it gave makes Christmas a day long to be glad for and I rejoice that we are able to make home worth living for. Sometimes I look back and for one moment wish it all over again. But no! There are many opportunities for making other homes happy, now that we have the opportunity. Let each and every one strive to make happy some home that has children where Santa Claus will not be able to call, for of these our Blessed Saviour said: "Of such is the Kingdom of Heaven."

HENRY.

AN air of mystery is beginning to pervade the domestic circle. Small persons are seen in anxious converse with elder brothers and sisters, while "Just what you would like for Christmas" is being artlessly inquired about in a careless discussion. A great industry, in the matter of fancy needlework, is manifested by the girls of the household, while the tiny folk are awaking to the fact that Santa Claus is making ready for his pilgrimage from the land of the reindeer. What to buy or make is perplexing many of us—and the question is of absorbing interest to the feminine world especially.

JAPANESE STENCILED SCREEN

"Something for the house" is always welcome to the mother of the family. A pretty pillow or cushion seldom comes amiss, and fortunate is the maiden who is skilful in drawn-work, embroidery or stenciling. In the case of a present of this nature, care should be taken to consult individual preferences in color and style, so that the gift may harmonize with the general furnishing or environment of the home. To give a handsome blue cushion to a housewife, whose living-room or parlor is furnished in brown and green means confusion and disappointment. A dainty screen or a chair is also a welcome acquisition, and here also the general tone of equipment already provided needs to be taken into consideration.

In small articles, there is infinite variety from which to choose—and the cost is not necessarily in proportion to the beauty or desirability of the article. In the matter of silver, alone, there are so many dainty trifles, from the vanity box or salve jar to the pencil or penholder, that it ought to be easy to select suitable gifts from a trayful of trinkets. In china and cut glass, also, it is not necessary to soar into luxurious prices before finding something which will be acceptable to any woman of good taste. Remember that it is better to buy a good article, however small, than to invest in an imposing bit of cheapness. Do not buy a cup and saucer of gaudy or splashy design, which proclaims its commonness. It would be better to invest in a pin-tray or tiny collar-button holder in white and gold. Cut glass is desired by almost every woman, and there are many small pieces of this attractive ware which will be within reach of the purchaser of moderate income.

Then, in the brass department, one meets with a bewildering array of gleaming objects, from the tiny kettle to the fern jar. In the hammered brass there are many charming articles of use and adornment. The fashion for pierced candle shades in various designs, from acorns to butterflies affords a ready suggestion for a small and pretty gift.

EVERY year, there arises a wail from womankind: "What is a nice present for a man?" For some reason or other, it is ever so much harder to buy a suitable present for the masculine members of the household than for the feminine—perhaps because women are so delighted with a variety of trivialities, and have so many small wants to be gratified with comparative ease. However, a woman need not despair of suiting the masculine taste, though ties or any article of personal adornment may be avoided in most cases, for the remarks which man makes concerning such purchases are far from flattering to womanly judgment. Most men desire to select their own ties and resent the sisterly or cousinly choice of color or fabric.

One girl, however, declares that she found just what appealed to her brother last year, when she invested on his behalf in some superfine hose. A box of stationery—not "fancy"—is appreciated by many men, and a cushion for a "den" is often welcome. However, be sure to avoid anything which is too elaborate or over-trimmed, for the masculine heart abhors anything of a "sissy" nature. A good picture or bronze or a blotter of substantial design would be considered desirable—or even such a trifle as a desk calendar might not be despised. A silver-topped ink-bottle makes a pretty gift and adorns a library table. A paperweight is also a useful article.

In the matter of books, it is rather difficult to be sure one is making an acceptable gift, whether the recipient be man or woman. This is a case in which the individual preference should be most carefully considered. To send Matthew Arnold's poems to a man who is a baseball enthusiast is almost as pathetic a blunder as to send George Ade's "Fables In Slang" to a university girl, who has high ideals and admires Pater and Browning.

A DRAWN-WORK PILLOW

The Gift That Is Always Most Prized!

THERMOS

Think what Constant Comfort, Convenience and Pleasure it is to own one

Keeps Boiling Hot Liquids Steaming Hot 24 Hours Without Fire

Keeps Ice-cold Liquids Deliciously Cold 3 Days Without Ice

Think how much YOU would appreciate having a THERMOS Bottle, and you will realize how much others will enjoy it as a gift from you.

Just What Is ALWAYS Wanted

To keep drinks or soups steaming hot all day or all night, in the nursery or sick room, for picnics or lunches on outings, when driving, motoring or travelling.

Useful Every Day, at Home or Away

The same THERMOS Bottle keeps boiling liquids hot for 24 hours, or ice-cold liquids cold for 3 days, as desired. Doesn't this suggest unlimited comfort and convenience—hundreds of times, in dozens of ways. Then

Make it YOUR gift THIS Xmas

Regular model, with beautiful nickel or copper detachable cases, highly finished, Pint size $3.50, Quart size $5.50.

New model with neat, serviceable metal cases, Pint size $2.25, Quart size $3.50.

THERMOS Lunch Kit $3.50.

Sold by leading drug, jewelry, sporting goods and department stores. If not in stores near you, write us and we will see that you are promptly supplied. Write for booklet describing all styles. Sent free.

Thermos Bottle Co. Limited
12-14 Sheppard Street - TORONTO

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

THE COST OF A CRIME

A Story of Yielding to Temptation and the Tragedy Ensuing

By ANNIE S. SWAN

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS.

John Reedham steals thirteen thousand pounds of trust money, held by the firm of Lowther, Currie and Company in London, England. He confesses to his friend, Lidgate, who allows him to escape, and who afterwards informs Mrs. Reedham of the crime. The only child, Leslie, is at school in Surrey. Leslie is brought home from school. Reedham, in the meantime, has found shelter in lodgings with Mrs. Webber, an old servant, and assumes the name of Thomas Charlton.

IT was a beautiful and sunshiny morning; comforted and refreshed by his safe shelter, good keep, and wholesome breakfast, and perhaps most of all by the sympathy of the only living being to whom he had spoken more than a few words during these horrible days, he was conscious of some slight lifting of the terrible gloom in his soul. Someone got on the omnibus with him, a man in clergyman's dress, with a fine, strong, kind face and a mobile mouth, which had almost a woman's sweetness. The top of the omnibus being nearly full, they had to share a seat, and the clergyman bade him a pleasant good morning.

Reedham at first scarcely responded. For the moment all men were his enemies, and he feared ulterior motives where none could possibly exist.

"London is a pleasant place on a morning like this," said the clergyman, apparently unconscious of any unresponsiveness on the part of his fellow passenger. "And this is quite a pleasant neighborhood. The Camden Road on a morning like this is hard to beat."

"Going down as a neighborhood, I should think?" observed Reedham brusquely. "If one is to judge by the number of notice boards on the houses."

"It has gone down of late, but possibly we may have a renaissance later on," observed the clergyman cheerfully. "People come back after they have tried other parts of London. It has many advantages and conveniences."

"You live here, I suppose?" hazarded Reedham.

"Yes, I am the vicar of St. Ethelred's in Seton Square. If you look along the first opening to the left you'll see the square tower of my church."

They passed it at the moment, and Reedham nodded as his companion pointed out a singularly ugly tower of dull smoke-bitten brick.

"A poor neighborhood, and my people are wholly of the working class, but I would not change it. Yes, I could have moved several times in the last ten years, but I am still here. Are you a stranger to London?"

"No, I have lived in it all my life."

The clergyman regarded his clear-cut profile with the interest peculiar to the real and discriminating student of human nature. He gathered from his speech and manner that he was an educated man, and a certain suggestion of power was in his face. But he seemed to be under a cloud. A quickened interest in him filled the good man's soul; it was his business to heal and help and save, and his name was known as a friend to the troubled far beyond the bounds of his own parish.

"Ah, then you know something of the stress of London life. Yet it has its charm. I could not live, I think, outside of it now, unless I happened to get into ill-health. London is no place for those who are not fully equipped for the race."

"You speak truly, sir," said Reedham, with some bitterness. "And it has been the ruin of many who imagined themselves, as you express it, fully equipped."

The note of personal bitterness rang insistently through the words, and the clergyman knew that in thinking that a troubled soul dwelt in the bosom of the man by his side, he had made no mistake.

"You have had misfortune, perhaps?"

"Yes, brought about by my own incredible folly," admitted Reedham, more and more amazed at himself. But there was really nothing to marvel at in the sudden craving for human sympathy. Only the man who has been wholly cut off from it, even for a period of days, knows how real is the deprivation. To Reedham it was a wholly new experience; he had up till then only tasted the sweets of life.

"But misfortunes pass," said the clergyman quietly. "And to all they have their uses. I hope I do not intrude if I express the hope that you see a way out of your misfortunes."

"No," replied Reedham, and a guarded note crept into his voice. "At present I see no way out."

"May I inquire whether you are what is commonly called out of work, though I see that you are a gentleman."

"Yes, I am out of work."

"And what is your line of things?"

Reedham hesitated a moment.

"I am a clerk," he replied at hazard.

A faint disappointment, almost touched with incredulity, overspread the clergyman's face.

"It is not a profession affording many possibilities," he remarked kindly. "I hope that you have something in view?"

"No, nothing, and I have to get down here," he said, as the omnibus drew up with a jerk at the corner of Euston Road.

"A moment, friend," said the clergyman quickly, as he drew out a card from his pocket and a pencil, with which he proceeded to write something on the back of the card.

"There, that is my name and address, and on the back you will find the address of a gentleman who delights in helping those who are down. He is an intimate friend of mine, we met in connection with a case in which we were both interested, and I have often thanked God for him since. He will see you if you present that card. I have his permission to send him whom I like, and I feel strangely interested in you. I hope we shall meet again."

He offered his hand, and after a moment's hesitation Reedham accepted it.

"Perhaps if you knew my history you would not touch my hand," he said thickly. "Good-bye, sir, and thank you."

He raised his hat and made haste down the steps of the omnibus to the ground. Immediately he turned towards Gower Street, and in a quiet doorway stopped and looked at the card.

On the one side was written:

"The Rev. Cyrus Fielden, St. Etheldred's Vicarage, Camden Town."

On the reverse side a name which caused Reedham to laugh aloud:

"Archibald Currie, Esq., 98, Hyde Park Square, and 18, Old Broad Street, E.C."

The brother of his own partner, James Currie, though a very different type of man.

He thrust the piece of pasteboard into his vest pocket, and strode on, having no particular object in view. He had merely got down to escape the kindly but embarrassing attentions of the vicar of St. Etheldred's.

But the name on the reverse side of the card pursued him as he walked. Something in the mere thought of presenting himself to Archibald Currie, who had known him quite well in the old days, which already seemed so far away, attracted him with a sort of weird fascination.

He was a very different man from his brother James, and if by means of his sympathy and assistance he could climb back to the paths of self-respect, how great would be the irony of his triumph!

There was something adventurous in the mere idea which appealed.

All day long he wandered in the byways of London, pondering on this strange chance that had come in his way. And from the beginning he seemed to know what the end would be.

Four o'clock in the afternoon found him in the very heart of the city standing with his face turned towards Old Broad Street.

CHAPTER IV.

THE HEIGHTS OF HAMPSTEAD.

THE office boy knocked at the door of Mr. Archibald Currie's private room.

"The carriage is at the door, sir, and Miss Wrede wishes to know if she is to come up."

"No, Baddeley, tell Miss Wrede I shall join her in less than five minutes."

"And please, sir, there a man wishes to see you very particular. Could you spare him five minutes? No name, sir, but he gave me this."

He handed a small piece of pasteboard to his master, who read both the printed words and the name scribbled on the back.

"Another of Fielden's proteges. I don't think I can see him now, Baddeley. But there, yes, I will! Tell Miss Wrede I am engaged for a few more minutes and that if she prefers to come up she will find Mr. Willett's room empty."

"Yes, sir, and shall I show the party up, the gentleman I mean, sir?"

"Yes, now."

Baddeley went off cheerfully. Everybody was cheerful under that roof. The note was struck by the principal himself each morning, when he appeared spick and span and smiling at his business house. The world could have told you that Archibald Currie had good reason for cheerfulness, and that he had been an extraordinarily successful man, that he had amassed great wealth, and had most of the gifts that men prize.

But personally he was a singularly lonely man, without ties of the kind which make the chief joy of life. He was estranged, through no fault of his own, from his only brother. They had never, even as boys, been intimate. It was indeed hard to believe that two men so different could have been born of one parentage and shared the same early home-life. Archibald, the elder, was large-hearted, sunny-natured, generous to a fault, combining with the highest business gifts a breadth of view and a benevolent spirit which his brother James continually condemned.

"Archie makes paupers, and adds to the problems of existence," he was fond of saying, and would then launch into condemnation of his indiscriminate charity.

Mr. James Currie did not err in that direction. He distributed no charity whatsoever, but required all he earned for himself and his family.

The astonishing thing, however, was, that the more Archibald gave away, the more money flowed in upon him. He did all sorts of unnecessary and expensive kindnesses. His latest was to adopt as his daughter one Katherine Wrede, the orphan child of a woman they had known in their youth, and who had married disastrously and suffered much. This latest indiscretion the James Curries condemned very loudly, because they feared that it might divert the channels of their uncle's money from themselves.

Archibald Currie was a very fine-looking man, resembling his brother somewhat in figure and feature, though on a larger scale. The generous largeness of his life seemed to have written themselves all over his personality; his eyes beamed kindliness; his beautiful white hair, which gave him at too early an age a singularly benevolent look, framed a face in which there was nothing to repel.

He drew a sheet of paper before him on the desk, and was busy writing when the door opened, and Mr. Charlton was announced.

"In a moment, sir," he said, partly wheeling round, but not taking a good look at the stranger. "Pray take a chair."

It gave the man whom we must henceforth call Charlton the necessary moment for self-recovery. The very fact that the glance bestowed upon him conveyed not the smallest recognition was in itself most reassuring. He looked round the room with interest, and tried to still his nerves, which threatened to get out of hand. Up till now Charlton had not had any occasion to play a part; he was astonished at his own ability to play it. Surely it was the very madness of daring to venture into the presence of this man, noted as much for his shrewd knowledge and judgment of human nature as for his benevolence! It was said in the city that Archibald Currie had never been known to make a mistake in his man.

To pass the bar of his judgment, therefore, was to go forth hall-marked to the world.

The risk for Charlton was colossal; only success could justify it. The man whose verdict might decide his whole fate and future, signed the letter and rang for it to be taken away.

Then he turned to give courteous attention to the stranger, rising to his feet and standing before the empty fireplace, with his hands folded behind his back. To the day of his death Charlton thought he would remember the pattern of his clothes, the curiously-wrought link of the old-fashioned fob, which dangled from beneath his ample waistcoat, the keenness as well as the kind lines in his deep-set eyes.

"You are a friend of the Vicar of St. Etheldred's?"

"Not exactly a friend, sir—a waif on whom he chanced this morning on the top of an omnibus," replied Charlton, striving to meet Currie's eyes, and succeeding wonderfully.

"You want help? What can I do for you?"

"I am out of work, sir," replied Charlton quietly. "A post of some kind, however humble in this place, would be at once the saving and making of me."

"You have been in another position," remarked the elder man, easily detecting the educated note, the ease of manner which singled him out from other applicants. "You have been, I could almost swear, an employer of labour yourself?"

"Yes, sir, I have."

"It does not seem to come readily to you to use the prefix, 'sir,'" continued Currie in an even, quiet voice. "Is there anything you would wish to tell me of a private nature before we consider how you are to be helped?"

Charlton seemed to struggle a moment with himself.

"Sir, if my own fate only were involved I should speak out freely. I cannot do so. I am here without character or credentials, asking you for the love of God to give me one more chance."

Currie remained silent a full minute, during which he regarded the pleader steadily. There was not the faintest recognition in his look, however, though he felt himself puzzled not so much by a haunting sense of familiarity as by the desire becoming momentarily more insistent to give the desired aid against his better judgment. Something in the pleasant educated voice, in the eager, almost hollow, eyes appealed. And to sum up, the chance to

RYRIE BROS.
·LIMITED·
JAMES RYRIE
PRESIDENT.
HARRY RYRIE
SEC-TREAS

GIFTS FOR MEN

134 · 136 · 138
YONGE ST
TORONTO.
(ONTARIO)

A FEW GOOD SENSIBLE GIFT ARTICLES WHICH ANY MAN WOULD APPRECIATE

Every gift purchased from Ryrie's is enclosed in a handsome box and mailed prepaid to any address in Canada (except the Yukon)

115—Guaranteed Fountain Pen, 14k point with safety clip..... $ 1.00
116—14k Knife with steel blades..... 12.00
117—Thin Model Ebony Cloth Brush in leather case 1.00
118—Gentleman's Set, 14k gold, containing collar button, three studs, pair of cuff links, in case..... 10.00
119—Heavy Sterling Silver Cigarette Case 5.00
120—Mother of Pearl Set, gold filled mountings, consisting of 6 Vest Buttons, 3 Shirt Studs and pair of Links, in case..... 9.00
121—Fine Suede Leather Collar Bag, silk lined with silk cords, holds 18 collars 1.00
122—3 Extension Coat Hangers in calf leather case..... 1.00
123—Heavy 14k Signet Ring, with any monogram 7.50
124—Extra heavy 14k gold Cuff Links. 5.00
125—3 Mother of Pearl Studs, with 14k patent backs 5.00
126—2 "Mab" Razors, finest steel, in case 3.00
127—Fine Ebony Military Brushes, in leather case, with silver initial on each 4.50
128—Set of 3 Studs and Collar Button, 14k gold, in case..... 4.50
129—Gentleman's Suit Case Umbrella, with ebony handle, natural finish, silver mounted 5.00
130—14k Gold Fob and Seal..... 10.00
131—Fine Patridge-wood Cane, silver mounted 4.50
132—Goat Seal Leather Dressing Case, silk lined, with pair of Ebony Military Brushes, Ebony Cloth Brush, Comb and Tooth Brush, in nickel holder..... 5.00
133—Earthenware Tobacco Jar, with air-tight cover 2.50
134—Fine Brass Smoker's Stand, 2 Cigar Rests, Match-holder and Ash Tray 3.00
135—Brass and Leather Tie Rack, with Velvet Cushion for Scarf Pins. 2.00
136—Brown Betty Tobacco Jar, silver mounted, with any pierced silver three-letter monogram 10.00
137—Fine Suede Leather Handkerchief Bag, silk lined (holds 24 handkerchiefs) 1.00
138—Antelope Leather Tobacco Pouch, rubber lined, with sterling silver shield 1.00
139—Fine Pierced Brass Ash Tray... .50
140—Genuine Briar Pipe, amber mouthpiece, sterling silver mounting, in case 2.75
141—Heavy Brass Pipe Rack, holds 6 pipes 5.00

RYRIE BROS. LIMITED □ □ □ □ □ □ TORONTO

drag a man back from any pit, was a task after his own heart.

"I have been often disillusioned and taken in," he observed, "and I have even no later than yesterday taken a vow to harden my heart. But you interest me. You are fully aware what an immense thing you ask from me?"

"I am fully aware of it, sir. No one could be more so, but—but if I live I shall repay, not betray, your trust."

Archibald Currie cleared his throat.

"I am not to ask a single question?"

"I could not answer any of a personal nature," replied Charlton frankly.

"And your very name, I take it, is assumed?"

Charlton made no reply, and again there was a prolonged silence.

Currie thought of all the men he had interviewed in that room, of the specious lies to which he had listened, of the crocodile tears he had witnessed, the false promises of amendment and reform. And he could not remember any appeal which had so powerfully affected him.

Against every warning of his shrewder judgment he determined to trust this man, to fling one more hostage upon the sea of fortune.

"You have been in business?" he inquired briefly. "So much I must know before I can do or promise anything. And as you have come to me I take it that you understand the nature of my business?"

"Yes, sir, I do understand it."

"The only thing I could offer you meanwhile is clerical work of the elementary order, and that merely superfluous, because we happen to be more than usually busy. The impending trouble in South Africa has quickened all the export trade, but your salary would be of the most meagre description."

"So long as it can provide me with food to eat and a decent shelter I shall be grateful for it, sir. It will give me my opportunity."

"Well, I will take you on your own recommendation solely, and perhaps because you come to me by introduction of Mr. Fielden. He and I together have been at the upbuilding of more than one fallen fortune, and helped to restore a few. You can commence here on Monday morning at a salary of twenty-eight shillings a week. Whether you remain will depend on yourself."

A flush, deep, almost painful, overspread Charlton's face as he sprang to his feet.

"Sir, I cannot thank you. I hope that my future conduct will be my guarantee of good faith."

Currie faintly smiled.

"I re-echo that hope," but he hesitated a moment and then forced back the question that had sprung to his lips.

He would not put it, because something warned him that the man before him either could not or would not answer it. No, he must to-day draw a large cheque on the bank of faith, and if it were dishonored, well, he would not even then be wholly the loser.

Charlton dismissed, passed out; and as he reached the end of the passage which shut off the private room, the swish of silken skirts, the faint perfume of violets greeted him. Immediately he had to stand aside to let a lady pass. He knew who she was, he had heard of Archibald Currie's ward, but he now saw her for the first time. She was beautifully dressed in a gown suitable only for some fete, and which seemed out of place in the bare passages of a city office. She looked at the man standing hat in hand in one of the shadowy corners, and as if the glance interested her, turned to look again. Then the vision disappeared beyond the glass panels at the end and Charlton passed out to the stairs.

"Are you there, Uncle Archie? You said five minutes, and do you know it is nearly half an hour. Mrs. James will be furious."

"Oh, of course, it is the day of the garden party at Fair Lawn, isn't it?" he asked with a facetious smile as he turned to greet the radiant vision invading his privacy and creating a very different atmosphere from that usually found therein. "Why, Katherine, surely this is the height of extravagance!"

"Hush, you naughty man, it will horrify Mrs. James, and Elizabeth and Sophia will bewail your extravagance. But nobody will dare tell them the thing cost two pounds, and that I made it myself!"

She pirouetted on one foot and took up her dainty skirts in her hands to show the delicious frou-frou beneath, and Currie smiled an indulgent smile.

Katherine Wrede had not been four years in the old house in Hyde Park Square, and she was verily the light of his life. He would have lavished his all upon her had she lifted her little finger, but her tastes were simple and her fingers clever, and she spent so little that those who only saw the finished product would have been amazed. There was a secret antagonism between her and the feminine element at Fair Lawn, for which reason she kept them wholly in the dark regarding the actual terms on which she lived in Hyde Park Square. They did not know that the comparatively small sum she spent on her own clothes was more than refunded by the economy and comfort with which she ruled the household. Archibald Currie had never known a home until she came to brighten his with her presence.

At Fair Lawn they were jealous and angry with her, they alternately patronised her and gave her warnings and advice. Katherine Wrede was never at her best there, and went as little as possible. This was a gala day, however, the one garden party of the season, into which Mrs. James paid off all her social engagements to the somebodies and nobodies of Hampstead. After consultation it had been decided that it would be better not to cancel the invitations, though the blow in the city would of course shed a gloom over it for themselves.

"Who was that man I passed just outside the door, Uncle?" inquired Katherine Wrede as she took his hat from the cupboard and the brush from the shelf to polish its glossy surface.

Instead of answering her he put a counter question.

"Why do you ask?"

"Oh, because his face interested me. He is not a common man. He is very good looking to begin with, and there is a whole story in his face."

"I believe that I have been guilty of what my brother James would call another deplorable indiscretion this afternoon."

Her eyes sparkled.

"Have you? Do tell me what it is. You have given a large sum of money perhaps to that man because his eyes appealed to you. I should have done just the same myself."

"No, my folly did not go quite so far, but I have given him employment without a reference of any kind or any guarantee that he will even serve me honestly. But if I hadn't he might have gone under."

The brightness on her face was arrested by the seriousness of the old man's words. A lovely, still look, which added indescribably to her beauty, because it gave a sudden glimpse of the soul, overspread her face.

"Dear, I am glad you are like that. It must be a splendid thing to be able to give a man his last chance and be willing, that is the greatest of all. So few are willing. Look how you took me from that horrible pension at Bruges! Oh, God knew how much need there was in the world when He made you."

She spoke with such passion that her guardian was at once touched and surprised.

He laid a soothing hand on her shoulder.

"Child, you must try to be less intense. You feel things too much, and make too much of every little service rendered, especially to yourself. Wipe those pretty eyes and keep the tears for the real need there is. Now come, and we shall be restored to a normal temperature by the atmosphere on the heights of Hampstead."

Often now they had their little joke, though it was always kindly, at the expense of the Fair Lawn relatives, with whom neither felt conspicuously at home.

"I don't care for this sort of thing, Katherine," he observed as he took his seat in the carriage beside her. "And James knows I don't, but in the circumstances it is our duty to rally round them. They are feeling this a good deal, and the attendance at the party this afternoon will be a sort of gauge of public opinion."

"I see. Has nothing been heard of poor Mr. Reedham yet?"

"Don't call him poor, Katherine. The man did wrong with his eyes open, and ought to be punished."

"You are not often so severe, Uncle Archie," she remarked in surprise.

"I can be severe when occasion arises. If the man had stuck to his guns and owned up it would have been better for everybody. And nothing can excuse his treatment of his wife. I wish you would go and see her, Katherine, before she leaves Norwood. Perhaps we could go together at the beginning of the week."

"Poor, poor thing; I shall go, certainly. I wonder how she feels about him! But, Uncle Archie, if it was as bad as the papers said, and he would have been committed, that would have been even more painful for his wife and son. I think, were I in her place, I should be glad that he had escaped."

"It was the coward's way out, Katherine," observed Currie, as he laid his hand on the padded morocco lining the side of the carriage.

"I thought suicide was the coward's way. Is it thought he has done that?"

"Nobody knows. I shouldn't think it likely myself. George Lidgate told me himself that he deliberately gave him eighteen hours' start. They all liked him, Katie, men trusted and liked him, which makes it all the worse. I was talking to a man yesterday, who has lost three thousand by him, and he said he would pay the money twice over to see Reedham reinstated."

"There must have been good in him; great good, then," she said emphatically. "People don't talk like that about a weak, or merely wicked man."

"You may be right, but I feel sore and hard about it. When that sort of thing comes near home, as it does in this case, it alters a man's point of view. We must do our best at Fair Lawn this afternoon to show our sympathy."

"Yes, Uncle," she said obediently, and did not add that he had set her a task. For she knew, though he did not, that the moment she felt herself enveloped by the hostile atmosphere of Fair Lawn, the other side of her nature, not the lovable side, would be up in arms.

They drove by way of Haverstock Hill to the Heath, the air growing purer and rarer as they made the steep ascent. Out there, the dust of the long, dry summer was not so all-pervading, and some freshness seemed yet to linger in the fine old gardens among the noble trees.

"It is very pleasant up here, Katie, but I have always said I would make no compromise betwixt town and country. One day, perhaps soon, we shall turn our backs wholly on London, and find a real country retreat. Then, when I have cut myself off from the London I love so well, you'll turn and leave me—" he added, with a slightly pensive touch.

"Why should I leave you? There is nothing I should like better than the country, and, believe me, I should never once look back."

"Ah, but you will ride off with a handsomer man?"

"Where is he to be found?" she asked, with a touch of gay banter. "If it is marrying you mean, dearest, I am not a marrying woman."

"That sounds bad for poor Stephen Currie," he said amusedly, and yet with a certain furtive anxiety in his glance. He saw her lip curl.

"I could not, and would not, marry Stephen Currie, Uncle Archibald, if he were the last man in the world."

"That would not be a good hearing for Stephen. He will ask you one of these days, Katie."

He did not add that he had already been sounded on the subject by his brother James, who had been anxious to learn the nature of the settlements to be made on Katherine Wrede in the event of such an alliance coming within the province of actual fact.

"I don't like him, Uncle Archibald. Oh, yes, he has brains of a kind, but all his views are opposed to mine, and his ideas about women are mediaeval. He shall be prevented asking me, Uncle Archibald."

When he did not immediately reply she turned her sweet face towards him anxiously. "It would not disappoint you very much, dearest. I mean you are not keen for me to marry Stephen Currie?"

"I, oh no, it is a matter of indifference to me. But Stephen is a good boy as far as he goes, and has never cost his parents any anxiety."

"He is made after their pattern," she said severely. "He will always walk in the appointed path, and do all that is expected of him. You could tell it by the parting in his hair, and the cut of his clothes."

"Hush, my dear, the sarcastic tongue does not become you," he said reprovingly, yet tempering his reproof by an indulgent smile. She asked his pardon immediately, and begged him to remember that she was a Bohemian by nature and upbringing, which pronouncement brought them to the well-appointed gates of Fair Lawn. They were pretentious for a merely suburban residence, towering high and ornate above the young trees planted to flank their buttresses, and they seemed to dwarf the house, visible two hundred yards further on. It was a fine house of its kind, and the lawns surrounding it were soft and fine as continuous attention could make them. They presented an animated appearance that afternoon, with the gay dresses of the ladies, the bright sunshades, the red and white stripes of the awnings, while the pleasant strains of the Viennese band filled the summer air.

Mrs. James Currie always did her garden party well, and, favored with fine weather, usually achieved success. She was looking very gracious, and when she saw her brother-in-law's well-appointed carriage draw up where the avenue took a curve for the wider space of the front lawn, she looked gratified. Archibald was always a gracious and acceptable personality, whom everybody was pleased to meet, and even while she secretly disapproved of Katherine Wrede, she also never failed to interest.

She seemed to strike a new note in the suburban crowd. Her frock of flowered muslin, simply made, with the big sash about her slender waist, seemed to add to her height, and the big picture hat, with its sweeping black plumes made a most becoming frame for her piquant face. Many looked at her with interest and curiosity, and the son of the house, immaculately attired in his frock coat suit and white waistcoat, and with a gardenia in his buttonhole, hastened forward to receive them.

"How do you do, Archibald?" inquired Mrs. James, in her well-modulated, conventional voice, "You are a little late; I was afraid you were not coming. Thank you, I am quite well, Miss Wrede. Yes, we have a beautiful day."

Katherine made her little bow, and turned to speak to Elizabeth and Sophia, who were eyeing her with ill-concealed envy and dislike.

Their gowns, made in Bond Street, bore the unmistakeable cachet of the West End, but they were not well worn. To them the simplicity of Katherine Wrede's attire seemed an affront, which made them, in their stiff silk frocks, suddenly feel overdressed. The delicate bloom of lilac scattered over her muslin skirt, the big fichu of old lace, draped about her shoulders with an art they could not copy, annoyed them beyond measure. And she did not wear a single article of jewelry of any kind; the fichu was knotted, and no one could tell how it was kept in its place.

Yet she at once took her place as the most distinguished-looking among the five hundred people present, and many eyes followed her admiringly.

"I say, you're looking stunning, you know," whispered Stephen Currie in her ear, when, after continuous effort, he managed to get a private word with her. "Simply stunning; you knock 'em all into cocked hats the minute you appear on the scene."

"I hope not. I don't see any evidence of it," she said demurely. "Get me an ice, will you?"

"Of course I will, if you promise not to let anybody else have my chair," he said jealously. With a good deal of engineering he had managed to secure a chair by Katherine's side at a convenient distance from the throng. Stephen was honestly and very much in love, though she did not give him credit for it. By the time he returned his chair was occupied by the clergyman of the church the Curries attended, a middle-aged man for whom Katherine had the greatest respect and esteem. He rose, however, when Stephen returned, gathering from his expression that he was de trop.

But Katherine begged him to stop.

"I have ever so many things to say to you, Mr. Cadell," she said gaily. "Did you see Mr. Currie and me in the front gallery seat last Sunday when you preached at Kensington? I want to tell you that it was the best sermon I have heard since I came to London. I do wish Hampstead were not so far away."

"That would be nothing to Uncle Archie's horses," said Stephen quickly, while a gratified expression crossed the clergyman's face. He was not a persona grata at Fair Lawn, and in some unaccountable way had missed his mark at Hampstead. Very little appreciation came in his way; therefore the sincere and kind words spoken by Katherine Wrede warmed his heart.

"May I bring my wife to speak to you, Miss Wrede?" he eagerly asked.

"I will come to her, Mr. Cadell," she said, with a steady grace. "It is only right that I should. Just let me finish my ice, will you?"

Someone sauntered up to speak to the clergyman, and Stephen bent over her reproachfully.

"Why are you so disagreeable to me, Katherine? You know I am only here to-day because you were coming. I loathe this sort of thing."

"Do you? I am sure it is very pleasant," she said quietly.

"And what do you want to go and talk to Mrs. Cadell for? You'll never get away. She'll pin you down for a week with trivialities. I tell you what, the Cadells are the greatest bores I know."

"You don't appreciate them as you ought. I like him sincerely, and I hope he will find his true sphere soon. He certainly hasn't found it in Hampstead."

"Won't you come for a turn round with me now, Katherine? It's really quite pretty at the back of the house, and the roses are out in plenty yet."

"Mr. Cadell may bring his wife to me at any minute, besides I didn't come to walk about with you. I must make myself agreeable to your mother's guests. That's why people come to garden parties."

"Why wouldn't you see me last Sunday when I called," he persisted.

"I had a headache. No, it wasn't any make-up, I assure you. I never came down all the evening."

"Well, I'll come to-morrow."

"Don't, we have three men already coming to lunch; I shall find them enough." She rose as she spoke, handed him her ice plate, and began to move across the lawn. She saw that she must put a stop to Stephen's talk, that it was approaching debateable ground. But he did not mean to be put off. Later on he managed by constant shadowing, observed by much piquant interest by many of the guests, and with inward chagrin by his mother, to get her alone again.

"Look here, Katherine, you're not going yet. Uncle Archie is still enjoying himself, and that awful Mrs. Cadell has got him fast in her toils. If I mayn't come to lunch when may I see you? Will you come down to Richmond with me one afternoon and we'll dine at the Star and Garter, and have a run on the river?"

She opened her eyes wide.

"Oh, Stephen, what will you suggest next? No, I certainly can't do that."

"You're tormenting me beyond endurance, Katherine, but you shan't browbeat me altogether. You know what I'm driving at. You will marry me, won't you?"

She lowered her sunshade until it came between her face and his eyes, and began to walk rather smartly away, but he kept pace with her.

"I mean to have you, Katherine. You've driven me nearly mad of late. You used to be much kinder to me. Do

Continued on page 34

W. A. Murray & Co. Limited
Established 1853

MURRAY-KAY Limited

John Kay Company Limited
Established 1843

Do Your Christmas Shopping
Through Our New Catalogue No. 5C

The goods illustrated on this page represent a few samples from our line of Roll Gold Plate and Gold Filled Lockets, Necklets, Brooches, Bar Pins, Hat Pins, Buckles, Fobs and Bracelets. All are of excellent quality. We carry nothing inferior.

M 188.—Neck Chain and Locket... $1.40
M 189.—Neck Chain and Locket... 2.00
M 190.—Neck Chain and Locket... 1.80
M 191.—Collar Pins, pair..... 1.90
M 192.—Collar Pins, pair..... 2.10
M 193.—Collar Pins, pair..... 1.20
M 194.—Bar Pin..... 2.20
M 195.—Brooch..... 1.40
M 196.—Bar Pin, pierced..... .60
M 197.—Bar Pin, stone set..... 1.00
M 198.—Bracelet, stone set..... 2.50
M 199.—Bracelet, stone set..... 7.40
M 200.—Bracelet, stone set..... 7.00
M 201.—Bracelet, pierced..... 6.30
M 202.—Bracelet, plain..... 6.00
M 203.—Bracelet, plain 5.50
M 204.—Bracelet, chased..... 5.00
M 205.—Bracelet, chased..... 4.00
M 206.—Expansion Bracelet, Locket top..... 6.30
M 207.—Expansion Bracelet, plain.. $3.50
M 208.—Ex Bracelet, Stone Set Locket..... 7.60
M 209.—Locket, stone set..... 3.90
M 210.—Signet Scarf Pin..... 1.20
M 211.—Signet Scarf Pin, shield centre..... 1.40
M 212.—Locket, stone set..... 4.20
M 213.—Plain Bracelet..... 2.60
M 214.—Neck Chain and Locket... 2.50
M 215.—Neck Chain and Locket... 2.80
M 216.—Neck Chain and Locket... 2.00
M 217.—Collar Pins, pair..... 1.30
M 218.—Collar Pins, pair..... 1.70
M 219.—Collar Pins, pair..... 1.70
M 220.—Brooch..... 2.90
M 221.—Brooch..... 1.40
M 222.—Bar Pin Chain..... 2.70
M 224.—Bar Pin Chain, stone set... 3.20
M 225.—Neck Chain, curb..... 1.10
M 226.—Bar Pin, stone set..... 1.00
M 227.—Bar Pin, stone set..... 1.00
M 228.—Lorgnette, stone set slide.. 2.80
M 229.—Belt Buckle, stone set..... 5.30
M 230.—Belt Buckle, stone set..... 5.70
M 231.—Belt Buckle, stone set..... 5.20
M 232.—Belt Buckle..... 2.10
M 233.—Belt Buckle, stone set..... 4.80
M 234.—Belt Buckle, signet shield.. $4.50
M 235.—Belt Buckle, stone set..... 4.80
M 236.—Belt Buckle..... 2.80
M 237.—Cuff Links, plain..... 2.50
M 238.—Cuff Links, thread edge.... 2.80
M 239.—Double Link, thread edge.. 1.00
M 240.—Double Link..... 1.00
M 241.—Hat Pin..... .70
M 242.—Hat Pin, stone top..... .70
M 244.—Chain Fobs, gents..... 6.00
M 245.—Metal Fob, ladies..... 5.60
M 243.—Hat Pin, stone top..... 1.00
M 246.—Fob, ladies..... 4.90
M 247.—Fob, ladies..... 1.70
M 248.—Fob, gents..... 4.80
M 249.—Fob, gents..... 1.80
M 250.—Fob, gents..... 3.30
M 251.—Fob, Masonic or Oddfellows..... 4.80
M 252.—Chain Fob..... 8.40
M 253.—Chain Fob..... 6.30
M 254.—Hat Pin, stone set..... .70
M 255.—Square Cuff Link..... 2.80
M 256.—Cuff Link chased..... 2.80
M 257.—Cuff Link, pierced edge.... 2.80
M 258.—Double Link, plain..... 2.80
M 259.—Hat Pin, stone set..... 1.00
M 260.—Hat Pin, stone set..... 1.00

Christmas is coming—fast. It is high time to make out a list of the presents you intend giving. This catalogue No. 5C will help you. If you have not already received your copy write for it to-day. It illustrates many beautiful lines of Silverware, Cut Glass, Jewelry and other things ideally suited for gifts and enables you to make selection of new, artistic and reliable goods at lowest city prices.

Note the finely made Jewelry featured on this page, choose any of the articles illustrated; send us your order with payment enclosed, and we will mail the articles selected, postage paid, to any address in Canada. If you are not entirely satisfied return the goods and we will at once refund your money.

MURRAY-KAY LIMITED
17 to 31 KING STREET EAST - - TORONTO

Every Advertiser in this issue is Guaranteed by the Publishers.

CHRISTMAS GIFTS

TRY ordering your Christmas Gifts from HENRY BIRKS & SONS, LIMITED, this year. You will find that it will prove very satisfactory. Your gifts will be different—of the best quality—appropriately wrapped in neat cases. Your money refunded upon the return of any article that is not satisfactory.

Catalogue free upon request

HENRY BIRKS & SONS
LIMITED
Gold and Silversmiths
MONTREAL OTTAWA WINNIPEG
VANCOUVER
Send your order to nearest address.
Order by number.

45888 Shears and Paper Knife, $1.00
72125 Scissors, in case, $1.00
64003. Sterling-silver Napkin Ring, $2.00
72134 Sewing Companion, 50 cts.
52087. Pencil Stand, $1.00
72127. Ribbon Sewing Companion, $1.25
64325. Egg Timer, Sterling-silver, $2.00
64334 Dutch Silver Spoon, $1.50
45829. Knife, 2 blades and corkscrew, 75 cts.

Read our Special Christmas Subscription Offer on page 30 and send the Canadian Home Journal to your friends for Christmas

Your Costly Silver is Worthy of the Greatest Care

Did you ever stop to think of the hard labor and work spent in the average household cleaning the silverware? All the rubbing, scrubbing, polishing and dust. Oh, say, it's awful.

That rubbing WEARS AWAY the silver or plate very rapidly—it can't help but do so.

The best and most modern way of cleaning Silver, Gold and Plated Ware, and with NO RUBBING, is the WONDER-SHINE Way.

This method is now being used altogether by the leading Hotels, Clubs and many owners of Gold, Silver and plate services.

Silver Lasts Longer—Shine Lasts Longer

IT IS SO EASY TO USE. A 25c. package contains everything complete, with full directions for using, and with it you can clean all your silverware many times.

Does all the work in quarter the time.

25c. and 50c. Per Package

WONDER-SHINE
SILVER CLEANER

Read our Advertisement Guarantee on Page Three of this issue.

Furnishing a Home on a Moderate Income

By JESSIE E. RORKE

THE DINING ROOM.

WITH the exception of the living-room the dining-room should be the most cheerful room of the house. Meals are much more attractive if served in a room that is bright and airy, and the family are tempted to linger and discuss plans and subjects of interest, as this is often the only place where they are sure to be all together during the day. Plenty of windows that open readily will go far toward making it a charming room—and where one may choose, an eastern exposure, or, better still, both eastern and southern, is most desirable. It is a pleasant beginning for a day that promises to be chilly and depressing, to come down to breakfast in a room that is flooded with sunshine. Later in the day our environment has less effect upon our feelings, and when the evening meal comes, in the cooler months, the position of the windows makes little difference, as the days are so short as to make artificial light a necessity. In summer, however, it is very necessary to have the dining-room windows well shaded, by trees or vines, if possible, as these make much the coolest shade, but if not by awnings. The housewife whose dining-room opens upon a wide, cool verandah or a shaded corner of the lawn, where the summer meals may be served, is very fortunate indeed, but if this cannot be accomplished plenty of fresh air without sunshine or even too strong a light will make the dining-room a pleasant place to linger after the heat of the office or the fields.

The curtains should be so arranged that they will either admit or temper the light as one may desire, and at all times allow the air to enter freely. This is accomplished easily by using different curtains for the different seasons, in the winter hanging only one set of madras or some other transparent material, and in the summer using fine net curtains next the glass and inner curtains of plain or printed linen, or any material that is woven closely enough to be opaque and yet is cool and light in effect. A pure white in curtains is often not pleasing with the color scheme, a slight shade or cream or ivory harmonizing much more readily. If one prefers to use the same curtains during the whole year nothing is more satisfactory than madras or net. Madras is to be had in pretty designs with quiet harmonious colorings, particularly the soft dull shades of red, green and blue that make attractive colors for a bright dining-room. The net comes in pure white ivory, deep cream or ecru. It is well to remember in selecting the curtains that unless the walls are plain, or have only a very inconspicuous design, figured materials are better avoided. When curtains are not plain they usually emphasize the contrasting rather than the prevailing color in the room. In hanging the curtains nothing is more attractive than straight, graceful lines from the pole to the sill.

Casement windows that may be swung wide open at pleasure are very suitable for the dining-room, admitting as they do abundance of fresh air and sunshine. Where the panes are leaded only the simplest of hangings should be used and these preferably of some sheer material. Shades may be omitted entirely unless they are needed to temper the glare of sunlight where the window is not otherwise protected.

IN arranging the artificial lighting, top lights should be avoided. The lights should be arranged on the walls, on the table itself, or hung low from the ceiling, so that the brightest light centers upon the table and glitters and glances charmingly upon the silver and glass.

In selecting paper one must decide in the outset whether the walls are to be decorative in themselves or whether they are to form a background for the pictures and china. In either case they should be subdued in coloring, and, in the latter, inconspicuous in pattern as well. If the paper has a bold and decorative design no pictures should be hung and very little china displayed on the plate-rail or in any place where it comes in close contact with the paper. This season's tendency to use extremely dark background in the wall paper should not tempt one to introduce such gloomy surroundings into a small home, even a very strong light will not counteract the dull and contracted effect of such walls. Any division of the wall, such as the use of a plate-rail will have a tendency to make the ceiling appear lower, and the use of a ceiling paper with a noticeable design or in any but the lightest tints will have the same effect. In some of the simpler dining-rooms the plaster is left with a rough surface and tinted some soft tone that makes a pleasing neutral shade for the color scheme. This often gives a very good effect, but does not, of course, correspond with expensive woods or draperies.

Plain rugs, or rugs in several shades of one color, are always pretty for the dining-room, though with plain walls and hangings the Oriental colors may be used on the floor. Hardwood floors entail so much labor that most housekeepers prefer to use a large rug, leaving only two or three feet of space at the wall.

Mahogany and walnut are at present the most popular wood for dining-room

A BUILT-IN SIDEBOARD

furniture, but some of the cheaper woods are made up in pieces that are almost equally pretty. Birch is perhaps the most satisfactory of the cheaper woods, the sheets of veneer when the grain is convoluted or curly being almost as beautiful as mahogany and quite as substantial. In the dining-room more than in any other we may readily sacrifice any attempt at ornament in the furniture, choosing rather the best of workmanship and simple dignity and beauty of line and proportion. Straight-backed, comfortable chairs, a sideboard and table making up the necessary furniture, though a small serving table or a cabinet is often added. The eighteenth century sideboard has never yet been excelled in beauty and grace, but many of the modern designs that follow the general type of the Hepplewhite and Sheraton models are very attractive. An overloaded sideboard is never pleasing. A few good pieces of silver, glass or china are sufficient to display, or some prefer to keep even these away where they will not be exposed to the gas and dust and require less care, and use only a bowl of flowers or a potted plant on the sideboard.

DINING-ROOM CHAIRS OF THE 18TH CENTURY

